The SPEAKER. The call of the States is concluded.

SMOKING.

Mr. LYMAN. Mr. Speaker, I rise to a point of order, and ask for the reading of clause 7, rule XIV.

The Clerk read as follows:

7. While the Speaker is putting a question or addressing the House no member shall walk out of or across the Hall, nor, when a member is speaking, pass between him and the Chair; and during the session of the House no member shall wear his hat or remain by the Clerk's desk during the call of the roll or the counting of ballots, or smoke upon the floor of the House; and the Sergeant-at-Arms and Doorkeeper are charged with the strict enforcement of this clause.

Mr. LYMAN. Mr. Speaker, great complaint has been made by many ladies of the bad state of the air in the galleries of this House; so bad they are obliged often to withdraw. They state further that this condition is owing largely to the amount of tobacco smoke which rises from the floor of the House.

Now, sir, I do not ask to have smoking stopped on the floor of the House on my own account, for I would never think of dictating to my fellow-members what they should do either in the matter of smoking or in respect to the singular and gymnastic position some gentlemen occasionally assume in this Hall.

Several MEMBERS. Name them.

Mr. LYMAN. I was about to state one lady said, on looking down on a gentleman below her, she thought it could not be healthy for him to lie on a sofa with his knees higher than his head, a lighted cigar in his mouth, and a newspaper held over his head. [Laughter.]

But I do not object to that, sir. I think, however, the visitors to this House have some rights that should be respected; and I ask, therefore, in their behalf that the Sergeant-at-Arms be instructed, on account of the people in the galleries, to strictly enforce the rule, to which I have called the attention of the House, upon this floor.

Mr. TALBOTT. I wish to offer a suggestion to the gentleman, which I think will carry out his wishes in this matter, and that is as to whether it would not in his judgment be better, inasmuch as they are dissatisfied with the present arrangement in the gallery, to throw open to them this lobby in the rear of the Speaker's chair, which is of little use to members of the House, and give them free access to that portion of the building, which would no doubt be more convenient for them and more convenient for members who have occasion to see them.

Mr. LYMAN. I confine my remarks strictly to the rule in question, and think on account of the ladies in the galleries and those persons who object to this practice generally it should be enforced.

The SPEAKER. The Chair has observed with regret that the rule to which the gentleman from Massachusetts now calls attention has been violated frequently by members upon the floor, and has more than once, as the House will remember, directed the Sergeant-at-Arms and Doorkeeper to see that it was enforced. The Chair will again direct the officers of the House to see that the rule is rigidly enforced. It is necessary not only for the comfort of visitors in the galleries but for the comfort of members on the floor that there should be no smoking in the Hall of the House, in the seats, or that part of the House known as the lobby. The Chair hopes that members will hereafter, without admonition on the part of the Chair or other officers of the House, respect this rule.

Mr. KEIFER. I wish to ask, so that it be definitely understood, whether or not the rule extends to that part of the Hall outside of the railing or screen?

The SPEAKER. It does.

Mr. KEIFER. Then that ought to be distinctly understood.

The SPEAKER. In fact, the rule according to its terms extends to the lobby in the rear of the Speaker's chair, because by law that is made a part of the Hall of the House. The Chair, however, has never undertaken to enforce the rule strictly in the lobby, for that is the most convenient place for members to meet, in order to avoid the disagreeable effect of smoking in the other parts of the Hall.

Mr. SCALES. I wish, Mr. Speaker, to ask at this time consent to offer a resolution——

The SPEAKER. The Chair was about to proceed to recognize members who were absent when their States were called.

Mr. WHITE, of Kentucky. Before that is done, on the subject under consideration I wish——

The SPEAKER. That has been disposed of. There is nothing before the House.

Mr. WHITE, of Kentucky. Then I desire to renew it.

The SPEAKER. In what form?

Mr. WHITE, of Kentucky. In the form of an inquiry. I wish to know whether the lobbies, the corridors extending to Statuary Hall, are not also under the control of the Speaker, and whether in the interest of decency and especially for the benefit of the ladies who come to the Capitol and have to pass through that hall on their way to the galleries that order should not be made to apply also to that portion of the Capitol, to prohibit smoking and spitting all over the floors out there?

The SPEAKER. The Chair does not think there is anything in the question made by the gentleman from Kentucky which would make it relevant to the question submitted by the gentleman from Massachusetts. It is for the House itself to determine whether it will extend the rule to the corridors outside of the Hall.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. BLACKBURN. Not being present when my State was called, I ask the privilege of introducing some bills for reference.

REPORT ON SWINE PRODUCTS.

Mr. BARBOUR. I call for the regular order.

Mr. SCALES. I desire to make a privileged report. I am instructed by the Committee on Printing to report back with a favorable recommendation and to ask for the present consideration of the joint resolution (H. Res. 192) providing for the printing of certain documents relating to the unhealthfulness of swine products in the United States. I ask that the report be read.

The report was read, as follows:

The Committee on Printing, to whom was referred the joint resolution (H. Res. 192) submit the following report:

The resolution in question provides for printing 60,000 copies of the report of the Secretary of State and accompanying report, made by a commission designated by the President, investigating the alleged unhealthfulness of the swine products of the United States. The investigation covers a question of vast moment to the public and should be widely disseminated. The report is elaborate, covering 136 pages, and will cost about $3,800 by the Printer's estimate.

The committee recommend the passage of the resolution.

The joint resolution was read, as follows:

Resolved, &c., That there be printed 60,000 copies of the report of the Secretary of State, and accompanying report made by the commission lately designated by the President to examine and report upon the asserted unhealthfulness of the swine products of this country, together with the message of the President transmitting the same to the House of Representatives; 45,000 copies thereof for the use of the members of the House of Representatives, 10,000 copies for the use of the Senate, and 5,000 copies thereof for the use of the Department of Agriculture.

The joint resolution was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading; and it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. SCALES moved to reconsider to vote by which the joint resolution was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

Mr. CURTIN. I desire to offer a resolution for reference.

The SPEAKER. If the demand for the regular order is not insisted upon the Chair must recognize the gentleman from New York [Mr. ROGERS] to make a report from the Committee on Printing.

Mr. BARBOUR. I must insist upon the regular order.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will read the resolution under which the House will proceed during the remainder of this day.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That the second and fourth Mondays of each calendar month hereafter, during the continuance of the Forty-eighth Congress, after the call of States and Territories for bills and joint resolutions, be, and the same are hereby, set apart for the consideration of such business as may be presented by the Committee on the District of Columbia.

STAR-ROUTE PAPERS.

The SPEAKER. Before proceeding under the special order the Chair will state that the Post-Office Department desires leave to withdraw from the files of the House the reports of the special agents to investigate the star-route service, having sent the original papers to the House in response to a resolution of the House. The papers have now been printed, and constitute a public document in possession of the House. If there be no objection, leave will be granted to the Department to withdraw the original papers. [After a pause.] The Chair hears none, and leave is granted accordingly.

STANDARD OF TIME IN DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA.

Mr. BARBOUR. I call up for consideration at this time Senate bill No. 616, to establish a standard of time in the District of Columbia, now on the House Calendar, and reported favorably from the Committee on the District of Columbia.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the legal standard of time in the District of Columbia shall hereafter be the mean time of the seventy-fifth meridian of longitude west from Greenwich.

SEC. 2. That this act shall not be so construed as to affect existing contracts.

Mr. BARBOUR. I desire to say in explanation of this bill that it was referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia, and reported by that committee back to the House with a recommendation that it be passed.

As I understand it, this bill has been approved by the Attorney-General and by Professor Hilgard, Superintendent of the Coast Survey, so far as concerns the technical language and scientific terms of the bill, as well as the legal effect of the words employed in the bill. As matters now stand, we have two standards of time in the District of Columbia, one for the people and the business element, and the other for the Government officers. It is desirable that but one standard of time shall exist in the District of Columbia.

I do not know that it is necessary for me to say anything further, except to remind the House that some time ago the Attorney-General gave it as his opinion that the standard of time in the Government offices could not be changed without an act of Congress. This bill has been framed to meet that view. If any gentleman desires to discuss the bill, I will yield for that purpose; if not, I call the previous question.

Mr. WHITE, of Kentucky. Before that is done I ask the gentleman to allow me to offer an amendment which in my opinion, and also in that of the chief the Naval Observatory, will not cripple the bill, but will strengthen it very materially. I ask him to hear the amendment read, so that he can decide whether he will permit it to be offered or not. In the last Congress the Committee on Commerce, after careful consideration, reported a bill to the House to provide for transmitting meridian time from the Naval Observatory at Washington to ports of entry and other cities, for placing time-balls on custom-houses for the protection of commerce, and other purposes.

The SPEAKER. Debate is not in order pending the demand for the previous question. If the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. WHITE] desires to make a request of the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. BARBOUR] he can do so.

Mr. WHITE, of Kentucky. I ask that the proposed amendment be read.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Virginia consent to allow the proposed amendment to be read for information pending the demand for the previous question?

Mr. BARBOUR. I have no objection.

The Clerk read as follows:

That the sum of $25,000 be, and is hereby, appropriated, to be paid out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to provide for the expense of transmitting daily by telegraph the standard time from the Naval Observatory at Washington, D. C., to all the principal maritime ports of the United States having a custom-house, to United States navy-yards, and to State capitals, and cities having a population of not less than 15,000 inhabitants, when requested by the authorities thereof. The Secretary of the Treasury shall erect a suitable clock and time-ball on the custom-house at each of said maritime ports, and detail a person in each to attend to them, at an additional compensation of $5 per month at each custom-house for the extra work thus imposed. The Secretary of the Treasury is hereby authorized to pay for the same out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated: Provided, That no city other than a port of entry with a custom-house shall be furnished with a clock and time-ball, or keeper for the same, by the Secretary of the Treasury. The said appropriation of $25,000 to be expended under the direction of the Secretary of the Navy.

Mr. WHITE, of Kentucky. I ask the gentleman from Virginia to allow me to explain why I desire to have this amendment adopted.

Mr. BARBOUR. I can not consent to allow the amendment to be offered. [Cries of "Regular order!"]

Mr. WHITE, of Kentucky. I hope the regular order will not be insisted upon, and that the gentleman from Virginia will not shut out this amendment without knowing its object. It is a matter affecting the interests of the whole country.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Virginia declines to yield to permit the amendment to be offered. The remedy of the gentleman from Kentucky is to induce the House to vote down the demand for the previous question.

The previous question was ordered; and under the operation thereof the bill was ordered to a third reading, and was accordingly read the third time.

The SPEAKER. Under the rules of the House thirty minutes are now allowed for debate; fifteen minutes in support of the bill, and fifteen minutes in opposition to it.

Mr. WHITE, of Kentucky. Mr. Speaker, the amendment which I have had read and to which the gentleman in charge of this bill objects is in substance a bill which after careful consideration by the Committee on Commerce at the last session was unanimously adopted and reported favorably to the House. It is a bill which I may say was prepared for the most part by the late Rear-Admiral John Rodgers, of the Navy, who was at that time Superintendent of the Naval Observatory. The object of the bill was to give to this country what the railroad companies now partially do by dividing up the country into zones. On account of the step which the railroad companies have taken since the last session of Congress I have modified the bill so as to read "standard time" instead of Naval Observatory or "Washington time."

To-day the standard time in this zone is the same as the standard time in Maine and in Chicago. Nature knows no such time. It is adopted only for the convenience of commerce. Now, the bill prepared last year proposed one time-zone for the whole United States, instead of several time-zones which the railroad companies have now arranged. Every civilized country on the globe except the United States has I believe a national standard of time. The railroad companies now arrange the time for this country. I do not object to that, because it is an improvement upon the condition of things which we had a year or two ago; but put this amendment upon the bill and very soon we shall have one uniform time for the whole United States. It matters not whether it be Greenwich time or Washington time, it will be uniform time, according to which all the railroad, maritime, and commercial business of the country will be transacted; and yet each locality can easily ascertain and duly respect its local time, for it is not to be supposed that by legislative enactment we shall retard or accelerate for one moment the movements of the earth or sun.

Of course I do not mean to say that we should attempt to change the movements of the sun or the earth; but I do mean to say that we should have one standard time for the movements of commerce throughout this nation. Each principal city, each important port of entry, each State capital throughout the nation, if this amendment be adopted, will have a time-ball on a suitable public building in those cities dropped at the same instant—say at noon every day—by the Naval Observatory here in Washington, at the nation's expense. The expense for erecting time-balls and the dropping apparatus would be less than $200 for each city entitled to it. How easy it will be for every such city to ascertain by astronomical calculation its local or national time, and by an additional hand on the clock have both standard time and national or local time without any inconvenience, while enjoying the blessing of standard time, signaled at noon daily to every important city.

To show the necessity of a uniform standard of time in the District of Columbia the gentleman from Virginia refers to the decision of the Attorney-General. Is it not more important to signal standard time all over the country, to give security to life and property, to promote foreign and interstate commerce, than to establish a standard time for the District of Columbia? It was for the purpose of sending out standard time and securing uniform time to every important city in the United States that Rear-Admiral John Rodgers prepared and asked the passage of the bill which was unanimously reported from the Committee on Commerce at the last session, and which the gentleman from Virginia, if he will carefully examine it, will see that he ought to accept. It contains nothing objectionable, but on the contrary it aims simply to secure a uniform system of time throughout the United States. It was not opposed at the last session of Congress except by two or three little observatories that were then selling their computations of time to certain railroad companies. Are you going to jeopardize the lives of people traveling on railroads and steamships and the commerce of the nation in order to put a few dollars into the pockets of those in charge of a few local observatories?

We have a national observatory here at Washington. Let us have this observatory send out to the capitals of States and to the important ports of entry in the United States Washington standard time—whether it be Washington natural time or Greenwich time. Then if other cities want the standard time they can have it by merely putting up their telegraph lines and their time-balls, &c., and the Naval Observatory of the Government will signal correct or standard Washington time by dropping the time-balls every day at noon for them. I ask the gentleman from Virginia to reconsider his objection to the amendment and to withdraw it. With the consent of the House I will publish with my remarks a statement carefully considered by the Committee on Commerce at the last session—a statement more thorough, more exhaustive, and more convincing than anything which I am prepared to submit at this time without special preparation.

MERIDIAN TIME AND TIME-BALLS ON CUSTOM-HOUSES.

March 9, 1882.—Mr. WHITE, from the Committee on Commerce, submitted the following report:

The Committee on Commerce, to whom was referred a bill to provide for placing time-balls on custom-houses at ports of entry, and for other purposes, having considered the same, make the following report:

The Naval Observatory, our only national observatory, is the proper and sole reliable source under the control of the Government from which exact time can be furnished for the promotion of foreign and interstate commerce.

Foreign nations have for years taken care to signal the correct time from their observatories, whereby the master of a ship, up to the last day of his stay in port, may ascertain the corrections to his chronometers. By these he is enabled, with the help of astronomical observations, to find the correct place of the ship on the chart. Having this, he sails with more security, with more confidence, in less time, with fewer chances consequently of bad weather, with diminished charges for passage, freight, and insurance. These are important helps to commerce, so important that foreign governments are careful to secure them. We, if true to our interests, will not neglect them. The railroads of the United States, embarrassed by the evils arising from their multiple schedules of service, about seventy in number, are now earnestly seeking a remedy for them. This remedy can be readily furnished by the Government through the Naval Observatory. The benefit will be appreciated by the public at large. It only needs that Congress make the necessary appropriation to do this work, which will give greater security to life and property, as well by sea as by land.

The local time and the Washington time can be furnished wherever desired by very simple and inexpensive means, while in truth but a single signal need be sent at Washington noon, or a local clock, regulated through the telegraph by the Washington clock, may be so arranged as to drop a ball automatically at any hour which the citizens or the corporations may prefer. This may be done for any number of local clocks. From the Zeitsignal Stationen it will be seen how earnestly the countries of Europe and of the colonies have taken up the subject of time-signals for securing this important and indeed indispensable aid to the commerce and convenience of nations.

It is the general and most suitable rule to use the national meridian for the prime meridian of the country; most suitable, since the national meridian must be nearer any local one than a foreign meridian can be.

The Naval Observatory already finds the time with the necessary accuracy and to send it out only needs funds to pay for the transmission of the telegraphic signals. Having the observatory, the Government consequently possesses exact time, the important and difficult part of the work being already paid for. The small appropriation asked will secure to a very large extent the benefits contemplated by the bill.

The time is to be furnished by officers of the Naval Observatory, under the direction of the Secretary of the Navy, and through instruments and apparatus solely under the control of the Navy Department. It seems therefore proper that the appropriation should be expended under the sanction of that Department.

On this subject your committee have the honor to call your attention to communications from the honorable Secretary of the Navy and Rear-Admiral John Rodgers, of the Naval Observatory.

In view, therefore, of these benefits, your committee report the bill named above with the accompanying modifications, and recommend its passage.

NAVY DEPARTMENT, Washington, January 30, 1882.

GENTLEMEN: The bill with reference to placing "time-balls on custom-houses at ports of entry and at other cities, and for other purposes." was submitted by me to Rear-Admiral John Rodgers, Superintendent of the United States Naval Observatory.

The report of that learned and distinguished officer is forwarded to your committee and commended most strongly to their approval. It entirely coincides with the views entertained on the subject by the Department. The appropriation contemplated by the bill ought properly to be made by the Committee on Commerce. The measure proposed is especially for the benefit of the commercial interests of the nation. The information is to be furnished by the Naval Observatory, by officers, and through instruments and apparatus solely under control of this Department. It is therefore proper that the appropriation should be expended under the sanction of the Department.

It is to be hoped that a measure so generally useful will be promptly adopted by Congress.

I have the honor to be, very respectfully, your obedient servant,

WILLIAM H. HUNT,
Secretary of the Navy.

To the honorable JOHN D. WHITE, WILLIAM WARD, THOS. H. HERNDON, Subcommittee on Commerce, House of Representatives.

UNITED STATES NAVAL OBSERVATORY,
Washington, February 4, 1882.

SIR: Every one has remarked that with the seasons the stars and the planets change their apparent places in the heavens; or, in other words, that time enters into their positions with respect to their places in the sky. At an observatory, consequently, accurate time must be kept. This can only be done by regulating-clocks, the highest human mechanism for measuring time, by means of the movements of the heavenly bodies, which, regulated by the Divine Artificer, move with perfect accuracy.

That the Naval Observatory keeps time as accurately as humanity allows may then be assumed without any statement to this effect. It has in practical use all the means of doing this—telescopes, chronographs, clocks, and trained observers.

It sends out the time every day to New York; and, besides dropping a ball at noon from the dome of the observatory, it gives daily signals to several places in the city.

The telegraph is used in the transmission of time, and as the signal travels at a rate sometimes reckoned as equal to ten times the circumference of the earth in one second of time, it may, for any practicable distance, be considered as instantaneous.

Carefully elaborated mechanism devised here is used to give automatically the time to the electric wires. These pass it on in a flash to the end of the route; and the telegraph company has it in its power to signal to as many places as it chooses the same flash at the same moment. This flash may be used, and is used, to drop a ball, which, it is needless to say, falls at once.

Ships find their longitude mainly by means of chronometers—time-pieces regulated to run accurately independent of the movements of the vessel. Other means are known to navigators; but practically these other methods are little used at sea. The chronometer is used to show the time, at the prime meridian, of Greenwich, Paris, Madrid, Pulkova, or other [places.] The local time of the ship is found by astronomical observation at sea. The difference between the time shown by the chronometer and the local time is an expression in time for the difference of longitude between the prime meridian and the ship at the rate of fifteen degrees for each hour.

Our ships navigate by Greenwich as the prime meridian. This is in obedience to a law of Congress. Originally, the United States published no chart and no nautical almanac, and our ships were forced to use the publications of England. When in process of time private publishers copied the charts of England, the prime meridian of the mother country continued to be used. When the Nautical Almanac was calculated and published in the United States it was then proposed to adopt for the United States Washington as its prime meridian. This so conflicted with private interests, since the adoption would necessitate throwing away all the large and valuable copper-plates of private publishers engraved to Greenwich as the prime meridian, that Congress passed a law that the Nautical Almanac should have certain parts for the use of shipping calculated and published for the meridian of Greenwich and certain parts for the meridian of Washington. (Revised Statutes, section 435.)

This law is now operative, and I am not prepared to say it is not a good one. The great chart-makers of the world are the English. Their surveying vessels explore every coast and every sea. Wherever our ships sail they find that the principal sources of maritime knowledge are English ones; and they use the longitude which our sailors use, namely, Greenwich.

In signaling time, however, it makes no difference what noon is shown. Since our noon is 5h. 8m. 12s. from Greenwich, the navigator has 5h. 8m. 12., Greenwich, signaled to him when our time at noon is shown; so for other prime meridians—Russian, German, French, or Spanish.

All the countries of Europe show time-signals in their seaports from their national observatories.

As navigation is based upon knowing the latitude and longitude of the ship, astronomy, as applied to navigation, can not be used without the time for which the nautical almanacs are computed.

Facilities to rate chronometers are then a necessary aid to the navigator. The navigator may rate his chronometer by his own observations, but not so well as by the help of an observatory; and it is not every ship which has an artificial horizon or has an observer accustomed to its use.

As was before said, the nautical tables predict the places of the heavenly bodies in the sky for the prime meridian of the almanac. As these places change every hour, the time of the prime meridian must be known with accuracy. This time is shown by the ship's chronometers; and their rate or daily performance must be known as well as the accumulated error. It has been found impossible to make watches which neither gain nor lose in time. The world, therefore, contents itself with ascertaining the daily change, which is called rate; and the accumulated daily rate, which is called error. A single comparison establishes the error; but the rate is found by continuous comparisons with a correct standard. For example: If the face of the chronometer on January 1 be one minute faster than, say, Washington time, one minute is the error; and if it gain one second every day, its rate is one second, gaining. The rate is supposed to remain constant; but the error changes every day by the addition of one second. On January 30 the error will be one minute thirty seconds; but the rate is still one second, gaining.

This error and this rate are necessary to the navigator; he can not else find his place on the charts, and the ship would lose her way. She would not know where she was, nor her position with regard to her port, nor to the shoals, rocks, and islands which may lie in her path. Time-signals from an observatory give the captain the means of finding the error and rate of his chronometer to the last day of his stay in port; a most important boon, one which enters as a prime factor in safety, and, consequently, in freights and insurance.

Most people who travel extensively by rail in the United States find the changes of time on railroads from one meridian to another a vexatious snare and delusion. His watch running on mean time can not inform the traveler of the constant alterations in the schedules of the railroads. He finds by his time-table that the next train starts five minutes after his arrival, or even before he arrives; when, in fact, he has half an hour for his meal. This arises from the connecting trains using different prime meridians.

The people away from observatories find that their clocks and watches differ extremely, and no one knows which are right; they may all be wrong. Jewelers are considered the repositories of correct local time. The intelligent ones know that they have no means of ascertaining this correctly. The citizen knows that they all differ. He is often content to take railroad time brought from a distance. Savages, to whom time is of little importance, are content to estimate it very roughly; but the civilized man, making exact appointments, specifies the time of his various engagements, and in proportion to his activity and usefulness, exact time is to him a matter of necessity. Some of the large towns of the United States have made arrangements with their State observatories whereby they have observatory time of their own selection sent to them by electric telegraph. These towns are entitled to their preferences. Congress, I presume, has no wish to interfere with them. I think it would be well to have Washington time given to shipping, for the benefit of commerce, by means of a time-ball on the custom-house, or other building, selected by the Secretary of the Treasury. All sailors who cross the ocean keep local time for the regulation of life and labor on shipboard, and that of some prime meridian, in order properly to use the astronomical predictions of the Nautical Almanac for finding the position of the ship.

This solution of the time problem seems the plain-sense practical one; the national prime meridian of Washington, for certain purposes, requiring continuous time and local time for the daily purposes of life.

If no objection be found in law, I should venture to propose as a boon to travelers, that under the power to regulate post-roads, given by the Constitution to Congress, all railroads which carry the mails be required to print continuous Washington time in their tables, leaving them at liberty to run on the time they may select, and to print whatever else they please. The traveler will be protected from vexation and annoyance and the railroads have the same freedom as now to select their standards and print their schedules regulating travel.

It appears, however, that the railroads, finding the inconveniences of the multiple standards of time, are seeking for a uniform one for their own use. (See a notice from Mr. W. F. Allen, secretary, printed on the forty-third page of the Travelers' Official Railroad Guide for January, 1881.)

The only proper standard of time is, if the practice of the world be taken as a guide, that of the national prime meridian, namely, Washington time for the United States.

Finally, it is recommended from all the foregoing premises that a time-ball be dropped from this observatory at all the principal ports of entry of the United States, at Washington noon, and that any city, town, or railroad desiring it may receive the same signal. It will only be necessary that at each point where the signal is received a suitable means be provided. This may be accomplished by having a clock connected with the telegraph wire over which the signal passes. The clock may be so arranged that the signal will set the clock every day to Washington noon. By having two hour and two minute hands upon the same dial, the clock could be made to show the local time of the place as well as Washington time.

It seems advisable that the appropriation for time-signals be inserted in the bill for the protection of commerce, rather than in the bill for the Navy proper, as the Navy would in the latter case be charged for an accommodation which belongs to commerce rather than to the Navy. To the Government it can make no great difference, as the cost will be the same in either case. An additional advantage will be that the cost stands out alone and not covered up in other appropriations. It may be that the first cost of telegraphing time-signals to all the cities having a population of not less than 15,000 inhabitants will involve an outlay greater than Congress is willing to sanction.

The system should be allowed to grow gradually, rather than be forced at once into full vigor. No town, apparently, should have time-signals unless they be asked for; and the town should be at the expense of providing a suitable clock and a suitable person to take care of it, the signal only to be sent free of cost. Few towns of 15,000 inhabitants are without a jeweler who would gladly undertake the work, either singly or by co-operation.

Very respectfully, your obedient servant,

JOHN RODGERS,
Rear-Admiral, Superintendent.

Hon. JOHN D. WHITE,
Chairman Subcommittee on Committee on Commerce,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

UNITED STATES OBSERVATORY,
Washington, March 1, 1882.

DEAR SIR: I have the honor to acknowledge the receipt of your letter of the 25th ultimo, with its inclosure.

It is difficult to ascertain the exact cost of erecting time-balls, since the plans for doing the work are many, each one having its separate features.

I would recommend a simple light cylinder of metal, about 4 feet in length, and of the same diameter, running on a gas-tube 3 inches in diameter, about 11 feet long, falling into a metal tub. The cylinder falling into the tub of nearly the same size will compress the air; thus cushioning and coming to rest.

The cylinder, the tub, and tube are simple, easily made, and of common materials. They can not be dear. The exact cost I can not know, as I have not made them; but for this and for dropping apparatus I estimate $175.

I have an offer from Mr. P. H. Dudley of suitable clocks for $285 each; and his electrical attachment to set the clock automatically by time-signal each day for $50; wire, battery, and connections, $100; miscellaneous—packing, freight, &c., $50. In all, $660 for each station, in order to equip it for dropping the time-ball, and for a clock which will serve for regulating chronometers when the time-signal shall fail from storms or other causes. The bill of Hon. J. FLOYD KING (H. R. 594) has been so amended as to confine the time-signals by Government to the principal maritime ports.

In looking over a list of ports I estimate the "principal maritime ports" as numbering about twenty-three; which number, multiplied by the cost of time equipment, will amount to $15,840 for the United States. If this sum be proportioned to the value of our foreign commerce, it will be seen that it is not great.

The letter of the honorable Secretary of the Treasury is herewith returned.

Very respectfully, your obedient servant,

JOHN RODGERS,
Rear-Admiral, Superintendent.

Hon. JOHN D. WHITE,
Chairman of the Subcommittee of Committee on Commerce,
United States House of Representatives.

Mr. STEVENS. I do not rise to make objection to the proposition of the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. WHITE], but simply to say that if the sending out or transmission of standard time by any officer of the Government shall hereafter be deemed necessary or proper, we can provide for that in an independent bill. In reference to this bill I desire to say that its propriety is sufficiently indicated by the fact that nearly every city in the United States has adopted this system of time, and over forty-seven millions of people in the United States have their affairs regulated by it to-day. And it seems to me that fact of itself is sufficient reason why Congress should vote to pass this bill and put it into effect in the District of Columbia.

Mr. WHITE, of Kentucky. How much time have I remaining?

The SPEAKER. Ten minutes.

Mr. SPRINGER. I am of course in favor of the passage of this bill, as in the first week of the present session of Congress I asked unanimous consent to introduce a resolution having the same object in view; but objection was then made. It is important the city of Washington should have a uniform time with that section of the country which has already adopted by universal consent the standard of the seventy-fifth meridian. This city has been running on the old time since the 18th of November last, much to the inconvenience of citizens here and much to the inconvenience of the traveling community especially. I am much obliged for one to the honorable gentleman from Virginia [Mr. BARBOUR], and to the Committee on the District of Columbia, of which he is chairman, for reporting this bill favorably to the House. It should have been adopted at an earlier date. But it is never too late for the Representatives of the people to catch up with the business interests of the country.

Mr. BARBOUR. I do not wish to take up any more time of the House, and now, Mr. Speaker, ask for a vote on the bill.

The SPEAKER. The question is on ordering the bill to be engrosed and read a third time.

Mr. WHITE, of Kentucky. I should like to make a further statement.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman has ten minutes of his time remaining.

Mr. WHITE, of Kentucky. Now, Mr. Speaker, I wish to call the attention of this House to the fact that the standard time now is not Washington time, but, on the contrary, I am informed, is Greenwich time. We call it in this country the seventy-fifth meridian time, but I think it is Greenwich time. The amendment I offer proposes at a merely nominal expense to put a time-ball and dropping apparatus on each of the custom-houses in the large ports of entry of the United States and on the custom-house or other public buildings in the capital of each State of this Union. This can be done at the small expense of $25,000 for the whole United States. It is estimated that will be the first cost of erecting time-balls, dropping apparatus, &c., on the United States custom-house or other public buildings. After that it will cost but a few dollars per month to pay for a messenger in each place to put up the time-ball every morning. At noon the Naval Observatory, by electrical connection, will drop the ball. Ships lying in the harbor of New York or Philadelphia, or the people in Harrisburg or Frankfort and every other capital of a State in the Union and at other cities to be provided for, can see the time-ball when it falls at noon and regulate their timepieces accordingly. They will learn at once and daily what is the standard time without going around to the various silversmiths to learn what each of them thinks it is. It will prevent enough of accidents in one month perchance to pay all the expense which may be incurred.

Twenty-five thousand dollars will be the original outlay, and the expense after that of keeping the system up will be merely nominal. If your city or my town want standard time, it could then have it by putting up a time-ball and by making telegraphic connection with the Naval Observatory in Washington. In this way we would have the same time in every city in the Union that we have here in Washington. Whether the railroads would be willing to run by that time or not it is for them to decide. I am sure they would find it to their advantage. Thus far they have merely been able to divide the United States into zones, so that there should be one time from Maine to Chicago, and another from Chicago to Denver, and still another from Denver to San Francisco, differing each from the other one hour as you go westward. That of itself has been of great advantage, and yet the system is open to serious objections.

To show what the present Superintendent of the Naval Observatory thinks of the matter I will read a few lines which he has addressed to me:

NAVAL OBSERVATORY, January 29, 1884.

DEAR SIR: Mr. Moore has told me of your intention to offer your time bill as an amendment to the District standard-time bill. Your proposition is entirely satisfactory to the observatory. I inclose a copy of your bill, in which I have made the change from Washington to standard time. I understand that you approve this change. Such a change would prevent the necessity of further legislation in case any other time were required.

Yours, truly,

W. T. SAMPSON.

Hon. JOHN D. WHITE.

Of course everybody can see to-day the seventy-fifth meridian is the standard time, because so ordered by the railroad kings. To-morrow the railroads may make it seventy-sixth or eightieth meridian. The amendment proposed authorizes the National Observatory, which is a Government institution, to send the standard time to the capitals of the various States and to the large seaport towns every day at noon. To put up these time-balls, as I have already said, will cost at first the small expense of $25,000; afterward the expense of keeping up the system will be very little.

Unless some other gentleman desires to address the House, I will ask for a vote on my amendment.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Virginia declined to yield to the gentleman to offer his amendment, and the previous question has been ordered.

Mr. WHITE, of Kentucky. I will move that the bill be recommitted with instructions to the Committee on the District of Columbia to report it back with my amendment added to it.

The SPEAKER. That can not be done at this time, but the motion will be in order when the bill is on its passage.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time.

Mr. WHITE, of Kentucky. I move that the bill be recommitted with instructions to report it back with my amendments.

Mr. SPRINGER. I think that amendment is not in order as a part of this bill, as it relates to an entirely different subject.

The SPEAKER. The Chair heard it read, and if the point of order is made against it the Chair must sustain it.

Mr. SPRINGER. I make it.

The SPEAKER. The pending bill is simply a bill to establish a standard of time for the District of Columbia. The amendment proposed by the gentleman from Kentucky is to make it applicable to the whole country, and makes an appropriation of $25,000 for that purpose. This would have to go to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union under the rules of the House if the point of order is made against it.

Mr. SPRINGER. I make the point of order against it.

Mr. WHITE, of Kentucky. I am aware of the fact that it is subject to the point of order on the ground stated, if the gentleman makes it.

The SPEAKER. He does make it.

Mr. WHITE, of Kentucky. I supposed the gentleman was national enough not to make it.

The SPEAKER. The question is upon the passage of the bill.

The bill was passed.

Mr. BARBOUR moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

DEVISEES OF THE LATE DANIEL CARROLL.

Mr. BARBOUR. I now move, sir, to take up House bill 1594, for the relief of the devisees of the late Daniel Carroll, and put it upon its passage.

The SPEAKER. That bill is in Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar. In order to reach it the House must first go into Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar.

Mr. WILSON, of West Virginia. Mr. Speaker, under instructions from the Committee on the District of Columbia, I move to take from the Speaker's table Senate bill No. 196, which is exactly the same as House bill No. 1594, and put it upon its passage.

The SPEAKER. The bill will be read.

The bill is as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the devisees under the will of the late Daniel Carroll, of Duddington, deceased, their heirs or assigns, may prosecute a suit in the Courts of Claims, according to the rules of practice and proceedings in said court, against the District of Columbia, to recover such damages, if any, as they have sustained by reason of the change of grade and the regrading of the streets around square numbered 736 in the city of Washington; and the said court, if it shall appear that said claim for damages has not heretofore been presented or prosecuted before any board of audit established by the provisions of the act of Congress approved June 20, 1874, is hereby authorized to hear and determine the said suit; and in ascertaining the damages sustained by the plaintiffs the court is directed to take into consideration the advantages, if any, to the said square, numbered 736, resulting from the change of grade and regrading aforesaid. It shall be the duty of the attorney for the District to defend the said suit; and each party shall have the right to appeal for a final decision in such case to the Supreme Court of the United States, according to the existing rules of practice in such court.

SEC. 2. That it shall be the duty of the Secretary of the Treasury, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to pay to the said plaintiffs such sum as the Court of Claims may adjudge to be due them, or any or either of them, one-half of which sum shall be chargeable to the revenue derived from taxation within the District of Columbia.

Mr. HISCOCK. I object to the consideration of that bill.

The SPEAKER. The question is, Will the House consider the bill? The gentleman from West Virginia, under instructions from the Committee on the District of Columbia, moves to take up the Senate bill instead of the House bill. The gentleman from New York objects to the consideration of the bill.

Mr. WILSON, of West Virginia. Can I state the substance of the bill?

The SPEAKER. It is not debatable at present. The question is, Will the House consider the bill?

The House divided; and there were—ayes 67, noes 23.

So (no further count being demanded) the House determined to consider the bill.

Mr. WILSON, of West Virginia. Mr. Speaker, this is exactly the same bill which was referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia and reported by that committee to the House with a recommendation that it do pass. In substance this is the same bill that passed this House in the Forty-seventh Congress.

It went over to the Senate and was amended in form by substituting the words "devisees of Daniel Carroll, deceased," in place of the names of the parties themselves, and also by adding that in the suit which would be brought in the Court of Claims both parties to that suit, the representatives of the devisees of Daniel Carroll and of the District of Columbia, should have the right of appeal from the judgment of the Court of Claims to the Supreme Court of the United States.

In that form as amended the bill passed the Senate, but it did not come back to the House in time to be acted upon in the amended form by the Forty-seventh Congress. The facts of the case, as set forth in the report of the House committee, are that these damages were done to a certain square in this city west of the Capitol belonging to two old ladies, and that it was after the law had abolished the tribunal before which their claim for damages could be presented. The Forty-third Congress established a board of audit to consider and act upon claims arising out of damages done to property in the prosecution of works of improvements undertaken by this city. By an act of the Forty-fourth Congress that board was abolished before these parties had their day in court. The object of this bill is simply to give to the parties who claim to be seriously damaged by the progress of these improvements the right which was afforded to other parties in the District of Columbia; to give them an opportunity, inasmuch as the board of audit has been abolished, to present their claim and have it acted upon by the Court of Claims in lieu of the board of audit, and reserving the right of appeal both of the parties presenting the claim and those representing the District of Columbia from any judgment rendered by that court to the Supreme Court.

I think that statement is all that is necessary to make the necessity of passing this bill clear; but if any gentleman desires further information I will be glad to answer.

Mr. HISCOCK. What I have to say will be in the nature of a question, and I would like the gentleman's attention. As I listened to the reading of the bill I understood it to change the rule of law in reference to the allowance of damages for the change of the grade of the streets of this city. I understand it to be a well-settled principle that any municipality can change the grade of its streets and the adjoining owner of property has no remedy for damages. I understand that to be the rule of law in this city of Washington, as it is everywhere, that it is in the power—I repeat it—always in the power of a municipality to change the grade of its streets and that the adjoining owner has no remedy for damages. I understand that this bill gives these parties damages; that there is no cause of action; that under the old system, if the board of audit was in existence, the claimants in this case would have no claim against the District of Columbia; that this bill absolutely gives a claim to these people which does not now exist; and as there are very eminent lawyers on the Committee on the District of Columbia—I have in my eye now my colleague from the State of New York—I should be glad to hear him upon this precise question which I have stated.

Now, Mr. Speaker, if I am right in this and if it is the sense of this House that this bill ought to pass, it seems to me that you should pass a general law, in which you will give to every adjoining owner a cause of action against the District of Columbia for the damages he has sustained where the grade has been changed in front of his property. You settle the principle by this law. If the House is prepared to take that position, then I believe this bill should be passed. But if I am right in my understanding of the bill, it seems to me the House should hesitate and consider this question before it takes that action.

Mr. WILSON, of West Virginia. As I understand the gentleman from New York [Mr. HISCOCK] he is anticipating what may possibly be the decision of the court.

Mr. HISCOCK. No, sir; I understand that this bill—and if I am wrong in that I have no objection to its passage—that it makes it mandatory to give these damages to these claimants; that the court is obliged to give to the claimants whatever damages they have sustained, taking into account the benefits which they have received. Now I understand the rule of law to be that every municipality has the power to change the grade of its streets and the adjoining owner has no right of action therefor. And I am told by a gentleman who sits behind me that the claims in the District of Columbia depending upon the principle of this bill amount to $25,000,000.

Mr. RICE. I should like to ask a question, for I do not understand the law to be as my friend from New York states it.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from West Virginia has the floor.

Mr. WILSON, of West Virginia. I can only say as to the statement just made by the gentleman from New York that his information is entirely erroneous. This matter has been considered to some extent before the Committee on the District of Columbia. Of course we are not familiar with what has been the history of these claims heretofore. But our understanding and our information is that the Forty-third Congress, after abolishing the board of public works, established what was called the board of audit in the District of Columbia, consisting, if I remember rightly, of the First and Second Comptrollers of the Treasury; and that before that board parties having claims against the District of Columbia similar to these were allowed to present their claims and have them passed on by that board.

Mr. BLOUNT. Will the gentleman yield to me for a question?

Mr. WILSON, of West Virginia. Yes, sir.

Mr. BLOUNT. Was there any limitation of the time in which the claims had to be presented?

Mr. WILSON, of West Virginia. I am not aware that there was. The only limitation of time arose from the abolition of the tribunal before which the claims could be presented. Now this claim is made an exceptional one, because the damage was done to this property after the tribunal was abolished before which these claimants could appear to assert their claims for damages.

I do not know what the law may be generally in this country on the point suggested by the gentleman from New York [Mr. HISCOCK]. But I do know that the rule of law suggested by him is not that which prevails in all the States of this country. I know that in some of them it is held while parties may not be entitled to damages for the original grading of the streets, if the municipal authorities proceed afterward to change that grading and regrade the streets and throw the houses up into the air which were on the ground or throw them far below the level of the street, thus destroying their value, that in all such cases the public is responsible to the owner for the damage done to his property. I know that is the rule of law which prevails in some of the States of this country.

Our information is that nearly all of these cases in which substantial damages could be claimed against the District of Columbia had their day in court. The parties had their opportunity to present their claims either before the tribunal which preceded the board of audit or before the board of audit itself. And the reason why this is made a particular case is, as I said before, because these old ladies, whose property here east of the Capitol, as we are informed, has been greatly damaged in the prosecution of these improvements, have never had an opportunity to present their claims before any tribunal and have the damages adjudicated.

Mr. COBB. I should like to ask the gentleman from West Virginia a question. How many other parties in the city of Washington occupy the same position?

Mr. WILSON, of West Virginia. I can not answer that question precisely.

Mr. COBB. I suppose, if the gentleman will pardon me, there are five or six hundred who occupy the same position.

I know a great many of my own knowledge whose property has been in this way all but ruined; and these poor people too. I know and you know how this city has been improved, how many streets have been regraded and grounds leveled down; and all these people have suffered from this being done.

Now, I undertake to say, if the gentleman from West Virginia will allow me for a moment to speak in his time—I undertake to say that this bill ought not to pass. It is simply giving to those persons whom the bill names a right which every other person in the District ought to have who has been injured in the same way. And these parties have been before committees of this House long ago asking for privileges of this kind. The persons who are to be benefited by this bill have got a valuable square there across the way. I have been there and have seen it and know that it is valuable. But at the same time I think they should not, on account of the value of their property, be given exclusive rights that others have not.

There has been an adjustment, to some extent, of this matter in the past. Why open it up now as to these individuals and leave hundreds and thousands that are similarly injured, perhaps not to the same extent, for the reason that their property is not so valuable—but why leave others out and give these parties a remedy when their property is so valuable, while nothing is done for poor persons who are the owners of small lots and have been injured in the same way? I can not understand the object or the equity of it.

It strikes me to be a bill which will establish a precedent that will let in all these parties. I should rather vote for a bill giving all parties this right than for a bill giving it to these parties alone, for in that way we would do equity and justice to all, while if this bill alone shall pass we will simply give the parties named in it a right to obtain what they conceive to be their dues and deprive of that right many poverty-stricken people of this District who I personally know have lost nearly all their property, in many cases all of it, by reason of these improvements. In many cases the damages sustained by them and the assessments made upon them for the change in the grade of the streets were such that they were unable to pay them, and they became bankrupt and their property was sold. All you have to do is to examine the records and you will find hundreds of such cases.

Now, why should we relieve the parties mentioned in this bill and not relieve the others? I submit that this bill ought not to pass. It is giving a right to these parties who have suffered no more than others, who are wealthy enough and have property enough to make them comfortable during the balance of their lives, which right you deny to the poverty-stricken men and women of the District who have lost property because of these improvements and who will get nothing for it. Give it to all, do justice to all, and then you can ask support for your bill. But this is simply giving to these parties a right to which in my judgment they are no more entitled than many others in the District.

Mr. HISCOCK. I desire to make myself clearly understood, if the gentleman will give me time, in reference to the position I take in regard to the law.

Mr. WILSON, of West Virginia. Does this come out of my time?

Mr. HISCOCK. No, out of my own time. When the municipality originally acquired title to the streets it was the theory that all damages sustained by parties owning property adjoining the streets were to be paid, both the damages sustained at the time of the improvements and all future damages. But I assert that unless there is a special statute which authorizes the assessment of damages for a change of grade in the streets, they have never been tolerated in the courts of any of the States of the Union.

Mr. RICE. May I ask the gentleman a question?

Mr. HISCOCK. Yes, sir.

Mr. RICE. Do not the statutes in many of the States give the right to the adjoining owner to recover damages for a change in the grade in the streets, and is it not just that he should have that right?

Mr. HISCOCK. I say that it does not exist in my State.

Mr. RICE. It does in my State.

Mr. HISCOCK. And more than that, I say it does not exist in the District of Columbia. If gentlemen will bring in here a bill which provides that for a change of grade in the streets any party who is damnified thereby shall have cause of action, I will agree with the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. COBB] that it should be considered, and perhaps some such bill should be passed. But I object to giving to these particular claimants damages to which they are not entitled under the law.

Mr. MILLER, of Pennsylvania. I would like to ask the gentleman from West Virginia [Mr. WILSON] what is meant by these words in the bill:

That the devisees under the will of the late Daniel Carroll, of Duddington, deceased, their heirs or assigns, may prosecute a suit in the Court of Claims, &c.?

What is meant by "their heirs or assigns?" Does that mean that persons who have bought this property from these heirs can bring these suits?

Mr. WILSON, of West Virginia. I suppose it does.

Mr. MILLER, of Pennsylvania. That others than those who owned it at the time the damage was committed can now bring suit to recover damages done when they did not own the property?

Mr. WILSON, of West Virginia. I will state to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MILLER] that so far as I am informed there has been no assignment of this claim. One of the very reasons why the claim is made special, without attempting to enact a general law, is that according to the information we have received this property belongs to two very old ladies, who are, so to speak, trembling to-day over the brink of the grave, and it is altogether probable, even if this bill should become a law, that before they can institute this suit one or the other of them may die. I suppose the bill was drawn in this form for the purpose of giving to their heirs, devisees, personal representatives, or assigns the right to conduct this suit in the Court of Claims should either or both of these parties die during the pendency of the suit or before it is prosecuted.

Mr. BRUMM. Why use the word "assigns?"

Mr. WILSON, of West Virginia. That is a legal phrase.

Mr. BRUMM. Why not use the word "devisees?"

Mr. WILSON, of West Virginia. It might be "devisees or assigns."

Mr. BRUMM. "Assigns" are those who obtain by purchase.

Mr. WILSON, of West Virginia. These parties of course have a right to sell their property, and along with it to sell any rights connected with the property.

Mr. BRUMM. They might sell the property to-day, and under this bill the purchaser could come in and prosecute for these damages.

Mr. WILSON, of West Virginia. I think if the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. COBB] and the gentleman from New York [Mr. HISCOCK] will inquire into all the facts of the case, they will find that their objections to this bill are not as substantial and formidable as they seem to them now. I do not know how many such outstanding claims there may be except as such claims have been presented before the Committee on the District of Columbia. If the amount of such claims be $25,000,000, and if there be five hundred parties in exactly the same condition as these parties, as suggested by the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. COBB], they have not made known to this House and through the House to the Committee on the District of Columbia that they desire any relief for the damages inflicted upon them.

The facts which make this a special case and distinguish it from the cases of the other parties to whom the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. COBB] has referred I have already stated; and they are that these parties occupy the exceptional position of having had the damage done to their property after the abolition of the tribunal which had jurisdiction of such claims. They have never had their day in court.

In regard to the propriety of a general law covering cases of this kind, I observe that the same point was made in the Senate when this bill came up for consideration there at the present session, and the facts were stated there substantially as I have stated them here to-day—that this property belongs to two very old ladies who can not in the course of nature live very much longer, and who, if they are to have any remedy in their lifetime, can not wait for the enactment of a general law. From the information before the Committee on the District of Columbia we are not aware that there is to-day any demand or necessity for the passage of a general law with reference to cases of this kind. So far as I now recollect there is not a single other bill pending before that committee asking relief for damages done to property here in the course of the extension of these public improvements. This case is therefore, as I have already said, an exceptional one, these parties never having had their day in court, and in justice they ought not be required to wait for the enactment of any general law.

Mr. BLOUNT. Has the Committee on the District of Columbia made any special inquiry of the District commissioners or resorted to any other sources to ascertain whether or not there are other cases of this kind? I understand, as does my friend from Indiana [Mr. COBB], that there are many cases of this sort.

Mr. WILSON, of West Virginia. We did not deem it necessary and did not consider it our duty to make any such inquiry. We do not wish to open the door any wider than the actual demands of justice may require. We do not wish to establish a general law when, so far as we are aware, there is but one case requiring the action of Congress. A general law might open the door to enable hundreds of other parties to come in and prefer their claims.

Mr. BLOUNT. If this claim is entitled to consideration I do not see why we ought not to open the door to other claims like it, if there be any such.

Mr. WILSON, of West Virginia. Certainly, if there be any such.

Mr. BLOUNT. I think we had better open the door by enacting a general law than make this an exceptional case. I believe the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. COBB] is right in supposing that there are many cases of this sort.

Mr. COBB. There is no doubt about that.

Mr. BLOUNT. I wish the gentleman from West Virginia [Mr. WILSON] would have read the act referred to in the report. I understand there is some typographical error, and I would like to understand the exact provision.

Mr. WILSON, of West Virginia. The act referred to is an act establishing a board of audit to consider claims against the District of Columbia. It was passed by the Forty-third Congress and repealed by the Forty-fourth, according to my present recollection.

Mr. LONG. Why was that board abolished?

Mr. WILSON, of West Virginia. It is a very hard question to answer why Congress does anything. I do not know any special reason. I suppose it was thought that all the claims of this character had been acted on. I can suggest no other reason. And, so far as we are informed, all had been acted on except this claim; and in this case the damage was done after the board was abolished.

Mr. MILLER. Mr. Speaker, this bill certainly should not pass in the form in which it comes before us. In the third and fourth lines I find these words: "The devisees under the will of the late Daniel Carroll, deceased, their heirs and assigns." Now, certainly this House does not propose that, if some one has come in and bought this property or any portion of it, and by reason of the street having been graded has purchased it at a lower price than might otherwise have been paid, such a party shall now be allowed to recover damages to which he never can be rightfully entitled. I have never before seen a law which enabled an assignee to obtain damages for injury done to the property of his assignor.

In answer to the remark of the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. COBB], I wish to say I am not one of those who believe that the people of this District have been injured by the public improvements which have been made. It may be that some property-holders were not able to pay the assessments made upon them by reason of the grading and improvement of the streets. Is that any reason why we should release them? If the city of New York or Philadelphia or any other city in this country proposes to make certain improvements, say to grade a street, if the party who owns the property is not able to pay the assessment the property must be sold. Does the city turn round and reimburse the party because he was not able to pay his taxes?

I notice, sir, there are many persons in this District who think they have been injured, and I notice there are many persons in this District who think they ought to have an appropriation therefor, and I believe it is about time for this Congress to say to them that by the improvement of their city, one-half of all of which has been paid for by the General Government, they have reaped more benefit than injury, and therefore we will not step in to reimburse them for what they have lost. Certainly a bill of that kind, which proposes not only to reimburse the original owner, but the present holder, ought not to pass.

The question was on ordering the bill to be read a third time.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 30, noes 53.

Mr. SHELLEY. I make the point there is no quorum, for the purpose of getting tellers.

The SPEAKER appointed Mr. MILLER, of Pennsylvania, and Mr. SHELLEY as tellers.

The House again divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 79, noes 75.

Mr. SHELLEY. I withdraw the point of order that a quorum is not present.

So the bill was ordered to a third reading; and it was accordingly read the third time.

The SPEAKER. The question is now on the passage of the bill.

Mr. BUCKNER. Is it in order to move to recommit with instructions at this stage?

The SPEAKER. It is.

Mr. BUCKNER. I make that motion.

The SPEAKER. The bill has not been before any committee, but came from the Speaker's table.

Mr. BUCKNER. Then let it go to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

Mr. BARBOUR. The bill has been considered by the Committee on the District of Columbia and its passage was recommended.

Mr. BUCKNER. I move that it be referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia with instructions to examine and report as to all the claims growing out of this particular class of cases. And I desire to say a word for the purpose of giving my recollection of what the troubles in this District grew out of. They grew out of the different laws and tribunals having jurisdiction over these matters more than anything else.

Mr. ROGERS, of Arkansas. It is impossible to hear what is going on.

Mr. WILSON, of West Virginia. I make the point of order that the gentleman from Missouri is out of order, as his motion is to recommit a special bill with instructions to bring in a general measure.

The SPEAKER. The Chair did not understand the instructions as stated by the gentleman from Missouri to be to bring in any other bill, but that this should be recommitted with instructions to inquire into all the cases. He has not yet submitted his motion in writing.

Mr. BUCKNER. I simply desire, Mr. Speaker, to bring to the attention of the House the circumstances under which this claim originated and to the fact that a large number of similar claims grew out of the condition of things existing under the District government up to the year 1874, when the present system of commissioners was established. Before that there was a board of audit.

HERR LASKER.

A message from the President was received by Mr. PRUDEN, one of his secretaries.

Mr. HISCOCK. In view of the fact it is understood this relates to the Herr Lasker matter, I ask by unanimous consent it be now laid before the House.

There was no objection; and the Speaker laid before the House the following message of the President:

To the House of Representatives:

I transmit herewith the following documents received from the Secretary of State relative to the resolution of the House of Representatives upon the death of Mr. Edward Lasker.

CHESTER A. ARTHUR.

EXECUTIVE MANSION,
Washington, March 10, 1884.

The message was ordered to be printed, and referred to the Committee on Foreign Affairs.

Mr. COX, of North Carolina. I ask that the documents accompanying the message be read.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. Let them be printed in the RECORD.

Mr. COX, of North Carolina. They had better be read.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. I suggest to my friend from North Carolina that as it appears these documents are very voluminous and would consume considerable time in the reading, I ask if his object would not be attained by allowing them to be printed?

The SPEAKER. They have been ordered to be printed.

Mr. COX, of North Carolina. Very well; I will not insist upon the reading.

Mr. HISCOCK. I now offer the resolution which I send to the desk.

The SPEAKER. The resolution will be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Whereas it has come to the knowledge of this House that a communication from it to the Parliament of the German Empire, entirely friendly in its intent, respectful in its character, and sent through the regular channels of international communication, has been arbitrarily intercepted and returned to the Department of State of the United States by the person now holding the position of chancellor of the German Empire: Therefore,

Resolved, That this House can not but express its surprise and regret that it should be even temporarily within the power of a single too-powerful subject to interfere with such a simple, natural, and spontaneous expression of kindly feeling between two great nations, and thus to detract from the position and prestige of the crown on one hand, and from the rights of the mandataries of the people on the other.

Resolved, That this House does hereby reiterate the expression of its sincere regret at the death of the late Edward Lasker and of its sympathy with the Parliament of the German Empire, of which for so many years he was a distinguished member.

The resolutions were referred to the Committee on Foreign Affairs.

DEVISEES OF DANIEL CARROLL, DECEASED.

Mr. BUCKNER. Mr. Speaker, there seems to be some misunderstanding on the part of members as to the status of claims of the character of that embodied in the pending bill, as well as in reference to the principle involved. While I had the honor to be on the District Committee, some ten years ago, we had occasion to look into this very question of damages growing out of the repairs of streets and other improvements in progress in the District of Columbia, and the amount presented was very large. Congress had abolished what was then known as the Legislative Assembly, under whose direction most of these improvements were made; but it provided in the seventh section of the act, to which I shall presently call attention, giving power to the board of audit to settle the claims; that this class of claims should be audited and paid. A large number were audited and paid, and they now constitute a portion of what is known as the 3.65 debt of the District.

After the organization of the board of commissioners, under their construction of the act of 1874, they proceeded to open and repair other streets and cut down grades, and it was then that the District proposed that all of these outstanding claims, and which have been pressing upon the District ever since, should be investigated, not upon the ground presented by my friend from New York [Mr. HISCOCK], according to the doctrines generally admitted in State courts that a municipal corporation is not responsible, but upon the opinion of the Supreme Court, as I understood it at the time, though I have not the decision at hand and can not now refer to it, that the absolute fee in all the streets of this District was in the General Government.

Whether that be so or not I do not know, but it is the ground upon which I understand this claim for damages to rest. Now, sir, it is not true that none of these claims have been paid. A good proportion of them have been paid. They have been knocking at the door of Congress for years and asking remuneration for the damages done to their property, and this is but one of a large class. There are many of them—some for damages not growing out of assessments of taxes, as my friend from Indiana stated, but growing out of improvements and repairs to streets as provided in this section of the act, expressly authorizing and requiring Congress to pay, as they did pay and are paying now, its proportion of this twenty-odd millions of dollars. I will read the section:

Sixth. All claims—

That is another class, but I will read it—

All claims for private property taken by the board of public works for the avenues, streets, and alleys of the cities of Washington and Georgetown; and, seventhly, all unadjusted claims for damages that may have been presented to the board of public works pursuant to the act of the Legislative Assembly of the District of Columbia entitled "An act to provide for the payment of damages sustained by reason of the public improvements or repairs," approved June 20, 1872, which last-named claims shall severally be examined and audited without regard to any examination heretofore made.

And when they were audited they were converted into fifty-year bonds, at 3.65 per cent. interest.

Now after these parties have been here before Congress and Congress has been asked to give these poor women some relief, the object of this bill is, I suppose, to enable them to bring the case before the Court of Claims and let that court decide this question. I recollect while I was a member of the District of Columbia Committee that we introduced a bill into this House forming a commission to settle and readjust all these claims; but it never became law, and there never has been anything done as to these claims so far as I know. It is just that these people should at least have an opportunity of being heard before the Court of Claims; and probably as a matter of equal justice the same privilege should be extended to all others having claims of similar character.

I withdraw my motion to recommit.

The SPEAKER. The question is, Shall the bill pass?

Mr. BLOUNT. I think we should have the yeas and nays on the passage of the bill.

The question being taken on ordering the yeas and nays, there were ayes 36.

The SPEAKER. The vote in favor of ordering the yeas and nays is more than one-fifth of the last vote.

Mr. SHELLEY. Count the other side.

The negative vote being counted, there were noes 37.

So (the affirmative being more than one-fifth of the entire vote) the yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 119, nays 104, not voting 97; as follows:

YEAS—119.

So the bill was passed.

After the second roll-call,

Mr. BENNETT said: I was attending a meeting of a subcommittee of the Committee on Elections at the time the roll was called. I ask leave to vote.

The SPEAKER. The rule does not allow the Chair to entertain a request for unanimous consent for a member to have his vote recorded after the second roll-call.

Mr. BENNETT. I was absent under permission given by the House to the Committee on Elections to sit during the sessions of the House.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will cause section 1 of Rule XV to be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Upon every roll-call, the names of the members shall be called alphabetically by surname, except when two or more have the same surname, then the whole name shall be called, and after the roll has been once called the Clerk shall call in their alphabetical order the names of those not voting; and thereafter the Speaker shall not entertain a request to record a vote or announce a pair.

The SPEAKER. The House has sometimes given unanimous consent to a member to have his vote recorded when he said that he was in his seat during the roll-call and listening but failed to hear his name. But even that is done in violation of this rule.

Mr. BENNETT. One word of explanation. I was absent from the session of the House attending a session of the Committee on Elections, which is permitted by resolution of the House to sit during the sessions of the House. I am hungry to vote, Mr. Speaker. [Laughter.] I think if the rule does not permit a vote to be recorded in such a case as this it ought, as a matter of sound sense and proper reform, to be amended.

The SPEAKER. The Chair can not change the rule. The gentleman's statement will go into the RECORD, and will show why he did not vote.

Mr. WEAVER. I ask leave to vote.

The SPEAKER. Was the gentleman in his seat listening to hear his name called?

Mr. WEAVER. I was not in my seat, but was standing here in front of the Speaker listening for my name, but did not hear it.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will submit that question to the House, because it has been the practice, although not in accordance with the rule. The gentleman from Nebraska asks unanimous consent to have his vote recorded, saying he was listening for his name to be called and did not hear it. Is there objection? The Chair hears none.

Mr. WEAVER. I vote "ay."

Mr. BENNETT. May I now invoke the same privilege?

The SPEAKER. The Chair can not go beyond what has been the practice of the House heretofore. The practice just now indulged in in the case of the gentleman from Nebraska is itself in violation of the rule, but it is a practice which the Chair found in existence when he was called to decide as to the application of the rule.

Mr. BENNETT. Subject to the correction of the Chair, I desire to say I was absent by permission of the House.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from North Carolina has already stated that.

The following pairs were announced:

Mr. LIBBEY with Mr. WILSON, of Iowa, on all political questions, for this day.

Mr. BLACKBURN with Mr. MCKINLEY, for to-day.

Mr. TALBOTT with Mr. MCCOMAS, for to-day.

Mr. LAMB with Mr. KANE, for to-day.

Mr. CLARDY with Mr. VALENTINE, for to-day.

Mr. HENDERSON, of Iowa, with Mr. HUNT, for to-day.

Mr. RAY, of New Hampshire, with Mr. HAMMOND, until 5.30 p. m. to-day.

Mr. CANDLER with Mr. HOUK, for to-day.

Mr. BAYNE with Mr. CLARDY, until further notice.

Mr. HANCOCK with Mr. CALKINS, until further notice.

Mr. MORGAN with Mr. MORRILL, until further notice.

Mr. PAIGE with Mr. HATCH, of Michigan, until further notice.

Mr. HAYNES with Mr. GRAVES, until further notice.

Mr. PEELLE, of Indiana, with Mr. STOCKSLAGER, until further notice.

Mr. CANNON with Mr. MUTCHLER, until further notice.

Mr. MULLER with Mr. BREWER, of New York, until further notice.

Mr. TOWNSHEND with Mr. WASHBURN, to the 13th instant, inclusive.

Mr. HEMPHILL with Mr. RUSSELL, to the 13th instant.

Mr. NICHOLLS with Mr. CHACE, until Wednesday next.

Mr. BURLEIGH with Mr. BEACH, until Thursday next.

Mr. ELLIS with Mr. KELLOGG, until the 13th instant.

Mr. SKINNER, of North Carolina, with Mr. SKINNER, of New York, until the 30th instant.

Mr. SLOCUM with Mr. JOHNSON, for to-day and to-morrow.

Mr. JORDAN with Mr. STRUBLE, for three days.

Mr. HENDERSON, of Illinois, with Mr. SPRINGER, until the 14th instant.

Mr. KETCHAM with Mr. HUTCHINS, until the 13th instant.

Mr. WELLER with Mr. BUDD, upon the pending bill.

Mr. HAMMOND. Though I am paired with the gentleman from New Hampshire [Mr. RAY] until half past 5 to-day, he stated that he did not object to my voting on this bill, and I have therefore voted.

The result of the vote was then announced as above stated.

Mr. WILSON, of West Virginia, moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

MUTUAL FIRE INSURANCE COMPANY, DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA.

Mr. BARBOUR. I call up for present consideration the bill (H. R. 4985) supplemental to and amendatory of an act to incorporate the Mutual Fire Insurance Company of the District of Columbia, now on the House Calendar.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That whenever the holder or holders of a policy or policies of insurance hereafter issued in the Mutual Fire Insurance Company of the District of Columbia shall have failed for the full period of three years to pay the interest or any lawful assessment due upon his or their premium note or notes, such policy or policies of insurance shall be deemed to be lapsed, and the board of managers may proceed to settle and cancel the same, after a previous advertisement of their intention to do so, to be inserted in two newspapers printed and published in the city of Washington, once in each week, for the period of three consecutive months, and after serving, besides, whenever practicable, a personal notice in writing, for a like period of time, upon the holder or holders of such policy or policies, or in the event of his or their death upon the legal representatives of such holder or holders.

SEC. 2. That the cost of such advertisement and notice shall be deducted from the sum or sums of money which may be found to be due on the settlement of said policy or policies to the holder or holders thereof.

Mr. BARBOUR. I yield to the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. MULDROW] who reported the bill.

Mr. MULDROW. The report is a short one, and I ask that it be read.

The report was read, as follows:

The Committee on the District of Columbia, to which was referred House bill No. 2242, make the following report:

By the incorporating act of the Mutual Fire Insurance Company provision is made for the settlement and cancellation of policies at the request of withdrawing members, but no authority is conferred for settling the accounts and canceling the policies of those who have forfeited their membership by reason of their failure to reinsure or pay the interest on their premium notes; yet under the provisions of the charter they must of necessity continue to be borne upon the books as holders of abandoned and unsettled policies.

This occurs in one of two ways: First, by the failure of such parties to come forward and request a settlement in the manner provided for by the charter; or, secondly, by the inability of the company to ascertain the places of residence of such parties.

Although the sums due upon individual policies so circumstanced are usually small, yet among a membership of several thousands the aggregate of such amounts becomes in the course of a few years very large, and, under the present law, is idle capital.

The committee believe that, as the policies heretofore issued gave certain rights to the holders in dividends declared, even though they failed to reinsure, or failed to pay the interest on their premium notes, no law should be passed which would attempt to violate the obligations of the company made with the holders of such policies heretofore issued. The committee believe, however, that as to policies hereafter issued by this company no good reason has been shown why the company should not have the right to deem them and declare them lapsed after a reasonable time, when the holders have failed to pay the interest or the legal assessments due upon their premium notes.

The committee have therefore amended the bill in such a manner as to meet this view of the case, and, as so amended, by way of a substitute, recommend its passage.

Mr. MULDROW. If I can get the attention of the House for a moment I will endeavor to briefly explain the purposes of this bill. By the terms of the act of incorporation of this company, organized upon the mutual plan of insurance, and by the terms of the contract in the issuance of policies between the policy-holders and the company, parties failing to come forward and pay the premium on their notes forfeit their right to claim any damages by reason of the destruction of their property by fire, but they are still entitled to a part of the dividends declared by this company. The result has been that a large sum of money has accumulated in the hands of the company, which is idle capital. The committee deemed it contrary to a correct policy that this capital should remain idle.

While the committee do not think that we can legislate so as to affect the rights of parties under existing contracts, yet they deem it wise that the rights of this company should be so enlarged that after publication they may declare the rights of policy-holders under future contracts to be forfeited, and the money remaining in the hands of the company, by reason of the failure of those parties to come forward and pay the premiums on their notes or continue their insurance, would then be divided among such policy-holders as shall comply with the requirements of the company and pay their annual premiums. Unless there is some objection to the bill to be suggested by some member or some question to be asked, I will demand the previous question.

The previous question was ordered, and under the operation thereof the bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading; and it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. MULDROW moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

CONVEYANCES OF LAND IN THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA.

Mr. BARBOUR. I now call up for present consideration from the House Calendar the bill (H. R. 3235) relating to acknowledgments of conveyances of land in the District of Columbia.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That all deeds of conveyance or other instruments of writing relating to land in the District of Columbia, heretofore recorded in said District, which purport to have been acknowledged before any notary public, justice of the peace, or commissioner of deeds appointed under any act or acts of the late Legislative Assembly of the said District, or before any commissioner of any circuit court of the United States, or before any commissioner of the United States appointed for the District of Columbia, or before any master in chancery or clerk of any State or Territorial court in the United States, or before any mayor, alderman, or aldermen of any city in the United States, shall have the same force and effect, and the same are hereby declared to be as good and effectual, in law and in equity, in favor of all persons claiming bona fide under such deeds or instruments, as if the same purported to have been acknowldged before any officer or officers duly authorized by existing law to take and certify acknowledgments to deeds of lands in said District: Provided, That nothing in this act shall be construed to divest just rights, already acquired of record, in good faith, by purchasers or creditors of the grantors in such deeds or other instruments.

SEC. 2. That no acknowledgment of any deed or instrument of writing heretofore recorded as aforesaid shall be deemed invalid by reason of the absence on the record of a seal or seals of the acknowledging officer or officers, but the record of all such acknowledgments shall have the same force and effect and shall be as good and effectual as if such seal or seals appeared of record.

SEC. 3. That all acknowledgments of deeds or other instruments of writing relating to land in the District of Columbia hereafter made before any commissioner of a circuit court of the United States, or before any commissioner of the United States for the District of Columbia, or before any commissioner of deeds of any State or Territory in the United States, or before the clerk of the supreme court of the District of Columbia, or before the clerk of any United States court, or of any court of record of any State or Territory in the United States, shall be as good and effectual as if made before any other officer or officers authorized by law to take and certify such acknowledgments; subject, nevertheless, to the requirements of section 443 of the Revised Statutes of the United States relating to the District of Columbia.

SEC. 4. That on petition in writing, in person or by attorney, to the supreme court of the District of Columbia, or one of the justices thereof, by any party to any instrument of writing whose acknowledgment to such instrument is necessary to entitle the same to be admitted to record in said District, setting forth the fact that such party is located, sojourning, or residing remote from any officer or officers authorized by law to take or authenticate such acknowledgment, the court of justice may order a commission to issue, under the seal of the court, to some fit and proper person to be therein named, and located at or near the place of residence or sojourn of the party whose acknowledgment is required, authorizing the person so named in the commission to take and certify the acknowledgment required. The petition shall be verified by affidavit, and shall have annexed thereto a copy of the instrument to be acknowledged. The commission shall be annexed to the instrument to be acknowledged; and when duly executed, evidenced by the certificate of the commissioner under his hand in the form of acknowledgment prescribed by law, and recorded in the office of the recorder of deeds of the District of Columbia, such acknowledgment shall have the same force and effect in law and in equity as if made in the said District before any officer therein by law authorized to take the same. For filing, docketing, and indexing the petition and accompanying papers, and issuing the said commission, the clerk of the said court shall be entitled to demand and receive a fee of $5, to be paid by the petitioner; and for taking and certifying the acknowledgment the commissioner shall be entitled to a fee of 50 cents for each person acknowledging, to be paid by the party making the same.

SEC. 5. That where acknowledgments are made before an officer who has no official seal, the signature of such officer to the certificate of acknowledgment shall be deemed sufficient, without any scroll or private seal.

The Committee on the District of Columbia recommend the following amendments:

In section 1, line 12, after the words "United States," insert the following: "Or before the clerk of the supreme court of the District of Columbia, or before any commissioner of deeds of any State or Territory of the United States."

Amend section 2 by adding to it the words: "Subject to the proviso contained in the first section of this act."

Strike out section 4 of the bill.

The SPEAKER. The question is upon agreeing to the amendments reported from the Committee on the District of Columbia.

Mr. BARBOUR. I will give so much of my time as may be required for the purpose of explanation to the gentleman from Maryland [Mr. MCCOMAS], who reported this bill to the House.

Mr. MCCOMAS. Mr. Speaker, the Committee on the District of Columbia, after the consideration of this bill, recommends that the fourth section be striken out, because it provides an unusual and unnecessary mode of taking acknowledgments of conveyances. The Committee further recommend the addition of a proviso to the first and second sections, respectively. With these amendments we believe the bill should be passed, in order to meet a requirement with respect to conveyances of real property in this District.

The first section proposes to legalize conveyances of land in the District of Columbia which have been acknowledged before officers who usually take such acknowledgments in the several States. During fifty years, or nearly that length of time, the officers before whom conveyances of land in this District might be taken have been limited in number and very scant in variety. In this District for years, and until recently, any paper—even a car-ticket, I apprehend—could be recorded if presented for record to the officer charged with the duty of recording deeds. Now this first section provides that deeds of land in this District, acknowledged before officers accustomed to take such acknowledgments in the various States, shall, when admitted to record, be regarded as valid, subject, of course, to the rights of purchasers in good faith and the rights of creditors of the grantors.

The second section provides that the acknowledgment of such instruments, when not attested by the seal of the officer taking the acknowledgment, shall have the same force and effect as if the seal accompanied the paper acknowledged, reserving, as in the first section, the rights of creditors and purchasers in good faith.

The third section proposes to enact that for the future the same officers who in the various States are authorized to take acknowledgments of deeds shall have like authority with respect to conveyances of real estate in this District.

The fourth section—originally the fifth, but now the fourth by reason of striking out the fourth section of the bill as introduced—provides that where an officer has no seal of office he shall not be required to attach to his acknowledgment any scroll or private seal.

After this explanation of the bill, as amended by the committee, I shall, unless there be some inquiry or objection, ask for a vote upon the amendments and the bill.

The amendments reported from the Committee on the District of Columbia were severally agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. MCCOMAS moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

STATUE OF MARTIN LUTHER.

Mr. BARBOUR. The next bill which I propose to call up—House bill 4088—appears to have been referred by some mistake to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, instead of the House Calendar. I ask that the Committee of the Whole be discharged from its further consideration, that it may be brought before the House for present action.

The SPEAKER. The Chair, after examining this bill, is satisfied that it was improperly referred to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union. If there be no objection, that committee will be discharged from its further consideration, and it will be brought before the House for present action.

There being no objection, the House proceeded to the consideration of the bill (H. R. 4088) to incorporate the Luther Statue Association, to erect and maintain a monument or statue in memory of Martin Luther in the District of Columbia.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That John G. Morris and Gustavus A. Dobler, of the State of Maryland; Arnold J. D. Wedemyer, Charles A. Schieren, and Augustus Kountze, of the State of New York; John W. B. Dobler, of the State of New Jersey; Daniel M. Fox, of the State of Pennsylvania, and George Ryneal, jr., and John G. Butler, of the District of Columbia, be, and are hereby, created and made a body politic and corporate by the name, style, and title of the Luther Statue Association; and said persons, or their successors, shall constitute a board of trustees, nine in number, of said association, to be maintained in perpetual succession, and shall have all the powers of a body corporate necessary and proper to carry out the purposes of said association, namely, to erect and maintain in the District of Columbia a statue or monument in memory of Martin Luther.

SEC. 2. That said board of trustees shall have power to make all necessary and proper by-laws, and to alter or repeal the same at pleasure, and to fill, by election, all vacancies which shall occur in their body, so that the number of nine trustees shall always be preserved.

SEC. 3. That said board of trustees shall have power to acquire, by purchase or otherwise, and to hold in and by said corporate name of the Luther Statue Association, and for the purposes thereof, property, real, personal, and mixed, and to convey and transfer the same at pleasure: Provided, however, That the lands of said body corporate shall be located in the District of Columbia, and shall not exceed 5,000 square feet.

SEC. 4. That the lands acquired and held by said body corporate, and the statue erected thereon, and all the improvements and appurtenances thereto, shall be entirely exempt from taxation, and shall not be chargeable or assessed for any purpose whatever.

Mr. BARBOUR. I yield to my colleague on the committee, the gentleman from Maryland [Mr. MCCOMAS], that he may explain this bill.

Mr. MCCOMAS. Mr. Speaker, this bill, in regard to which the Committee on the District of Columbia had instructed me to move a suspension of the rules for its passage, has now been reached in regular order. It proposes simply to enable the Lutherans of this country to erect on the lot formed by the angle of Vermont avenue and Fourteenth street, in this city, and in front of their Memorial church, a statue of Martin Luther. It is proposed to convey this triangular lot to a body of men, nine in number, to be incorporated for the purpose, and the statue of Luther, now crossing the ocean, is to be placed on that lot.

In this District as well as in the different States the law requires that two or more of the corporators should be residents of the locality; and therefore the incorporation was made in this form, as the corporators are from different States, and it is necessary they should be so named in order to collect the requisite funds for the monument and to keep it in repair for all time to come. I do not suppose there will be any objection to this most laudable undertaking, and therefore demand the previous question on the passage of the bill.

The previous question was ordered.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. MCCOMAS moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

PRIVATE CALENDAR.

Mr. BARBOUR. We are nearly through with the District business for to-day. It is necessary to go into Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar to consider some bills there, and I make the motion for that purpose.

The motion was agreed to; and the House accordingly resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar, Mr. ELLIS in the chair.

MELISSA G. POLAR.

The first business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 2344) for the relief of Melissa G. Polar.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the auditor of the District of Columbia be, and is hereby, ordered to issue to Melissa G. Polar two duplicate certificates, respectively, issued by the board of audit of said district, and stolen from her, numbered 8884, for the sum of $75.34, and 13634, for the sum of $18.80, dated August 1, 1874.

SEC. 2. That before said auditor shall deliver to said Melissa G. Polar the duplicate certificates as provided for in section 1, the said Melissa G. Polar shall execute and deliver to said auditor her bond of indemnity, in double the amount of the said certificates, with two sufficient sureties, to be approved by said auditor, payable to the District of Columbia, which bond shall be filed by said auditor in the archives of his said office.

SEC. 3. That upon the presentation of said duplicate certificates to the Treasurer of the United States he shall redeem the same as authorized to redeem board of audit certificates by the act of Congress approved June 16, 1880, and the acts amendatory thereto.

The report was read, as follows.

The Committee on the District of Columbia, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 2344) for the relief of Melissa G. Polar, authorizing the auditor of the District of Columbia to issue to said Melissa G. Polar two duplicate certificates, respectively, issued by the board of audit of said District, and stolen from her (No. 8884, for the sum of $75.35, and No. 13634, for the sum of $18.80, dated August 1, 1874), respectfully report that in the opinion of your committee the bill should be amended as follows, namely:

In line 3, section 2, after the word "Polar," insert the words following, namely: "Shall furnish satisfactory proof to said auditor of the loss of said certificates and that the same have not been paid."

As amended, your committee report the bill back to the House, and recommend its passage.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment of the committee.

Mr. SPRIGGS. Of course it is unnecessary to detain the House at any length on a bill of this character. It provides for the issue of duplicate certificates to this party in lieu of those which have been lost, on condition, as the amendment of the committee provides, she shall furnish satisfactory proof to said auditor of the loss of said certificates and that they have not been paid. There is no use of making further speech on the question, and I move the bill be laid aside with a favorable recommendation.

The amendment was agreed to; and the bill as amended was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

DEVISEES OF THE LATE DANIEL CARROLL.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 1594) for the relief of the devisees of the late Daniel Carroll.

Mr. BARBOUR. As the same bill coming from the Senate has been passed in the House, I move this bill be laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation it be laid upon the table.

The motion was agreed to; and the bill was accordingly laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation it be laid on the table.

SARAH A. REDMOND.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 2346) for the relief of Sarah A. Redmond.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the auditor of the District of Columbia be, and is hereby, authorized to issue to Sarah A. Redmond a duplicate certificate for one lost or burned, numbered 18313, class 6, of the board of audit, for $30.94: Provided, That she executes to the commissioners of the District of Columbia a bond, with double the amount as security, for the issue of said certificate. And said certificate shall be redeemed, as all board of audit certificates are, by the Treasurer of the United States, as commissioner of the sinking fund of the District of Columbia.

The report was read, as follows:

The Committee on the District of Columbia, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 2346) for the relief of Sarah A. Redmond, by authorizing the auditor of the District of Columbia to issue to Sarah A. Redmond a duplicate certificate of one lost or burned, numbered 18313, class 6, of the board of audit, for the sum of $39.94, have had the same under consideration, and report that in the opinion of your committee the bill should be amended as follows, namely:

In line 7 of said bill, after the words "that she," insert the words following, to wit: "Furnish to the auditor satisfactory proof of the loss or destruction of the original certificate, and that the same has not been paid."

As amended the committee report the bill back to the House, and respectfully ask that the same be passed.

Mr. SPRIGGS. I move the amendment of the committee be agreed to.

Mr. HOLMAN. The amount involved is small, but they seem to be against the District of Columbia, while it is provided the money shall be paid out of the Treasury. They should all stand on the same footing.

Mr. MULDROW. It is merely to replace a lost certificate.

Mr. HOLMAN. Certainly, but are they not certificates which the United States are to pay?

Mr. SPRIGGS. It is to be paid out of the fund provided for the purpose.

Mr. HOLMAN. But these bills pay the whole out of the Treasury, when one-half should be paid by the District of Columbia.

Mr. STEVENS. If duplicate certificates are issued they are to be paid in the same way as the original ones.

Mr. HOLMAN. I did not understand precisely what was proposed. There is no appropriation of money.

Mr. STEVENS. None. It is simply to issue duplicates in place of the lost ones.

The amendment of the committee was agreed to; and the bill as amended was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation it do pass.

Mr. BARBOUR moved that the committee rise and report the bill to the House.

The motion was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. ELLIS reported that the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar had had under consideration District of Columbia business, and had directed him to report the same back with sundry recommendations.

The bill (H. R. 1594) for the relief of the devisees of the late Daniel Carroll was laid upon the table, and the amendments to the following bills were agreed to, and then the bills as amended were severally ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, they were accordingly read the third time, and passed:

A bill (H. R. 2344) for the relief of Melissa G. Polar; and

A bill (H. R. 2346) for the relief of Sarah A. Redmond

Mr. BARBOUR moved to reconsider the several votes just taken; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

Mr. BARBOUR. I move that the House do now adjourn.

Mr. BUCKNER. I ask the gentleman to yield to me to call up a bill.

Mr. BARBOUR. No, I think we have been long enough in session.

PRINTING DEFICIENCY, INTERIOR DEPARTMENT.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of War, asking an appropriation of $15,000 to supply deficiencies in the appropriation for printing and binding for the current fiscal year; which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

By unanimous consent, leave of absence was granted as follows:

To Mr. VAN EATON, until March 12, on account of sickness in his family.

To Mr. FINERTY, for ten days, on account of important engagement.

To Mr. JORDAN, for this week, on account of important business.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. BARBOUR. I withdraw the motion to adjourn.

Mr. BUCKNER. I ask unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table Senate bill No. 1314, to change the name of the James Sweet National Bank of Nebraska City, Nebr.

I will state that the same bill, word for word, has been adopted and reported here by the House committee.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Missouri?

Mr. MORGAN. I object.

SPOKANE FALLS AND CŒUR D'ALENE RAILWAY COMPANY.

Mr. CASSIDY, by unanimous consent, from the Committee on Pacific Railways, reported back with favorable recommendation the bill (H. R. 5428) to incorporate the Spokane Falls and Cœur d'Alene Railway Company; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

ALCOHOLIC TRAFFIC, DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA.

Mr. McCOMAS. By request, I ask unanimous consent to introduce resolutions from the Baltimore Methodist Conference, now in session in this city, and ask that they be read and appropriately referred.

The SPEAKER. The resolutions will be read, after which the Chair will ask for objection to the reference.

The Clerk read as follows:

Whereas there is a bill now pending in Congress known as the commissioners' bill for the District of Columbia; and

Whereas the ninth and twelfth sections thereof are favorable to the liquor interests, and as such must be injurious to the homes of many, damaging to the morals of the people, and detrimental to the prosperity of the community: Therefore,

Be it resolved by the Baltimore Annual Conference of the Methodist Episcopal Church, assembled in this city, March 7, 1884, That we earnestly and respectfully solicit Congress not to pass said sections of this bill; and

Resolved, That we heartily approve of the District Temperance Alliance, and do hereby join with them in asking for the right to vote upon the question of the prohibition of the manufacture and sale of all intoxicating liquors as a beverage within said District of Columbia; and

Resolved, That a copy of these resolutions be sent to Congress forthwith.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the reference of the resolutions?

Mr. BUCKNER. I object.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. KING. I ask unanimous consent to present for printing in the RECORD a memorial of the Louisiana Educational State Association in reference to public education.

Mr. HOLMAN. Is it brief?

Mr. COX, of North Carolina. I object to the printing of all of these resolutions in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. POST, of Pennsylvania. I object.

Mr. HOLMAN. Let it be printed as a document.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE. I move that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and accordingly (at 4 o'clock and 47 minutes p. m.) the House adjourned.

SENATE.

TUESDAY, March 11, 1884.

Prayer by the Rev. J. McK. REILEY, D. D., of the city of Baltimore.

The Journal of yesterday's proceedings was read and approved.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATION.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate a communication from the Secretary of the Interior, transmitting, in answer to a resolution of the 25th ultimo, a report of the Commissioner of Railroads (with other papers and documents) on the subject of the failure of the Central and Union Pacific Railroad Companies to comply with the requirements of the act of May 7, 1878; which, with the accompanying papers, was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary, and ordered to be printed.

HOUSE BILLS REFERRED.

The following bills, received yesterday from the House of Representatives, were severally read twice by their titles, and referred to the Committee on Pensions:

A bill (H. R. 314) for the relief of John W. Cummins;
A bill (H. R. 554) granting a pension to Joseph T. Caldwell;
A bill (H. R. 562) granting a pension to H. E. Van Trees;
A bill (H. R. 569) granting a pension to Ruben Marshall;
A bill (H. R. 570) granting a pension to M. H. Clements;
A bill (H. R. 591) granting a pension to W. H. Blake;
A bill (H. R. 819) granting an increase of pension to Merritt Lewis;
A bill (H. R. 1391) granting a pension to Mary Eliza Dickson, widow of Dr. Thomas Dickson;
A bill (H. R. 1394) granting a pension to Mary P. Thompson;
A bill (H. R. 1406) granting a pension to Mrs. Mary F. Barnes;

A bill (H. R. 1411) granting a pension to Martha M. B. McCullach, of Freeport, Pa.;
A bill (H. R. 1428) granting a pension to Cornelia A. Schultz;
A bill (H. R. 1433) granting a pension to Mary E. Murray;
A bill (H. R. 2372) granting a pension to Michea Titler;
A bill (H. R. 2608) granting a pension to Mrs. Sarah Bryan Leet;
A bill (H. R. 3606) granting a pension to Irene Baker;
A bill (H. R. 4036) to increase the pension of Thomas Ward;
A bill (H. R. 4682) granting a pension to Ward B. Burnett;
A bill (H. R. 4706) for the relief of Charlotte Day;
A bill (H. R. 4707) granting a pension to Louisa V. de Kilpatrick, widow of Maj. Gen. Judson Kilpatrick; and
A bill (H. R. 4708) granting a pension to Moses Fullington.

The bill (H. R. 328) for the relief of John P. T. Davis was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

The bill (H. R. 1198) for the relief of John Taylor & Son was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Claims.

The bill (H. R. 1319) to adjust the accounts of John D. Monteith, deceased, was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

The bill (H. R. 3521) for the relief of Benjamin D. Lakin was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

The joint resolution (H. Res. 192) providing for the printing of certain documents relating to the unhealthfulness of swine products in the United States was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Printing.

LOUISA BODDY.

The bill (H. R. 1292) for the relief Louisa Boddy was read twice by its title.

Mr. DAWES. That bill is precisely like a bill which passed the Senate a few days ago, and I suggest that without reference the bill be passed now.

Mr. INGALLS. Let it lie on the table until after the morning business is over.

Mr. DAWES. It seems a pity to have the bill go to a committee again. The bill that passed the Senate was reported from the Committee on Indian Affairs at this Congress and passed and so it was at the last Congress. This bill is in the same words except that there is a blank as to the name of a county. That is the only difference in words.

Mr. ALLISON. Is there not occasion for the blank to be filled?

Mr. DAWES. There is no occasion for the blank to be filled.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Massachusetts ask for the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. DAWES. I do, if there is no objection.

Mr. INGALLS. Regular order.

Mr. DAWES. Then let it lie on the table for the present.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If there is no objection the bill will be laid on the table.

MILITARY ACADEMY APPROPRIATION BILL.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate the action of the House of Representatives agreeing to some and disagreeing to other amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 4971) making appropriations for the support of the Military Academy for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1885, and for other purposes.

On motion of Mr. LOGAN, it was

Resolved, That the Senate insist on its amendments to the said bill disagreed to by the House of Representatives, and ask a conference with the House on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon.

By unanimous consent, it was Ordered, That the conferees on the part of the Senate be appointed by the President pro tempore.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore appointed Mr. LOGAN, Mr. RANSOM, and Mr. CALL the conferees on the part of the Senate.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. MILLER, of California, presented a petition of citizens of California, praying for an increase of the duty on raisins; which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. PLATT presented a petition of 82 ex-Union soldiers of Meriden, Conn., praying for the passage of a bill for the relief of Fitz-John Porter; which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. ALLISON presented a joint resolution of the General Assembly of the State of Iowa; which was read, and referred to the Committee on Commerce, as follows:

Joint resolution.

Be it resolved by the General Assembly of the State of Iowa, That the interests of the people of Iowa and of the country require that the national Congress assume the power granted in the Federal Constitution of regulating commerce between the States by the prompt enactment of laws regulating and controlling the transportation of freight and passengers on all lines of railroads within the United States engaged in interstate commerce; that by such laws discrimination in charges for said transportation shall be prevented, and whereby such charges shall be limited to the payment of a fair rate of income on the actual cost in money, of the standard coin value, of the several lines of railway.

Be it further resolved, That our Senators and Representatives be, and are hereby, requested to assist by their votes and influence in securing the enactment of such just laws as will accomplish this end.

Resolved, That the secretary of state be instructed to send to each of Iowa's Senators and Representatives in Congress a copy of this resolution, signed by the president of the senate and speaker of the house.

O. H. MANNING,
President of the Senate.
WM. P. WOLF,
Speaker of the House.

Mr. ALLISON also presented a joint resolution of the General Assembly of the State of Iowa; which was read, and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary, as follows:

Joint resolution in relation to the liens of judgments in Federal courts.

Be it resolved by the General Assembly of the State of Iowa, That our Senators and Representatives in Congress be, and they are hereby, requested to use all proper efforts to secure the enactment of a law by Congress providing that judgments in the Federal courts shall not be a lien upon the property in any other counties than those in which such judgments may be recovered, unless a transcript of such judgments shall be filed in the proper office in the county where such judgments are sought to be made a lien.

Resolved, That the secretary of state be, and he is hereby, instructed to transmit a copy of the foregoing resolution to each of our Senators and Representatives in Congress.

STATE OF IOWA, OFFICE OF SECRETARY OF STATE,
Des Moines, Iowa, March 4, 1884.

I hereby certify the foregoing to be a true and correct copy of a joint resolution passed by the Twentieth General Assembly, now in session.

Witness my hand and official seal.

J. A. T. HULL, Secretary of State.

Mr. ALLISON presented resolutions adopted by the Fort Donelson Post, Grand Army of the Republic, of Fort Dodge, Iowa, in favor of the passage of an act for the equalization of bounties and for the repeal of the limitation clause of the arrears-of-pensions act; which were referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. CALL. I present the petition of W. G. Lovell and other citizens of Orange County, Florida, praying that an appropriation be made for the improvement of the Wekiva River, a navigable estuary of the Saint John's River. The petition sets forth at length the very great importance of this river as a tributary of the Saint John's and its connection with the commerce of the country. I move that the petition be referred to the Committee on Commerce.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. LOGAN presented a petition of the Veterans' National Association of Maine, praying that one hundred and sixty acres of land be given each honorably discharged soldier; which was referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

He also presented resolutions adopted by Somerset Post, No. 71, Grand Army of the Republic, Department of Ohio, and resolutions adopted by the George B. Torrence Post, No. 60, Grand Army of the Republic, Department of Ohio, favoring the passage of the bill (S. 340) granting public land to the soldiers of the late war of the rebellion; which were referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

He also presented a petition of Roderic Rockwood Post, No. 39, Department of Missouri, Grand Army of the Republic; a petition of Captain York Post, No. 116, Department of Missouri, Grand Army of the Republic; a petition of Grand Army Post located at Jamestown, N. Mr. BLAIR. I present the petition of the Baltimore Yearly Meeting of Friends, which meets annually in that city, composed of representatives from its several subordinate meetings in Maryland and adjacent parts of Pennsylvania and Virginia, which, through its committee on temperance, in order to secure the better protection of the American people from the great evils attendant upon the traffic in intoxicating liquors and for the promotion of the general welfare, respectfully and earnestly ask that Congress by an appropriate joint resolution shall adopt and propose to the several States an amendment to the Constitution of the United States which, when ratified, will prohibit henceforth the manufacture, importation, and sale of all alcoholic beverages throughout our national domain. This petition is officially signed by Jonathan K. Taylor, chairman of the committee on temperance, and Caroline R. Hull, secretary, third month, fourth day, 1884.

I move that the petition be referred to the Committee on Education and Labor.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. BLAIR. I present also from the same body, through its committee, a petition praying that for the purpose of promoting every right opening to relieve the people from the oppression of a legalized traffic in intoxicating drinks Congress shall enact legislation that will prevent the vending of intoxicating drinks by the authority of the United States in the District of Columbia. The petitioners state that the traffic now makes it exceedingly difficult to enforce prohibitory laws in the adjacent counties of Maryland, thereby doing great injustice and harm to the people of those counties. It is officially signed as in the other case. I move that the petition be referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. BLAIR. I also present from the Baltimore Yearly Meeting of Friends a petition addressed to the two Houses of Congress, officially signed as in the other cases, in which they respectfully but earnestly request the passage of a bill providing for the appointment of a commission of inquiry to investigate thoroughly and impartially the alcoholic liquor traffic in its relation to crime, pauperism, the public health, and general welfare, and also the results of license and prohibitory legislation in the several States and Territories of the Union. I move that the petition be referred to the Committee on Education and Labor.

The motion was agreed to.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. CLARK, its Clerk, announced that the House had passed the following bills; in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate:

A bill (H. R. 4985) supplemental to and amendatory of an act to incorporate the Mutual Fire Insurance Company of the District of Columbia;

A bill (H. R. 3235) relating to acknowledgments of conveyance of land in the District of Columbia;

A bill (H. R. 4088) to incorporate the Luther Statue Association, to erect and maintain a monument or statue in memory of Martin Luther in the District of Columbia;

A bill (H. R. 2344) for the relief of Melissa G. Polar; and

A bill (H. R. 2346) for the relief of Sarah A. Redmond.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. HARRIS, from the Committee on Finance, to whom was referred the bill (S. 1242) to reimburse Elizabeth Comstock customs dues paid by her on articles donated for the relief of colored refugees, reported it with amendments, and submitted a report thereon.

Mr. HAMPTON, from the Committee on Military Affairs, to whom was referred the joint resolution (S. R. 67) in relation to the claim made by Dr. John B. Read against the United States for the alleged use of projectiles claimed as the invention of said Read and by him alleged to have been used pursuant to a contract or arrangement made between him and the War Department, and for which no compensation has been made, reported it with an amendment, and submitted a report thereon.

Mr. BECK, from the Committee on Finance, to whom was referred the bill (S. 530) for the relief of Henry Ayres, of Evansville, Ind., reported it with amendments, and submitted a report thereon.

Mr. ALLISON, from the Committee on Finance, to whom was referred the bill (S. 823) for the relief of Thomas Lynch, submitted an adverse report thereon, which was agreed to; and the bill was postponed indefinitely.

Mr. DAWES, from the Committee on Indian Affairs, to whom was referred the bill, (S. 1008) to accept and ratify the agreement submitted by the Shoshones, Bannocks, and Sheepeaters of the Fort Hall and Lemhi reservations, in Idaho, May 14, 1880, for the sale of a portion of their lands in said Territory, and for other purposes, and to make the necessary appropriations for carrying out the same, reported it with an amendment.

Mr. COCKRELL, from the Committee on Military Affairs, to whom was referred the bill (S. 1222) to place John Jones, late captain of the First Minnesota Battery, on the retired-list of the Army, submitted an adverse report thereon, which was agreed to; and the bill was postponed indefinitely.

Mr. BLAIR, from the Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (S. 360) granting a pension to Maria Louise Moss, submitted an adverse report thereon, which was agreed to; and the bill was postponed indefinitely.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (S. 546) granting a rerating of pension to Jacob Meier, submitted an adverse report thereon, which was agreed to; and the bill was postponed indefinitely.

Mr. BLAIR. I am also directed by the Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (S. 283) to increase the pension of George W. Bausman, to report it adversely, and move its indefinite postponement.

Mr. PLUMB. A similar bill was reported favorably from the committee at the last session after consideration, and I think there must be some mistake about it. I ask that it be placed on the Calendar.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore The bill will be placed on the Calendar.

Mr. BLAIR. I am also directed by the Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (S. 313) granting a pension to Charlotte McCay, to report it adversely, on the ground that if such cases should be pensioned a general law should provide for them, and in justice it should. I move that the bill be postponed indefinitely.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. BLAIR. I am also directed by the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (S. 707) granting an increase of pension to Nicholas W. Barnett, to report it adversely, on the ground that under the general law passed at the last Congress the pension has already been increased.

I may observe with propriety, I think, that many bills for an increase of pension have come before the committee apparently from the ignorance of the claimants that under the general law enacted at the last Congress they have been already provided with the increase of pension they desire. I move that the bill be postponed indefinitely.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. BLAIR, from the Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (S. 732) for the relief of Mary J. Vaughan, reported it with an amendment.

Mr. MORRILL. I am directed by the Committee on Finance, to whom was referred the bill (S. 1237) for the relief of Betts, Nichols & Co., to report it with amendments and submit a written report. I wish to say that the committee, having obtained the evidence and facts in relation to this case from the Treasury Department, thought it proper to report the bill; but if they had noticed the character of the bill or had their attention called to it in the first instance, they would have referred it to the Committee on Claims. It is clearly a bill that ought to have been referred to the Committee on Claims, but finding the facts so strongly in favor of the bill, the Committee on Finance finally concluded to report it favorably.

Mr. CAMDEN, from the Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (S. 905) for the relief of Hugh Dougherty, submitted an adverse report thereon, which was agreed to; and the bill was postponed indefinitely.

Mr. MORGAN, on behalf the majority of the Committee on Public Lands, submitted a report to accompany the bill (S. 1445) to provide for the settlement of the rights of the States and of the corporations and persons interested in any grant of lands in aid of said railroads and canals which shall be hereafter declared forfeited by act of Congress.

THE TARIFF COMPILATION, 1884.

Mr. ANTHONY. The Committee on Printing, to which was referred a resolution to print additional copies of Senate report No. 12, being the tariff compilation, have instructed me to report it with amendments, and to ask for its present consideration.

The Senate, by unanimous consent, proceeded to consider the resolution, as follows:

Ordered, That one hundred additional copies of Senate report No. 12, Forty-eighth Congress, first session, be printed and bound, interleaved, for the use of the Committee on Finance.

The first amendment reported by the Committee on Printing was, in line 1, to strike out "one" and insert "two;" so as to read, "two hundred additional copies."

Mr. COCKRELL. I should like to know why out of the two hundred copies each Senator should not have one copy at least? There are others who desire to use this document besides the members of the Committee on Finance.

Mr. ANTHONY. The suggestion of the Senator from Missouri has been carried out by the committee. The number has been increased to two hundred, of which one hundred are to be for the use of the committee and one hundred for the use of the Senate.

Mr. COCKRELL. I did not so understand the amendment.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Only the first amendment has yet been reported. The Secretary will read for information the succeeding amendment.

The CHIEF CLERK. In line 4, after the word "interleaved," it is proposed to insert the words "of which one hundred shall be;" so as to read:

Be printed and bound, interleaved, of which one hundred shall be for the use of the Committee on Finance.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the first amendment recommended by the committee, increasing the number from one hundred to two hundred.

The amendment was agreed to.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The next question is on agreeing to the amendment inserting after the word "interleaved" the words "of which one hundred shall be."

The amendment was agreed to.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the order as amended.

Mr. COCKRELL. Let it be reported as amended.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

Ordered, That two hundred additional copies of Senate report No. 12, Forty-eighth Congress, first session, be printed and bound, interleaved, of which one hundred shall be for the use of the Committee on Finance.

The order as amended was agreed to.

EULOGIES ON REPRESENTATIVE HASKELL.

Mr. ANTHONY. The Committee on Printing, to which was referred the joint resolution (H. Res. 191) for the printing of certain eulogies delivered in Congress upon the late Dudley C. Haskell, have instructed me to report it without amendment and to recommend its passage. I ask for its present consideration.

By unanimous consent, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the joint resolution.

The joint resolution was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

Mr. COCKRELL. I should like to inquire of the distinguished Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. ANTHONY] what has been done with the resolution presented by me some time ago for the printing of the eulogies on the late Thomas Allen, of Missouri, which was introduced, I think, prior to the joint resolution just passed, and even prior to the delivery of those eulogies, and referred to the Committee on Printing?

Mr. ANTHONY. It has not been brought to my notice or I should have attended to it.

Mr. COCKRELL. It ought to have been attended to during the last session, the short session of Congress, but I found on examination of the records that it was not. As soon as I ascertained that fact I introduced a joint resolution, and I hope that speedy action will be taken upon it.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Mr. SAWYER introduced a bill (S. 1797) to authorize the construction of a railroad bridge across the Saint Croix River, in the States of Wisconsin and Minnesota; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. DAWES introduced a bill (S. 1798) for the relief of Edward L. Keyes; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. MILLER, of New York, introduced a bill (S. 1799) to suspend coinage of the standard silver dollar and the issuing of one and two dollar Treasury notes; which was read twice by its title.

Mr. MILLER, of New York. This bill has been prepared by a committee of the Chamber of Commerce of the State of New York. It provides for the suspension of the coinage of the silver dollar for two years. It is accompanied by a memorial from the chamber of commerce. I move that the bill and memorial be referred to the Committee on Finance.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. SABIN introduced a bill (S. 1800) for the relief of Edward Corning; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Claims.

He also introduced a bill (S. 1801) granting a pension to Mrs. Elizabeth Ann Rice; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. BLAIR. I introduce a bill to prohibit the manufacture and sale of intoxicating liquors in the District of Columbia. This bill has been prepared at the request of leading citizens of this District, and without having examined its details, but approving its object, I introduce it.

The bill (S. 1802) to prohibit the manufacture and sale of intoxicating liquors in the District of Columbia was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

Mr. HAWLEY introduced a bill (S. 1803) granting an increase of pension to George A. Washburn; which was read twice by its title, and, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. PLATT introduced a bill (S. 1804) granting a pension to Clarinda Hunt; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. PLUMB introduced a bill (S. 1805) granting an increase of pension to Miles Barber; which was read twice by its title, and, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. SHERMAN introduced a bill (S. 1806) granting a pension to George H. Fluke; which was read twice by its title, and, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. MANDERSON introduced a bill (S. 1807) requiring notice of deficiency in accounts of principals to be given to sureties upon bonds of United States officials, and fixing a limitation of time within which suits shall be brought against said sureties upon said bonds; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. INGALLS introduced a bill (S. 1808) to make the Lake Borgne outlet, to improve the low-water navigation of the Mississippi River from New Orleans, Louisiana, to Cairo, Illinois, and incidentally to reclaim and protect the valley lands of the Mississippi River and tributaries from overflow without levees; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Levees and Improvements of the Mississippi River.

Mr. COCKRELL introduced a bill (S. 1809) granting a pension to W. R. D. Mabrey; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. FARLEY introduced a bill (S. 1810) for the erection of a public building at Sacramento, Cal.; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds.

Mr. HOAR introduced a bill (S. No. 1811) granting a pension to Mrs. Anne T. Dicks; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. LOGAN introduced a bill (S. 1812) for the relief of Laura E. Jaynes; which was read twice by its title, and, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

He also introduced a bill (S. 1813) for the relief of Frank Schwartz; which was read twice by its title, and, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Pensions.

He also introduced a bill (S. 1814) to equalize the pay of hospital stewards; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

He also introduced a bill (S. 1815) for the relief of Francis Munson; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Patents.

He also (by request) introduced a bill (S. 1816) to amend section 4707 of the Revised Statutes of the United States, in relation to dependent relations of deceased soldiers; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. GEORGE introduced a bill (S. 1817) to regulate appeals and writs of error in certain cases; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. EDMUNDS introduced a bill (S. 1818) to regulate the retirement of Army officers; which was read twice by its title, and, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. MILLER, of New York, introduced a joint resolution (S. R. 73) authorizing the Secretary of the Treasury to pay to Charles L. Jones the sum of $705.50 for services as messenger under the Sergeant-at-Arms of the Senate from the 5th day of July, 1879, to the 1st day of January, 1880, inclusive; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate.

LOUISA BODDY.

Mr. DAWES. I now ask for the consideration of the bill (H. R. 1292) for the relief of Louisa Boddy.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Massachusetts? It requires unanimous consent, as the bill has come over to-day. The Senator from Massachusetts asks unanimous consent that the Senate now consider the bill.

Mr. ALLISON. Let it be read in full, so that we may see what it is.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be read at length for information.

The Chief Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to pay to Louisa Boddy, of —— County, State of Oregon, the sum of $5,400, in full settlement of her claim against the Government for depredations committed and property taken and destroyed by the Modoc Indians, on or about November 29, A. D. 1872.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. COCKRELL. A bill similar to that was passed by the Senate some time ago and sent to the House. Is the amount in this bill the same as it was in the bill that passed the Senate?

Mr. DAWES. I understand this bill to be precisely the same as that except the blank county.

Mr. ALLISON. Why not refer the bill to a committee?

Mr. DAWES. It has been twice through the Senate, and it seemed to me that it was the shortest way to pass the bill at once.

Mr. COCKRELL. The Senator knows that the amount is the same?

Mr. DAWES. Yes, I asked the Senator from Oregon [Mr. SLATER].

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Debate is not in order. The Chair is calling for objection.

Mr. DAWES. I understand it to be precisely the same bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill? The Chair hears none. It is now before the Senate as in Committee of the Whole and open to amendment.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. CLARK, its Clerk, announced that the House had passed the following bills and joint resolution; in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate:

A bill (H. R. 4779) to change the name of the Waterville National Bank of Oakland, in the State of Maine, to that of the Messalonskee National Bank;

A bill (H. R. 5445) to amend section 4136 of the Revised Statutes of the United States, relating to the purchase and repair of foreign vessels; and

Joint resolution (H. Res. 124) authorizing the collector of the port of New York to deliver free of duty a silver cup won by Sergt. A. B. Van Heusen as a member of the American rifle team at Wimbledon in July, 1883.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

The message also announced that the Speaker of the House had signed the following enrolled bills and joint resolution:

A bill (S. 196) for the relief of the devisees of the late Daniel Carroll;

A bill (S. 616) to establish a standard of time in the District of Columbia;

A bill (H. R. 1292) for the relief of Louisa Boddy; and

Joint resolution (H. Res. 191) for the printing of certain eulogies delivered in Congress upon the late Dudley C. Haskell.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

Mr. MILLER, of California. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After four hours and ten minutes spent in executive session the doors were reopened, and (at 5 o'clock and 15 minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

TUESDAY, March 11, 1884.

The House met at 12 o'clock m. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. JOHN S. LINDSAY, D. D.

The Clerk proceeded to read the Journal of the proceedings of yesterday.

Mr. CALKINS. I move to dispense with the reading of so much of the Journal as relates to the formal introduction and reference of bills and joint resolutions.

There was no objection, and it was ordered accordingly.

The remainder of the Journal was read and approved.

REGISTER OF CERTAIN FOREIGN-BUILT VESSELS.

Mr. FINDLAY. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to discharge the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union from the further consideration of the bill (H. R. 5445) to amend section 4136 of the Revised Statutes of the United States, relating to the purchase and repair of foreign vessels, and that the same be taken up for immediate consideration.

The SPEAKER. The bill will be read, after which the Chair will ask for objection.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That section 4136 of the Revised Statutes be, and is hereby, amended so as to read:

"That the Secretary of the Treasury may issue a register or enrollment for any vessel built in a foreign country whenever such vessel shall be wrecked or damaged in navigable waters, foreign or domestic, and shall be purchased by a citizen of the United States and repaired in the United States, if it shall be proved to the satisfaction of the Secretary that the repairs put upon such vessel are equal to double the cost of the vessel when so purchased."

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to discharging the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union from the further consideration of this bill and considering the same in the House at this time?

There was no objection.

Mr. FINDLAY. There is a report accompanying the bill which tells the whole story. There is no occasion for making any speech or statement. Let the report be read, and that will explain the necessity for the passage of the bill.

The report was read, as follows:

The Select Committee on American Ship-building and Ship-owning Interests, to which was referred a bill (H. R. 3917) concerning the purchase and repair of foreign vessels, report herewith a substitute for said bill.

Section 4136 of the Revised Statutes authorizes the purchase and repair of foreign vessels wrecked within the navigable waters of the United States and the admission of such vessels to American registry, provided the repairs put upon them shall be equal in cost to three-fourths of their value when repaired. The object of the present bill is to permit the admission to American registry of any foreign vessel which has been either wrecked or damaged within the navigable waters of the United States, or outside of its jurisdiction on the high seas or elsewhere, provided the vessel shall have been purchased by a citizen of the United States and repaired therein at a cost equal to double the amount of the value of the vessel when purchased. The changes are obvious. A vessel may be damaged and yet not wrecked or the injury may occur at some point not within the navigable waters of the United States, but in such cases the purchase and repair of a foreign vessel with a view to her naturalization would not be permissible under existing laws.

Again, the requirement that three-fourths of her value shall be expended in repairs estimated upon the basis of the worth of the vessel when thus repaired is in the opinion of the committee an exaction too rigorous to permit any real benefit to be derived from the law. To require that the cost of the repairs shall be double the value of the vessel when purchased will be quite sufficient to protect our home interests, and at the same time may offer some inducement to venture upon enterprises of this character, which must in their very nature be exceptional and rare.

For these reasons the committee have unanimously recommended the passage of the bill.

Mr. FINDLAY. Mr. Speaker, I yield now such time as he may desire to my friend from Massachusetts [Mr. STONE].

Mr. STONE. Mr. Speaker, I think the reasons assigned for the passage of this bill are set forth clearly and forcibly in the report. The reason is stated with such clearness that nothing I may say can add to its force. I hope the bill may pass, since it is in the interest of American industry and only removes some of the restrictions found by experience to be too rigid. It is not necessary to make any additional remarks.

Mr. FINDLAY. I demand the previous question upon the engrossment and third reading of the bill.

The previous question was ordered; and under the operation thereof the bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. FINDLAY moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

CHANGE OF NAME OF NATIONAL BANK.

Mr. DINGLEY. I ask unanimous consent to take from the House Calendar for immediate consideration the House bill No. 4779, reported by the Committee on Banking and Currency. The bill is simply to change the name of a national bank.

The SPEAKER. The bill will be read, after which the Chair will ask for objection.

The bill was read, as follows:

A bill (H. R. 4779) to change the name of the West Waterville National Bank of Oakland, in the State of Maine, to that of the Messalonskee National Bank.

Be it enacted, &c., That the name of the West Waterville National Bank, located and transacting business at Oakland, in the county of Kennebec and State of Maine, shall be changed to that of the Messalonskee National Bank, whenever the board of directors of said bank shall accept the aforesaid new name by a resolution of the said board, adopted by a majority of the members of said board at a meeting duly called for the purpose of making said change of name, and shall cause a copy of said resolution, duly authenticated, to be filed with the Comptroller of the Currency: Provided, That such acceptance be made within six months after the passage of this act, and that all the expenses incident to such change, including engraving, shall be borne and paid by said bank.

SEC. 2. That the debts, dividends, liabilities, rights, privileges, and powers of the said West Waterville National Bank shall devolve upon and inure to the said Messalonskee National Bank whenever such change of name shall be effected.

SEC. 3. That nothing in this act contained shall be so construed as in any manner to release the said West Waterville Bank from any liability or affect any action or proceeding in law in which said bank may be or become a party or interested.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There was no objection.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. DINGLEY moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

YELLOWSTONE PUBLIC PARK.

Mr. EVINS, of South Carolina. I ask unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table for reference to the Committee on Territories the bill (S. 221) to amend sections 2474 and 2475 of the Revised Statutes of the United States, setting apart a certain tract of land lying near the headwaters of the Yellowstone River as a public park.

There being no objection, the bill was taken from the Speaker's table, read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on the Territories, and ordered to be printed.

SERGT. A. B. VAN HEUSEN.

Mr. KASSON. I ask for the present consideration of a brief resolution of half a dozen lines to admit free of duty a prize cup won by an American rifleman at Wimbledon.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Iowa asks unanimous consent that the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union be discharged from the further consideration of the House joint resolution No. 124, and that it be brought before the House for present consideration. The joint resolution will be read, after which the Chair will ask for objections.

The joint resolution was read, as follows:

Joint resolution (H. Res. 124) authorizing the collector of the port of New York to deliver, free of duty, a silver cup won by Sergt. A. B. Van Heusen, as a member of the American rifle team, at Wimbledon, in July, 1883.

Resolved, &c., That the collector of the port of New York be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to deliver to Sergt. A. B. Van Heusen, of the Twelfth Regiment National Guard of the State of New York, free of duty, the silver cup won by said Sergt. A. B. Van Heusen, in the international rifle match, in July, 1883, as a member of the American rifle team.

There being no objection, the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union was discharged from the further consideration of the joint resolution, and it was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. KASSON moved to reconsider the vote by which the joint resolution was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

OATH OF OFFICE.

Mr. COX, of New York. I ask unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table the bill (H. R. 3926) known as the ironclad-oath bill, with amendments by the Senate, for the purpose of moving that the House concur in the Senate amendments.

Mr. WHITE, of Kentucky. I object. I think that had better remain on the statutes for a while.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. Then let us have the regular order.

Mr. COX, of New York. Does the gentleman from Kentucky object to a conference? I am told by Senators we can not do anything better in the Senate.

Mr. WHITE, of Kentucky. I object.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

The SPEAKER. Objection is made by the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. WHITE], and the regular order is demanded by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. TOWNSHEND]. The regular order is the call of committees for reports.

REFUND TO GEORGIA.

Mr. HAMMOND, from the Committee on the Judiciary, reported back with a favorable recommendation the bill (H. R. 4703) to require the payment in cash to the State of Georgia of $35,555.42, appropriated for said State by an act to refund to the State of Georgia certain money expended by said State for the common defense in 1777, approved March 3, 1883; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

SUPREME COURT, DAKOTA.

Mr. MCCOID, from the Committee on the Judiciary, reported back with an amendment the bill (H. R. 1682) providing for two additional associate justices for the supreme court of the Territory of Dakota; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, and, with the amendment and accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

SECTION 914 REVISED STATUTES.

Mr. CULBERSON, of Texas, from the Committee on the Judiciary, reported back with an amendment the bill (H. R. 3800) to amend section 914 of the Revised Statutes of the United States; which was referred to the House Calendar, and, with the amendment and accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

LIGHT-HOUSE AT ERIE, PA.

Mr. O'NEILL, of Pennsylvania, from the Committee on Commerce, reported, as a substitute for the bill (H. R. 1417) providing for the reestablishment and maintenance of the land light-house at Erie, Pa., a bill (H. R. 5890) having the same title; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed.

FORT HAYS MILITARY RESERVATION.

Mr. MORGAN, from the Committee on Military Affairs, reported back with an amendment the bill (H. R. 578) to authorize the sale of a certain portion of the Fort Hays military reservation, Kansas, to the Ellis County Agricultural Society of Kansas; which was referred to the House Calendar, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

CHEYENNE AND BLACK HILLS RAILWAY.

Mr. ROSECRANS, from the Committee on Military Affairs, reported back with a favorable recommendation the bill (H. R. 3486) to authorize the Cheyenne, Black Hills and Montana Railroad Company to build its road across the Fort Russell and Fort Laramie military reservations; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

SETTLEMENT OF OFFICERS' ACCOUNTS.

Mr. ROSECRANS, from the Committee on Military Affairs, also reported a bill (H. R. 5891) to provide for the settlement of accounts of officers who served during the war of the rebellion; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

Mr. ROSECRANS, from the Committee on Military Affairs, also reported back bills of the following titles; which were laid on the table, and the accompanying reports ordered to be printed:

HEIRS OF HORATIO N. SPENCER.

Mr. ELLWOOD, from the Committee on Claims, also reported back the bill (H. R. 866) for the relief of the heirs of Horatio N. Spencer; when the Committee on Claims was discharged from the further consideration of the bill, and it was referred to the Committee on War Claims.

CLAIMS OF CITIZENS OF KANSAS.

Mr. BROWN, of Pennsylvania, from the Committee on Claims, reported back adversely the bill (H. R. 2037) authorizing the appointment of a commissioner and the settlement of the claims of certain citizens of Kansas named therein; which was laid on the table, and the accompanying report ordered to be printed.

JAMES W. HARVEY.

Mr. PRICE, from the Committee on Claims, reported a bill (H. R. 5892) for the relief of James W. Harvey, assignee of Joseph Parkins; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

PILOTAGE.

Mr. DINGLEY, from the Select Committee on American Ship-building and Ship-owning Interests, reported, as a substitute for H. R. 3057, a bill (H. R. 5893) relating to pilotage; which was read a first and second time, referred to the House Calendar, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

Mr. DINGLEY. I ask unanimous consent that the minority have leave to file their views hereafter, and that when filed they shall be printed with the report of the majority.

There was no objection, and it was ordered accordingly.

TARIFF.

Mr. MORRISON. Mr. Speaker, I rise for the purpose of making a privileged report. The Committee on Ways and Means, to which was referred sundry resolutions and bills on the subject of revenue, have directed me to report a bill (H. R. 5894) to reduce import duties and war-tariff taxes, accompanied with a written report, and to recommend it be passed.

The bill was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

Mr. McKINLEY. I ask leave, Mr. Speaker, to present the views of the minority of the Committee on Ways and Means in reference to the bill just reported and referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, and to ask that they be ordered to be printed with the report of the majority.

Mr. MORRISON. There is no objection to that.

The SPEAKER. The Chair hears no objection, and the views of the minority are ordered to be printed with the report of the majority.

POST-OFFICE APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. I move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the purpose of considering general appropriation bills, and especially with a view of resuming the consideration of the Post-Office appropriation bill; and pending that motion I move that all general debate shall be closed in four and one-half hours. I understand from my friend from Michigan [Mr. HORR] he is willing to consent to that limitation of the general debate to four and one-half hours.

Mr. HORR. Two hours and a half on this side.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. And two hours on this side. Of course this does not include whatever remains to myself out of my hour, and which I reserved. With that addition it will make five hours; and therefore I will modify my motion so that debate shall be closed in five hours.

Mr. HORR. As I understand it, the gentleman from Illinois had thirty minutes of his time remaining and which he reserved out of his hour.

The SPEAKER. That is a matter over which the House has no control. That is an understanding between gentlemen themselves, and is not a part of the motion of the gentleman from Illinois. The Chair means to state that any arrangement as to the division of the time after it has been limited is a matter to be determined by gentlemen themselves.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. I ask unanimous consent, then, that all general debate shall be closed in five hours after the consideration of the bill shall be resumed.

Mr. WILLIS. Why not say two hours?

Mr. TOWNSHEND. It has been agreed between the gentleman from Michigan and myself that all general debate shall be closed in five hours, and we wish to have an order of the House entered to that effect.

Mr. WILLIS. I move to strike out "five" and insert "three" hours.

Several MEMBERS. That is right.

Mr. WILLIS. We have already had a whole day on this subject.

The SPEAKER. The motion is not debatable.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. I ask for a division of the House on that amendment.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 83, noes 57.

So the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. I withdraw the motion to close debate, and will let the House regulate it hereafter.

Mr. WILLIS. I object to that.

The SPEAKER. It is not in order to withdraw the motion after an amendment has been agreed to unless by unanimous consent.

Mr. WILLIS. And I object.

Mr. HOLMAN. Perhaps if the gentleman from Kentucky will consent to make it four hours there will be no objection.

Mr. WILLIS. No, sir; the committee having indicated its purpose as to what the time should be, the gentleman from Kentucky accepts the indication of the committee.

Mr. ROGERS, of Arkansas. I demand tellers.

The House divided; and there were ayes 15.

The SPEAKER. Not a sufficient number to order tellers.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. Then I make the point of order that a quorum has not voted, and that will give me tellers on this motion.

The SPEAKER. The point of order having been made, the Chair will appoint as tellers Mr. TOWNSHEND and Mr. WILLIS.

The question recurred on the motion to close debate as amended to three hours.

The House divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 97, noes 86.

So the motion was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The question now recurs on the motion to go into committee.

The motion was agreed to; and the House accordingly resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, Mr. BLOUNT in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The House resumes the consideration of the bill (H. R. 5459) making appropriations for the service of the Post-Office Department for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1885, and for other purposes, on which the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. BINGHAM] is entitled to the floor. By order of the House all general debate on this subject shall be closed in three hours.

Mr. BINGHAM addressed the committee. [See Appendix.]

During the delivery of the foregoing remarks, at the expiration of one hour, the hammer fell.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Pennsylvania has expired.

Mr. BINGHAM. I would like to have a little further time, if possible.

Mr. WHITE, of Kentucky. I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman from Pennsylvania be given fifteen minutes' additional time.

The CHAIRMAN. The House has limited the general debate, and it would not be in order for the committee to extend it.

Mr. HOLMAN. I presume that the remaining time on that side of the House is at the disposal of the gentleman from Pennsylvania or his friends.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Indiana will be recognized next. The Chair desires now to state that the arrangement made by the gentlemen on the several sides of this bill as to the debate has been defeated by the action of the House.

Mr. HOLMAN. I suggest though that three hours were allowed for debate. Of course the gentleman of Pennsylvania represents one hour and a half of that time, and I suggest therefore that he consume such time of that hour and a half as he may think proper.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will not interrupt the gentleman unless some member of the committee sees fit to do so. It is not proper, however, to entertain a motion to extend the time.

Mr. SKINNER, of New York. If I can be recognized I will yield to the gentleman.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Pennsylvania can proceed unless objection is made by some member of the committee.

Mr. HOLMAN. I suppose the time can not be extended by the committee, but the gentleman can use the half hour remaining to that side of the House.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will understand that the time is being used by the assent of gentlemen on the other side unless objection is made.

Mr. HOLMAN. Of course the time can not be extended by the committee.

The CHAIRMAN. It can not. The Clerk informs the Chair that the additional time was granted with a view to allowing the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. TOWNSHEND] to close the debate. The gentleman is not present, the Chair perceives.

Mr. HOLMAN. This will not interfere with that arrangement.

Mr. HOLMAN addressed the committee. [See Appendix.]

Mr. SKINNER, of New York. Mr. Chairman, we are willing to give full credit wherever the bill under consideration does justice to the interests of the country. We make no charge of insincerity, bad faith, or wrong intent. We judge the bill solely by its known or anticipated effects. We give credit for a desire for economy on the part of the honorable gentleman from Illinois [Mr. TOWNSHEND] and his honorable colleague from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN], for both of whom I have personal respect. We will follow them wherever they may lead in the real path of economy, but can not follow in the by-paths which lead to the pools of stagnation by aiding in the passage of any bill which will prove a detriment to the public service.

What is economy when considered in the discussion of national affairs? It is the cutting off of useless expenditure and extravagance.

It is the management of governmental affairs upon the same strict principles which govern business concerns. This implies getting the best possible service and the best results at the least expense. It does not imply the employment of fewer servants than are necessary to properly conduct public or private business. To employ one servant less than is required is as much against public interest as to employ one more than is actually necessary.

There is a power behind us which is a just judge of our work. That power is the people of the United States; the reading, writing, thinking, sensible people, who write the letters and read the newspapers. They ask for service, and always appreciate the best service that can be given. They will hold us strictly responsible. They will condemn us if we give unreasonable appropriations to be corruptly expended. They will as certainly condemn us if we give less than the public interest demands or seek to cripple the service by making meager appropriations. There is no intimation of corruption, misappropriation, or dishonesty in the administration of the Post-Office Department.

The honorable gentlemen who have spoken for the Committee on Appropriations have not intimated anything of the kind. Will not the people hold the administration responsible for all its acts? Do they not commend every advanced step and condemn crime? Have not criminals been driven from place and pursued by public condemnation?

This bill deals with the only Department of the Government which is self-supporting. In the nature of things, other Departments, like the State, War, Navy, Interior, and Treasury, can not be self-sustaining. It is not to be expected that they will be. The bill affects the interest of every person in the country who can read or write, and more than all other Department bills combined. And who pays for the service? Who pays the vast amount required to satisfactorily conduct this great Department? It is paid purely and simply by the voluntary act of the people, who are glad to use the privileges given and willing to pay for them. Shall they then be denied any advantage or convenience they ask and are willing to pay for? They are, with reason, jealous when these privileges are curtailed or interfered with.

The effects of this bill, by certain provisions, are:

1. It strikes at nine of our proudest American cities, which collect more than one-quarter of the entire postal revenues of the country, by decreasing the salaries of the postmasters. Does the committee appreciate the labor and responsibility resting upon the postmasters at these cities? Does it appreciate the work they do, the revenue they collect?

In this connection I desire to appropriate a table compiled by my colleague [Mr. RAY], showing the comparative postal receipts and expenditures of these nine great cities and the nine Democratic States of the Union giving the largest postal revenues:

	Receipts, 1882-'83.	Exp'ditures, 1882-'83.

These are instructive figures and worthy of attentive study.

It strikes at one hundred and fifty-nine of our most progressive cities and towns by crippling the free-delivery service at these points, which collect one-half the entire postal revenues. The revised estimate of the Post-Office Department on this point is $4,000,000; the amount appropriated in the bill is $3,600,000; showing a cutting down of $400,000 from estimates.

In this connection I submit a letter from the superintendent of the free-delivery system touching the appropriation for and positive needs of this service:

POST-OFFICE DEPARTMENT,
OFFICE OF THE FIRST ASSISTANT POSTMASTER-GENERAL,
Washington, D. C., February 1, 1884.

SIR: I submit herewith for your consideration a revised estimate of the cost of the free-delivery service for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1885.

It is proper to state, as bearing on this subject, that this service is now in operation in 159 of the largest cities in the country, employing 3,888 carriers, and aggregating a population of 10,000,000 under the census of 1880, who are directly interested in it, besides other millions who, having correspondence with these cities, are likewise interested in it.

That this branch of the service during the last fiscal year yielded $1,021,894 from local matter alone in excess of the cost of the service.

That the total revenues of the Department for the fiscal year ended June 30, 1883, amounted to $45,508,692, of which amount $22,317,499 was derived from the free-delivery offices—one-half.

That the large estimate is due in great part to the act of August 2, 1882, changing the pay of all auxiliary carriers from $400 to $600 per annum, and requiring the promotion of carriers to the next higher grade after one year's service, involving an expense in each individual case of $200 in the first-class free-delivery cities, and $250 in the second class.

That the percentage of increase of the service for the fiscal year ended June 30, 1882, was 4.93; whereas it was 20.96 for the fiscal year ended June 30, 1883, this large increase in the cost being attributable mainly to the act of August 2, 1882.

It will be observed that the expense of the service is shown in comparison with the postage derived from local matter alone, which is estimated at about 25 per cent. of the whole matter delivered by carriers—no credit being given to matter received by mail and delivered by carriers.

In view of the above considerations, the service can not, in my judgment, be kept up to a commendable state of efficiency and extended to additional cities, as the law authorizes, for a less sum than the estimate herewith submitted, $4,000,000.

Very respectfully,

R. W. GURLEY,
Superintendent Free-Delivery System.

Hon. FRANK HATTON,
First Assistant Postmaster-General

Pay of 1,985 carriers, at $1,000 each	$1,985,000
Pay of 891 carriers, at $850 each	757,350
Pay of 367 carriers, at $800 each	293,600
Pay of 645 carriers, at $600 each	387,000
3,888	3,422,950

These estimates were made January 15, 1884, at present rates, which are changing every day by promotions.

For promotion, 1,012 carriers	$220,000
For additional carriers, say $300 to $600 each, which is less than an average of two to each of 159 offices	180,000
For estimated service in additional cities (21 now on file)	50,000
For incidentals, including three inspectors ($9,000)	130,000
	4,002,950

I also append a list of cities applying for free delivery:

Cities.	Population, 1880.	Revenue, 1883.
Decatur, Ill	9,547	$30,027
Fargo, Dak	2,693	30,288
Fort Worth, Tex	6,663	26,045
Freeport, Ill	8,516	21,318
Jacksonville, Ill	10,927	21,878
Joliet, Ill	16,145	20,234
La Crosse, Wis	14,505	25,091
Moline, Ill	7,800	20,493
Raleigh, N. C	9,265	23,914
Rutland, Vt	12,149	20,242
Norwich, Conn	21,141	.....
Newburg, N. Y	18,050	.....
Nashua, N. H	13,397	20,158
Rome, N. Y	12,045	.....
Salt Lake City, Utah	20,768	40,878
San José, Cal	12,567	29,232
Sedalia, Mo	9,561	21,049
Sioux City, Iowa	7,366	27,300
Selma, Ala	7,529	.....
Saratoga Springs, N. Y	8,421	.....
Waterbury, Conn	20,269	31,544

It will be seen that this list affects cities and towns in fourteen different States, the greater number (five) in the State of Illinois, whence comes our friend Mr. TOWNSHEND. These thriving communities are all asking the establishment of the free-delivery system, but their requests can not be granted by reason of insufficient funds. Pass the bill in its present form, and there is an end of the extension of the system. To make both ends meet the number of carriers must be reduced at points now established. To make the point clear as to the actual needs of the Department in this direction I append two letters from the Postmaster-General to the chairman of the House Committee on Appropriations:

POST-OFFICE DEPARTMENT, Washington, D. C., February 12, 1884.

SIR: I find, on referring to my annual report for 1883, page 59, that in stating the amount which will be required for the free-delivery service for the fiscal year beginning July 1, 1884, two important items were omitted, namely, $180,000 for additional letter-carriers in cities where the service is now in operation and $20,000 for additional incidental expenses, making $200,000.

I therefore advise that the estimate for this service for the next fiscal year be increased from $3,800,000 to $4,000,000.

The considerations which lead me to ask for this large amount are as follows: This service has been extended within about a year to forty-seven additional cities, making the present number one hundred and fifty-nine. These cities have an aggregate population according to the census of 1880 of about 10,000,000, and employ 3,888 carriers at the present time. They yielded last year one-half of the gross revenue of the Department, and from postage on local matter alone $1,021,594 in excess of the total cost of this branch of the service. The amount required is also largely increased by the act of August 2, 1882, increasing the pay of auxiliary carriers from $400 to $600 per annum, and requiring the promotion of carriers to the next higher grade after one year's service, involving an increased expense in each individual case of $200 in the first-class free-delivery cities and $250 in the second-class cities. The percentage of increase in the cost of the service for the fiscal year was 4.93, against 20.95 for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1883, this large increase being due in great part to the act above cited.

I therefore recommend the appropriation of $4,000,000 as the probable cost of the service for the next fiscal year.

Very respectfully,

W. Q. GRESHAM, Postmaster-General.

Hon. S. J. RANDALL,
Chairman Committee on Appropriations, House of Representatives.

POST-OFFICE DEPARTMENT, Washington, D. C., February 11, 1884.

SIR: I desire to submit for the consideration of the Committee on Appropriations that, according to the best estimates that can be made up to this time, the appropriation for the free-delivery service for the current fiscal year will be exceeded at the close of the year by a small sum.

To meet this anticipated deficiency, I request that the amount left over from the appropriation of the last fiscal year, namely, $26,663.49, be appropriated for use during the remainder of this fiscal year.

I beg leave to state in this connection that Congress at its last session appropriated for this service $100,000 less than the estimate submitted, and hence the danger of a deficiency.

Very respectfully,

W. Q. GRESHAM, Postmaster-General.

Hon. S. J. RANDALL,
Chairman Committee on Appropriations,
House of Representatives.

To continue this bill in its spirit is like putting down a feather to stem a torrent—a vain attempt to check the steady and resistless increase in postal business by a cry of false economy.

It is a face-about to the rear in dealing with a progressive question. It is an attempt to stop progress, and we are told that where progress ends decay begins.

It is a crippling of the railway mail service of the country by giving to the Department $1,050,000 less than the estimates furnished for inland transportation by railroad routes, and $295,286.60 less than the estimates furnished for railway postal clerks for the next fiscal year. The growth of the service demands our attention, and we hear no good reason why the increase asked for should not be given. It is based on careful and honest estimates, and if denied the service will grow weak instead of strong. We can not expect the service to be weakened on the great trunk lines, which are the arteries of travel and of communication. These will be maintained to their full efficiency, but it will be the side lines upon which so many of us live that will suffer. We can not afford to cripple them.

The increase in mail handled during the past year was 15.96 per cent. on the preceding year, and the increase in number of miles of railroad was 9,264. The Department asks only an increase of 8 per cent. over the preceding appropriation, and gives excellent reasons why it should be given. Again the bill cripples thousands of post-offices throughout the country by reducing the amount required for clerk-hire. We all know how urgent the demand is; we all know that at third-class post-offices no allowances whatever can be made for rent, and clerk-hire can only be given at "separating offices." I trust this Congress will yet do justice to post-offices of the third class by passing a bill now on our Calendar giving the Postmaster-General authority to make allowances for rent to post-offices of the third class.

The bill reduces the appropriation for clerk-hire from $4,900,000 to $4,775,000, a decrease of $125,000. While the increase of gross revenues, as shown by returns from one hundred offices, is 24.32 per cent. for 1882–'83, it would seem as though an increase of 2.6 per cent. or $125,000 ought to be allowed without question.

The allowances made in 1882–'83 were 2,758; increase over preceding year, 478; increase per cent., 20.9: applications denied in 1882–'83, 2,604; separation offices allowed, 1,732. There is needed to-day in this branch of the Department to meet just demands $20,000, and yet one office has to be robbed of a portion of its allowance to give another what is absolutely nece sary for the good of the service.

The bill denies, or attempts to deny, to postmasters below the third class what the law of 1883 gives them, and which they are entitled to allow themselves in making their returns. This will only create a deficiency which a future Congress must pay. The money will be spent, and we might as well appropriate it. The bill appropriates $1,750,000 less than the closest estimate the Department can make under the construction of the law of March 1, 1883.

The bill makes no allowance for the growth of the service or its grand possibilities. In twenty years, 1863 to 1883, the transactions of the Post-Office Department have increased over $30,000,000, year by year. I append the following table, showing—

It will be seen that the Post-Office Department for many years has been steadily self-sustaining.

As one instance illustrating the growth of the mail service it may be stated that forty years ago in the New York post-office in an entire week the weight of the mails amounted to but 19,000 pounds. Now that weight leaves New York every two hours, or more than one hundred and twenty tons daily by various routes. On January 16 last there was dispatched from New York over seventy-five tons of mail; the receipts also coming near that figure. Right here I desire to pay my respects to our amiable and liberal friend from Colorado who has so much to say about swinging wide open the doors of the national Treasury, and who loses no opportunity to charge New York with many of the sins which overtake the financial world. I am proud to say to him that a comparison of postal revenues shows that the "little" State of New York alone yields a sufficient revenue to run the postal business of seventeen "great" States like Colorado, and not work very hard either.

Mr. BELFORD. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SKINNER. No, I can not; my time has nearly expired. I am sorry, for I like to hear you talk.

Does politics enter into the preparation of this bill on the part of the committee? Is there fear of retaining men in Government employ or of increasing the number in view of approaching elections? Whatever may be charged in other directions the Postoffice Department is free from any charges which make it dangerous as a political power. Nothing can be shown to prove that a Republican administration has not dealt equitably by all parties and all people.

It is liberal in its treatment of all sections of the country. A demand from Democratic Mississippi is heard as quickly and treated as fairly as a demand from Republican Iowa. Has any privilege been denied on political grounds? None whatever. The seventeen States and Territories of the Union which yield the postal revenues of this Government are nearly a solid Republican phalanx. They do not seek to deny to the remaining States any privilege accorded to them.

The next President of the United States will not be a Democrat simply because the Committee on Appropriations of this House cuts down the postal estimates four or five millions of dollars, or because it systematically pares the estimates given by the Departments. In short, he will not be a Democrat anyway! But no man was ever elected President because he or his party attempted to starve the Army, ridicule the Navy, or cripple the Post-Office Department. What the people want is a liberal, not a narrow policy—a liberal policy, honestly administered, without favoritism or sinecurism; and they have always shown that they appreciate it.

For the past twenty-three years Republican administrations have dealt justly with all sections; they have kept up with the spirit of the times; they have not looked back. When the people have demanded an advance they have always been at the front to serve them. They have given the people every privilege and advantage demanded by the increase of population and intelligence. It will do the same for twenty-three years to come.

People read more newspapers, write more letters, ten to one, than they did twenty years ago, and they demand a Government which keeps even pace with their enlightenment.

We are legislating for the public, not for parties; we are dealing with a question of vital importance to the comfort and convenience of 50,000,000 of people, not making political platforms or electing Presidents.

Mr. RAY, of New York. Mr. Chairman, judging from the conduct of the political majority of this House, the Democratic party seems to have two peculiar cardinal virtues which control its action so far as it has to do with aiding in the administration of the affairs of this Government.

The first is extravagance as applied to Democratic employés, and which they call liberality, and the second is parsimony, as applied to the Republican Executive Departments, and which they call economy.

True economy is one of the greatest virtues of any government. It is commendable in every legislative body, and if not practiced by the executive branches of our Government would sap the life of the Republic.

But economy is a word the meaning of which the Democratic party does not seem to understand. Economy may, and does, consist as much in the wise, the necessary, the judicious expenditure of money for purposes necessary to the general growth, prosperity, and welfare of the country as in keeping it hid and confined in the Treasury vaults. With our Democratic friends the word economy seems to be the synonym of penuriousness, except when applied to Democratic officials, and then economy and extravagance seem to be synonymous in the Democratic vocabulary. The Democratic idea seems to be that the Congress can not give the Republican administration little enough nor a Democratic office-holder too much.

To be sure, our Democratic friends are compelled to operate in a small way at present, as applying economy of this kind to themselves, but they are attempting to operate on a large scale when dealing with the Republican Executive Departments of the Government. For the Democratic committees of this House they can not have too many clerks nor too much pay. They have clerks for committees that never meet or that meet but once or twice during a session of Congress, and never report anything to the House unless it be a bill of expenses. But when the Postmaster-General asks for the money required to pay and keep in the employment of the Government the clerks absolutely necessary to care for and distribute the mails of the country, with full knowledge of the facts and of the amount required, the Democratic majority of the Committee on Appropriations cuts down the amount recommended to a figure below what experience has proved absolutely necessary. I desire it distinctly understood that I believe the people of this country will resent, when opportunity presents, this attempt to cripple our railway mail service. The people of this country are ready and willing to pay most liberally for the rapid and safe carriage and delivery of the mails.

I think I may safely say there has been no charge of extravagance in this department of the service. The facilities afforded are good, but not sufficient. The employés are hard worked, poorly paid, and not sufficient in number. The population of the country is rapidly increasing. The lines of railroad are reaching out farther and farther every year; and where goes the steam-horse with the train of cars, there must go the railway mail service. Eager for knowledge, hungry for news, the men and women and the boys and girls watch the coming of the train, and are more impatient at a delayed mail train than at the non-arrival of friends or express matter.

The following table shows the gowth of the mail service from 1836 to 1883. In that time its annual receipts have grown from $5,000,000 to $45,000,000, and for many years it has been self-sustaining:

Then why is it that a deliberate effort is made to cripple this branch of the service? Do our Democratic friends expect that they can compel the Department to "squeeze through" and get the mail matter delivered at a small expense, and thus gain a reputation for economy? Or is it that you hope to keep out of Government employ a large number of persons lest they should help swell the great army of Republican office-holders and perhaps vote the Republican ticket? Or is it that you may create a large deficiency for the next Congress, which you know will be Republican, to provide for, so that you can make a contrast for the next campaign, and thus by false pretenses try to get power in this House two years out of every four?

If you desire to retain your majority in this House you must throw aside your assumed virtues and cultivate real ones. You must study the wants and the wishes of the people, keep pace with the march of events, and administer to the intellectual wants of the people with no niggardly hand. There is another feature of this bill that demands attention. It is proposed to cut down the salaries of the postmasters of nine of the largest cities of this country to $4,000 per annum. The gentleman from Illinois confesses that the bill strikes at the city of New York, Philadelphia, Baltimore, Boston, Saint Louis, Chicago, San Francisco, Cincinnati, and Washington. These nine cities furnish more revenue to the Post-Office Department than any nine Democratic States in the Union. Of course I exclude the States of New York, Connecticut, and New Jersey (States that are classed as doubtful)—States that the gentleman from Missouri the other day called barnacles on the rotten hulk of the Democratic party. Thank God, he shall no more so term them. In November next they will each prove a thorn in the side of the Democratic party.

To properly administer the affairs of these offices requires the best skill, the highest intelligence, and the most onerous labors. These offices require the services of men who in any department of business can command the highest salaries; men who are able to earn, and who demand for the support of their families, much larger salaries. I desire to ask the gentlemen who reported this bill if they wish to drive from these places men of character, intelligence, skill, and business capacity, and fill them with a class of men of inferior abilities? Or is it your intention simply to put these men on such small pay that by no possibility can they contribute to the success of the Republican party in the approaching campaign.

I confess that I believe your object purely political and not economical. The people of this country so understand it, and they will duly resent it. It seems to me that you cannot afford to seek political gain at the expense of the public good; that you cannot afford to attempt to lift a political party into power by destroying the efficiency of the Postal Department in these great cities.

Sir, I shall expect a round scolding from the Democratic side for my temerity in presuming to offer advice to our Democratic brethren. I know I am presumptuous, and that a new member of this august body deserves censure for assuming to differ from the condensed wisdom of the gentlemen on the other side who, by "long service in this House," as the gentleman from Pennsylvania says, have become entitled forsooth to guide and direct the whole legislation of the country. I shall expect a severe rebuke, such as the distinguished gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. RANDALL] administered the other day to the distinguished gentleman from New York [Mr. DORSHEIMER] who assumed to advocate the armament of three vessels of war to protect the commerce of the United States.

Sir, I expected the gentleman from New York to assert his manliness and exhibit some of his old-time vigor, such as he was wont to display in the legislative halls of the State of New York, in which State he resides, and where, as lieutenant-governor, he presided over the senate of that great State. Sir, I was astonished when I found him obedient to the crack of the party whip and when I saw him bow down in meek submission to the dictation of party will, even at the expense of his ideas of what is due to the dignity of the Navy of this great country.

Sir, for full fifteen minutes were we entertained by that other distinguished gentleman from New York [Mr. COX], who so fervently advocated the full armament and equipment of the star actress Langtry (an English cruiser), and he met with no rebuke. On the contrary he was listened to with the most profound attention by our Democratic friends, who treated with contempt the dignified and manly address that pleaded for the American Navy. But the reason was plain. The gentleman who advocated an appropriation to arm and equip American war vessels was trenching on the Democratic idea of economy. He was advocating a doctrine that rendered it possible for a Republican administration to employ a few hundred men in our navy-yards; to add to the dignity of this nation; to command the respect of the civilized world.

But, sir, I am departing somewhat from the object that I had in rising to address the House. With considerable labor and care I have tabulated the figures bearing on the question to which I last referred, and I am prepared to say that in my judgment it would be a shameful act to pass this bill in its present form.

The following table shows the receipts and disbursements in the several States and Territories, and that but one Democratic State pays its postal expenses:

The nine Democratic States yielding the largest revenue give a postal revenue of $5,463,612.40, and their expenses are $7,959,139.25, showing an annual deficiency of $2,495,526.85, excluding of course the cities of Baltimore and Saint Louis from these figures. These nine cities, at which this bill strikes, give an annual revenue of $12,323,798, and the total expenses of these offices are $2,393,098, giving us a surplus revenue in these nine cities of $9,930,700.

Surplus revenue in these cities	9,930,700 00

The salaries paid the postmasters in these nine great cities of the nation, and which yield to this Government this immense surplus revenue, are as follows:

New York	$8,000
Chicago	6,000
Philadelphia	6,000
Boston	6,000
Saint Louis	6,000
San Francisco	5,000
Cincinnati	6,000
Baltimore	5,000
Washington	5,000
Salaries paid	53,000
Salaries proposed	36,000
Assumed saving	17,000

Now, my experience is that if we would have work well done we must have it well paid. We must have the compensation commensurate in some degree at least with the labor, the risk, and the responsibility. These postmasters give bail in an immense sum, and they are responsible not only for their own acts, but for the acts of their subordinates. Then should they be cut down to a mere pittance, or shall their salaries be graded according to the receipts, the responsibilities, the labors? Is it economy to take from them every pecuniary incentive to make their respective offices produce the largest possible revenue? Is it becoming to the dignity of this Government to cut down the salaries of these officials to a figure that will simply command the services of ordinary men, and barely suffice for the support of themselves and families in the most economical manner and deprive them of the hope of saving a single penny?

No, sir; we owe to every citizen a duty, and we can ill afford to degrade the character of any official. And I assert that this Government can well afford to pay these nine men their present salaries for safely administering the postal affairs and collecting the moneys at these nine great commercial centers, which produce more than one-fourth of the entire postal revenues of this country and make the service more than self-supporting.

To pass this bill in its present form will publish our parsimony and indicate no economy. But, sir, I desire to present another table of figures showing the receipts and expenditures of the postal service in the States in which are situated the six large cities named in the above table, and excluding, of course, the receipts and disbursements of those six cities, namely: New York, Chicago, Philadelphia, Boston, San Francisco, and Cincinnati.

States.	Receipts.	Expenses.
New York	$3,752,737 48	$4,485,210 66
Illinois	1,885,197 22	2,599,426 07
Pennsylvania	2,469,503 40	2,798,284 82

Ohio	2,261,414 49	3,219,012 77
	12,543,786 15	16,125,201 67
		12,543,786 15
Deficiency in six States, not including those cities		3,581,415 52

Expenses above receipts in such States, as follows:

New York	$732,473 18
Illinois	714,228 85
Pennsylvania	328,781 42
Massachusetts	113,654 88
California	734,678 91
Ohio	957,598 28
Total	3,581,415 52

Now, taking these six States in which are situated six of these large cities, we find them giving a large surplus.

Surplus of postal receipts over expenses in six States.

States.	Receipts.	Expenses.
New York	$8,166,559 48	$5,352,829 66
Illinois	2,834,396 22	2,982,077 07
Pennsylvania	4,048,738 40	3,061,567 82
Massachusetts	2,999,683 16	1,888,222 04
California	1,241,602 40	1,518,619 31
Ohio	2,900,038 49	3,330,198 77
	23,191,018 15	18,133,514 67
	18,133,514 67
Surplus in six States	5,057,503 48

Thus we find that the States in which are situated six of the large cities at which it is proposed to strike giving us a grand surplus revenue of $5,057,503.48, while nine of the very best Democratic States in the Union giving the largest postal revenue, and including the States in which are situated two of the cities struck at, Baltimore and Saint Louis, show a deficiency of $2,495,526.85, not including those cities, and a deficiency of $1,357,021.85, including them, while the nine cities struck at by this bill give us the magnificent surplus revenue of $9,930,700 with which to support a postal service in the poorer States. And yet you propose to cripple the service, impair the efficiency of the employés in these six States and in these nine cities, to the detriment of the people, and the business, educational, and religious interests of this great country, under the plea of Democratic economy.

Gentlemen, you have the power to do it, but remember the people have the power to remedy the evil and rebuke this assault upon the best postal system and the most efficient service of the world.

There are other, many other, provisions of this bill which are most objectionable, but want of time prevents their consideration. It is only necessary for me to say that civilization has marched on, and will continue to march on despite the Democratic party. Some one has said that progress has its halts as well as its marches.

You may command and in part force a halt in the progress of the grand postal system of this country if you will, but the intelligent people will rise in their power and revoke the orders and demand the restoration of every facility that tends to build up commerce, aids agricultural and manufacturing enterprises, and gives intelligence to the people.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. Mr. Chairman, every gentleman on the other side of the House who has spoken on this bill has exercised not only the privilege of criticising in severe and unfair terms the action of the committee, but has made politics a prominent feature of his remarks. The House will bear me witness that in my opening speech I refrained from any political allusion whatever. It was introduced into this debate by the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. HORR], and his course has been followed by all those on the opposite side who have subsequently spoken. Before I discuss the political questions introduced here I wish to correct some of the errors into which gentlemen have fallen.

The Committee on Appropriations of this Democratic House have had the highest appreciation of the fact that the postal service is a rapidly growing one, and that there is absolute necessity for increase of appropriation in that service every year. But I charge that the Republican Congress last year failed to appreciate that fact, for instead of providing an increase of appropriation to meet the growing demand on the service, that Republican Congress reduced the appropriation for 1884 $154,000 below the appropriation of the previous year, 1883, allowing not one dime for increase of service during the year, but on the contrary curtailing and cutting down necessary appropriations for the service. Now look at the real facts. Did we reduce the appropriations below those of last year? No; on the contrary we have increased the appropriations above those of last year nearly $2,000,000. Why, what did the last Congress do on this item providing pay for postmasters, which has been so much criticised? Notwithstanding the large increase in the number of postmasters, the Republican House only increased the appropriation $450,000 above that of the previous year, and they made the appropriations $1,065,000 less than was paid postmasters the previous year.

What further? It appears that for the Post-Office Department, under the control of Republican officials, the appropriation for the pay of postmasters was $181,000 less than the books of the Post-Office Department showed had been paid to postmasters the preceding year. How does such action compare with our committee, which has increased the appropriation for postmasters' salaries one million and a quarter of dollars, and yet you come and declare the Democratic party has not appreciated and provided for the increase of the service.

In regard to postal clerks, about which so much has been said, I wish to call attention to the language of the Postmaster-General. Before proceeding further I desire to say nothing shall fall from my lips against the present able Postmaster-General Gresham. I am speaking of the maladministration and the corruption which ran riot in the Post-Office Department before his entrance into that office. He was a gallant soldier during the late war, and an able, conscientious, and upright judge in Indiana, and I believe him to be an able and upright Postmaster-General. I am sorry I can not say as much for some of those who preceded him, and for some other officers who have held positions in that Department within the past few years. The committee has respected the recommendations of Mr. Gresham and have given careful consideration to all his estimates, although at times differing with him. What does he say in regard to clerks in post-offices?

> Many clerks designated, not, however, by statute, as assistant postmasters, superintendents of division, cashiers, auditors, &c., were paid salaries ranging from $3,000 to $3,500, and many more were paid salaries ranging from $2,000 to $3,000. Postmasters, backed as many of them are by influential friends, have in some cases been unreasonable in their demands for allowances, and it is not surprising that some of them have received more than their share of the appropriation while others have received less.

This is the language of the Postmaster-General.

There, my Republican friends, is your Postmaster-General telling you plainly that out of the meager appropriations made by last year's bill some officers, "backed by influential friends," obtained a large and disproportionate number of clerks to the detriment of others. If it had not been for the presence of "influential friends;" no doubt the clerks would have been distributed in such a manner as to have afforded a sufficient number to all.

Mr. BINGHAM. Will the gentleman permit me to interrupt him just here?

Mr. TOWNSHEND. I can not. I have but very limited time, and beg not to be interrupted. Now, we have increased the item for post-office clerks, and if I had time I believe I could convince any fair mind from the reports of the Post-Office Department and other data that if the number this fund will employ is wisely distributed and outside "influential friends" do not interfere we have appropriated all that is necessary for this service.

Mr. BINGHAM. The gentleman will pardon me, but I do not understand this as an increase.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. Now I wish to devote some attention to a few of the features of this debate.

Mr. WHITE, of Kentucky. Before the gentleman does that will he not allow a question upon the merits of the bill?

Mr. TOWNSHEND. I have not the time now to yield to the gentleman. He will have ample opportunity when the paragraphs of the bill are being discussed to ask, and I can then answer all his inquiries upon the details of the bill.

Mr. Chairman, as I have already remarked when I was first on the floor, and had called attention to the fact that last year the Republican Congress, disregarding the enormously increased demand for the payment of the salaries of postmasters, appropriated only $450,000 more than the previous year, and that it had failed to appropriate $1,065,394 as much as was required for actual expenditures of the previous year, and that the Post-Office officials had failed to estimate by $181,394 as much as the expenditures of the previous year required, and the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. HORR] when on his feet admitted that the appropriations of last year were so meager and less than the needed amount as to occasion a deficiency of $2,000,000 on the appropriations for this year——

Mr. HORR. Not on this item.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. Was it on the aggregate of the bill?

Mr. HORR. Yes, on the entire bill.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. A deficiency of $2,000,000; while on the other hand by this bill we have increased the appropriations of last year, and have given as much as the positively ascertained estimates show are necessary. At that point in my remarks the very strange conduct of the Republican Congress and the Post-Office Department caused my friend from Massachusetts [Mr. LYMAN]—I am sorry to find he is not in his seat—who is unsophisticated in the "ways that are dark and the tricks that are vain," practiced by his political associates in Congress, innocently to inquire of me what was the reason for this strange action of the Post-Office Department and of the Republican Congress. Sir, well may such conduct excite the curiosity of any fair-minded and candid man and cause him to make the inquiry, no matter to what political party he may belong.

I will now give the answer. His party friends can not plead ignorance as a justification for the refusal of the Department to make a sufficiently large estimate, because the books were there showing them how much it was their duty to estimate for. They well knew that more would be required than was asked. Nor can his party friends in the last Congress justify themselves upon the plea of ignorance, because they were frequently reminded by Democratic members in the debate that occurred on the bill last year of the inadequacy of the appropriation for postmasters' salaries and that there would be a deficiency in this item. Why, then, were they guilty of such an omission of duty? Sir, I charge that they did so with the deliberate intention to deceive the country into the belief that they were in favor of economy, and to create a deficiency that this, a Democratic House, would be required to fill in order that their stump orators might howl and rail against Democratic extravagance and in favor of Republican economy. Why, sir, we all know the postal service absolutely requires, as I have heretofore stated, increased appropriations every year; and yet last year they actually failed to appropriate by several hundred thousand dollars as much as was appropriated the preceding year.

There are other items in this bill where the same false pretense was practiced by the political associates of my friend from Massachusetts, who I am glad to see is now in his seat, but I have not time to refer to them in the few minutes now at my command.

Sir, their conduct in this debate is but a part of the programme adopted last year. After making inadequate appropriations for this service and creating large deficiencies, they come in now at this session of Congress with an assumption of virtue they have not and rail at us for not making enormous and extravagantly increased appropriations. When we offer 13 per cent. increase in the appropriation for the salaries of postmasters over that of the last Congress, when they made the appropriation themselves, they still demand that we shall give millions more. How rapidly do the salaries of postmasters annually increase, if 13 per cent. is not sufficient? Can you claim that postmasters' salaries are annually increasing at a greater rate than that?

When the gentleman from Michigan reached the item for star routes, although we gave every cent estimated as necessary by the Department for that service (and we have not taken a dollar off the estimates), notwithstanding that fact the gentleman rises in his place and denounces the Democrats on the committee as having made meager appropriations for the star routes. And when I reminded him that his own party had made inadequate appropriations, he replied, we must not imitate the blunders but the virtues and the beauties of his party.

Sir, his party has shown no virtues in the past fifteen years worthy of imitation. No political organization ever existed in any civilized country that has a record reeking with more corruption than the record the Republican party has made in the last fifteen years. No party has ever existed in a free land so utterly destitute of political virtues, so unfaithful to public trusts, so prolific in false pretense and hypocrisy as the Republican party during the last fifteen years of its history.

Mr. BELFORD rose.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. Do not interrupt me. I ask the gentleman from Colorado to contain himself.

Mr. BINGHAM. Why do you not include the time of the war?

Mr. TOWNSHEND. Look at the record it has made during the past fifteen years. No American citizen can read it without crimsoning with shame and humiliation for his country. I am willing to concede that many of the founders of that party were men of exalted virtues, of lofty aims, and noble purposes. But what became of those virtuous, noble, and pure-minded men who helped to create the Republican party?

Mr. WELLER. They went into the National party. [Laughter.]

Mr. TOWNSHEND. Where did Chase go? Where did Sumner go? Where did Seward go? Where did Andrew Johnson go? [Laughter on the Republican side.] Where did Lyman Trumbull, ANDREW G. CURTIN, and John W. Palmer—where did the best and most patriotic Republican leaders of 1856 and 1860 go when they discovered that their party had fallen under the baleful influence of the bad men who had prostituted it to base purposes?

Mr. HENDERSON, of Iowa, made a remark from his seat.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. Oh, we heard from Iowa last fall, and will hear still better news from that State next fall, I trust.

Sir, when that party was converted into a spoils-hunting band the bravest and most upright of the leaders who had led it to victory abandoned that party and affiliated with the Democratic party, the only political organization of the country that had patriotic aims and sought to administer the Government in the interest of the people. And many of those leaders are there to-day, doing valuable service for that party and the country.

Sir, the star-route item in this bill is a dangerous one upon which to proclaim the virtues and beauties of the Republican party. It brings up reminiscences that the gentleman from Michigan, as a Republican, should be glad to see buried in oblivion. For in the record of the many scandals with which the administration of that party has afflicted this country that page stands, not as the darkest, but as one of its most shameful acts of maladministration. But, sir, there are many other dark chapters in its history which can not be forgotten, when he would have us believe it has virtues and beauty. We can not forget that his party opened the vaults of the Treasury to the wickedest rings and thieves that ever cursed a free land, plunderers who have fattened upon spoils forced by iniquitous laws of taxation from a suffering people.

It was just such arguments as that made by the gentleman from Michigan—with different motives, I have no doubt—that the extravagant and unnecessary appropriations were obtained which were plundered from the Treasury by the thieving star-route contractors, creating one of the saddest episodes in the history of any administration of this Government. Such arguments for extravagant appropriations opened the door of the Treasury to the Credit Mobilier band, the post-trader plunderers, and the whisky ring, as well as many other raids on the Treasury. But I will pause; I will not recount the crimes of that party against the sacred rights of suffrage—its debauching of the ballot-box, its never-to-be-forgotten or pardoned crime of depriving a rightfully elected President of his office by fraud, perjury, and forgery; and yet with such a damning record before him the gentleman prates of the virtues of his party.

Let me warn the gentleman that if he is preparing campaign material for the next election he can not aid his cause by bringing up this record of his party. Sir, the people will remember these deeds of your party in the next election. It will be tried upon the indictment which I have but outlined, and if there be virtue and intelligence enough among our people, and I think there is, your party will be convicted and condemned to everlasting obloquy and oblivion. [Loud applause.]

Mr. REED. Can not the gentleman's time be extended?

Mr. TOWNSHEND. I ask that the bill be now read by paragraphs for amendment.

Mr. REED. The bill will appear rather tame after the gentleman's speech.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois has six minutes remaining of the time allowed by the House for general debate.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. I do not claim it.

The CHAIRMAN. General debate, then, is now closed by consent, and the bill will be read by paragraphs, and will be open for amendment and debate under the five-minute rule.

The Clerk read as follows:

That the following sums be, and the same are hereby, appropriated for the service of the Post-Office Department for the year ending June 30, 1885, out of any money in the Treasury arising from the revenues of said Department, in conformity to the act of July 2, 1836, as follows.

Mr. KASSON. I ask the gentleman in charge of the bill if this clause which has just been read authorizing the appropriations to be made only out of the revenues of the Department will accomplish its purpose in case of those revenues, by reason of the reduction of postage or otherwise, falling short of the necessary amount.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. I will explain. If this bill is sustained by the House according to the estimates made by the Postmaster-General of the incoming revenues, there will be a considerable surplus left out of the income of the postal service; because we have reduced the appropriations considerably below the estimates. I will say further that those estimates of the incoming revenue were made by the Postmaster-General some time before it was ascertained what would be the effect of the reduction in the rates of letter postage. It was supposed there might be a decrease of something like one-third in the receipts from letter-postage stamps. But the returns have since shown the revenues are to be very much larger than the Postmaster-General and other officers of the Department supposed, and it is believed by many good judges that the revenues will reach nearly $50,000,000; so that there is no probability of a deficiency.

Mr. KASSON. Is there in the bill any clause that provides, in case there is a deficiency, that it shall be supplied from any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated?

Mr. TOWNSHEND. There is not, because we kept below the estimates of revenue, and therefore no need exists for such a clause.

Mr. KASSON. I am aware that the receipts in the cities from the sales of stamps have been larger than was estimated; but I do not know that that holds good of the country at large, while it does hold good of the large city offices. I only wished to call the attention of the gentleman in charge of the bill and the committee to the necessity at some point of making provision to prevent any embarrassment of the service; that if the revenues should fall short the deficiency should be supplied out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated; in other words, that the usual clause to that effect should be inserted in the bill.

Mr. HORR. I will say to the gentleman from Iowa that I do not think that has ever been done in a bill where the estimates of revenue have been greater than the bill foots up. That provision has only been inserted where it was estimated the receipts would fall short of the expenditures.

Mr. HAMMOND. I rise to make a parliamentary inquiry. What question is before the committee?

The CHAIRMAN. There is no question pending.

Mr. KASSON. I will make a motion, so as to bring myself within the rule. The gentleman from Georgia [Mr. HAMMOND] will see that as a practical question he will gain nothing by forcing me to encumber the record with a motion. I move to strike out the last word.

I was about to say to my friend from Michigan [Mr. HORR] that before the Department became self-sustaining there was always an additional appropriation besides the revenues of the Department. I understand that the official estimates are not given upon the supposed result of the postage law. If the gentleman says that the Postmaster-General has estimated the receipts under the new law and since it went into effect, then of course there is some reason for assuming that as a basis for our action.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. I will answer the gentleman from the bill itself, in which it is stated that the estimated revenues for 1885 are $47,104,078.31.

Mr. KASSON. Will the gentleman state the date of that estimate?

Mr. TOWNSHEND. It was contained in the annual report of the Postmaster-General made to this Congress. The bill appropriates $45,261,900, nearly $2,000,000 less than the estimated revenues.

Mr. HORR. And in addition to that let me say that the Department, judging from the receipts since that estimate was made, is satisfied that the revenues will be in excess even of $47,000,000.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. And I will further suggest that the question can not properly arise for consideration until we have gone through the bill.

Mr. KASSON. I withdraw the pro forma amendment.

Mr. BELFORD. I desire to renew the amendment. We have witnessed strange spectacles in this House within the last few days. Think of it; the Democratic party, posing as the grand economic party of the country, reduced the amount of appropriations in the naval appropriation bill $8,000,000 below the estimates, though we were confronted at that time with the combined hostility of Europe. It was done under the advice of Democrats from Pennsylvania and from New York. To-day we see a Western member from Illinois playing the part of a decoy-duck around which the other Democrats are flocking, as in the play of Dundreary.

What does this bill do? It reduces the appropriations below the estimates over $4,000,000, with a constantly increasing population. Is there a gentleman on the floor of this House who will deny that the population of this country is daily increasing; that the demand for mail facilities, especially in the West, are daily increasing? Yet in view of these facts the Democratic party declares that they will not only destroy our Navy, not only cut down the appropriations for the postal service, but I expect that in the case of every appropriation bill presented to this House they will declare that there shall be a reduction; and that, too, in view of the fact that we have $150,000,000 of surplus revenue in the Treasury. [Laughter.] Oh, I am going to keep pounding at that. And in view of the further fact that the other day you had not courage to vote on the bonded-whisky bill, when the only result of defeating that bill was to place $70,000,000 more in the Treasury of the United States.

Mr. HARDEMAN. Will the gentleman allow me to ask——

Mr. BELFORD. Oh, no; I have only five minutes. I would be delighted to accommodate you, but I can never get into the debate here except under the five-minute rule.

When the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. TOWNSHEND] stands up here in his place and reads a lecture to the Republican party, I point him, first, to the fact that you over there had not the courage to consider the tariff so far as it relates to the wool trade; second, you had not the courage to consider the question of the bonded-whisky interests, which involve the national banks of this country; and you have not the courage to appropriate money enough to supply the people of the West with substantial and adequate mail service.

Mr. HARDEMAN. Will the gentleman yield——

Mr. BELFORD. No; unless you extend my time, and then I will. I appealed to you Democrats to-day to allow me ten minutes on this bill and I could not succeed in getting it. I am forced, as we all are on this side of the House, to speak under the five-minute rule. The time for debate upon this bill was carefully farmed out by the gentleman in charge of it.

I want to commend the engineers and managers of the Committee on Appropriations on the fact that they seduced a Western man to bring in a bill here which puts the knife into the very bosom of the mail service of the West. They were wise and smart; but we in the West will have courage, and sense, and discretion enough to hold the Democratic party responsible for that act.

Mr. HARDEMAN. I do not wish to make a speech on this bill, but simply to relieve the Democratic party of the charge made by the gentleman from Colorado [Mr. BELFORD]. The gentleman made the charge that the Democratic party dodged the question of the bonded-whisky bill. I simply wish to refer the House to the vote on that bill, and if gentlemen can find that the gentleman from Colorado [Mr. BELFORD] voted for it, then the record is certainly wrong.

Mr. BELFORD. I did not know the bill was coming up that day. I told Mr. WILLIS, of Kentucky, that I would vote for the bill.

Mr. HARDEMAN. But the gentleman did not appear, and when the question came up he deliberately dodged it and did not vote.

Mr. BELFORD. It was Saturday, and I was attending to Department business, and did not know the bill was coming up. But I previously assured Mr. WILLIS that I would vote for it.

Mr. HARDEMAN. But you did not do it.

Mr. WILLIS. I only desire, in justice to the gentleman from Colorado [Mr. BELFORD], to make one statement. It is true, as he has stated on this floor, that he has never concealed his purpose to vote in favor of the bonded bill; that his absence on the day when the vote referred to was taken was due more to my fault than his, as I failed to notify him. He has not attempted at any time, so far as I know, to conceal his purpose to vote for the bill.

I think this statement is due to him. I came in while this matter was under debate. I thought the House was discussing the Post-Office bill. I was out in the Committee on Rivers and Harbors discussing water, and when I returned I found gentlemen here discussing whisky.

Mr. BELFORD. I withdraw the pro forma amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Office of the First Assistant Postmaster-General:
For compensation to postmasters, $10,500,000. And no salary of any postmaster under the act entitled "An act to adjust the salaries of postmasters," approved March 3, 1883, shall exceed the sum of $4,000 per annum.

Mr. HORR. I move to amend the paragraph just read so as to make the appropriation for compensation of postmasters $12,250,000 instead of $10,500,000.

In explanation of this amendment I need only refer to the statement which I made here on Saturday last. The amount which my amendment proposes to appropriate for this purpose is the amount fixed in the estimate of the Postmaster-General. From a careful examination I am satisfied that even if this amount be appropriated there will be a deficiency. I am well aware that an insufficient appropriation for this item does not hamper the service, because we shall be compelled to make up the deficiency hereafter. The amount which may be appropriated for this item does not determine in any manner the sum which shall be spent. My friend from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN] is certainly mistaken in intimating that this is a matter which can be controlled by political action or political whim. It is a matter of mathematics.

The compensation which these postmasters receive is regulated according to a percentage on their receipts or is in the form of fixed salaries; and whether we appropriate more or less, they can take out of their receipts the exact amount which the law allows them; and whatever may be the aggregate amount in excess of the appropriation we are compelled to make it up by a deficiency. On the other hand, if we appropriate a million dollars too much every dollar of the excess remains in the Treasury; the excessive appropriation does not entail any additional expenditure. Consequently we should make as nearly as we can an appropriation which will cover the amount to be expended for this purpose.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. On this point I need but repeat what I have already said last Saturday and to-day. The amount estimated by the committee and appropriated in this item is in my judgment sufficient to pay all salaries of postmasters so far as they can be at present positively and definitely ascertained. The First Assistant Postmaster-General, in endeavoring to form an estimate of the amount that will be required for postmasters' salaries, says himself that the basis is a very uncertain one, and he has great difficulty in fixing upon an estimate. He first bases his estimate of the probable cost of the service upon its cost in the last quarter of last year, before the rates of postage were reduced; then he goes on and conjectures as to the effect of the changes in the law and the increase of the service may have upon the aggregate of these salaries. I simply repeat what I have said heretofore, that we give in this bill all that can upon ascertained data be found necessary. We have not given the amount that the First Assistant Postmaster-General surmises may be needed to cover the increase of the service, &c., because of the reasons I have mentioned. It is insisted by some that the legislation of the last Congress regarding salaries will absolutely reduce the aggregate amount of postmasters' salaries.

Mr. HORR. But does not the Postmaster-General state that in his opinion the salaries for this year will amount to nearly $200,000 more than you propose to appropriate for next year?

Mr. TOWNSHEND. The Postmaster-General does not, so far I recollect, make that difference.

Mr. HORR. Certainly he does.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. His opinion was that it would require $10,600,000. We give $10,500,000. That is what the Postmaster-General estimates. It is but an opinion—is not based upon actual ascertained facts.

Mr. BINGHAM. The gentleman does not quote fully what the Postmaster-General states. Let him read the whole paragraph.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. Last year, when this very question was up, my colleague from Illinois [Mr. CANNON], now my colleague on the committee; Mr. Caswell of Wisconsin, Mr. Robeson of New Jersey, I think the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. RYAN]—in fact, the whole Appropriations Committee insisted that only $9,250,000 was needed for postmasters' salaries. We have increased that appropriation a million and a quarter. Further than that, Mr. Caswell asserted here, and I find a similar statement in the report of the Postmaster-General, that the basis which the Department has adopted for estimating the amount required for postmasters' salaries is 20 per cent. on the income of the Post-Office Department. Now, 20 per cent. on $47,000,000 will make not much over $9,000,000. So that if we accept the percentage basis adopted by the Department in estimating the amount required for postmasters' salaries, we have appropriated a million and a quarter more than is needed for that purpose.

Mr. HORR. In 1883 this branch of the service cost something over $10,300,000.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. But how does my friend get over the fact that according to the estimate of the Department itself 20 per cent. of the income of the Department should be sufficient to pay the compensation of postmasters? If the gentleman will make the computation he will find that 20 per cent. will not amount to much over $9,000,000, whereas we have given $10,500,000—a million and a half more than that percentage shows to be necessary. I believe that when these salaries for the next fiscal year are paid there will remain a surplus of this appropriation of $10,500,000.

Mr. HORR. Why, sir, the gentleman, it seems to me, can not be candid in that statement. He has mathematics against him. He vouches for the ability and integrity of Mr. Gresham, the Postmaster-General; and this officer tells us in his report that the expenditure for this branch of the service can not be less than the amount proposed in the amendment, and it may be a good deal more. Even if the appropriation should be too large, an excessive appropriation will not cost the Government one cent additional.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. BINGHAM. I move to amend the amendment by striking out the last word. I wish to reply briefly to the statement of the gentleman having charge of this bill [Mr. TOWNSHEND] in reference to compensation of postmasters. The fact is known to the House that it makes no difference what amount be appropriated, the compensation fixed by statute goes to the postmasters. They receive on behalf of the Government the forty-seven or fifty millions of income which this Department collects, and from this amount they pay themselves their fixed salaries.

The gentleman refers to a statement contained, as he says, in the report of the Postmaster-General; but, in fact, the statement is that of the First Assistant Postmaster-General. The Postmaster-General asks for an appropriation of $12,250,000; and to ascertain this sum he goes to the estimate of the First Assistant Postmaster-General. But in this estimate there is nothing about 20 per cent. The First Assistant Postmaster-General first states that the appropriation for the present fiscal year is $9,250,000. He next states that the payments for postmasters' salaries during the last fiscal year amounted to about $10,300,000. I am not dealing now with the question what the Committee on Appropriations did or anything of that kind. I wish this Committee of the Whole to reach such a conclusion as will enable it to put into this bill the exact amount which, upon proper information, should go into it.

Now we know that for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1883, it took something over $10,300,000 to pay the compensation of postmasters. The First Assistant Postmaster-General submits that, according to the nearest estimate that can be reached, it will take for the present fiscal year $2,000,000 more than the $9,250,000 that was appropriated. We know that for 1883 $10,300,000 was required. We are assured that for this year the cost of this branch of the service will be $9,250,000 plus $2,000,000. But the gentleman says, "We have given $10,500,000, and the Department only asked for $10,600,000."

The Postmaster-General says:

> After a consideration of all the circumstances of the case, I am of the opinion that the amount paid for the quarter ended March 31, 1883 ($2,660,339.53), is the best present basis for an estimate, which, multiplied by four, would give $10,641,358.12 for the fiscal year 1884-'85—

There the gentleman stopped, but the Postmaster-General does not stop there. He continues as follows:

> exclusive of the annual increase in this item. Placing this natural increase at $750,000 for the present fiscal year and at $835,000 for the next year (which periods will include two readjustments of salaries at first, second, and third class offices), I judge that the total amount required for compensation to postmasters for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1885, would be about $12,216,358.12. Of this amount it is estimated that at least $4,000,000 will be required to pay postmasters at Presidential offices. The number of these offices on the 1st of October last was 2,195, and it is thought that for several coming quarters the increase will average about 45 offices per quarter, or 180 annually.

On the knowledge of what it was two years ago and on a fair estimate of the known increase of the service for the present and the next fiscal year, the Department asks for $12,250,000.

Coming to the question of percentage, the gentleman does not quote correctly the language of the Postmaster-General. The latter says:

> On no preceding occasion has it been so difficult to make anything like an accurate estimate for compensation to postmasters as at this time. For several years past, or since the passage of the law of June 17, 1878, it has been ascertained that an estimate based upon from 20 to 25 per cent. of the estimated receipts of the Department for the fiscal year under consideration would approximate as near to the amount required as by any other method. This is no longer practicable, however, in consequence of the changes, by the act of March last, in the rates of commissions paid postmasters, which law has been interpreted, so far as the compensation of fourth-class postmasters is concerned, to take effect from the date of its approval by the President, March 3, 1883.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman's time has expired.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. I will take the floor and yield a few minutes of my time to him in order to that he may finish his remarks.

Mr. BINGHAM. I thank the gentleman for his courtesy.

Now, under that law we gave the 46,000 postmasters 10 per cent. additional compensation. And in that connection I want to state why the Committee on Appropriations did not appropriate fully for the pay of the postmasters at the last Congress. The reason was this: The Post-Office appropriation bill came into the House in regular order all right, with appropriations made up according to the then estimates of the Department. The 2-cent postage did not go into effect until the action of the conference committee on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses, and that was just before the close of the last session. It was on the 3d of March, the last day, when the law was passed for the readjustment of the pay of postmasters. Therefore the Committee on Appropriations could not possibly have been able to have passed in the Post-Office appropriation bill on that change of the law and provided the necessary additional appropriation of 10 per cent. increase for 46,000 postmasters. And there is one of the difficulties to-day. It is because the Postmaster-General took into consideration all these facts that he asks for the next fiscal year $12,250,000.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. Mr. Chairman, I endeavored a moment ago to indicate the basis on which the committee made this appropriation. The Department makes its estimate of the amount required for the payment of the increased salaries on the basis of the last quarter of last year. Now this is not a fair test, for the reason that the law which went into operation on the 1st of October reduced the rate of postage to 2 cents, on which these salaries are mainly based. But the Department's estimate is based on the income from 3-cent stamps, or at one-third higher rate than that of the next year.

The Postmaster-General has based his estimate for the year on what was required for the last quarter of last year. Now, there is another circumstance that perhaps causes the Department to estimate the cost of the present year larger than it will be found at the end of the year. It is this: by reason of the law increasing postmasters' salaries of the fourth class being made to take effect in March last, the cost of those salaries for the first quarter of this year is some $600,000 more than will be required for the salaries of those postmasters for the remaining three-quarters of the fiscal year. As stated, those salaries for the first quarter of this year were based on the 3-cent stamp and the others will be based on the 2-cent stamp. Taking all the facts into consideration I am satisfied, sir, that we have given more than will be required for the next fiscal year. I believe we have been very liberal in this item. We have increased the appropriation in the aggregate to an amount I conscientiously believe will supply sufficient to meet the requirements of the whole service.

Mr. HORR. You have frankly and honestly said what the receipts are to be. Now, tell me how these receipts are going to increase without the postmasters' salaries increasing also?

Mr. TOWNSHEND. They will go up, of course. If we take the basis of the Department of 20 per cent. of the revenue it will only require $9,400,000. The Postmaster-General conjectures there will be a large percentage of increase, and he adds surmises which make out a sum that I think is largely in excess of what will be necessary. Taking the percentage fixed by the Department somewhat as a basis, and taking all the other circumstances I have mentioned into consideration, you will find the amount we recommend will prove sufficient. And let me say further that no matter how much we appropriate, be it large or small, the postmasters will not suffer for a single dime. All of their salaries, no matter how much, will be retained by them out of the receipts of their offices.

Mr. BINGHAM. That is all very true.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. Then what is the objection that you make here?

Mr. BINGHAM. Only that we want the bill to be consistent.

Mr. WHITE, of Kentucky. If the amendment has been withdrawn I will renew it.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will assume that it has been withdrawn.

Mr. WHITE, of Kentucky. Then I renew it. I desire to call the attention of the committee to a fact which seems to be overlooked by those gentlemen who are afraid that a few postmasters at large cities will not get sufficient salary. If I understand the appropriation, and if I am wrong I would like the gentleman in charge of the bill to correct me, the clause on lines 20 to 25 includes the allowance to all post-offices. I rise to a point of order before making my remarks, because if the amendment does not properly come in here I want to find out where it does come in.

Mr. HORR. There will be a motion made to strike out the next clause. We have not yet reached that paragraph.

Mr. WHITE, of Kentucky. What I desire to know is whether this $10,500,000 appropriated by this clause is exclusively for salaries of postmasters or whether any portion of it is an allowance for clerk-hire?

Mr. HORR. Not a dollar of it.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. It is all for salaries of postmasters.

Mr. WHITE, of Kentucky. Then I will send to the Clerk's desk and have read in my five minutes a letter to which I wish to call the attention of the committee. A great deal of inequality exists, and this letter will show it, between the salaries received by third and fourth class postmasters as compared with first and second class postmasters as well as in regard to the number of clerks that is allowed in first and second class offices, while but a small number or none at all is allowed in third and fourth class offices. I ask the Clerk to read the letter.

The Clerk read as follows:

POST-OFFICE DEPARTMENT, Washington, D. C., March 1, 1884.

SIR: I have the honor to respond in writing to the request of your committee, heretofore verbally acknowledged, for the following information:

First. "Number of fourth-class post-offices in the United States."

Second. "What is the average salary from commissions at fourth-class offices where no allowance for clerk-hire is made?"

Third. "What number of fourth-class offices do receive allowance for clerk-hire?"

Fourth. "What number of fourth-class offices at county seats do not receive any allowance for clerk-hire?"

Fifth. "What is the average salary of postmasters at county seats where allowances for clerk-hire are made?"

Sixth. "What number of fourth-class post-offices which are not located at county seats, but are distributing offices, and yet do not receive allowance for clerk-hire?"

These questions, being of an unusual nature, have involved considerable research, as the records of this office do not show in a concise form the information desired. The delay in responding by letter has been occasioned by the desire of the Department to furnish the most reliable and correct information possible.

In answer to query No. 1, you are informed that the number of fourth-class post-offices, January 1, 1884, reached 46,113.

Second. "What is the average salary from commissions at fourth-class offices where no allowance for clerk-hire is made?" In reply to this question you are informed that in the absence of the Official Register, which is not yet printed for the fiscal year ended June 30, 1883, this office is unable to give more than a close estimate of the average compensation of fourth-class postmasters. The gross amount paid as compensation to fourth-class postmasters for the quarter ended June 30, 1883, amounted to $2,006,568.31. This sum was allowed at an aggregate of 45,717 post-offices, or an average amount of $175.56 for each postmaster. The gross amount paid to fourth-class postmasters for the quarter ended September 30, 1883, amounted to $1,948,886.45. This sum was paid out at 45,956 post-offices, or an average of $169.64 per office.

Third. "What number of fourth-class offices do receive allowance for clerk-hire?" To date (March 1, 1884,) 927.

Fourth. "What number of fourth-class offices at county seats do not receive any allowance for clerk-hire?" February 1, 1884, 1,028.

Fifth. "What is the average salary of postmasters at county seats where allowances for clerk-hire are made?" In reply to this query you are informed that only a limited number of such offices are not receiving an allowance for clerical assistance in separating the mails. It is the practice of this office, where the appropriation for clerks in post-offices will warrant it, to pay for clerical assistance in separating mails, where there are two or more star routes, or where there is a sufficient railroad service to warrant an allowance. At the present time (March 1, 1884) the aggregate amount allowed on account of clerk-hire for separating offices—offices of the third and fourth classes (see section 121, Postal Laws and Regulations, 1879) amounts to $515,030, distributed among 2,108 offices, making an average of $244.32 per office. This average is low and should be increased; and this office will cheerfully endeavor to increase the amount, provided the appropriation for clerk-hire will warrant it. Pertinent to this subject, your attention is invited to remarks on clerks in post-offices on pages 96 and 97, report of Postmaster-General for fiscal year ended June 30, 1883.

Very respectfully,

FRANK HATTON,
First Assistant Postmaster-General.

Hon. H. D. MONEY, Chairman, &c.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. I move that the committee do now rise.

The motion was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. BLOUNT reported that the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union having had under consideration the Post-Office appropriation bill had come to no resolution thereon.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. MCCOOK, its Secretary, announced that the Senate had passed without amendment House bill and joint resolution of the following titles:

A bill (H. R. 1292) for the relief of Louisa Boddy; and

Joint resolution (H. Res. 191) for the printing of certain eulogies delivered in Congress upon the late Dudley C. Haskell.

The message further announced that the Senate insisted on its amendments disagreed to by the House to the bill (H. R. 4971) making appropriations for the support of the Military Academy for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1885, and for other purposes, asked a conference with the House on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses, and had appointed as conferees on the part of the Senate Mr. LOGAN, Mr. RANSOM, and Mr. CALL.

ENROLLED BILLS AND JOINT RESOLUTIONS SIGNED.

Mr. NEECE, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that they had examined and found truly enrolled a joint resolution and a bill of the following titles; when the Speaker signed the same:

Joint resolution (H. Res. 191) for the printing of certain eulogies delivered in Congress upon the late Dudley C. Haskell; and

A bill (H. R. 1292) for the relief of Louisa Boddy.

Mr. YAPLE, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that the committee had examined and found truly enrolled Senate bills of the following titles; when the Speaker signed the same:

A bill (S. 196) for the relief of the devisees of the late Daniel Carroll; and

A bill (S. 616) to establish a standard of time in the District of Columbia.

ALLEGED UNDERVALUATION OF BOOKS.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of the Treasury, in response to a House resolution, transmitting reports of Special Agent N. L. Williams and the appraiser at New York respecting the alleged undervaluation of certain books imported at that port; which was referred to the Committee on Ways and Means, and ordered to be printed.

PRINTING OF CERTAIN TABLES.

By unanimous consent, leave was granted to Mr. HOLMAN to append certain tables and other statistics to his remarks made on the Post-Office appropriation bill.

WITHDRAWAL OF PAPERS.

On motion of Mr. BAGLEY, by unanimous consent, leave was granted to withdraw papers from the files of the House in the case of Erastus C. Weaver, with a petition for a pension.

MARY MARGARET HUSBAND.

Mr. PEELLE, of Indiana, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. 5895) granting a pension to Mary Margaret Husband; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Invalid Pensions, and ordered to be printed.

WARREN O. HOOVER.

Mr. PEELLE, of Indiana, by unanimous consent, also introduced a bill (H. R. 5896) granting a pension to Warren O. Hoover; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Invalid Pensions, and ordered to be printed.

L. B. COOK.

Mr. CURTIN, by unanimous consent, introduced the following resolution; which was read, and referred to the Committee on Accounts:

Resolved, That the Clerk of the House be, and he is hereby, directed to pay to L. B. Cook, out of the contingent fund of the House, a sum equal to the difference between the compensation received by him as fireman and assistant engineer in charge of the House elevator, at $1,200 per annum, from the 22d of February, 1883.

CLERK TO THE COMMITTEE ON FOREIGN AFFAIRS.

Mr. CURTIN, by unanimous consent, from the Committee on Foreign Affairs, reported the following resolution; which was read, and referred to the Committee on Appropriations:

Resolved, That from and after the end of the current fiscal year the clerkship of the Committee on Foreign Affairs be an annual clerkship, with a compensation fixed at $2,000 per year.

PUBLIC BUILDING, NEWPORT NEWS, VA.

Mr. LIBBEY, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. 5897) for the erection of a public building for the use of the custom-house and post-office at Newport News, in the district of Yorktown, Va., and making appropriation therefor; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds, and ordered to be printed.

FLOODS OF ARKANSAS RIVER.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, by unanimous consent, presented a memorial from citizens of Arkansas, indorsed by the governor of Arkansas, praying for relief in connection with the destructive floods of the Arkansas River; which was referred to the Committee on Rivers and Harbors.

BURLINGTON AND MISSOURI RIVER RAILROAD.

Mr. PAYSON. I desire to make a privileged report. I am instructed by the Committee on Public Lands to report back with the recommendation that it be adopted the resolution referred to them on the 10th instant, and which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Whereas it is alleged that there has been patented or allowed to the Burlington and Missouri River Railroad Company a large amount of public lands in excess of the amount it was entitled to receive under the acts of Congress making the grant:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Interior is requested to inform this House what the basis of the adjustment of the grant of this company was; whether any error was made in such basis; what amount of land has been patented or certified or allowed to said company, and what the excess, if any, has been in the first adjustment of the grant over the amount the company was entitled to; what steps, if any, have been taken by the Department to correct the error, if any exists, and whether any of the lands certified or patented in excess of what the company was entitled to have been sold by the company.

The resolution was adopted.

Mr. PAYSON moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was adopted; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

Mr. COBB. I move that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and accordingly (at 4 o'clock and 45 minutes p. m.) the House adjourned.

PETITIONS, ETC.

The following petitions and papers were laid on the Clerk's desk, under the rule, and referred as follows:

By Mr. BAGLEY: Papers relating to the claim of Thomas Burns—to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Also, papers relating to the pension claim of Betsey Crandall—to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

SENATE.

WEDNESDAY, March 12, 1884.

Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. E. D. HUNTLEY, D. D.

The Journal of yesterday's proceedings was read and approved.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATIONS.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate a communication from the Secretary of the Navy, transmitting, in answer to a resolution of the 26th ultimo, reports of Rear-Admiral G. H. Cooper and Lieut. R. P. Rodgers, United States Navy, respecting the progress of the work in the construction of a ship-canal across the Isthmus of Panama, with request for additional copies thereof if printed; which, with the accompanying papers, was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations, and ordered to be printed.

He also laid before the Senate a communication from the Attorney-General, transmitting, in response to a resolution of the 29th of January, 1884, information concerning the number of persons convicted of crime and sentenced to imprisonment in the District of Columbia since January 1, 1873, and the cost of their transportation, maintenance, and support; which, with the accompanying paper, was referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia, and ordered to be printed.

HOUSE BILLS REFERRED.

The following bills received yesterday from the House of Representatives were severally read twice by their titles, and referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia:

A bill (H. R. 4985) supplemental to and amendatory of an act to incorporate the Mutual Fire Insurance Company of the District of Columbia;

A bill (H. R. 3235) relating to acknowledgments of conveyances of land in the District of Columbia;

A bill (H. R. 4088) to incorporate the Luther Statue Association, to erect and maintain a monument or statue in memory of Martin Luther in the District of Columbia;

A bill (H. R. 2344) for the relief of Melissa G. Polar; and

A bill (H. R. 2346) for the relief of Sarah A. Redmond.

The bill (H. R. 4779) to change the name of the West Waterville National Bank of Oakland, in the State of Maine, to that of the Messalonskee National Bank was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Finance.

The bill (H. R. 5445) to amend section 4136 of the Revised Statutes of the United States, relating to the purchase and repair of foreign vessels, was read twice by its title.

Mr. HOAR. I ask that the bill may lie upon the table until after the ordinary morning business is over, when I shall desire the consent of the Senate to pass it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If there be no objection, that order will be entered.

Mr. HOAR. I suppose it will be more agreeable to the Senate and the Chair to have the motion deferred until after the routine morning business.

The joint resolution (H. Res. 124) authorizing the collector of the port of New York to deliver free of duty a silver cup won by Sergt. A. B. Van Heusen as a member of the American rifle team at Wimbledon in July, 1883, was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Finance.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore signed the following enrolled bills and joint resolution, which had previously received the signature of the Speaker of the House of Representatives:

A bill (S. 196) for the relief of the devisees of the late Daniel Carroll;

A bill (S. 616) to establish a standard of time in the District of Columbia;

A bill (H. R. 1292) for the relief of Louisa Boddy; and

Joint resolution (H. Res. 191) for the printing of certain eulogies delivered in Congress upon the late Dudley C. Haskell.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore presented the petition of J. A. Paddock and 42 other members of the Grand Army of the Republic, of Saint Johnsbury, Vt., favoring the passage of Senate bill No. 1, authorizing the payment of arrears of pensions in cases filed subsequent to July 1, 1880; which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. HARRISON presented resolutions adopted at a meeting of Garfield Post, No. 224, Grand Army of the Republic, of Uniontown, Jackson County, Indiana, in favor of the passage of various measures now pending before Congress for the relief of soldiers and sailors of the late war; which were referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. SHERMAN. I present a memorial that is directed to me but is manifestly intended for the Senate, signed largely by inventors, manufacturers, and dealers in patented articles, and citizens of Tiffin, Astoria, and vicinity, in the State of Ohio, who, believing the United States patent laws as they now stand to be approximately faultless and effective, "do most respectfully remonstrate against any legislative interference with said laws as detrimental to their interests and what they consider the public weal." They set forth at some length their views upon the patent laws, and I beg leave to say that the signers of the memorial are persons largely engaged in manufacturing, and laboring men also, very respectable in character. I ask that the memorial be received and referred to the Committee on Patents.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The memorial will be received, if there be no objection, and referred to the Committee on Patents.

Mr. SHERMAN presented a petition of citizens of Cambridge, Guernsey County, Ohio, praying for the passage of a law to increase the pension of David Frazier, late private Company B, Fifteenth Regiment Ohio Infantry; which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. GARLAND. I present a petition of about 300 citizens of the town of Hot Springs, Ark., calling attention to the blasting upon East Mountain, in that town, in consequence of which three of the principal springs have disappeared. They call attention to this subject by petition to Congress, and ask that an act be passed prohibiting any further operations of that sort. I move that the petition be referred to the Committee on Public Lands, as matters relating to the Hot Springs reservation have generally gone to that committee.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. GARLAND presented a petition of the governor of Arkansas and citizens of Little Rock, in that State, praying that an appropriation be made for the improvement of the streets and sidewalks in and around the United States arsenal at Little Rock; which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

Mr. GIBSON presented the petition of Ernestine H. Stevens, of Washington, D. C., administratrix of the estate of Waller H. Stevens, praying that her claim for 6,000 tons of coal seized by the military authorities of Mexico may be referred to the Court of Claims for adjudication; which was referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. HAWLEY. I present the petition of J. A. Price and 1,200 other inventors, manufacturers, and citizens of the United States, praying for the amelioration of the United States patent system and that better facilities may be afforded inventors. The petition deserves serious consideration in these days when there are so many attacks made upon the patent laws, which I consider of immense value to the whole country. I move that the petition be referred to the Committee on Patents.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. MITCHELL presented the petition of Thomas U. Walter, of Philadelphia, Pa., late architect of the extension of the United States Capitol, praying compensation for designing and executing certain public work in different Departments of the Government; which was referred to the Committee on Claims.

He also presented a memorial of citizens of Philadelphia, Pa., interested in trade in the Kanawha Valley, West Virginia, remonstrating against the passage of the bill (S. 1441) to authorize the construction of bridges across the Great Kanawha River and to prescribe the dimensions of the same; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. HOAR presented resolutions of the Legislature of Massachusetts; which were read, and referred to the Committee on Finance, as follows:

COMMONWEALTH OF MASSACHUSETTS,
In the year one thousand eight hundred and eighty-four

Resolution relating to the repeal of so much of the internal-revenue law of the United States as authorizes the manufacture of vinegar from alcohol which has paid no revenue tax.

Whereas the business of the citizens of the State of Massachusetts engaged in agricultural pursuits has been injured by the operation of the United States revenue laws permitting the manufacture of vinegar from alcohol which has paid no internal-revenue tax; and

Whereas the operation of said internal-revenue law gives opportunity to evade the tax on alcohol made and sold as such: Therefore,

Resolved by the senate and house of representatives of the Commonwealth of Massachusetts, That our Senators and Representatives be, and hereby are, requested to use all honorable means in their power to procure the repeal of so much of the amendment to the United States revenue laws contained in section 5, chapter 125 of general laws, passed by the Forty-fifth Congress, at the third session, in the year 1879, as authorizes the manufacture of vinegar from alcohol that has paid no internal-revenue tax.

Resolved, That the governor of the Commonwealth be requested to forward copies of the foregoing preamble and resolution to our Senators and Representatives in Congress.

SENATE, February 26, 1884.

Adopted. Sent down for concurrence.

S. N. GIFFORD, Clerk.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES, February 29, 1884.

Adopted in concurrence.

EDWARD A. McLAUGHLIN, Clerk.

EXECUTIVE DEPARTMENT, March 10, 1884.

A true copy.

GEO. D. ROBINSON, Governor.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. JONES, of Florida. I am instructed by the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds, to whom was referred the bill (S. 1405) for the erection of a public building at Jacksonville, Fla., to report it favorably. I take the liberty of stating that, while I approve of the provisions of the bill, that portion of it in reference to the cession of jurisdiction, about which I have said something already in the Senate, does not meet my concurrence.

Mr. HOAR, from the Committee on Claims, to whom were referred the bill (S. 250) to provide for the ascertainment of claims of American citizens for spoliations committed by the French prior to the 31st day of July, 1801, and sundry petitions upon the same subject, submitted a report thereon, accompanied by a bill (S. 1820) to provide for the ascertainment of claims of American citizens for spoliations committed by the French prior to the 31st day of July, 1801; which was read twice by its title.

Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin, from the Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the bill (S. 582) for the relief of W. H. Powell, reported it with amendments, and submitted a report thereon.

Mr. KENNA, from the Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the bill (S. 1099) for the relief of Thomas M. Harbin, submitted an adverse report thereon, which was agreed to; and the bill was postponed indefinitely.

Mr. SHERMAN, from the Committee on Foreign Relations, to whom was referred the joint resolution (S. R. 46) relative to a certain accepted draft in the Department of State, reported it with amendments, and submitted a report thereon.

Mr. MANDERSON, from the Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the bill (S. 1003) to reimburse and compensate O. W. Streeter for moneys expended and services performed in taking the census of Dakota in 1860, submitted a report thereon, accompanied by a bill (S. 1821) to authorize the Secretary of the Interior to examine and adjust claim of O. W. Streeter for moneys expended and services performed in taking the census of Dakota in 1860; which was read twice by its title.

Mr. DOLPH, from the Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the bill (S. 294) for the relief of Frank Della Terre and Susan F. Della Terre, heirs of Peter Della Terre, deceased, reported it with an amendment, and submitted a report thereon.

Mr. HARRISON, from the Committee on Military Affairs, to whom was referred the bill (S. 1229) for the relief of Jacob H. Stark, submitted an adverse report thereon, which was agreed to; and the bill was postponed indefinitely.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (S. 1027) for the relief of James H. Woodard, reported it with amendments, and submitted a report thereon.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (S. 853) to fix the rank of certain retired officers of the Army, submitted an adverse report thereon, which was agreed to; and the bill was postponed indefinitely.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (S. 1212) to authorize the extension of the Chesapeake and Ohio Railway to a point on the military lands at Fortress Monroe, Va, reported it with an amendment and submitted a report thereon.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (S. 789) providing for certain time allowances in computing the longevity pay of officers of the Medical Department of the Army, submitted an adverse report thereon, which was agreed to; and the bill was postponed indefinitely.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the petition of F. L. Hagadorn, praying that the Secretary of War be authorized to purchase his patent for the manufacture of improved ammunition-chests, submitted an adverse report thereon, which was agreed to; and the committee were discharged from the further consideration of the petition.

Mr. PUGH, from the Committee on Education and Labor, to whom was referred the bill (S. 1235) to establish an educational fund and apply a portion of the proceeds of the public lands to public education, and to provide for the more complete endowment and support of colleges for the advancement of scientific and industrial education, reported it without amendment.

Mr. MORRILL, from the Committee on Finance, to whom was referred the bill (S. 1153) authorizing the Secretary of the Treasury to deliver to the rightful owners the contents of certain boxes deposited in the Treasury Department by the Secretary of War, reported it with an amendment.

Mr. BAYARD. I am instructed by the Committee on Finance, to whom was referred the bill (S. 329) for the relief of the sureties of the late J. O. Rawlins, to report it adversely. I ask that the bill be placed on the Calendar.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be placed on the Calendar, with the adverse report of the committee.

EULOGIES ON REPRESENTATIVE ALLEN.

Mr. ANTHONY. The Committee on Printing, to which was referred the joint resolution (S. R. 69) to print certain eulogies delivered in Congress on the late Thomas Allen, have instructed me to report it back without amendment and to recommend its passage. I ask for its present consideration.

By unanimous consent, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the joint resolution.

Mr. INGALLS. I move to amend by changing the frame of this resolution to a bill—the Chief Clerk will make the necessary alterations—in accordance with previous suggestions that have been made.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Kansas moves to amend the enacting clause of the joint resolution so as to turn it into a bill.

Mr. ANTHONY. I quite agree with the Senator from Kansas that the practice of passing joint resolutions should be abolished and that they should take the form of bills; but if we are to change the form of this measure perhaps it would be better to make it conform to the usual practice of the Senate in ordering printing, which is by concurrent resolution, although as I have repeatedly stated here, it seems to me that a concurrent resolution which requires the assent of both Houses of Congress should go to the President for his signature, but I have been borne down by the lawyers, the Senator in the chair among them.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair will suggest to the Senator from Rhode Island that this particular resolution contains an appropriation of money from the Treasury.

Mr. ANTHONY. Yes; I am corrected. It does make an appropriation. It should be a bill then.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to amending the enacting clause of the joint resolution so as to make it a bill? The Chair hears no objection.

The joint resolution was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill is now before the Senate and still open to amendment. If no other amendment be proposed the question is, Shall it be ordered to be engrossed for a third reading and read the third time?

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

The title was amended so as to read: "A bill (S. 1819) to print certain eulogies delivered in Congress upon the late Thomas Allen."

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Mr. BLAIR introduced a bill (S. 1822) granting a pension to Mrs. Anna Johnson Foster; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

He also introduced a bill (S. 1823) granting a pension to Ebenezer K. Marden; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. EDMUNDS (Mr. GARLAND in the chair) introduced a bill (S. 1824) to establish a forest reservation on the headwaters of the Missouri River and the headwaters and Clark's Fork of the Columbia River; which was read twice by its title.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I ask that the bill be referred to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry. I wish to call the attention of the chairman and members of that committee to what I think is the great importance of making a provision of this kind for the preservation of the mountain forests at the headwaters of these two great rivers, whose continued flow and exuberance of water is essential to the welfare and the happiness of such a vast tract of territory through which they flow. There are certain papers and explanations accompanying the bill which I move be referred with the bill to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. JACKSON (by request) introduced a bill (S. 1825) for the relief of Martha Turner; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Claims.

He also (by request) introduced a bill (S. 1826) to repeal the act entitled "An act to incorporate the Connecticut Avenue and Park Railway Company in the District of Columbia;" which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

Mr. CULLOM introduced a bill (S. 1827) for the relief of L. S. Ensel; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. CALL introduced a bill (S. 1828) donating certain lots to the city of Saint Augustine, Fla., for public schools, parks, and a public library; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

Mr. HILL introduced a bill (S. 1829) for the erection of a public building at Boulder, Colo.; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds.

Mr. JACKSON introduced a joint resolution (S. R. 74) proposing an amendment to the Constitution of the United States changing the terms of office of President and Vice-President of the United States; which was read the first time by its title and the second time at length, and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary, as follows:

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States in Congress assembled (two-thirds of both Houses concurring), That the following article be proposed to the Legislatures of the several States as an amendment to section 1, Article II, of the Constitution of the United States, which, when ratified by three-fourths of said Legislatures, shall be valid as part of the Constitution, namely:

ARTICLE II.

SECTION 1. The executive power shall be vested in a President of the United States of America. He and the Vice-President shall hold their offices for the term of six years; but the President shall not be re-eligible. The President and Vice-President shall be elected as follows.

PAPERS WITHDRAWN AND REFERRED.

On motion of Mr. MILLER, of New York, it was Ordered, That the papers in the case of Senate bill No. 608 be taken from the files of the Senate and referred to the Committee on Claims.

STEAMER KEOR JEOR.

Mr. FRYE submitted the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Secretary of State be directed to communicate to the Senate, if not incompatible with the public service, any correspondence between our Government and that of China relating to the Ward claims and the claim of Charles E. Hill for the charter of the steamer Keor Jeor.

THE PANAMA CANAL.

Mr. MILLER, of California, submitted the following resolution; which was referred to the Committee on Printing:

Resolved, That there be printed 1,000 extra copies, for the use of the Navy Department, of the reports of naval officers upon the progress of the work in the construction of the Panama Canal, transmitted to the Senate with letter of the Navy Department dated March 10, 1884.

THAYER BROTHERS.

Mr. MILLER, of New York. I ask unanimous consent that the vote by which the bill (S. 1000) for the relief of George F. Roberts, administrator of the estate of William B. Thayer, deceased, surviving partner of Thayer Brothers, may be reconsidered, and that the bill be recommitted to the Committee on Finance. The bill was reported adversely and indefinitely postponed. The parties in interest did not suppose that it would be acted upon so soon, and had not asked for a hearing. They were not heard, and they now desire to be heard.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from New York asks unanimous consent that the vote of the Senate heretofore taken indefinitely postponing the bill indicated by him be reconsidered and that the bill be recommitted to the Committee on Finance. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If there be no further resolutions that order is closed and the Calendar under Rule VIII is in order.

Mr. MILLER, of New York. I move to take up House bill 3967, which is known as the pleuro-pneumonia bill. I should not move to take it up at this time out of its order were it not for the fact that disease has broken out among cattle in the State of Kansas of a very serious and dangerous character, and the people of Kansas, the governor, and other officials are asking for immediate action upon this measure. The Committee on Agriculture have instructed me to make this motion at this time. The bill that I call up is the House bill, to which the committee of the Senate propose some amendments.

Mr. HOAR. I gave notice when the House bills were laid before the Senate for reference this morning that I should like to ask the Senate to dispose of one of them, which will take but a moment. If I find it leads to any debate, I shall withdraw the request.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from New York withdraw his motion?

Mr. MILLER, of New York. Let the pleuro-pneumonia bill be taken up, if the Senate agree to it, and then it can be laid aside temporarily to take up the other bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the motion of the Senator from New York.

Mr. SEWELL. I ask if the bill is taken up whether it will be discussed under the five-minute rule?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The motion is made under the eighth rule of the Senate, which authorizes, after resolutions are closed, a Senator to move to proceed to the consideration of any bill on the Calendar until 2 o'clock.

Mr. SEWELL. And it is to be taken up and discussed under what rule?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Under Rule VIII, but not under the five minutes' limitation of debate.

Mr. SEWELL. Then I move to amend the motion by substituting the special order for to-day, the bill for the relief of Fitz-John Porter.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair is of the opinion that a motion to amend a motion to proceed to the consideration of a bill is not in order.

Mr. SEWELL. Then I hope the motion of the Senator from New York will be voted down, and that the special order will be proceeded with.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The special order will come up at 2 o'clock.

Mr. SEWELL. Notwithstanding this bill?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Notwithstanding this bill at 2 o'clock the special order will be laid before the Senate.

Mr. SEWELL. Then I withdraw my objection to this motion.

Mr. BLAIR. I should like to make a parliamentary inquiry. If this motion shall prevail, what effect has it upon the pending unfinished business of the morning hour, which is the bill to establish a bureau of labor statistics? Is that bill simply laid aside informally?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. There is no unfinished business of the morning hour. The business that was under consideration when 2 o'clock was reached yesterday resumed its place on the Calendar, and when the Calendar is proceeded with it will again be taken up.

Mr. PLUMB. In support of the motion which has been made by the Senator from New York I desire to have the Chief Clerk read a dispatch which I have received from the governor of Kansas and the secretary of the State board of agriculture of that State.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Kansas asks that a certain telegraphic dispatch which he states bears on the question of the present consideration of the bill be now read. If there be no objection it will be read.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

EMPORIA, KANS., March 11, 1884.

HON. P. B. PLUMB:

The foot-and-mouth disease is assuming alarming proportions. When cattle go on the range the disease can not be stamped out, and will involve all the Western cattle interests. The people ask that you hurry up the legislation now pending before Congress. If the States are asked to pay half the expense it will be useless to Kansas at present.

G. W. GLICK,
Governor of Kansas.
WM. SIMS,
Secretary of State Board of Agriculture.

Mr. COKE. I desire to know, if the bill is taken up, whether the debate on it will proceed under the five-minute rule?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It will not, in the opinion of the Chair.

Mr. HOAR. I desire to make a parliamentary inquiry for the information of several Senators as well as my own. There are various orders of the Senate in force making different bills a special order for a certain hour on different days. Suppose a bill the subject of such an order is not reached on the day designated in the order, what is the effect, what is the position of it?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The tenth rule of the Senate provides:

1. Any subject may, by a vote of two-thirds of the Senators present, be made a special order; and when the time so fixed for its consideration arrives the presiding officer shall lay it before the Senate, unless there be unfinished business of the preceding day; and if it is not finally disposed of on that day it shall take its place on the Calendar of Special Orders in the order of time at which it was made special, unless it shall become by adjournment the unfinished business.

The Chair is of the opinion therefore that special orders now on the Calendar not yet reached should be laid before the Senate in the order of time at which they were made special orders and not in respect of the order of the days for which they were made special orders. The question is on agreeing to the motion of the Senator from New York.

The motion was agreed to.

WRECKED FOREIGN VESSELS.

Mr. HOAR. Before the bill is proceeded with I ask the Senate to lay it aside for a moment and have the bill which came from the House in regard to the purchase of vessels considered.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Massachusetts asks unanimous consent that the Senate now consider the bill (H. R. 5445) to amend section 4136 of the Revised Statutes of the United States, relating to the purchase and repair of foreign vessels. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. VEST. I object.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Objection is made.

Mr. HOAR. Will the Senator hear——

Mr. VEST. I know the bill very well.

Mr. HOAR. Then let the bill, if the Senator from Missouri does not object, be referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. VEST. Certainly.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If there be no objection the bill will be referred to the Committee on Commerce.

CONTAGIOUS DISEASES OF ANIMALS.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (H. R. 3967) for the establishment of a bureau of animal industry, to prevent the exportation of diseased cattle, and to provide means for the suppression and extirpation of pleuro-pneumonia and other contagious diseases among domestic animals.

Mr. MILLER, of New York. Mr. President, I shall not detain the Senate with any——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair will state to the Senator from New York that the first thing in order is the reading of the bill, unless unanimous consent be otherwise given.

Mr. ALLISON. The bill is familiar to the Senate. I ask unanimous consent that its first reading may be dispensed with.

Mr. HOAR. It must be read at length once.

Mr. INGALLS. It must be read once in full, and it may as well be read now as at any time.

Mr. MILLER, of New York. It can be read by sections for the purpose of amendment.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will proceed with the reading of the bill.

The Chief Clerk read the bill, which was reported from the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry with an amendment to strike out all after the enacting clause and to insert:

That the Commissioner of Agriculture shall organize in his department a bureau of animal industry, and shall appoint a chief thereof, who shall be a competent veterinary surgeon, and whose duty it shall be, under the direction of the said Commissioner, to investigate and report upon the condition of domestic animals of the United States, their protection and use; and also inquire into and report the causes of contagious and communicable diseases among them, and the means for the prevention and cure of the same, and to collect such information on these subjects as shall be valuable to the agricultural and commercial interests of the country; and the Commissioner of Agriculture is hereby authorized to employ a force sufficient for this purpose. The salary of the chief of this bureau shall be the same as that paid to other chiefs of division in said department; and the Commissioner shall furnish to the chief of said bureau the necessary clerical force for the transaction of the business of the bureau.

SEC. 2. That the Commissioner of Agriculture is authorized to appoint two competent agents, who shall be practical stock-raisers or experienced business men familiar with questions pertaining to commercial transactions in live-stock, whose duty it shall be, under the instructions of the Commissioner of Agriculture, to examine and report upon the best methods of treating, transporting, and caring for animals, and the means to be adopted for the suppression and extirpation of contagious pleuro-pneumonia, and to provide against the spread of other contagious, infectious, and communicable diseases. The compensation of said agents shall be at the rate of $10 per diem, with all necessary expenses, while engaged in the actual performance of their duties under this act.

SEC. 3. That in order to promote the exportation of live-stock from the United States the Commissioner of Agriculture shall make special investigation as to the existence of contagious pleuro-pneumonia or lung-plague, or any contagious or communicable disease, along the dividing line between the United States and foreign countries, and along the lines of transportation from all parts of the United States to and including ports from which live-stock are exported, and make report of the results of such investigation to the Secretary of the Treasury, who shall establish such regulations concerning the exportation and transportation of live-stock as the results of such investigation may require.

SEC. 4. That to prevent the exportation from any port of the United States to any port in a foreign country of live-stock affected with any infectious or contagious disease, and especially pleuro-pneumonia, the Secretary of the Treasury, on the reports provided for in section 3, be, and he is hereby, authorized to take such steps and adopt such measures, not inconsistent with the provisions of this act, as he may deem necessary.

SEC. 5. That it shall be the duty of the Commissioner of Agriculture to prepare such rules and regulations as he may deem necessary for the speedy and effectual suppression and extirpation of contagious pleuro-pneumonia, and to certify such rules and regulations to the executive authority of each State and Territory, and invite said authorities to co-operate in the execution and enforcement of the provisions of this act. Whenever the plans and methods of the Commissioner of Agriculture shall be accepted in any State or Territory in which contagious pleuro-pneumonia is declared to exist, and whenever the Governor of a State, or other properly constituted authorities signify their readiness to co-operate for the extinction thereof, the Commissioner of Agriculture is hereby authorized to expend so much of this appropriation as may be necessary in the investigation of the facts as to the disease, in paying for the animals which it is deemed necessary to slaughter, and in such disinfection and other means as may be necessary to stamp out the disease; and whenever a State or Territory in any section of which a contagious or infectious disease exists which the Commissioner of Agriculture has declared to be dangerous to the animal industries of the nation fails to make provisions for its extinction, or to co-operate with the plans of the Commissioner of Agriculture for the extinction of the disease, the President of the United States, on the presentation of the facts by the Commissioner of Agriculture, shall be authorized to declare the said State or Territory, or such part of said State or Territory as is dangerous to the animal interests of the country, in quarantine, and to regulate or prohibit the transportation of cattle out of said State, Territory, or district.

SEC. 6. That the Commissioners of the District of Columbia, whenever notified by the Commissioner of Agriculture that an infectious or contagious disease affecting domestic animals, and especially the disease known as pleuro-pneumonia, has been brought into or has appeared in the District of Columbia, shall take measures to suppress the same promptly and to prevent the same from spreading; and for this purpose the said commissioners are hereby empowered to order and require that any premises, farm, or farms where such disease exists or has existed be put in quarantine; to order all or any animals coming into the District to be detained at any place or places for the purpose of inspection and examination; to prescribe regulations for and to require the destruction of animals affected with contagious pleuro-pneumonia, and for the proper disposition of their hides and carcasses; to prescribe regulations for disinfection, and such other regulations as they may deem necessary to prevent infection or contagion being communicated, and shall report to the Commissioner of Agriculture whatever they may do in pursuance of the provisions of this section; and the said commissioners shall certify any expenses attending the aforesaid measures to the Commissioner of Agriculture, who is hereby empowered to pay the same in the manner prescribed by law.

SEC. 7. That no railroad company within the United States whose road forms any part of a line of road from one State or Territory to another, or from a State into the District of Columbia, or the owners or masters of any steam or sailing or other vessel or boat, shall receive for transportation or transport from one State or Territory to another, or from any State into the District of Columbia, any live cattle affected with any contagious or infectious disease, and especially the disease known as contagious pleuro-pneumonia or lung-plague; nor shall any person, company, or corporation deliver for such transportation to any railroad company, or master or owner of any boat or vessel, any live cattle, knowing them to be affected with any contagious or infectious disease; nor shall any person, company, or corporation drive on foot or transport in private conveyance from one State or Territory to another, or from any State into the District of Columbia, any live cattle knowing them to be affected with any contagious or infectious disease, and especially the disease known as contagious pleuro-pneumonia or lung-plague.

SEC. 8. That it shall be the duty of the Commissioner of Agriculture to notify the proper officials or agents of any railroad, steamboat, or other transportation company doing business in or through any infected locality of the existence of said contagion; and any person or persons operating any such railroad, or master or owner of any boat or vessel, or owner or custodian of or person having control over such cattle or other live-stock within such infected districts, who shall knowingly violate the provisions of section 7 of this act, shall be guilty of a misdemeanor, and, upon conviction, shall be punished by a fine of not less than one thousand nor more than five thousand dollars, or by imprisonment for not more than one year, or by both such fine and imprisonment; and if any such railroad, steamboat, or other transportation company shall, after having received such notice, violate the provisions of this act as hereinbefore set forth, such action shall be prima facie evidence of willful disregard of the provisions of this act.

SEC. 9. That it shall be the duty of the several United States district attorneys to prosecute all violations of this act which shall be brought to their notice or knowledge by any person making the complaint; and the same shall be heard before any district or circuit court of the United States holden within the district in which the violation of this act has been committed, or the person or corporation resides or carries on or has his or its place of business.

SEC. 10. That the sum of $500,000, to be immediately available, or so much thereof as may be necessary, is hereby appropriated, out of any moneys in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to carry into effect the provisions of this act.

SEC. 11. That the Commissioner of Agriculture shall report annually to Congress an itemized statement of all expenditures under this act, and full particulars of the means adopted and carried into effect for the suppression of contagious diseases among domestic animals.

SEC. 12. That this act shall take effect and be in force from and after its passage.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment recommended by the committee.

Mr. MILLER, of New York. Mr. President, I shall not detain the Senate with any lengthy explanation of the provisions of the bill, or any discussion of pleuro-pneumonia or other contagious diseases of domestic animals. The attention the subject has had in another branch of Congress and in the public press makes it entirely unnecessary that that should be done. But I desire to make an explanation in behalf of the committee.

The committee originally reported a bill which had been introduced and referred to it by myself, and it was placed on the Calendar. Subsequent to that a bill on the same subject passed the House and was referred to the committee. The committee reported that bill back with an amendment in the form of a substitute, substituting the original Senate bill for the House bill. At a meeting of the committee this morning, on account of the paramount necessity and urgency of this legislation, the committee authorized me to have the House bill taken up, and, instead of our substitute, to move certain amendments to it by sections as it may be read.

There are only two important differences between the bill as it passed the House and the bill as reported by the Committee on Agriculture of the Senate. The House bill makes no provision for putting a State or any portion of a State in quarantine in case the State fails to take concurrent action with the Federal authorities. The original Senate bill as reported by the committee and the substitute for the House bill as reported provide as follows:

> And whenever a State or Territory, in any section of which a contagious or infectious disease exists which the Commissioner of Agriculture has declared to be dangerous to the animal industries of the nation, fails to make provisions for its extinction, or to co-operate with the plans of the Commissioner of Agriculture for the extinction of the disease, the President of the United States, on the presentation of the facts by the Commissioner of Agriculture, shall be authorized to declare the said State or Territory, or such part of said State or Territory as is dangerous to the animal interests of the country, in quarantine, and to regulate or prohibit the transportation of cattle out of said State, Territory, or district.

The proposition is thought to be very important by the committee, and I am authorized to move it as an amendment to the House bill at the proper time. It will be seen, I think, upon a careful examination of the bill, that without this provision the efficiency of the measure might be entirely destroyed. It is well known that in many of our Western States the Legislatures hold only biennial sessions, and very few of them have ever taken any action upon this question. Very few of them have passed any laws in regard to it or appropriated any money for the suppression of these diseases. If the bill should pass without this provision in it, in nearly all the States of the West there would be no co-operation upon the part of the State governments for one or two years to come, and meanwhile great danger might be incurred to the entire cattle interests of our country.

This provision is in no way a punishment upon a State for not passing laws and appropriating money, but it simply provides that in case a State government shall have failed to do this the Federal Government may do the work necessary. This is in the direction of a provision which was contained in the act passed some years ago in regard to the National Board of Health, when we were attempting to prevent yellow fever from being brought into our borders. It was there provided that in case State or city authorities failed to co-operate with the national authorities in matters of quarantine within their borders, then the Federal power was authorized to establish quarantine and to enforce it. Unless this can be done, unless there is power lodged somewhere (and here it is lodged in the President of the United States), it will be impossible in my judgment that the bill can be made effective. That is one important point and one important amendment which the committee will offer to the House bill.

The other important point is this: The bill as it passed the House provides that each State shall pay one-half of the expenses attending the extirpation of pleuro-pneumonia or any other contagious disease within its limits; in fact, one-half of all the expense that may be incurred within the borders of the State for this purpose. The Senate bill as it was reported provided that all this expenditure should be borne by the Federal Government, and the committee authorize me to move, as an amendment to the House bill, that instead of each State being called upon to pay one-half the expense, the whole expense, whatever it may be, shall be paid out of the Federal Treasury.

It is believed by the committee that this also is important, for if the Federal authorities can not act promptly in the matter of extirpating disease by the killing of cattle and by disinfecting their quarters, if they are compelled to wait until a session of the Legislature of any particular State may be called and until money shall have been appropriated by the State authorities, all the dangers which the bill was intended to avoid may occur. It is believed that the whole country is interested in extirpating the disease in any particular State in which the disease may be found. For instance, to-day in the State of Kansas the mouth-and-foot disease exists; all the surrounding country and all the surrounding States are threatened alike. It is the judgment of the committee that the expense of extirpating that disease, for instance in the State of Kansas, should not be borne one-half of it by the State of Kansas, but that it should all be borne by the Federal Treasury.

Then it is believed that it will not be possible for any bill to operate thoroughly and effectually in which the money power is divided between the State and the Federal authorities. There must be power lodged somewhere to suppress the disease by all means that are necessary, and that power must be the power of paying. If it be divided, there will be conflict between the State and the Federal authorities. I am authorized by the committee at the proper time to move this amendment.

There is another amendment, in regard to the amount of money which should be appropriated for this purpose, but substantially the two propositions which I have stated are the only ones that the committee now propose to move to the House bill. One is giving the President power to put a State or portion of a State or Territory into quarantine if the disease shall be found there and the State has made no regulation for it, and the other is that the Federal authorities shall pay out of the Federal Treasury all the moneys that may be necessary for the suppression of these diseases.

I have no further remarks to submit on the general provisions of the bill, and now ask that the House bill be taken up by sections.

Mr. MORGAN. I should like to inquire of the Senator from New York where the amendment he proposes is to come in?

Mr. MILLER, of New York. The amendment I propose will come in in the House bill, at line 23 of section 3, first striking out the provision that the States shall pay one-half of the expense, and at that point inserting what will be found on page 10, commencing at the end of the eighteenth line, where will be found the provision which I read in regard to quarantine. This amendment will accomplish the two propositions which I stated.

Mr. MORGAN. Is that amendment in print?

Mr. MILLER, of New York. Yes, sir; in the printed bill you will find it on page 10.

Mr. MORGAN. It is part of the amendment reported by the committee.

Mr. MILLER, of New York. Yes, it is part of the amendment reported by the committee as a substitute for the House bill; but the committee to-day decided to abandon that and take up the House bill, and propose only these two important amendments to the House bill; so that if the bill pass it shall be substantially the House bill with these amendments, provided the Senate decide to incorporate these amendments into the House bill. From the end of line 18 to the end of line 30, on page 10, is the proposition we propose to insert at the point I have indicated.

Mr. MORGAN. All the substitute proposed by the Senate committee then is withdrawn, and these few amendments are proposed to be inserted in the text of the House bill?

Mr. MILLER, of New York. In the text of the House bill. I ask that the House bill be read by sections.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from New York will please state the amendment he proposes to the text.

Mr. MILLER, of New York. The original report of the committee and its present action of course are inconsistent, and lead to this difficulty; the committee first reported back the House bill with an amendment which was in the form of a substitute for the entire House bill, but at its meeting to-day the committee decided to take up the House bill and simply move these two general amendments which I have mentioned.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It is in order to move now to perfect the text of the House bill.

Mr. MILLER, of New York. Then I propose to amend the House bill, commencing at the word "provided," in line 23 of section 3, by striking out all the remainder of that section after the word "provided" to the end of it, and inserting what is found on page 10 commencing in line 18 at the words "and whenever a State or Territory" to the end of the section.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from New York moves to amend the text of the House bill as will be read.

The CHIEF CLERK. On line 23, section 3, it is moved to strike out the following proviso:

Provided, That the authorities of said State or Territory shall assume and pay one-half of the expense of the valuation of the animals it is deemed necessary to slaughter and one-half the cost of disinfection and necessary police regulations in the quarantine and care of infected herds of cattle.

And to insert in lieu thereof:

And whenever a State or Territory in any section of which a contagious or infectious disease exists which the Commissioner of Agriculture has declared to be dangerous to the animal industries of the nation fails to make provisions for its extinction, or to co-operate with the plans of the Commissioner of Agriculture for the extinction of the disease, the President of the United States, on the presentation of the facts by the Commissioner of Agriculture, shall be authorized to declare the said State or Territory, or such port of said State or Territory as is dangerous to the animal interests of the country, in quarantine, and to regulate or prohibit the transportation of cattle out of said State, Territory, or district.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on this amendment.

Mr. BECK. Mr. President, I do not rise to debate the bill, but to make an inquiry of the Senator from New York. This is a very important bill, and I have read it now or heard it read for the first time. I ask the Senator whether he expects to pass the bill before 2 o'clock, when the Senator from Illinois [Mr. LOGAN] has the floor, or whether he proposes to print the bill as reported with the amendment now proposed? I understand he has abandoned the amendment which has been read to us as a substitute. Let us look at the amendment now moved in print. It is not a very easy bill to make up our minds about, though. I am somewhat familiar with the general proposition, and if we are not to pass it to-day, I think we shall save time by having the bill printed in the form the committee propose it with the amendments now suggested.

Mr. MILLER, of New York. The committee hope to pass the bill before 2 o'clock to-day. The committee will do their part to accomplish that end by avoiding any unnecessary talk on the matter.

Mr. MORGAN. I wish to say to the Senator from New York that there is scarcely any conceivable necessity for forcing the Senate into the consideration of this bill in the brief time between this and 2 o'clock to-day. We can not easily overcome our objections to the consideration and determination of a matter of this gravity. There are great constitutional questions involved here and great questions of policy. It is entirely a new departure in the legislation of the country. We have not time to study every question that may be presented in this bill, and under the great pressure of important public business, just as it may come into the Senate, and I think it would be very dangerous in this particular, on a mere request made on the floor of the Senate because there is a good deal of public demand and public clamor about this matter, to press this question to immediate consideration. I do not like to be compelled to consider a question under the sort of pressure that has been intimated here to-day; that is to say, that a disease threatening large portions of the country has seized hold of the cattle of Kansas, and that if we do not act immediately there is going to be very great suffering. I dislike to vote under such compulsion as that. I would prefer to hold an all-night session to have an opportunity to consider this question as it ought to be, rather than to dispose of it within two hours under such circumstances or twenty minutes, as the case may be.

Mr. MILLER, of New York. There is no desire on my part or on the part of the committee to force immediate action if that course does not meet with the approval of the Senate; but this question has been before the country for a long time, agitating the public mind, and it affects one of the most important interests of our people. The bill was made a special order for yesterday at 2 o'clock, but other business came in in advance and held the attention of the Senate until 5 o'clock, as we all know. So the bill went over. It is now the intention of the Committee on Agriculture to press this bill on the attention of the Senate continuously, if possible, until it shall have been passed, whether it be to-day or to-morrow or any other day or within two weeks.

The committee think there is no more important question before the Senate than this, and if it be not disposed of at 2 o'clock to-day I shall ask the Senate to go on with it after 2 o'clock, for we are inclined to think that it is of more importance to the country, vastly more important, than the special order which is set down for 2 o'clock to-day. We shall continue to press this question on the Senate until it shall be disposed of, but there is no intention to deprive any Senator of the right of debate or consideration. If gentlemen desire to debate this bill, to discuss the constitutional questions said to be involved in it, we shall be prepared to stay here any length of time required to do it, or to take it up from day to day until it shall be disposed of. Of course it is entirely within the power of the Senate to consider this bill now or at any other time, or to take it up or lay it down at any time; but the Senate by a vote has made it the special order and we are now proceeding under it, and we have no desire to show any undue haste or deprive any Senator of his rights of debate, if any one desires to debate the question. The motion I made was to take up the House bill by sections and consider the amendments section by section.

Mr. BECK. I did not rise for the purpose of throwing any obstacle in the way, but the Senator from New York suggests that this question has been before the country for a long time and carefully considered. That being so, I think a decent respect for the Senate would have required the committee to have laid before us in proper form what they now propose us to act upon, and not bring before us something which they propose to abandon, and then for the first time tell us now what they do propose to act upon, and expect us to catch it in this way.

Mr. PLUMB. I want to say that the committee is not amenable to the criticism uttered by the Senator from Kentucky. We proposed a substitute for the House bill. That substitute is printed in full.

Mr. BECK. And abandoned.

Mr. PLUMB. Well, suppose it is abandoned.

Mr. BECK. Then we want time to see what next is proposed by the committee that is not to be abandoned.

Mr. PLUMB. It is not true that it is all abandoned, but it is simply true that we abandon a portion of it. We take up the text of the House bill and propose now to take more of the House bill than the committee originally proposed; but every single line and every single letter of what the committee propose now to insert is a part of what it proposed before to insert, but only a part. The Senator therefore who is competent to grasp the proposition of the Committee on Agriculture in its entirety is certainly entirely competent to grasp any portion of it. It is not an innovation in any respect on that which has been before the Senate heretofore in a general way, and consequently there is nothing in the nature of surprise or anything that is lacking in due respect for the Senator from Kentucky or for the entire Senate.

Mr. COKE. Mr. President, I concur fully in the remarks made a moment ago by the Senator from Alabama [Mr. MORGAN]. There is no more important bill before this body than this. If the Senator from New York [Mr. MILLER] has any expectation of passing it by 2 o'clock or any expectation of passing it even in two or three days, in my judgment he will be very greatly disappointed. It ought not to pass at all, and I hope will not, for in every section it grossly violates the Constitution and all my ideas of a proper policy.

It is very true, as the Senator from New York says, that this bill in substance has been a long time before the country. It has been twice defeated in the Senate. It is very true, as alleged by the Senator from New York, that the Agricultural Department has persistently kept it before the country, and he says that the department intends to keep it before the country. I assure the Senator from New York that the great interests sought in this bill to be delivered over to the keeping of the Commissioner of Agriculture, of whom I will say I entertain a high opinion, are too vast and concern too vitally the people of this country to be intrusted to the discretion and handling of any one man, however great his anxiety may be to grasp them. Indeed, Mr. President, this desire on the part of that official and the persistence with which he has urged this bill do not gain for it any favor with me.

The people of the State which I have the honor in part to represent, as is shown in the report I hold in my hand, pay State taxes on between six and seven million head of cattle; they pay taxes on upward of seven million of sheep; they pay taxes on a million and a half head of horses and mules; and every hoof of stock, every head of it, is to be dealt with under this bill by the Commissioner of Agriculture and the President of the United States and the Secretary of the Treasury, without appeal, without judge or jury, and without being consulted. I can show from the report of the Commissioner of Agriculture that this bill will hand over to the custody of the Commissioner of Agriculture and the Secretary of the Treasury all the cattle from Virginia between the coast and the foot of the mountains in North and South Carolina and Mississippi and Alabama and Louisiana and Florida and Texas. I can show from this report that this bill places the cattle of that entire region, constituting at least one-third of the live-stock of this country, in the custody directly of the Commissioner of Agriculture and the subordinates of his appointment, to be dealt with at his pleasure.

Sir, there are untold millions of dollars' worth of stock that by this bill, if it is passed, the jurisdiction of the Commissioner of Agriculture will be absolute over. If we are to go into a discussion of this bill now, I would turn to the report to which I referred but a minute ago. Do I understand the Senator from New York as insisting on proceeding with the bill?

Mr. MILLER, of New York. We are proceeding now under the order of the Senate.

Mr. COKE. Very well. Now, Mr. President, I want gentlemen to take the report of the Commissioner of Agriculture for 1883 and turn to page 19 and read from there on the "report on the Texas cattle fever," and they will find from that official report that "the Texas cattle fever" is a misnomer for the disease referred to; that it ought to be called the Southern or swamp fever; that it prevails in Virginia and has prevailed there for a hundred years; that it has prevailed from time immemorial in North Carolina, in Georgia, in Tennessee, in Mississippi, in Alabama, in Louisiana, in Florida, as well as in Texas.

The cattle in those regions at home in their pastures are healthy; the beef is good; the milk and butter are wholesome; the people live on them and find them healthy and nutritious food. The animals look healthy and fat; their hair is sleek and shows every indication of health, and they are in good health. Now, take one of these animals from the coast in Virginia, or North Carolina, or South Carolina, or any of these States going south, and drive it up to the foot of the mountains and let it come in contact with mountain stock, and this report says that the mountain stock contracts some sort of disease which kills a considerable percentage of them. Drive the mountain stock down into the coast country and they will sicken and die. Drive the coast cattle into the mountains, and while the mountain stock may contract disease from them the low country stock thrive and improve. Take Northern stock down to Texas, and unless they are young, under twelve months old, a large percentage of them is lost by this fever; but take Texas stock up North and they thrive and grow large and fatten. These are the leading facts stated in this report of the Agricultural Department, and it is worthy of special attention that the cattle from Texas and the South, said to communicate disease, are well, in good health apparently, and are the cattle which furnish beef, milk, and butter for the inhabitants where they are raised. Yet these cattle, all of them embraced in the vast section I have named, are within the embargo of this bill.

I read from the report as to Virginia and North Carolina:

In answer to inquiries, Maj. R. L. Ragland, of Halifax County, sent me the following valuable information, which I give in his own words:

"I have never seen anywhere a more correct description of the cattle disease which prevails more or less every year in this and many of the adjoining counties in Virginia and North Carolina than is given on pages 253-255 of department report on 'Diseases of Swine and other Domestic Animals, 1879.' I have no means of tracing its history ('distemper' as it has been called for more than half a century), but all authentic accounts agree that the disease was brought from Eastern North Carolina to Virginia—from the pine and swamp region of North Carolina, as stated by Mr. Lenoir, where it existed long prior to its appearance in this State. The disease was prevailing here when I was born, over fifty years ago, and prevails more or less every year. The cause of the disease is not known. It came from Eastern North Carolina sixty or seventy years ago, and progressed westward very much as stated by Mr. Lenoir."

Here are reports of the disease in Patrick County, in Henry County, in Pittsylvania County, in Franklin County, in Halifax County, in Campbell County, in Charlotte County, in Prince Edward and Lunenburg Counties, in Buckingham County, in Fluvanna and Goochland Counties, and in Henrico and Hanover Counties. Here is a map showing how the disease is traveling. It travels from the seacoast to the mountains, and is constantly going. Here is the conclusion of the report:

To sum up, then, I believe it has been demonstrated beyond any possibility of successful contradiction: 1. That the district permanently infected with Texas fever is being continually enlarged by the advance of the infection toward the north. 2. That this infection has already reached in a part of Virginia to about 38° of north latitude. 3. That districts have been permanently infected for years not only at the line of frost and snow, but where the temperature frequently descends to the neighborhood of zero Fahrenheit. 4. That frost, snow, or even intense freezing can not be depended upon to destroy the germs of this disease. 5. That while large rivers and mountain chains have checked the advance for a considerable time in the past, rivers at least have always been crossed in time, and there is, consequently, no apparent natural obstacle to the continued extension of the infected district toward the north.

The report is an exceedingly interesting one. It gives the large experience of the reporter in Alabama and in fact in all the States I have named. The disease, Mr. President, is one that grows out of the climate. You go down into the coast part of Virginia or North Carolina or South Carolina or any part of the States south on the Atlantic seaboard, and you will find that it has existed from time immemorial; you will find that the people understand it. You will find that the mountain man will not drive his stock down into the low country except during periods of frost and ice, and will not permit swamp or low country stock driven among his stock at any other period. The people understand this thing. Why should the Government take hold of the question in view of the fact that the people for one hundred and fifty years have had to deal with it, and that they in the localities know and understand it much better and more practically than any Commissioner of Agriculture can?

Our Government is based on the theory that the people are intelligent and judicious enough to care for their private interests properly, and surely it is not a violent presumption, when they have managed this matter for one hundred years without aid, that with increased experience and intelligence they can continue to do so without the intervention of the Government. Too much government is a greater curse than too little.

I oppose this bill, Mr. President, for various reasons, both of constitutionality and expediency, and especially because it puts under the ban the cattle of a vast section of our country stretching from Northern Virginia to the mouth of the Rio Grande, which are in a perfectly natural and normal condition of health. It does not need that disease shall break out among them; it is only necessary that they shall be in a certain section of the country to put in full play the arbitrary and dictatorial power conferred on the Commissioner of Agriculture, from which no appeal lies. In all that great section of country I have named this bill withdraws all the safeguards provided by the Constitution for property, not on contingencies which may or may not happen, but on a certainty already declared by the Commissioner that contagious disease exists there, or, in other words, that it is permanently infected.

This bill, sir, will strike a blow at a great interest of my State in a vital point. It will obstruct commerce in cattle and other stock, and subject owners of stock to the danger of black-mail and robbery by subordinates who may be detailed to execute the law. I have as much confidence in the high officials named in this bill as any other can have, but would intrust the power conferred in this bill to no men on earth; still less would I to any set of men who would be compelled to delegate power to subordinates in order to execute the law. Under this bill the Commissioner of Agriculture would declare the existence of an infectious disease, the locality of the infection, and upon his recommendation the President would act. The report of the commissioner has already declared that the Texas fever exists from Northern Virginia to the Rio Grande, and if the bill passes all left to be done as to that great extent of country and the millions of stock in it will be to put it under quarantine, shut out the cattle from market, and thus wound a great interest.

So far as the pleuro-pneumonia is concerned that is a disease which is imported. I am perfectly willing to support a constitutional bill that shall specify pleuro-pneumonia. It may go further and specify the foot-and-mouth disease, or any other that is known to affect cattle which the people do not understand and can not manage. But there are clauses in this bill that speak of "pleuro-pneumonia and any other contagious, infectious, or communicable disease." By those terms you embrace all cattle throughout the South; you will embrace seven millions of cattle in Texas; you will embrace two-thirds of the cattle in Virginia, in North and South Carolina, in Tennessee, in Mississippi, in Alabama, in Louisiana, in Florida, in Arkansas, and in the Indian Territory, Notwithstanding the fact that they are in the condition in which they were reared and grown, a condition perfectly normal and natural, and as we believe healthy, yet they are embraced in the penalties of this bill because it is said they can communicate disease to cattle raised in more northern latitudes.

Can we pass a bill of that sort, Mr. President? Can we submit if we can possibly avoid it to have so many millions of dollars' worth of property placed beyond the pale of the protection of the law and subject to the irresponsible dictation of three officials acting through subordinates, as they will be under this bill?

I desire that the Senate shall understand this bill. It is a monstrous one. Twice has a bill just like it been defeated in this body, and it was defeated in very short order each time. This bill should not pass. I have simply adverted to the facts that show the immense interests involved. In the State of Texas alone the cattle at $20 a head, subjected to the caprice of three men under this bill, will bring $140,000,000 in the market to-day; the sheep (for it embraces all sorts of stock), nearly 8,000,000 head, would bring $40,000,000 more, besides horses and mules, in this one single State of Texas. Now add that to the amount involved in the other States, and see what an immense aggregate is placed subject to the dictation of two or three men under this bill, without appeal, without judge or jury.

This is the bill exactly that was defeated twice before in the Senate, consigned to the waste-basket. The Senate would not consider it then and ought not now. I am willing to give the power to have an investigation and report, so as to teach the people how to deal with the diseases of cattle, but I am not willing in order to provide against pleuro-pneumonia or any other disease to turn the vast stock interest of this country over to the manipulation of any two or three men.

Mr. MCPHERSON. May I ask the Senator from Texas a question?

Mr. COKE. Certainly.

Mr. MCPHERSON. In giving information not only as to his own State but as to other States he shows this to be a very large industry, and therefore an industry that should be preserved. This bill, as I understand, if it has any purpose whatever, is for the preservation of that great industrial interest. Now, the honorable Senator says he is perfectly willing to vote for a bill that will designate the diseases.

Mr. COKE. I will put in this qualification. I am willing to vote for a bill which shall authorize the Commissioner of Agriculture to explore thoroughly the causes and the means of prevention and of cure, and let him report the facts for dissemination among the people. That is the sort of bill I am for.

Mr. MCPHERSON. The Senator says he is perfectly willing that the Commissioner of Agriculture shall obtain information and report; but in the absence of any remedy, although we have the information, the evil may be done. He says he is in favor of putting in the bill "pleuro-pneumonia or lung-plague." I take it from his argument——

Mr. COKE. Put in foot-and-mouth disease, and specify any other disease you choose.

Mr. MCPHERSON. I rather understood from the Senator's remarks that he objected to these terms, "or any contagious or communicable disease." Now, I suppose that any disease which is contagious or communicable will after a time become epidemic, because the very nature of a disease that is contagious or communicable will of itself in course of time make it an epidemic.

Mr. COKE. The fever of which I spoke has been existing one hundred and fifty or two hundred years, and I have never heard of its becoming epidemic yet. I would be willing to try a little longer, rather than subvert the Constitution in destroying all the safeguards for property of this character.

Mr. MCPHERSON. What fever?

Mr. COKE. The so-called Texas fever. The Senator rose to ask me a question. He is not through with his question yet. If he will conclude it in a short time I will try to answer.

Mr. MCPHERSON. Does the Senator object to the words "contagious or communicable diseases?" I was of the opinion, and I can hardly dislodge that idea from my mind, that any disease contagious or communicable will in course of time result in disaster to this great cattle industry.

Mr. COKE. I have spoken about the so-called Texas fever. Cattle are said to communicate the disease. It is the cattle in another and higher locality that take the disease under certain conditions from these other apparently healthy cattle. Now, I say when our cattle in Texas are healthy, when they afford us good beef, when they afford us healthy milk and butter, when they look well, when their hair glistens and they present every appearance of health, these cattle ought not to be embargoed by the Government. If you take them North they do not suffer from it and they do well at home. They are healthy everywhere, both at home and in more northern latitudes. Their condition is a natural one, a normal one, is inherent in and incidental to the climate in which they are reared. Their condition is inseparable from the surroundings in which they are reared. To say that they shall be embargoed is tantamount to saying that cattle should not be raised in that country, and if it is constitutional and expedient to pass this bill into law it would be equally so to pass a law forbidding the raising of cattle in the country where the so-called Texas fever prevails; indeed, that would be the only logical course to pursue.

But it is said that these apparently healthy animals communicate disease to the stock in other localities, and I presume they do; but I have this to say in reference to that, that the facts connected with the Texas fever are thoroughly known to the people wherever any danger exists from it. The people need no assistance from the Government. They know how to provide against it. They have learned this from the experience of more than a century.

Mr. MAXEY. If my colleague will permit I will say that our people do not object to the use of the term pleuro-pneumonia in the bill, for that is the designation of a well-defined disease; but they do seriously protest against the exercise by the Commissioner of Agriculture of an uncontrolled discretion to determine what is a contagious and communicable disease. Under this unlimited power to determine what is contagious, what is communicable, without appeal from his decision, however ill-advised, arbitrary, or unjust, the great cattle interest of Texas, aggregating $120,000,000 in value, and constantly increasing, is placed at the mercy of the Commissioner. It is to this vast, uncontrolled power over an undefined disease that we protest.

Mr. COKE. Certainly. I object to the sweeping language of the bill referred to by my colleague for reasons I have endeavored to give. This bill will destroy the market value of the cattle throughout the South—will exclude them from export to foreign countries. No foreign country will take them when denounced as infected with disease which is classed with pleuro-pneumonia, lung-plague, and other deadly diseases. It is unjust to truth and the facts that they should be so classed, because in their own native ranges they are healthy and their removal to other ranges does not injure them. It is not these, but the Northern cattle, who are said to take this so-called Texas fever.

I am willing to see a constitutional bill passed specifying the diseases for which cattle shall be excluded from commerce, but enter my protest against the provisions of this bill, which under its general terms already quoted will brand as diseased and impure, unfit for market or commerce, five-sixths of the cattle from Northern Virginia southward to the Rio Grande, embracing one-third of the cattle in the United States, withdrawing the guarantees of the law from the protection of that species of property and subjecting it to the arbitrary will and caprice of whoever may happen to be the Commissioner of Agriculture.

This bill embraces all sorts of live-stock—cattle, sheep, hogs, goats, horses, mules, everything in the stock line. The whole subject is turned over to the Commissioner of Agriculture. He is to determine when any disease exists, and his jurisdiction is to commence when it does exist. He is to be judge, jury, and executioner. The President and the Secretary of the Treasury perform some unimportant functions; he is the ruling, guiding spirit in substance and effect. I will discuss the details of this bill more fully and illustrate its enormities more minutely further on in this debate, but desire now, if I have the time left, to point out specifically the constitutional objections to it, but as the time for the regular order has arrived will defer it until the bill is taken up again.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Texas will suspend. The hour of 2 o'clock having arrived, it is the duty of the Chair to lay before the Senate the special order for this time, being the bill (H. R. 1015) for the relief of Fitz-John Porter.

Mr. MILLER, of New York. I move that that bill be laid aside and that the bill which has been under consideration be continued.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from New York moves that the Senate proceed to the consideration of House bill 3967, the bill last under consideration. That motion under Rule IX is not open to debate.

Mr. SEWELL. I simply rise to ask for information what vote is necessary to set aside the special order. It having taken a two-thirds vote to make it a special order, can a less vote set it aside?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. A majority vote under the ninth rule can take up another bill.

Mr. SEWELL. I hope the motion will not prevail.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the motion of the Senator from New York.

Mr. HOAR. Mr. President, what is the motion?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The motion of the Senator from New York is under the ninth rule, the Fitz-John Porter bill being now under consideration, to proceed to the consideration of another bill on the Calendar, being House bill 3967.

Mr. HOAR. How does this motion come in under the ninth rule, which expires at 2 o'clock?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair does not hear the Senator from Massachusetts.

Mr. HOAR. I inquired of the Chair how this motion came in under the ninth rule, which expires at 2 o'clock.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It is now 2 o'clock and after.

Mr. HOAR. Does not the ninth rule expire at 2 o'clock?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. No; the ninth rule begins at 2 o'clock. The question is on agreeing to the motion of the Senator from New York.

Mr. COKE called for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered; and the Secretary called the roll.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore (after having voted in the affirmative). The Senator from Vermont in the chair [Mr. EDMUNDS] asks leave to withdraw his vote, as he has been requested to pair with the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. GARLAND].

Mr. LOGAN. I am paired on the preliminary questions connected with the Porter bill, and for that reason do not vote.

The result was announced—yeas 24, nays 34; as follows:

YEAS—24.

Aldrich,	Dawes,	Manderson,	Sawyer,
Allison,	Dolph,	Miller of N. Y.,	Sherman,
Bowen,	Frye,	Mitchell,	Van Wyck,
Cameron of Wis.,	Hawley,	Morrill,	Walker,
Conger,	Ingalls,	Palmer,	Williams,
Cullom,	McMillan,	Plumb,	Wilson.

NAYS—34.

Bayard,	George,	Jones of Florida,	Pugh,
Beck,	Gibson,	Kenna,	Riddleberger,
Blair,	Gorman,	Lamar,	Saulsbury,
Brown,	Groome,	McPherson,	Sewell,
Call,	Hampton,	Maxey,	Vance,
Camden,	Harris,	Morgan,	Vest,
Coke,	Hoar,	Pendleton,	Voorhees.
Fair,	Jackson,	Pike,
Farley,	Jonas,	Platt,

ABSENT—18.

Anthony,	Edmunds,	Jones of Nevada,	Ransom,
Butler,	Garland,	Lapham,	Sabin,
Cameron of Pa.,	Hale,	Logan,	Slater.
Cockrell,	Harrison,	Mahone,
Colquitt,	Hill,	Miller of Cal.,

So the motion was not agreed to.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. House bill No. 1015 is now before the Senate as in Committee of the Whole and will be read.

Mr. SHERMAN. Before that is done I ask consent to submit an amendment to the bill which has just passed from the consideration of the Senate, the pleuro-pneumonia bill, with a view to have it printed.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The proposed amendment will be received and printed.

Mr. MILLER, of New York. I move that House bill No. 3967 be made the special order immediately succeeding the conclusion of the consideration of the bill now before the Senate, known as the Fitz-John Porter bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair thinks that motion can only be made by unanimous consent, the other bill being now before the Senate.

Mr. BLAIR. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair will state the question, and then recognize the Senator from New Hampshire. The Senator from New York asks unanimous consent that he may now move that the bill last under consideration, the cattle bill, be made the special order immediately after the conclusion of the Fitz-John Porter bill. Is there objection to the Senator making that motion?

Mr. COKE. I object.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Objection is made.

Mr. BLAIR. That there may be no misunderstanding on this matter, I think it proper to state that the order making the bill to aid in the establishment and temporary support of common schools a special order to-day at 2 o'clock was made, as will appear by the RECORD, to be subject to the disposition of the Fitz-John Porter case, and that, by an order of the Senate already existing, will be taken up immediately on the termination of the proceedings in the Fitz-John Porter bill.

Mr. PLATT. I do not so understand the rule. The bill (H. R. 3925) to regulate practice in patent suits was the special order for yesterday, but was not reached by reason of other business preceding it. I understand the rule to be that the bill (H. R. 1015) for the relief of Fitz-John Porter, having been reached to-day, takes precedence, and to that of course I can make no objection; but I think that when the Fitz-John Porter bill shall be concluded the special orders then stand, or ought to stand, in the order in which they are assigned, and the first bill, as I suppose, following the Fitz-John Porter bill is the bill to regulate practice in patent suits. My vote against proceeding with the bill for the suppression and extirpation of pleuro-pneumonia was because I did not want that bill to displace what I supposed to be the next order, or what I think at any rate ought to be the next order. I think the act to regulate practice in patent suits, having the right of way prior to this day, ought to continue to have the right of way after the Fitz-John Porter bill shall be disposed of.

Mr. BLAIR. Mr. President, it should be observed that the bill to which I have referred, which is the special order at 2 o'clock, if the Fitz-John Porter case is not proceeded with, and which is a continuing special order, subject to its disposition, that bill being now before the Senate, was given this position several days before the bill to which the Senator from Connecticut now makes allusion was made a special order at all, and the RECORD will show, if it shall be read, that what I have stated in regard to this being a continuous order, subject to the disposition of the Fitz-John Porter case, is correct.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill before the Senate will be read.

Mr. MILLER, of New York. I think it will be in order to move that the House bill No. 3967 be make a special order for 2 o'clock on Friday next.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair thinks it is not in order to make the motion without unanimous consent of the Senate, the Fitz-John Porter bill being now before the Senate. The Senate having passed over the bill referred to by the Senator from New York, the Senator from Texas objected to the Senator from New York making the motion at this time.

Mr. MILLER, of New York. As it seems to be the decision of the Senate that the private bill of Fitz-John Porter shall displace all public measures here, I cannot, of course, do otherwise than submit to the parliamentary rules and the decision of the Senate. I ask that the amendments proposed to the pleuro-pneumonia bill be printed, and that the bill and the amendments proposed by me be printed separately, in order that the objection made by the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. BECK] may be obviated, that the Senate has not before it precisely what it is proposed to act on.

Mr. SHERMAN. I ask that the amendment I proposed be printed in the same manner.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The order to print the bill as proposed to be amended from the Committee on Agriculture will be entered, if there be no objection.

Mr. SHERMAN. I hope the amendment I offered will be printed in the same document.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If there be no objection the amendment intended to be proposed by the Senator from Ohio will be printed on the same paper. The Chair hears no objection

FITZ-JOHN PORTER.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (H. R. 1015) for the relief of Fitz-John Porter.

The bill was reported from the Committee on Military Affairs with an amendment to strike out all after the enacting clause and to insert:

That the President be, and he is hereby, authorized to nominate and, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, to appoint Fitz-John Porter, late a major-general of the United States Volunteers and a brevet brigadier-general and colonel of the Army, to the position of colonel in the Army of the United States, of the same grade and rank held by him at the time of his dismissal from the Army by sentence of court-martial promulgated January 27, 1863, and, in his discretion, to place him on the retired-list of the Army as of that grade, the retired-list being thereby increased in number to that extent; and all laws and parts of laws in conflict herewith are suspended for this purpose only: Provided, That said Fitz-John Porter, shall receive no pay, compensation, or allowance whatsoever prior to his appointment under this act.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment reported by the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. SEWELL. Mr. President, as the amendment is the unanimous report of the Committee on Military Affairs there can be no objection to it. I ask to have it adopted.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is the Senate ready for the question?

Mr. LOGAN. I would suggest to the Senator from New Jersey that perhaps that vote ought not to be put until the question comes in reference to the amendment and then agreeing to the bill.

Mr. SEWELL. I prefer to speak to the bill as amended. There certainly can be no objection to the amendment. When the bill is amended as proposed it will be the same bill that the Senate passed during the last Congress.

Mr. LOGAN. I understand that the amendment is much preferable to the bill as passed by the House, and I merely made the suggestion as to the convenience of business. I have no objection to the amendment being acted on.

Mr. SEWELL. Under the instructions of the committee I should prefer to have the amendment adopted now.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment reported by the Committee on Military Affairs.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. SEWELL. Mr. President, there are voluminous reports both from the majority and minority of the committee. I have no desire at the present time to have them read, but there are some extracts that I may ask for the reading of during the progress of the remarks that I shall submit to the Senate.

The bill to restore Fitz-John Porter to the Army, now before the Senate, is, substantially, in words, and for the same limiting effect, the bill passed by the Senate at the last session of Congress. Of its merits I have heretofore spoken, and I purpose now to make but few remarks, and those only to brush away a few doubts on the justice of the bill, which may exist with those who have not had full opportunities to study the case. The bill is based on the recommendation of an advisory board of officers, appointed by the President to examine fully into the merits of the case, and to report, "with the reasons for their conclusions, what action, if any, in their opinion, justice requires should be taken by the President."

The members of the board were selected for their rare judicial ability, intelligence, military experience, and integrity. They were known to entertain unfriendly opinions to General Porter's cause. General Sherman, who selected them, said, "they were officers than whom their better do not exist in the Army," and expressed in advance of their decision the belief that he would accept as conclusive the judgment of this court of honor, "composed, as it was, of such officers as Generals Schofield, Terry, and Getty." The President so far indorsed their recommendations as (in the absence of power to execute it) to submit their proceedings and recommendations to Congress for such action as in their wisdom should seem expedient and just.

The report of the board is before the Senate. It states that the sentence of the court-martial inflicted on General Porter in 1863 was founded in error and in ignorance of the real facts, and that so far from his conduct deserving condemnation it merited praise.

These convictions are supplemented by the judgment of the ablest general of our Army, late its head, and President of the United States, who, after months of study, confirmed emphatically the conclusions of that advisory board.

I ask the Secretary to read an article from the North American Review, headed "An undeserved stigma," as part of my remarks.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

[From the North American Review.,

AN UNDESERVED STIGMA.

On the 27th of November, 1862, a court-martial was convened in the city of Washington for the trial of Major-General Fitz-John Porter, of the volunteer force. The court consisted of nine members and a judge-advocate—the Judge-Advocate-General of the Army.

The charges against General Porter were:

First. Disobedience of orders under the ninth article of war.

Second. Misbehavior before the enemy under the fifty-second article of war.

Under the first charge there were three specifications of which the court found Porter guilty. These were, substantially:

First. Disobedience to the order of August 27, requiring him to march from Warrenton Junction at 1 o'clock on the morning of the 28th and be at Bristoe Station by daylight.

Second. Disobedience on August 29, while in front of the enemy, to the joint order to McDowell and Porter, directing them to march toward Gainesville and establish communication with the other corps.

Third. Disobedience on August 29, while in front of the enemy, to what is known as the "4.30 p. m. order," requiring Porter to attack the enemy's flank and rear.

Under the second charge the specifications upon which Porter was tried and convicted were, in substance:

First. Shameful disobedience to the 4.30 p. m. order on August 29, while in sight of the field and in full hearing of its artillery; and retreat from advancing forces of the enemy, without attempting to engage them or to aid the troops who were fighting greatly superior numbers, and who would have secured a decisive victory and captured the enemy's army but for Porter's neglect to attack and his shameful disobedience.

Second. Failure of Porter all that day to bring his forces on the field when within sound of the guns and in presence of the enemy, and knowing that a severe action of great consequence was being fought and that the aid of his corps was greatly needed; and his shameful falling back and retreat from the advance of unknown forces of the enemy without attempting to give them battle.

Third. Shameful failure of Porter on the same day, while a severe action was being fought, to go to the aid of General Pope's troops when he believed that they were being defeated and were retiring from the field, and his shameful retreat away and falling back under these circumstances, leaving the army to the disasters of a presumed defeat; and failure, by any attempt to attack the enemy, to aid in averting a disaster which would have endangered the safety of the capital.

These are the accusations that were made against General Porter for his part and failure in the battles generally known as those of the second Bull Run campaign. The court found him guilty of the charges and specifications. If he was so guilty the punishment awarded was not commensurate with the offense committed. I believe lawyers have taken exception to the formation of the court and to some of its technical rulings; but neither at the time nor since has General Porter attempted to evade the consequences of his acts by any special pleading, or by taking advantage of any technical error in the composition of the court or the method of its being ordered, but has relied entirely upon his innocence of all the charges and specifications, and would not be satisfied with an acquittal on any other ground than that of his entire innocence.

It will be seen from the foregoing that General Porter's alleged misconduct was embraced in three separate cases of disobedience of orders: one on the 27th of August and two on the 29th of August, and in having retreated unnecessarily from the enemy, by that act endandering other portions of the army with which he was co-operating.

It will be seen that, though these offenses were alleged to have been committed in August of 1862, he was continued in the command of an army corps until some time in November following, taking an active part in battles of the day following the date of the last charge and in command of the defenses of Washington on the west bank of the Potomac, and also at the battle of Antietam, some weeks later. It would look at first very singular that an officer so wantonly derelict in the performance of his duty as General Porter was alleged to have been on the 27th and 29th of August should have been continued in so important a place as the command of an army corps, when so much was at stake as there was on the 30th of August, and in the defenses of Washington, and in the later battles in Maryland, when the invasion of the North was threatened. These facts would indicate to an unprejudiced mind that the charges against Porter were an after-thought, to shift the responsibilities of failure from other shoulders and to place them upon him.

In regard to his disobedience of the order of the 27th of August, he is alleged to have without justification deferred his march from Warrenton Junction to Bristoe Station from 1 o'clock until 3 of the morning of the 28th. It was about 10 o'clock on the night of the 27th when Porter received the following order:

HEADQUARTERS ARMY OF VIRGINIA,
Bristoe Station, August 27, 1862—6.30 p.m.

GENERAL: The major-general commanding directs that you start at 1 o'clock and come forward with your whole corps, or such part of it as is with you, so as to be here by daylight to-morrow morning. Hooker has had a very severe action with the enemy, with a loss of about three hundred killed and wounded. The enemy has been driven back, but is retiring along the railroad. We must drive him from Manassas and clear the country between that place and Gainesville, where McDowell is. If Morell has not joined you send word to him to push forward immediately; also send word to Banks to hurry forward with all speed to take your place at Warrenton Junction. It is necessary, on all accounts, that you should be here by daylight. I send an officer with this dispatch who will conduct you to this place. Be sure to send word to Banks, who is on the road from Fayetteville, probably in the direction of Bealeton. Say to Banks also that he had best run back the railroad trains to this side of Cedar Run. If he is not with you, write him to that effect.

By command of Major-General Pope.

GEORGE D. RUGGLES,
Colonel and Chief of Staff.

Maj. Gen. F. J. PORTER,
Warrenton Junction.

P. S.—If Banks is not at Warrenton Junction, leave a regiment of infantry and two pieces of artillery as a guard till he comes up, with instructions to follow you immediately. If Banks is not at the Junction, instruct Colonel Clary to run the trains back to this side of Cedar Run, and post a regiment and section of artillery with it.

By command of Major-General Pope.

GEORGE D. RUGGLES,
Colonel and Chief of Staff.

His troops had been marching all day, were very much fatigued, and some of them only having just arrived in camp and had their supper when the order to march at 1 o'clock was received. The night, as shown in the testimony before the court which tried Porter, and as confirmed by the evidence given in what was known as the Schofield board, was extremely dark; the road very narrow, with numerous cuts and streams passing through it; bounded by woods on both sides in many places, with no place where the open country could be taken for the march of troops; and blocked up with about two thousand army wagons, many of them mired in the narrow road, so that the officer who conveyed this order to General Porter was over three hours on horseback in making the distance of ten miles. Porter was expected, with fatigued troops, worn with long marches, on scanty rations, to make a march on a very dark night through a blockaded road more rapidly than a single aid-de-camp, unencumbered, had been able to get through on horseback.

When he received the order he showed it to his leading generals, and, apparently with one accord, they decided that the movement at that hour was impossible; further, that no time could possibly be gained by so early a start, and that if they should start at that hour and get through to Bristoe Station at the time designated the troops would not be fit for either fighting or marching on their arrival at that point. Porter replied, however, "Here is the order, and it must be obeyed;" but after further consultation he decided, as did his generals, that a postponement of two hours in starting the march would enable them to get through as quick as if the men were kept on foot and under arms while the road was being cleared and that the men would be in much better condition for service on their arrival at their destination. He was entirely justified in exercising his own judgment in this matter, because the order shows that he was not to take part in any battle when he arrived there, but was wanted to pursue a fleeing enemy. He did not leave the commanding general in ignorance of his proposed delay nor of the reasons for it, but at once sent a request that the general commanding should send back cavalry (he had none himself) and clear the road near him of incumbrances, so that the march might be unobstructed.

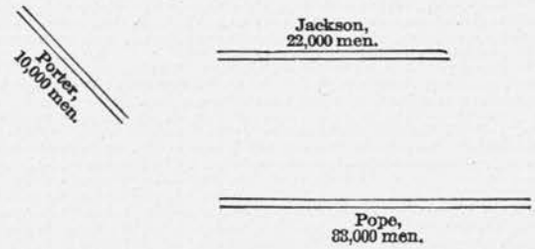
It is shown that a literal obedience to the order of the 27th of August was a physical impossibility. It is further shown that General Porter was desirous of obeying it literally, so far as was practicable, but was prevailed upon by his leading generals—against whom a suspicion of disloyalty to their commander or to the cause has never been entertained—to do what his own judgment approved as the best thing to do, to make a later start, with a view of arriving at his destination as early as it was possible for him to arrive there, and to give to his jaded and worn troops two hours more of needed rest. If the night had been clear and the road an open one there would not have been as much justification for the exercise of his discretion in the matter; but there is no doubt but that he would have arrived at Bristoe Station just as early, and with his troops in much better condition, if he had started at early dawn instead of the hour he did, and the intervening time had been used in clearing the road for his troops when they did march. Where there were open spaces along the line of the road they were either marshy, filled with stumps of trees, and impossible to march over, or were crowded with army wagons, so that the track of his army was limited to the encumbered narrow road between the two points designated in the order, which could be cleared only by the wagons being moved ahead, as requested of Pope.

Much of the testimony before the court and before the Army board might be quoted to confirm what is here stated; but as this is all accessible to the reader I will not lengthen this statement by quoting it.

I question very much whether there was an engagement during the war or a series of engagements continuing over as much time as was consumed in the battles about Bull Run in August, 1862, when not only one but a number of generals did not exercise their discretion as Porter did on this occasion, and with far less justification. The commanding general who gave the order desired to have the troops at a certain point by daylight, and he gave his orders so as to accomplish that result. Under the circumstances his order required of the troops an impossibility. That was as evident to Porter and those with him before the attempt was made as it was after.

It is a little singular that any one high in rank connected with the Army of Virginia should be in ignorance of the arrival of at least a portion of Lee's army, by the very route designated by Pope, many hours before the 4.30 order was published. Porter was not in ignorance of that arrival. Between 12 and 1 o'clock, on arriving at his advanced position, Porter was shown by McDowell a dispatch from General Buford, sent at 9.30 on the morning of the 29th, stating that from seventeen to eighteen regiments of the enemy had passed through Gainesville three-quarters of an hour before, or at a quarter before 9 o'clock, on their way to re-enforce Jackson, so that the head of the column must have been not only in supporting distance of Jackson, but at the place of deployment by 10 o'clock in the morning; and now it is known by others, as it was known by Porter at the time, that Longstreet, with some twenty-five thousand men, was in position confronting Porter by 12 o'clock on the 29th of August, four hours and a half before the 4.30 order was written.

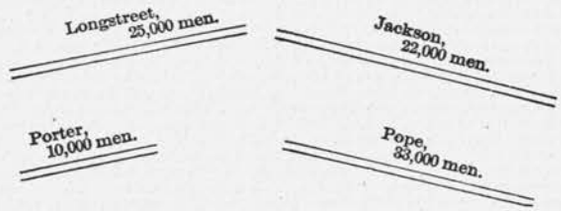
While at the head of their united forces between 12 and 1 o'clock, and while Porter was preparing to attack the enemy in his immediate front, McDowell, then in command, showed Porter the "joint order" and also Buford's dispatch. It was evident from this dispatch, corroborated by the enemy's movements in their immediate front, that the main forces of the enemy, which the "joint order" said were far distant, had not only arrived, but had formed a junction with Jackson and deployed in their front. Porter knew of this from another fact. He had prisoners from that force—Longstreet's troops. The object of moving toward Gainesville had been thus defeated, and any further advance, if practicable, would only the more widely separate them from Pope's forces, then checked at Groveton, at least two miles distant, and with which they were ordered to "establish communication." McDowell, as he had the right, at once withdrew his troops, leaving Porter with ten thousand men to confront Longstreet's twenty-five thousand, while he went by a circuitous route to a point between Porter and Pope to establish the communication enjoined.



Thus left alone, facing superior numbers advantageously posted, and ignorant of the needs of Pope, if indeed he had any, Porter had necessarily to bide McDowell's arrival on his right. In the mean time his duty was manifestly to engage Longstreet's attention and prevent him from moving against Pope, especially while McDowell was out of support of both Pope and Porter. Porter all that day did not hear of McDowell, or of what was taking place in front of Pope, though he kept the former well informed of affairs with him, and presumed that his dispatches were sent to the latter. He, however, engaged Longstreet's attention by demonstrations nearly harmless to himself and so successfully as to cause Longstreet to take Wilcox's division from in front of Pope in order to strengthen the line confronting Porter, who at the time was aware of this movement of forces coming from the right to his front and notified McDowell of it. Thus Porter, without sacrifice of men and without endangering any interests, did more for Pope's relief than if he had gone directly to that general's assistance. To have done so would probably have sacrified his corps, without any benefit, and jeoparded the safety of Pope's army.

So far as I have investigated the case—and I have studied it, I think, pretty thoroughly—I see no fact to base the charge of retreat upon. I do not see that any argument to prove this is necessary, because any reader of history may be defied now to find where and when General Porter retreated during the time specified.

In my judgment this disposes of the charges, and consequently of all specifications under them, except the alleged disobedience of the 4.30 p. m. order.



In regard to the charge of disobedience of the 4.30 order, which is the principal one and the one that has most deeply impressed the mind of the general public, there are evidences which look to me important and conclusive, showing that the court-martial which tried General Porter found him guilty under a mistaken idea of the actual facts, now accessible to any one in search of the truth, and which Porter knew to be the facts at the time. As maintained by the prosecution, to the apparent satisfaction of the court, the situation of the belligerent forces were in numbers and position about as here given:

The 4.30 p. m. order of the 29th of August required Porter to attack the enemy's right flank and to get into his rear if possible. This enemy, in the mind of the commanding general, and no doubt of the court, was Jackson's force of twenty-two thousand men. Porter was supposed to occupy, with ten thousand troops, position assigned to him in the diagram given. The court also seems to have been satisfied that the order to make this attack was received by Porter from 5 to half past 5 o'clock in the afternoon, leaving him abundance of time to obey the order.

That the commanding general believed the positions as given in the foregoing diagram to be the positions of the different commands is shown from the fact that in his joint order of that morning he stated that "the indications are that the whole force of the enemy is moving in this direction at a pace that will bring them here by to-morrow night or next day"—that is, the evening of the 30th or the morning of the 31st of August—and from the fact that in the 4.30 order he stated that "the enemy is massed in the woods in front of us," thus ignoring the presence of Longstreet. This is confirmed in his map No. 5 furnished to the Government. If these had been the facts of the case there would have been no justification whatever for Porter's failure to make the attack as ordered; but instead of the facts being as supposed by the commanding general and the court which tried General Porter, they were as shown by the following diagram. This Porter knew on indisputable evidence:

As shown by this diagram, Porter was not in a position to attack the right flank of Jackson, because he was at least three miles away, and not across his flank, as shown in the first diagram. With Longstreet's presence, to have obeyed that order he would have been obliged, with ten thousand men, to have defeated twenty-five thousand men in a chosen position before he could have moved upon the flank of the enemy, as the order directed. But, even if the position of Lee's army had been thirty-six to forty-eight hours distant, as asserted in the joint order to McDowell and Porter, it would have been impossible for Porter to have obeyed the 4.30 order, because it did not contemplate a night attack, and was not received by Porter until about dark. To have obeyed it would have required some little preparation, movement of troops, and distribution of orders, so that it would have been some time after dark before he could have moved from the position he was then occupying, and at least as late as 9 o'clock at night before he could have reached Jackson's flank to engage it. His efforts to execute the order, notwithstanding its apparent inappropriateness, demonstrate this assertion.

I consider that these facts, with many more that were brought to the knowledge of the Schofield board, fully exonerate General Porter of the charge of disobedience of what is known as the 4.30 order, and also of the imputation of lukewarmness in the support of the commanding general.

A great deal might be said of the movements, the marching and countermarching of troops, between the date of the order of the 27th of August and the receipt of the order of the 29th which would throw light upon this question; but I abstain from giving it, because I believe that what is stated here covers all the points wherein General Porter has been charged with being delinquent.

General Porter has now for twenty years been laboring under the disabilities and penalties inflicted upon him by the court-martial of 1862, all that time contending for a restoration to his position in the Army and in society, and always, as stated in the beginning of this article, on the ground of his entire innocence. The investigation of the Schofield board has in my judgment established his innocence of all the offenses for which he was tried and convicted. The sufferings of twenty years under such findings, for himself and family and friends, is something it is now impossible to set right. Twenty years of the best part of his life have been consumed in trying to have his name and his reputation restored before his countrymen. In his application now before Congress he is asking only that he may be restored to the rolls of the Army, with the rank that he would have if the court-martial had never been held. This in my judgment is a very small part of what it is possible to do in this case, and of what ought to be done. General Porter should, in the way of partial restitution, be declared by Congress to have been convicted on mistaken testimony, and therefore to have never been out of the Army. This would make him a major-general of volunteers until the date might be fixed for his muster-out as of that rank, after which he should be continued as a colonel of infantry, and brevet brigadier-general of the United States Army from the date of the act when he could be placed upon the retired-list with that rank.

In writing what I have here written I mean no criticism upon the court which tried General Porter nor upon the officers under whom or with whom he served. It is easy to understand, in the condition of the public mind as it was in 1862, when the nation was in great peril and when the Union troops had met with some severe reverses, how the public were ready to condemn—to death if need be—any officer against whom even a suspicion might be raised. For many years, and till within a year, I believed that the position and number of the troops on both sides were as stated in the first diagram given here, and that the order to attack was received at an hour in the day sufficiently early to have made the attack feasible; and, under that impression, it seemed to me that the enemy, unless through very bad generalship on the Union side, could not have been able to escape while a superior force confronted him and ten thousand men flanked him. But a study of the case not only has convinced me, but has clearly and conclusively established that the position and numbers of the armies were as given in the second diagram.

If a solemn and sincere expression of my thorough understanding of and belief in the entire innocence of General Porter will tend to draw the public mind to the same conviction, I shall feel abundantly rewarded for my efforts. It will always be a pleasure to me, as well as a duty, to be the instrument, even in the smallest degree, of setting right any man who has been grossly wronged, especially if he has risked life and reputation in defense of his country. I feel, as stated on a previous occasion, a double interest in this particular case, because, directly after the war, as General of the Army, when I might have been instrumental in having justice done to General Porter, and later as President of the United States, when I certainly could have done so, I labored under the firm conviction that he was guilty; that the facts of the receipt of the 4.30 order were as found by the court, and that the position of the troops and numbers were as given in the first of these diagrams. Having become better informed, I at once voluntarily gave, as I have continued to give, my earnest efforts to impress the minds of my countrymen with the justice of this case, and to secure from our Government, as far as it could grant it, the restitution due to General Fitz-John Porter.

U. S. GRANT.

Mr. SEWELL. I now ask the Secretary to read the letters of General Grant, General Terry, and General Walker, which are marked in the copy of the report which I send to the desk.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

NEW YORK, November 3, 1883.

DEAR GENERAL: As there is some discussion as to the probable reasons for my change of mind in regard to your case, now pending before the people of the United States, I deem it proper that I should give them myself.

In the first place I never believed you to be a traitor, as many affected to believe. I thought I knew you too well to believe for one moment that you would accept the pay, rank, and command you held for the purpose of betraying the cause you were professing to serve. Then, too, your services had been too conspicuous as a staff officer at the beginning of the war and as commander of troops later to support such a theory for a moment.

But I did believe that General Pope was so odious to some of the officers in the East that a cordial support was not given him by them. I was disposed, too, to accept the verdict of a court-martial composed as the one which tried you was. Some of the members of that court I knew personally, and had great confidence in their judgment and justice. I supposed you had shared in this feeling towards Pope, and while not more guilty than others you, were unfortunate in being placed in a position where specifications could be made showing this hostility.

After the close of the war, when I was requested to read your new defense, I read it with the feeling above described. At the same time I read the other side as prepared—or furnished—by General Pope. This gave maps showing the positions of the two armies substantially as shown by the first of the diagrams presented by Mr. Lord, of San Francisco, from whom I copied in the article in your case, and did not indicate the presence of any other force than Jackson's. Then, too, it appeared that you had actually received an order at about 5 or 5.30 in the afternoon of August 29 to attack the enemy's flank, and that, too, at a time when a fierce battle was raging in the front.

I was first shaken in my views, however, when such a man as General Terry—who unites the lawyer with the soldier—a man of high character and ability, and who had believed as I had, and possibly worse, after many weeks of investigation should entirely vindicate you and be sustained, too, by men of the known ability of his colleagues on the board. Until in 1881, when I re-examined for myself, my belief was that on the 29th of August, 1862, a great battle was fought between General Pope, commanding the Union forces, and General Jackson, commanding the confederate forces; that you, with a corps of twelve or more thousand men, stood in a position across the right flank of Jackson and where you could easily get into his rear; that you received an order to do so about 5 or 5.30 o'clock, which you refused to obey because of clouds of dust in your front, which you contended indicated an enemy in superior force to you; that you allowed Pope to get beaten while you stood idly looking on, without raising an arm to help him. With this understanding, and without a doubt as to the correctness of it, I condemned you.

Now, on a full investigation of the facts, I find that the battle was fought on the 30th of August; that your corps, commanded directly by you in person, lost a greater percentage than any other corps engaged; that the 4.30 order of the day before did not reach you until nightfall; that your immediate superior had cautioned you early in the day that you were too far out to the front then; that General Pope had cautioned you against bringing on an engagement except under such circumstances as he described, and that in any event you must be prepared to fall back behind Bull Run that night, where it would be necessary for you to be to receive supplies; that from 11 o'clock of the 29th you were confronted by a force of twice your own number, of whose presence you had positive proof, while General Pope did not know of it.

This last fact is shown by the wording of the 4.30 order. It directed you to attack the enemy's right and get into his rear. General Pope's circular of the morning of the 29th said that General Lee was advancing by way of Thoroughfare Gap. At the rate at which he was moving he would be up the night of the 30th or the morning of the 31st.

In his testimony before the court-martial which tried you he said, under oath, that he did not know of the arrival of Lee's command until 6 o'clock of the 29th, an hour and a half after he had dictated the order for your attack.

His circular and testimony prove conclusively that Jackson, and Jackson alone, was the enemy he intended you to attack. Your knowledge of this fact, as well as of the fact that you had another force, quite double yours, in addition, in your front, would have been sufficient justification for your not attacking, even if the order had been received in time. Of course this would not apply if a battle had been raging between Jackson and Pope. At the hour you received the order all was quiet.

This very short, hastily written, and incomplete summary shows why and when my mind underwent a change. I have no doubt now but the change would have taken place in 1867 if I had then made an investigation. I regret now that I did not understand your case then as I do now. Your whole life since your trial, as well as your services before, disprove the great burden of the charges then sustained by a court-martial. As long as I have a voice it shall be raised in your support, without any reference to the effect upon me or others. Your restoration to the Army, simply, I would regard as a very inadequate and unjust reparation. While men—one at least—have been restored to the Army because of their gallantry and wounds, after conviction and sentence, and when there is no doubt of their guilt, are given all their pay for the years they were out of the service, I can see no reason for your having less.

I hope for you a thorough vindication, not only by Congress, but in the minds of your countrymen.

Faithfully, yours,

U. S. GRANT.

General F. J. PORTER, Morristown.

SAINT PAUL, MINN., August 26, 1879.

DEAR GENERAL: Soon after the publication of the report of the Schofield board you wrote to me thanking me as one of the board for our action in your case. * * * I write now to say it is not thanks but pardon I should ask from you. For years I did you wrong in thought, and sometimes in speech. It is true that this was through ignorance, but I had not the right to be so ignorant; I might have learned something at least of the truth had I diligently sought it.

If you find anything in my action as a member of the board which you can accept as an atonement for the wrong which I did you, I shall be more than gratified.

With great respect and admiration, I am, yours, most sincerely,

ALFRED H. TERRY.

Maj. Gen. FITZ-JOHN PORTER, New York.

FORT SNELLING, MINN., November 19, 1882.

DEAR GENERAL: Will you permit me to express to you the very great gratification with which I have read your article in the North American Review? Dealing, as it does, with only the great essential points of Porter's case, and brushing aside as unworthy of serious notice all the pretty sophistries with which his opponents have sought to confuse the public mind, it seems to me that it must carry conviction to every fair, unprejudiced man.

The questions involved in Porter's case are, of course, partly legal and partly military. Long ago the best legal authority of the country—such men as B. R. Curtis, Charles O'Conor, and Daniel Lord—declared that the rules of law were violated by the conviction of Porter, even as the case stood before the court-martial; and now that the highest military authority of the nation has pronounced in his favor upon the military questions, what is there left for the Government and the people to do except to hasten to make such reparation as may yet be possible for the wrong which has been done?

As perhaps you may know, I once, like yourself, believed Porter to be guilty. I believed that he had committed a crime so great that mere human law could provide no adequate punishment for it. But when it became my duty to examine into the case carefully I found that I had grossly erred. I found that instead of being a criminal he was a martyr.

So believing, it is a source of very great satisfaction to me that I have borne some small part in his vindication.

Looking back over the years that have elapsed since I entered the military service, I find nothing that gives me so much pleasure as the fact that I have had some part in that vindication, and I can think of nothing in the future which would be so grateful to me as to be able to do something more in behalf of one who has suffered so grievously and so unjustly. While I feel thus, you may imagine the gratification with which I find that the opinion which I now entertain, that what I believe to be the cause of truth, of right, and of justice, is so strongly supported by yourself; and you will pardon me, I am sure, for expressing to you my feelings.

Very sincerely and respectfully,

ALFRED H. TERRY.

General U. S. GRANT, New York.

MASSACHUSETTS INSTITUTE OF TECHNOLOGY,
Boston, November 27, 1882.

GENERAL: I have the honor, on behalf of some of your former soldiers, to inclose a note expressive of their sentiments respecting your recent article in the North American Review.

No circulation has been given to this note with a view to securing signatures. It is written and sent only as a spontaneous utterance of hearty thanks for your justice and courage in defending an unfortunate but honorable and gallant soldier.

Very respectfully, yours,

FRANCIS A. WALKER.

General U. S. GRANT, New York.

Mr. SEWELL. General Grant concisely and clearly states the essential points in this letter. On one point—the night march of August 27–28, 1862, I shall make a few remarks before I close. General Grant does not refer to the charge based on that event, probably, as others have done, regarding it of no moment, and only used as a makeweight to other apparently more serious charges.

The bill is to authorize an act of justice to be done to an injured man. That man was an officer of high standing, of untarnished reputation, through many years of faithful and valuable service in the cause of our country. He was suddenly stricken down and degraded, and made to suffer for many years, in a manner unexampled in our country, by the act of our Government, committed, as is now established, through erroneous impressions of the facts. That act has been proved wrongful, and is so declared in the report of the advisory board. It has been virtually acknowledged by our Government. The President has professed himself without power, in the absence of legislation, to right the wrong, and remits the whole case "for such action as, in the wisdom of Congress, shall seem expedient and just." Another President, having doubts of the justice of the sentence of the court-martial, has remitted so much of it as forbids the holding of office under the Government of the United States. He has declared his powers exhausted in that act of amelioration. Congress is asked, in the bill now before us, to give the necessary authoritative legislation. We are to act, not as a court of appeals, but as a legislative body, on the voice of a court of appeals pronouncing the wrong done and the legal remedy.

It is true, as has been asserted, that the decision of the advisory board had not in a legal sense the power and rights of a court of appeals, nor has the opinion of General Grant. But military law recognizes no court of appeals, unless it be such an advisory board. Take the board's judgment in this case. Is there any court of appeals whose finding on the facts would receive stronger evidence in the integrity of its proceedings and the justice of its decision than should the decision and recommendation of this board of officers, who, for the sake of their honor alone—as dear to them as life itself—would never have dared to recommend action not based on truth and justice?

I do not consider Congress necessarily a court of appeals. If it were so, there are many of us who, without military experience and knowledge of military law, would reluctantly act as judges on matters so technical, and often involving "the purest treasure mortal times afford, spotless reputation." We have the report of a competent board of honored and trusted officers, whose investigation of the facts was made at a time of freedom from all excitement and prejudice and restraint, and which had before it every person who felt interested and desired to testify, save one, who had promised to testify if subpœnaed, but who when so called refused to appear.

Is not that board an ample court of appeals to base our action upon? Believing it such, I shall be pardoned for reiterating here a few expressions from that report; but preliminary to doing so I quote a few lines from a letter of Hon. Benjamin R. Curtis on the point of governmental action due in such a case of injustice. Judge Curtis, for many years a judge of the United States Supreme Court, and who was in this city at the time, closely watched the proceedings of Porter's court-martial, and in 1866 he appealed to President Johnson in Porter's behalf in the following words:

I beg leave to address you concerning the case of Fitz-John Porter, lately a major-general in the military service of the United States and cashiered by sentence of a court-martial.

I presume you are aware that many persons who felt no particular interest in General Porter, and who founded their opinion only from a perusal of the proceedings which took place on his trial, believed that the result of that trial did entire injustice to a brave officer who had done important service to his country. I was one of those persons. I had never seen General Porter nor had relations with him in any way, but the result of that court-martial I felt to be an injury to the military justice of the country.

This opinion has been, in my own judgment, made as near a certainty as any such subject admits of by the reports of Longstreet, Hood, and Jones, exhibited in the History of the Army of the Potomac, by Mr. Swinton. I believe you will agree with me when I say that there are few things more important in government than the preservation of public confidence in the justice of judicial sentences, whether civil or military, and that when in conspicuous instances not only grave doubts existed at the time whether the sentence was correct, but decisive evidence of its injustice has since been discovered, the Government owes it not only to the accused but to the fame of justice which itself entertains, and to the preservation of that confidence in its love of justice among the people, which is essential to their willing respect and obedience, to interfere and do whatever can fitly be done in such a case.

After presenting the charges on which General Porter was tried the advisory board reports:

The charges and specifications certainly bear no discernible resemblance to the facts of the case as now established. Yet it has been our duty to carefully compare with these facts the views entertained by the court-martial as shown in the findings and in the review of the case which was prepared for the information of the President by the Judge-Advocate-General, who had conducted the prosecution, and thus to clearly perceive every error into which the court-martial was led. We trust it is not necessary for us to submit in detail the results of this comparison, and that it will be sufficient for us to point out the fundamental errors, and to say that all the essential facts in every instance stand out in clear and absolute contrast to those supposed facts upon which General Porter was adjudged guilty.

The fundamental errors upon which the conviction of General Porter depended may be summed up in few words. It was maintained, and apparently established to the satisfaction of the court-martial that only about one-half of the confederate army was on the field of Manassas on the 29th of August, while General Lee, with the other half, was still beyond the Bull Run Mountains; that General Pope's army, exclusive of Porter's corps, was engaged in a severe and nearly equal contest with the enemy, and only needed the aid of a flank attack, which Porter was expected to make, to insure the defeat and destruction or capture of the confederate force in their front under General Jackson; that McDowell and Porter, with their joint forces, Porter's leading, had advanced toward Gainesville until the head of their column had reached a point near the Warrenton turnpike, where they found a division of confederate troops, "seventeen regiments," which Buford had counted as they passed through Gainesville, marching along the road across Porter's front and going toward the field of battle at Groveton; that McDowell ordered Porter to at once attack that column thus moving to join Jackson, or the flank and rear of the line if they had formed in line, while he would take his own troops by the Sudley Springs road and throw them upon the enemy's center near Groveton; that Porter, McDowell having then separated from him, disobeyed that order to attack, allowed that division of the enemy's troops to pass him unmolested, and then fell back and retreated toward Manassas Junction; that Porter then remained in the rear all the afternoon, listening to the sounds of battle and coolly contemplating a presumed defeat of his comrades on the center and right of the field; that this division of the enemy having passed Porter's column and formed on the right of Jackson's line near Groveton, an order was sent to Porter to attack the right flank or rear of the enemy's line, upon which his own line of march must bring him, but that he had willfully disobeyed and made no attempt to execute that order; that in this way was lost the opportunity to destroy Jackson's detached force before the other wing of General Lee's army could join it, and that, this junction having been effected during the night of the 29th, the defeat of General Pope's army on the 30th thus resulted from General Porter's neglect and disobedience.

Now, in contrast to these fundamental errors, the following all-important facts are fully established:

As Porter was advancing toward Gainesville, and while yet nearly four miles from that place and more than two miles from the nearest point of the Warrenton turnpike, he met the right wing of the confederate army, twenty-five thousand strong, which had arrived on the field that morning and was already in line of battle. Not being at that moment quite fully informed of the enemy's movements, and being then under orders from Pope to push rapidly toward Gainesville, Porter was pressing forward to attack the enemy in his front, when McDowell arrived on the field with later information of the enemy, and later and very different orders from Pope, assumed the command, and arrested Porter's advance. This latter information left no room for doubt that the main body of Lee's army was already on the field and far in advance of Pope's army in preparation for battle. General McDowell promptly decided not to attempt to go farther to the front, but to deploy his column so as to form line in connection with General Pope's right wing, which was then engaged with Jackson. To do this General McDowell separated his corps entirely from General Porter's, and thus relinquished the command and all right to the command of Porter's corps. McDowell did not give Porter any order to attack, nor did he give him any order whatever to govern his action after their separation.

It does not appear from the testimony that he conveyed to General Porter in any way the erroneous view of the military situation which was afterward maintained before the court-martial, nor that he suggested to General Porter any expectation that he would make an attack. On the contrary, the testimony of all the witnesses as to what was actually said and done; the information which McDowell and Porter then had respecting the enemy, and the movement which McDowell decided to make, and did make, with his own troops, prove conclusively that there was left no room for doubt in Porter's mind that his duty was to stand on the defensive and hold his position until McDowell's movement could be completed. It would have indicated a great error of military judgment to have done or ordered the contrary, in the situation as then fully known to both McDowell and Porter.

General Pope appears from his orders and from his testimony to have been at that time wholly ignorant of the true situation. He had disapproved of the sending of Ricketts to Thoroughfare Gap to meet Longstreet on the 28th, believing that the main body of Lee's army could not reach the field of Manassas before the night of the 30th. Hence, he sent the order to Porter, dated 4.30 p. m., to attack Jackson's right flank or rear. Fortunately that order did not reach Porter until about sunset—too late for any attack to be made. Any attack which Porter could have made at any time that afternoon must necessarily have been fruitless of any good result. Porter's faithful, subordinate, and intelligent conduct that afternoon saved the Union Army from the defeat which would otherwise have resulted that day from the enemy's more speedy concentration. The only seriously critical period of that campaign, namely, between 11 a. m. and sunset of August 29, was thus safely passed. Porter had understood and appreciated the military situation, and, so far as he had acted upon his own judgment, his action had been wise and judicious. For the disaster of the succeeding day he was in no degree responsible. Whoever else may have been responsible, it did not flow from any action or inaction of his.

The judgment of the court-martial upon General Porter's conduct was evidently based upon greatly erroneous impressions, not only respecting what that conduct really was and the orders under which he was acting, but also respecting all the circumstances under which he acted. Especially was this true in respect to the character of the battle of the 29th of August. That battle consisted of a number of sharp and gallant combats between small portions of the opposing forces. Those combats were of short duration, and were separated by long intervals of simple skirmishing and artillery duels. Until after 6 o'clock only a small part of the troops on either side were engaged at any time during the afternoon. Then, about sunset, one additional division on each side was engaged near Groveton. The musketry of that last contest and the yells of the confederate troops about dark were distinctly heard by the officers of Porter's corps; but at no other time during all that afternoon was the volume of musketry such that it could be heard at the position of Porter's troops. No sound but that of artillery was heard by them during all those hours when Porter was understood by the court-martial to have been listening to the sounds of a furious battle raging immediately to his right. And those sounds of artillery were by no means such as to indicate a general battle.

The reports of the 29th and those of the 30th of August have somehow been strangely confounded with each other. Even the confederate reports have, since the termination of the war, been similarly misconstrued. Those of the 30th have been misquoted as referring to the 29th, thus to prove that a furious battle was going on while Porter was comparatively inactive on the 29th. The fierce and gallant struggle of his own troops on the 30th has thus been used to sustain the original error under which he was condemned. General Porter was, in effect, condemned for not having taken any part in his own battle. Such was the error upon which General Porter was pronounced guilty of the most shameful crime known among soldiers. We believe not one among all the gallant soldiers on that bloody field was less deserving of such condemnation than he.)

Of the delay in marching from 1 to 3 o'clock a. m., August 28, the board says:

Nothing was gained or could have been gained by the attempt to move before the dawn of day. It would have been wiser to have delayed the attempt to move until 4 o'clock. A vigorous and persistent effort to make that march, commencing at 1 o'clock, could only have resulted in greatly fatiguing the troops, and throwing them into disorder, from which they could not have been extricated until long after daylight, without making any material progress, and would thus have caused the corps to arrive at Bristoe at a later hour and in a miserable condition.

Of the events of August 29, so aptly summarized by General Grant, as far as General Porter is concerned, the board reports:

Porter's faithful, subordinate, and intelligent conduct that afternoon saved the Union army from the defeat which would otherwise have resulted that day from the enemy's more speedy concentration. The only seriously critical period of that campaign, namely, between 11 a. m. and sunset of August 29, was thus safely passed. Porter had understood and appreciated the military situation, and so far as he had acted upon his own judgment his action had been wise and judicious. For the disaster of the succeeding day he was in no degree responsible. Whoever else may have been responsible, it did not flow from any action or inaction of his.

The judgment of the court-martial upon General Porter's conduct was evidently based upon greatly erroneous impressions, not only respecting what that conduct really was and the orders under which he was acting, but also respecting all the circumstances under which he acted. Especially was this true in respect to the character of the battle of the 29th of August. Such was the error upon which General Porter was pronounced guilty of the most shameful crime known among soldiers. We believe not one among all the gallant soldiers on that bloody field was less deserving of such condemnation than he.

The delay of two hours in marching in the night of August 27 has always been acknowledged by Porter. The letter of the order required Porter and all his command to make in about three hours a night march of ten miles over a road known by him and his generals to be then impassable by troops in any order and to be efficient for active duty after arrival. The order stated he was wanted to pursue and drive a retreating enemy; not as Porter's accusers subsequently alleged, to aid troops without ammunition and to repel a supposed attack. There was no truth in this allegation. The reason subsequently assigned by the prosecution for the march was a fabrication in toto.

The spirit of the order required Porter to reach his destination with his troops in condition for further and immediate service. The letter of the order was impracticable. Its spirit was executed in ample time for any emergency. There was no need of haste; none had existed. Furthermore, if offense had been committed, General Pope had condoned it by accepting the explanation without objection, and that should have debarred all subsequent allegation, and it would had not the charge been needed as a makeweight to other charges.

But Porter on receipt of the order dispatched General Pope as to his intended delay and assigned his reasons. General Pope had ample time before 3 o'clock to repeat his order. He failed to do so, thus silently approving of Porter's judgment and action.

The rule of action for officers situated as was Porter at that time is laid down in Napoleon's Maxims as follows:

The rule, as it appears to me, which applies to such cases, is well stated in certain extracts taken from a French work recently published in Paris.

It is entitled The Method of War, and the extracts which are translated will be found on pages 753, 754, and 755.

The reputations of Napoleon, the Duke of Wellington, and Archduke Charles are such as entitle them to consideration.

This is from Napoleon I:

"A military order even requires passive obedience only when it is given by a superior who, being present at the moment when he gives it, has knowledge of the state of things, can listen to objections, and can give explanations to the one who is to execute the order."

This is from the Duke of Wellington; a general order from the camp of Jansen, November 11, 1803:

"In making known to the army the decision given by the court-martial in the affair of Captain —— Major-General Wellesley thinks proper to explain to the troops that it is necessary to well distinguish the cases in which it is allowable or not for an officer to act at his own will.

"It may frequently happen that an officer receives an order which through circumstances unknown at the moment of giving it by him who gave it is impossible to execute, or the execution of which would be so difficult or so dangerous that there would be a moral impossibility to conform to it. In a case of this nature Major-General Wellesley would be very far from wishing to prevent detached officers from acting freely.

"But Captain —— was not in that situation; he had and has had no private information which the officer who had given him his orders did not also have; and then it was his duty to obey."

ARTHUR WELLESLEY,
(DEPUIS DUC DE WELLINGTON).

Jourdan's army having forced the passage of the Lahn (July 7, 1796,) the first intention of Wartensleben, who commanded the Austrian corps left before it [the Lahn] by the Archduke Charles, had been to fall back behind the Widda, because the French, having forced the garrison of Hamburg to fall back upon Usingen, were already threatening his line of retreat. But the 9th of July, having received a dispatch in which the Archduke wrote to him to withdraw from the environs of Friedburg, only after having tried the fortune of arms, he changed his design, and resolved to attack Jourdan that same day.

However, Wartensleben, in his position at the time, should not have attempted an attack. He could in fact direct it only against the center of the French army, since in moving his left he left Jourdan at Hamburg on his rear, and in advancing by his right he abandoned his line of retreat upon Frankfort.

In spite of these dangers he had the temerity to attack, and in what a situation! With forces inferior in number, in a position in which his wings, deprived of support and threatened with being constantly outflanked, had no reserve.

In vain will it be said that the order which the Archduke Charles had sent him was the ground of his resolution. Wartensleben had the right not to execute it; the Archduke Charles, then near Pforzheim, did not know his situation when he gave him the order.

A general-in-chief who indicates to subordinates, detached afar, their lines of operations and the strategic points of their defensive positions, has performed his duties. One can not expect from him precise and detailed orders when their execution depends not only on the circumstances of the moment but also on the actual position of the troops.

L' ARCHIDUC CHARLES.

The board declare as their judgment: "It would have been wiser for Porter to have delayed the attempt to move until 4 o'clock."

As for the alleged disobedience of orders of subsequent date, there was no disobedience, not even a deviation of them, by Porter. There was, on the contrary, prompt execution of every order.

The other orders which General Porter has been charged with disobeying are what is known as the joint order, governing the action of General McDowell and General Porter, and the 4.30 order, which was received by Porter at 6.30 p. m. I read the joint order:

HEADQUARTERS ARMY OF VIRGINIA, Centreville, August 29, 1862.

GENERALS MCDOWELL AND PORTER: You will please move forward with your joint commands toward Gainesville. I sent General Porter written orders to that effect an hour and a half ago. Heintzelman, Sigel, and Reno are moving on the Warrenton turnpike, and must now be not far from Gainesville. I desire that as soon as communication is established between this force and your own the whole command shall halt. It may be necessary to fall back behind Bull Run, at Centreville, to-night. I presume it will be so on account of our supplies. I have sent no orders of any description to Ricketts, and none to interfere in any way with the movements of McDowell's troops, except what I sent by his aid-de-camp last night, which were to hold his position on the Warrenton pike until the troops from here should fall upon the enemy's flank and rear. I do not even know Ricketts's position, as I have not been able to find out where General McDowell was until a late hour this morning. General McDowell will take immediate steps to communicate with General Ricketts, and instruct him to rejoin the other divisions of his corps as soon as practicable. If any considerable advantages are to be gained by departing from this order it will not be strictly carried out. One thing must be had in view, that the troops must occupy a position from which they can reach Bull Run to-night or by morning. The indications are that the whole force of the enemy is moving in this direction at a pace that will bring them here by to-morrow night or next day. My own headquarters will be for the present with Heintzelman's corps or at this place.

JOHN POPE,
Major-General, Commanding.

The joint order placed Porter under the command of General McDowell until such time as the latter should relinquish the same. Porter had marched in the direction that he was ordered, to Gainesville; but, arriving at Dawkin's Branch, the head of his column struck the enemy. McDowell, arriving on the field at this time, said to Porter, "You are too far out here to fight a battle; put your men in here," or words to that effect. It was the general expectation in the army that when a battle was to be fought, after the concentration of the different corps, it would be fought behind Bull Run. The joint order distinctly contemplated this, as it used the language: "It may be necessary to fall back upon Bull Run at Centreville to-night; I presume it will be so on account of our supplies;" and further on is more positive: "One thing must be held in view, that the troops must occupy a position from which they can reach Bull Run to-night or by morning; the indication is that the whole force of the enemy is moving in this direction at a pace which will bring them here to-morrow night or the next day."

Now, the facts are, as proven conclusively before the board, and as Porter knew then from information received through his scouts and through a dispatch from General Buford, that Longstreet's whole corps were then in front of his position. McDowell, on saying that "you are too far out; put your men in here," having a knowledge of the situation of affairs as reported by Buford in the front, took his command and marched to the right and rear to make a connection with the right wing of the army, leaving Porter with his corps of ten thousand men to act on his own responsibility. Porter made all the necessary dispositions to hold that part of the field and to retain whatever forces were in front of him. What is known as the 4.30 order was received by Porter at 6.30 p. m. or after. I read the order:

HEADQUARTERS IN THE FIELD, August 29—4.30 p. m.

MAJOR-GENERAL PORTER: Your line of march brings you in on the enemy's right flank. I desire you to push forward into action at once on the enemy's flank, and, if possible, on his rear, keeping your right in communication with General Reynolds. The enemy is massed in the woods in front of us, but can be shelled out as soon as you engage their flank. Keep heavy reserves and use your batteries, keeping well closed to your right all the time. In case you are obliged to fall back, do so to your right and rear, so as to keep you in close communication with the right wing.

JOHN POPE,
Major-General Commanding.

Now, no one will read the history of this case without becoming imbued with the idea that General Pope's whole campaign up to this time was being made against Jackson, on the supposition that he was not receiving any re-enforcements and that the powerful corps of General Longstreet would not reach him until, as the joint order stated, the night of the 30th, when in reality Longstreet was then deployed in line in front of Porter at 11 a. m. on the 29th. The 4.30 order, just read, is positive in its character, and impossible to be executed, as it is an instruction to attack the enemy's flank, meaning thereby the flank of Jackson, which was three miles away, with Longstreet's twenty-five thousand men between; but notwithstanding this fact was apparent to General Porter, the order was of such a character that, while he saw the mistake being made by the commander-in-chief, he did not hesitate to give the necessary instructions to have it carried out. Before this was accomplished darkness intervened and the order was suspended, as attacking at that time of night would have done no good, and Porter would in all probability have sacrificed his corps, and with it the army; for, as the advisory board has said, Porter by his action on that day saved the army. The accusers of General Porter lay great stress on the charge that, the army being engaged in a terrific fight with Jackson on that day, he should have marched to the sound of the enemy's guns.

Now, sir, there were few men in the Army at that day that had marched to the sound of the enemy's guns more bravely or more successfully than Fitz-John Porter. No one had ever charged him with being a laggard in that direction, for a more gallant soldier never commanded troops; for he was a soldier not alone in name, but in reality; he was a man that had the good of the Army at heart; a man who looked beyond the mere flash of temporary notoriety; a student of military science; a man that devoted all his time to perfecting himself in his profession; a man to whom the science of war was above and beyond everything, excepting only his duty to his country and his God. Any tyro in war finding himself temporarily in command of men might obtain a little cheap éclat by making attacks which could not succeed and by carrying out instructions issued on an erroneous basis, which were sure to end in destruction; but it required a full-grown man to assume the responsibility, which he had a right to do, before carrying out orders issued under the circumstances that I have stated, of reporting back the actual condition of affairs to his commanding officer. This Porter did in each instance. It has been charged that the 4.30 order was received by Porter at an earlier period than the time named, 6.30 p. m. It has been proved conclusively to the mind of any fair man that such was not the case, and one evidence of this was a dispatch received by McDowell from Porter dated at the latter's headquarters at 6 p. m., which gives no evidence of the 4.30 order having been received. Pope, on the right, was fighting Jackson; Porter, on the left, was holding Longstreet, which was the greatest possible relief that he could have given to Pope. The latter's report that the army was engaged in a terrific battle on that day has not been borne out by the facts in the case. Pope, supposing that he had Jackson with twenty thousand men isolated from supports, had fully made up his mind that he was going to capture the whole of Jackson's corps, while the latter, securely posted in an impregnable position, received the desultory attacks of Pope without apparent inconvenience or any intention of retiring. These attacks were made by isolated brigades, particularly of Hooker's and Kearny's divisions, and while they were gallant actions, made by troops without any superiors in the Army, they never amounted to the dignity of a battle, as we of the Army of the Potomac were accustomed to behold. On the night of the 29th General Porter received the following order, which he promptly obeyed, reporting to the major-general commanding on the right of the line:

HEADQUARTERS ARMY OF VIRGINIA,
IN THE FIELD NEAR BULL RUN,
August 29, 1862—8.50 p. m.

GENERAL: Immediately upon receipt of this order, the precise hour of receiving which you will acknowledge, you will march your command to the field of battle of to-day and report to me in person for orders. You are to understand that you are expected to comply strictly with this order, and to be present on the field within three hours after its reception, or after daybreak to-morrow morning.

JOHN POPE,
Major-General Commanding.

Maj. Gen. F. J. PORTER.
[Received August 30—3.30 a. m.]

At first sight it would appear that in this prompt and unhesitating movement, under this order, General Porter committed a grave fault. He was already on the field of battle confronting the enemy in force, and holding a position of vital importance to the security of Pope's army; while the latter appeared, from the order, to be wholly in the dark respecting these all-important facts. It is true the order was most positive, imperative, and also distrustful in its terms. But those very terms served to show only the more forcibly that the order was based upon a total misapprehension of the essential facts, without which misapprehension it would not seem possible that such an order could have been issued. The well-established military rule is that such an order must never be obeyed until the commander who gave it has been informed of his error and given an opportunity to correct it; but upon close examination, the opposite view of Porter's conduct under this order appears to be the just one.

Porter had repeatedly reported to McDowell the presence of the enemy in large force in his front. Presumably these reports had gone to Pope, as one of them had in fact. Porter had also sent an aid-de-camp with a written message to Pope about 4 p. m., and had sent a written reply to the 4.30 p. m. order after 6.30 p. m. These last two dispatches have not been preserved by General Pope, and hence their contents are not known to us; but we are bound to presume that they reported the situation as Porter then knew it and as he had frequently reported it to McDowell, and the last of these dispatches, in reply to the 4.30 p. m. order, was later than the latest of those in which Porter had spoken of any intention to fall back. Hence, Porter had already given to his superior all the information which it was possible for him to give, and nothing remained for him but to obey the order. This movement of Porter's corps on the morning of the 30th was the beginning of the unfortunate operation of that day. This corps, which had been protecting the left flank of Pope's army, was withdrawn from its important position, leaving the left wing and flank exposed to attack by greatly superior force of the enemy, brought to the center of the field, and then ordered "in pursuit of the enemy."

The following order was issued by General Pope on the morning of August 30:

HEADQUARTERS NEAR GROVETON, August 30, 1862—12 m.

The following forces will be immediately thrown forward in pursuit of the enemy and press him vigorously during the whole day. Major-General McDowell is assigned to the command of the pursuit; Major-General Porter's corps will push forward on the Warrenton turnpike, followed by the divisions of Brigadier-Generals King and Reynolds. The division of Brigadier-General Ricketts will pursue the Hay Market road, followed by the corps of Major-General Heintzelman. The necessary cavalry will be assigned to these columns by Major-General McDowell, to whom regular and frequent reports will be made. The general headquarters will be somewhere on the Warrenton turnpike.

By command of Major-General Pope:

GEO. D. RUGGLES,
Colonel and Chief of Staff.

HEADQUARTERS THIRD CORPS, ARMY OF VIRGINIA,
August 30, 1862.

Major-General McDowell, being charged with the advanced forces ordered to pursue the enemy, directs me to inform you that your corps will be followed immediately by King's division, supported by Reynolds. Heintzelman, with his corps, preceded by Ricketts's division, will move on your right, on the road from Sudley Springs to Hay Market. He is instructed to throw out skirmishers to the left, which is desirable you should join with your right. General McDowell's headquarters will be at the head of Reynolds's division, on the Warrentown road. Organize a strong advance to precede your command, and push on rapidly in pursuit of the enemy until you come in contact with him. Report frequently. Bayard's brigade will be ordered to report to you; push it well to the left as you advance.

Very respectfully, your obedient servant,

ED. SCHRIVER,
Colonel and Chief of Staff.

Major-General PORTER,
Commanding, &c.

This order shows that General Pope still believes there is nothing in his front but Jackson and that Jackson is retreating, and he is about to consummate his favorite process of bagging the crowd, as he stated in his order to General Kearny on the morning of the 27th. General Porter, as the order contemplates, took part in this pursuit, but he did not have to march very far before he met the enemy in full force; in fact, the united confederate army was there then, as it had been for nearly twenty-four hours. Porter attacked with his accustomed gallantry, and his losses on that field bore testimony to the discipline of his corps and the devotion of its officers and men. Standing in full view of this attack (my own command being in reserve at that time, having been actively engaged the day before) I unhesitatingly say that the fight of Porter was one of the most imposing sights of the war. His corps was made up of some of our best troops, and they had implicit confidence in their commander. The result was defeat. It was not unexpected. General Pope had joined the Army of Virginia after some slight successes in the West, but he did not have the confidence of his command, and while possessing an abundance of troops, he failed in the first requisite of a commanding officer, the ability to concentrate his forces in the presence of the enemy. The persistent manner in which he, notwithstanding information to the contrary; notwithstanding the fact that Ricketts's division was driven away from Thoroughfare Gap by Longstreet, held on to the idea that he was fighting an isolated corps of the confederate army; and that alone showed the want of capacity of the man to take in the whole situation.

Porter continued in command of his corps and was assigned to the defenses of Washington, but afterward marched with his corps and took part in the victorious battle of Antietam. Nothing was said to him about disobedience of orders. Pope did not express any dissatisfaction to him in their personal conversation, and Porter was perfectly ignorant of his having done anything or omitting to do anything under which he could be tried by court-martial. He had acted under the rules of war, had exercised his judgment as a detached commander, and what he had done he considered was for the best and for the protection of the Army. The board of distinguished officers who examined into his case not alone approved of his action, but said to the President and to the country: "Porter's faithful, subordinate, and intelligent conduct that afternoon saved the Union army from the defeat which would otherwise have resulted that day from the enemy's more speedy concentration." McClellan was reinstated in his command, which relieved General Pope. A great blunder had been committed; the Union armies had been defeated almost within sight of the capital, although there were men enough to have withstood the shock of twice the confederate force if properly handled. Fears for the safety of Washington at that time were uppermost in the minds of the officials that controlled the action of the armies, and much was lost to the country by the fact that no one man had the authority, as was afterwards given to General Grant, to concentrate troops at a given point.

When McClellan made his peninsular campaign his plans were made on the basis of having McDowell's command; but he was deprived of that to protect the front of Washington, which rendered his campaign a failure. This, though, did not prevent the confederate General Jackson, who had gone up the valley of Virginia, from coming back and attacking McClellan's right in front of Richmond, under Fitz-John Porter, at Gaines's Mill, without any assistance being received by the Army of the Potomac from the troops in front of Washington, which General Jackson had been operating against, and which allowed him to pass, unmolested and unknown, to the aid of General Lee in front of Richmond. The country was tired, grew restive under repeated disasters, which the average man knew to have been brought about, not by the individual or the collective superiority of the Southern army, but by mismanagement at our own capital. Porter marched to Antietam in the proud consciousness of having done his duty, and continued to do it on that field. Mr. Lincoln, personally, said to him that the dispatches he had sent to General Burnside in relation to the Pope campaign were the first true insight that he had into the affairs of that army, and thanked him for them. Much has been said about these dispatches. It has been argued on the floor of this Senate that the animus of these dispatches proved conclusively Porter's guilt. Now, the facts are that Porter's relations with Burnside were of the closest personal nature; and on leaving Burnside, a few days previous, on his way to join Pope, Porter promised to send him such dispatches as would give him the actual condition of affairs in that army. This he did. They do not display any great respect for the ability of the commanding officer of the army, and had I received them I would have treated them as confidential messages, which they were intended to be.

As I have remarked, there was great discontent in the North at the condition of affairs in the Army. The duplication of Bull Run was more than the people could bear; the press thundered forth its anathemas on the management that would result in such disaster. General Pope was called freely to account by the Northern papers, as was also General McDowell, whom the press said ought to have selected, from his previous experience, another field to fight on. A victim was necessary to propitiate the public sentiment of the North, and, whether by concert of action or otherwise, that victim was designated by General Pope, and some of the authorities were not slow to take advantage of the charges preferred.

Why should these charges have been preferred at this time? Why should General Pope take advantage of the services of this officer on the 30th of August and make his main fight with his corps if he was satisfied that he had willfully disobeyed his orders? Why not do as other commanding generals have done in the late war—relieve an officer immediately? Why was Porter allowed to take command of the defenses of Washington and to march with his corps to the battle of Antietam? Simply, Mr. President, because these charges of disobedience, of willful disobedience, were not thought of at all. The people of the North, through the press, called on the Government and the commanding officer of the Army of Northern Virginia to account for the defeat of Manassas. Porter was sacrificed; not for any guilt of his, not that he had disobeyed orders, not that he was not a gallant soldier and one of the most successful; but he was selected by his commanding general to propitiate, as I say, the public sentiment of the North by punishing somebody for mismanagement and relieving himself from the charge.

Officers have been punished and degraded for the willful or stupid disobedience of orders given by a superior fully informed of all the circumstances of the case, but it has been reserved for our country to punish a general officer on the accusation of failing to obey an order given in total misconception of the strength and position of the enemy, and which, had it been received in season and executed, must have resulted in disaster. There is no precedent covering such a case, because among nations accustomed to war on a large scale it is held as an axiom that when a subordinate receives an order issued under a total misconception of the real condition of affairs, and when he discovers that, for reasons unknown to his commander, the execution of the order would result in needless disaster or really overthrow instead of furthering the plans of the general-in-chief, it is his duty to assume the responsibility of at least delaying its execution until he can inform his superiors of the real state of affairs.

The subordinate in such a case is responsible for the correctness of his facts and judgment. Cases must and do occur when the general-in-chief, with a full knowledge of the facts, finds it necessary to sacrifice a part of the army to insure the safety of the remainder, or to gain some great advantage commensurate with the cost, and in such a case the subordinate has only to obey; but this is not to be confounded with the instances in which the superior has given his orders on information so erroneous as to change the whole state of the case and justify the subordinate in feeling certain that the orders would not have been given were the real facts known.

The rules of common sense apply in war quite as well as in business life. In the old days when supercargoes were employed, if one of them upon arriving at a distant port found that the state of the market differed entirely from the anticipations of his employer, when his instructions were framed, he would not have been forgiven if by a strict adherence to his orders he ruined his principal.

He who contests that under the circumstances cited the commander of a detached body has no right to exercise his judgment, nay, more, that it is not his duty to do so, subject to a verification of his data, is ignorant of history and of war, and wholly deficient in sound judgment.

None of the great commanders of the world have ever held such a theory; none of them would have forgiven a subordinate for failing to accommodate himself to the unexpected.

One of the greatest glories of the modern Prussian army is the fact that in the Bohemian campaign of 1866 the isolated corps commanders at once accommodated themselves to circumstances and knew how to depart from the letter in order to conform to the spirit of their instructions.

But General Porter does not come under the cases supposed; the 4.30 order was not received until nearly dark; preparations were instantly made to execute it, but darkness interfered and put an end to the possibility of attack.

In regard to the night march, it is sufficient to say that the evidence proves that literal obedience would have resulted in completely wearing out the almost fatigued men without reaching their destination any sooner than they actually did in a comparatively good condition, and that no need for their services existed when they did arrive. No campaign ever occurred without numerous instances of this kind, and no sensible general would be at all likely to find fault with a subordinate who used his judgment in such a matter with results similar to those in this case, i. e., bringing his command to the required post in condition for action and in the shortest practicable time. Great generals are not prone to make scapegoats for their own faults, and do not often hastily punish subordinates whose occasional faults are outbalanced by high qualities. Instances may be recalled during the Spanish campaign of Wellington when his generals violated orders with no other excuse than their own rashness, and when he knew the state of affairs better than they, and when they were not punished, not even removed from their commands.

Crawford, commanding the light division at the affair of the Coa, July 24, 1810, engaged the enemy against orders and was badly beaten; Picta was ordered to support him and would not. Again, in the affair of the Cirag, September 25, 1810, Crawford was on the point of repeating his conduct on the Coa when Wellington came up and withdrew his division. Not long after he was surprised at Alberque, yet he continued in command of his division through Buraco and all the battles that occurred, until he was killed at the assault of Ciudad Rodrigo, January 19, 1812. At Toulouse the duke, well knowing Picta's disposition, gave him both verbal and written orders, which he violated by attacking, was completely repulsed, lost four hundred men, and jeopardized the battle; yet he remained in command until killed at the head of his division at Waterloo. In the battle of Woerth one of the Prussian corps, the fourth, I think, was ordered to retire from the battle, but finding his neighbors heavily engaged, its commander disobeyed his orders and continued the attack. Grouchy's case after Ligny is certainly in point as showing the folly of a literal adhesion to orders when circumstances have changed.

But we need not go beyond this campaign in Northern Virginia to show the necessity of the exercise of judgment and of the discretion existing in a corps commander when separated from his commanding general, even to the extent of obeying or disobeying orders which he knows have been issued under a mistake as to the situation existing at the time of the receipt of orders. The principle is illustrated in every way, within a few days of each other, in August, 1862, by and under the commander of this army, General Pope.

General Banks claims that he received at Cedar Mountain a verbal order to attack, which was supplemented by a taunt from General Pope's inspector-general in substance that "there was to be no backing out this time." He did attack, in literal obedience, and suffered a disaster, in sight of the main force of the army, at a halt, watching the contest, whereas if he had bided an attack victory would have crowned his efforts.

Again, General Pope, in literal obedience to General Halleck's orders, held on to the Rappahannock two days longer than he should have done, knowing as he did, as is shown by his dispatch of 10 a. m., August 27, and by other evidences, that the main body of the enemy had been moving to his right, and was not in his front. He then disregarded General Halleck's orders, and, properly exercising his own judgment, moved to his rear, though, unfortunately, too late to prevent disaster. General Halleck, over thirty miles distant, in Washington, has been censured for giving the orders; General Pope has been blamed for litterally "sticking to the Rappahannock, with the purpose of fighting like the devil," but no one has found fault with him for finally exercising his judgment and moving to his rear.

And again, General McDowell, in the exercise of his discretion, being several miles from General Pope, on August 28 dispatched General Ricketts to Thoroughfare Gap to hold in check Longstreet's forces, then known to General McDowell, but not to Pope, to be coming through that gap, this in deviation of General Pope's orders to march his forces on Manassas. General McDowell has the approval for his shining act of every one of experience save General Pope, who condemns him.

Again, in the afternoon of August 26 General McDowell received General Pope's orders in quick succession to march to Gum Springs and to Centreville, and complied literally, against his judgment, with the rash orders, and hastily pressed to "Manassas to confer with General Pope," who he saw "was making mistakes as to distances and places, but who wanted his (McDowell's) views." This strict compliance with orders and this going to Manassas separated for a night McDowell from his command, which in the mean time moved from between Jackson and Longstreet, and permitted the latter, unopposed, to join the former at an early hour on the next morning.

On the afternoon of the 29th of August General Hooker was ordered to attack, and with General Grover's brigade did attack, and attacked with an energy and success that no command on that day attacked. Kearny was ordered to attack at the same time in support of Hooker, but for reasons satisfactory to him did not do so.

Once more: on the 30th of August General Pope ordered General Porter "to pursue the enemy in his retreat and push him vigorously all the day." General Porter knew that the enemy was not retreating, but well posted in his front, with forces increased since the 29th. He remonstrated against the order and stated the facts, but the order was at once renewed on the ground. It was obeyed, and defeat and disaster ensued.

These are instances under the rules of war in which strict obedience to the letter of orders issued at a distance led to disaster. Action under the spirit of an order by McDowell to prevent Longstreet passing through Thoroughfare Gap and attacking our forces in the rear, which was praiseworthy, met with disapproval from his commander.

Delay in execution of orders given by the commander present on the field caused no rebuke. Prompt obedience, after protest, led to disaster and to loss of over two thousand men in a very short time, and was charged in this case to have been slow, neither vigorous nor persistent, and when the commander was arraigned under this charge he was not permitted to refute it.

I think no further examples need be given to show that discretion in the execution of certain orders has been exercised and approved in our own wars, while it has become a maxim in other wars.

In the case of the 4.30 order there was no disobedience. It was not received till near dark; every effort was made to execute it, but night put an end to all movements. The following dispatch shows it could not have been received before 6 o'clock:

No. 38*b*.

GENERAL MCDOWELL: Failed in getting Morell over to you. After wandering about the woods for a time I withdrew him, and while doing so artillery opened upon us. My scouts could not get through. Each one found the enemy between us, and I believe some have been captured. Infantry are also in front. I am trying to get a battery, but have not succeeded as yet. From the masses of dust on our left, and from reports of scouts, I think the enemy are moving largely in that way. Please communicate the way this messenger came. I have no cavalry or messengers now. Please let me know your designs, whether you retire or not. I can not get water and am out of provisions. Have lost a few men from infantry firing.

F. J. PORTER,
Major-General Volunteers.

AUGUST 29—6 p. m.

And the following shows that Porter could not have had it before dark as at that time the last of Ricketts's division passed Porter. (See Tower's testimony.) It shows that at that time he did not know that Pope was not at Centreville.

No. 38*c*.

GENERAL MORELL: Send down some energetic men to General Pope at Centreville. Get hold of Colonel Beckwith and get some rations. Bring beef up to kill, we have nothing else, and get enough to last two or three days. Ricketts has gone up; also King.

F. J. PORTER, Major-General.

The board closes this report with the following recommendation, now before us, to aid in executing this act of justice:

Having thus given the reasons for our conclusions, we have the honor to report, in accordance with the President's order, that, in our opinion, justice requires at his hands such action as may be necessary to annul and set aside the findings and sentence of the court-martial in the case of Major-General Fitz-John Porter, and to restore him to the positions of which that sentence deprived him; such restoration to take effect from the date of his dismissal from the service.

Mr. President, we have before us the judgment and recommendation of a board of officers whose members we respect. Officers distinguished in the service of their country, who had held high commands in the field, were selected for this special duty because of their great ability, and of whom the general-in-chief of the Army stated that he should accept the report of this high court of honor as final in the case.

General Porter, a son of New England, was a graduate of high standing from the West Point Military Academy. Within three years we find him brevetted a captain and major for gallant and distinguished services in the war with Mexico. Called to West Point as an instructor, we see him through a period of six years holding several positions, each successive one an advancement, by selection, and leaving upon the grounds and in the buildings of that institution existing evidences of intelligent and useful labor. As General Persifor F. Smith's assistant adjutant-general in the Kansas troubles and chief of staff to General Albert S. Johnston during the memorable troubles in Utah, he won by intelligent and efficient services the commendation of General Scott; and while on duty at the Headquarters of the Army he so won the confidence and esteem of the Administration and general-in-chief as to be intrusted with the inspection of Charleston Harbor in 1860, and the adoption of his recommendations for its security; also the bringing from Texas troops for the security of the forts in the Gulf of Mexico. He was selected to protect the railroads and secure through Baltimore open communication between Washington and the Northern States.

His conduct at Harrisburg, where, by the assumption of the authority of the Secretary of War, as General Frank Blair has said, "he saved Missouri to the Union," together with his services as chief of staff to General Patterson, secured the lasting confidence of Secretary Cameron and the unsolicited reward of colonel in the regular Army and brigadier-general of volunteers and the command of a division of the Army in the defenses of Washington. Commanding a division, and subsequently the Fifth Army Corps, organized for him in recognition of services, he was appointed director of the siege of Yorktown, and fought the battles of New Bridge, Hanover Court House, Mechanicsville or Beaver Dam, Gaines's Mill, Turkey Bridge, and Malvern. For recognition of these services he received the warm commendation of his commanding general and the promotion, unsolicited, of major-general of volunteers and the honor of brigadier-general of the Army.

Upon the abandonment of the James River by the Army of the Potomac General Porter was ordered to halt at Williamsburg for the army to pass through his forces, when they would become the rear guard and the last to leave the Peninsula. Becoming possessed of reliable evidence that General Lee, leaving the Army of the Potomac unmolested in its retreat, was pushing his forces north to crush General Pope before he could, by any possibility, be re-enforced by the Army of the Potomac, General Porter telegraphed the facts to General Halleck at Washington and to General McClellan on the James River, adding to the latter that the next morning (August 17) he should, unless forbidden, push to Fort Monroe and embark as rapidly as possible to join General Pope. He thus was the first to leave Fort Monroe, and part of his corps—the Pennsylvania Reserves—hastened off by his help only, was the first to give General Pope assistance. By this prompt decision and action he expedited the embarkation of the whole army, and joined General Pope at least four days earlier than if he had conformed to orders.

From Aquia Creek, before joining at Falmouth the parts of his command which had preceded him, he hastened, by brigades and division, his forces to protect the flank of General Pope's army and give him assistance. On the 26th of August, without instructions—in fact, in deviation of them, his orders not conforming to existing circumstances—he reported by letter to General Pope, and on the 27th in person with his whole command.

Passing Bealeton at 9 a. m. on the 27th, General Porter received orders to change the direction of his march from toward Warrenton to Warrenton Junction, the enemy, as General Pope said, having cut his line of communication with Washington, and making it necessary to move his forces to the rear. At 10 o'clock Porter dispatched from Warrenton Junction to General Burnside the condition of affairs as narrated by General Pope, having since 9 o'clock done the same from Bealeton and traveled ten miles and reported to Pope. His whole command joined General Pope that day between 1.30 and 7 p. m., after marching sixteen to twenty miles on a hot summer day, almost without food and water, and being much fatigued.

It has been alleged that General Porter had such an unkind feeling toward General Pope and entertained such a poor opinion of his management of the campaign as to prevent him from properly performing his duty. For evidence his accusers and prosecutors, regardless of the main facts, point to a few expressions of amusing badinage in his dispatches to General Burnside.

The feeling with which General Porter entered upon that campaign is made plain in the incidents just narrated, and utterly destroys the belief that an officer with so meritorious a record should risk sacrificing his reputation and all his hopes for the future by committing such crimes as he was charged with for the paltry purpose of injuring General Pope

The purity of Porter's motives are here made manifest in his earnest efforts to help Pope and to save that Army of Northern Virginia from unnecessary disaster. Additional evidence of those earnest efforts is found in the reputed obnoxious dispatches and in other dispatches written on the field of action, which were in possession of the Government but were not produced or exhibited before the court-martial. Much of it is after-discovered evidence, which aided to secure the commendatory judgment of his peers—the advisory board.

A careful study of Porter's acts after joining Pope will show that he was governed by proper motives, the good of the service, the safety and success of our Army; or, as the advisory board has expressed it, "his conduct was obedient, subordinate, faithful, and judicious; it was not subject to criticism, much less deserving of censure or condemnation."

Mr. President, I am interested in this case of Fitz-John Porter, because I served in the Army of the Potomac during the entire period he was connected with it from its formation, and because I know the man and his reputation as a soldier. I am interested for the honor and integrity and disipline of our Army. I am interested for the honor of our Government and the sense of justice of our people, to see that no stain shall rest upon them by the failure of their representatives to right a wrong recognized by our Government and demanded by our countrymen through an almost united public press.

The Army is of our creation, and exists by the will of Congress. It becomes our duty to watch its government and to remedy its errors.

Mr. President, General Porter's case is mine; it is yours; it is that of Congress; it is that of every just and honorable man in the nation. I now submit it for the action of the Senate, confident that our countrymen will be grateful to every one who helps to set his case aright.

Mr. WILSON. Mr. President, it is not my purpose to engage in a discussion of the controverted questions of fact which cluster around this case. I do not regard them as in any proper sense material to its right solution. Doubtless they may be interesting data upon which to found speculations relative to what might or might not have happened had Fitz-John Porter obeyed the orders given to him by General Pope. Curious theories might be evolved from such speculations; but they could not rightly be held of slightest importance in the solution of the real question upon which we are to express our judgment, or of sustaining a legitimate relation to the true issue which we are to determine.

The gravity of the case we have before us can not be dissipated by guessing. We have a real presence to deal with; and it is one which can be seen, and felt, and demonstrated. Such a case can not be resolved by guessing, and indulgence therein is forceless and futile. Hence when it is said that obedience of orders by Fitz-John Porter would have induced greater disaster than resuted from his disobedience, we are treated to a guess which signifies nothing, so far as the real question presented by this case is concerned. As he did not attempt to obey, the guess is void of substantial support. No man can tell what would have been the result of obedience. Had Porter obeyed his orders that fact alone might have changed the entire mass of data upon which the guess of a more disastrous result rests. It is not susceptible of proof that this might or might not have been so; for, as he did not obey, the facts which alone could supply the requisite proof do not exist. Hence it results that the statement which assumes that Porter's disobedience of orders prevented the happening of a greater disaster than did occur is simply a repetition of the guess, notwithstanding its change of form. Put it in either form, and the facts necessary to its support are absent, and for the very good reason that they do not exist. Argument can not supply the office of the absent facts, for argument in such a case is impotent. It can not induce a reliable result, because it has not the requisite data on which to act.

We do know that there was disobedience and disaster. Whether or not the latter is attributable to the former we may not be able to demonstrate, for we can not repeat the conditions and apply to them the factor of obedience. We can guess, but we can not prove. On the other hand, it may not be susceptible of proof that a greater disaster was not averted by the disobedience of Porter. Hence results, in greater or less degree, the sharp conflict of opinion which has run through the lines of this case from its beginning, relative to what might or might not have happened if obedience had excluded disobedience from consideration. This very conflict of opinion, and the uncertainty which surrounds it, patent as it is to every mind, not confined to this body but pervading the entire country, is demonstration absolute that this case must be resolved on other and more substantial grounds than guesses as to what result would have transpired had Fitz-John Porter obeyed the orders given to him by General Pope.

Mr. President, it too often happens that matters of great public concern fail of that conservative treatment which always should be accorded them because of the intruding presence of more active personal interests and private aims. The present case is a striking illustration of the truth of this statement. It involves a question of great public interest, and one of most serious import to the effectiveness of our military establishment. Rarely, if ever before, in the entire line of our history has a graver question of military law come before Congress for its consideration. It has been a prominent presence in Congressional discussion for several years. At no time has its real nature been other than that of a public question. It is of that character to-day in spite of the involvement of personal interests which has been forced upon it, and not even the passage of the present bill can strip it of that character. For by our action we will either maintain or overthrow the most necessary and forceful principle of military law, and promote or embarrass the public welfare in so far as it may, in the years of the future, be affected by the effectiveness or inefficiency of the discipline of our Army. The principle with which we are now dealing is not made a line or shade different because of the personal interests of Fitz-John Porter in the result of our action than it would be if our efforts were exclusively directed to the enactment of an article of war declaring it a duty of all inferior officers to obey the lawful commands of their superiors.

No argument that we can make, no theory which we may advance, no humanitarian declarafion it may be our pleasure to proclaim, no complaints to which we may give ear, can change or disguise the fact that in this case, and here in this Senate Chamber, the duty of a military officer to obey the lawful commands of his superior and the alleged right to exercise a discretion in that regard stand confronting each other. An affirmance of the duty to obey will defeat this bill. A declaration of the right to exercise a discretion in that regard will pass the bill. The former means effective military law and discipline, and a forceful army. The latter means weakness, demoralization, and disaster. We must make our choice between these two results; and this most serious duty imposes a higher obligation than can spring from any kindly personal impulse we may feel moving upon us to relieve from an unpleasant predicament the individual involved therein.

Had Fitz-John Porter obeyed the lawful commands issued to him by General Pope this case could not have found its way to us, even though dire disaster had come from that obedience. He did not obey, and hence the court-martial, the conviction, and the report and bill which we have now under consideration. It is not claimed that he did obey the lawful commands of his superior; but the doctrine of discretion is advanced as an excuse, if not as a justification, for the failure to obey. And thus we come back to the point when the duty to obey and the discretion to disobey confront each other. Turn which way we may we come into the same presence. And this is why I said at the beginning of my remarks, that it is not my purpose to engage in a discussion of the controverted questions of fact which cluster around this case. Orders were issued. They were not obeyed. These are not controverted facts. No one can dispute them. They are sufficient for my purpose in what I may yet have to say.

Mr. President, war is not a merciful employment. The lines of military law are not written in mercy. A contest of arms means death. In times of war armies are organized to kill and be killed. Many of our articles of war include death as a penalty for military offenses, and these grim articles stand whether war or peace be present. The ninth article of war reads as follows, namely:

> Any officer or soldier who shall strike his superior officer, or draw or lift up a weapon, or offer any violence against him, being in the execution of his office, on any pretense whatsoever, or shall disobey any lawful command of his superior officer, shall suffer death, or such other punishment as shall, according to the nature of his offense, be inflicted upon him by the sentence of a court-martial.

In the lines of this article of war we find the factor of discretion as an element of mercy. It did its office in the case of Fitz-John Porter. It relieved him from the infliction of the penalty of death which might have been applied to him and dismissed him from a service the obligation of whose law he refrained from obeying. But nowhere else in his case does this factor appear. He mistakes its nature and its office when he presents it here as a justification of his disobedience of the lawful commands of his superior officer and of his violation of the ninth article of war.

That article of war was in force on the 27th day of August, 1862. On that day Maj. Gen. John Pope was commanding the Army of Virginia. Maj. Gen. Fitz-John Porter was commanding a corps in that army. Pope was the superior officer; Porter was one of his subordinate officers. Whatever lawful order the latter received from the former it was his duty to obey, and to do it in manner and spirit prescribed by the Army Regulations then in force, and which declared that:

> All inferiors are required to obey strictly and to execute with alacrity and good faith the lawful orders of the superiors appointed over them.

On the day mentioned General Pope issued and caused to be delivered to General Porter the following order, namely:

> HEADQUARTERS ARMY OF VIRGINIA,
> Bristoe Station, August 27, 1862—6.30 p. m.
> GENERAL: The major-general commanding directs that you start at 1 o'clock to-night and come forward with your whole corps, or such part of it as is with you, so as to be here by daylight to-morrow morning. Hooker has had a very severe action with the enemy, with a loss of about three hundred killed and wounded. The enemy has been driven back, but is retiring along the railroad. We must drive him from Manassas, and clear the country between that place and Gainesville, where McDowell is. If Morell has not joined you, send word to him to push forward immediately; also send word to Banks to hurry forward with all speed to take your place at Warrenton Junction. It is necessary, on all accounts, that you should be here by daylight. I send an officer with this dispatch, who will conduct you to this place. Be sure to send word to Banks, who is on the road from Fayetteville, probably in the direction of Bealeton. Say to Banks, also, that he had best run back the railroad trains to this side of Cedar Run. If he is not with you, write him to that effect.
> GEORGE D. RUGGLES,
> Colonel and Chief of Staff.
> Maj. Gen. F. J. PORTER,
> Warrenton Junction.
> P. S.—If Banks is not at Warrenton Junction, leave a regiment of infantry and two pieces of artillery as a guard till he comes up, with instructions to follow you immediately. If Banks is not at the Junction, instruct Colonel Cleary to run the trains back to Cedar Run, and post a regiment and section of artillery with it.
> By command of Major-General Pope.
> GEORGE D. RUGGLES,
> Colonel and Chief of Staff.

This order was delivered to General Porter by Capt. Drake De Kay, aid-de-camp to General Pope, about half past 9 o'clock p. m. of the day on which it was issued. What duty did the delivery of this order to General Porter devolve on him? Why, in the language of the Army regulation which I have quoted, "to execute it with alacrity and good faith." Did he do this? There is no pretense that he did. He does not claim that he did, and no one presents such claim for him. He did not even attempt to obey it. What did he do? He assumed to exercise his discretion as to whether or not he would obey it; not whether or not he would obey it with "alacrity and good faith," but whether or not he would obey it at all, or even attempt to obey it at all. He was ordered to start at 1 o'clock. He did not move until 4. He was ordered to have his corps at Bristoe Station by daylight of the morning after he received the order. He did not put his command in motion until the hour had arrived when he should have had it at Bristoe Station. It was his duty to execute the order with "alacrity and good faith." He did not obey the command of his superior. This was a crime under the ninth article of war. He knew it was a crime, not merely by that implication which imposes knowledge of the law upon all men subject to its jurisdiction, but also by that affirmative and definite knowledge which came to him by his education as a soldier.

The obligation to obey "with alacrity and good faith" was inexorable, and he knew it. He knew that that obligation excluded discretion, and bound him to use all means within the possible range of his power to respond to it with "alacrity and good faith." He knew that, even though it should become apparent to him that the execution of the order was an impossibility in the time and manner prescribed, it was still his imperative duty to do all he could in the direction of obedience, and while engaged in this to promptly advise his superior of the real conditions surrounding him; and this in order that his superior might, with exact knowledge of the facts, so modify his plans and change his orders as not to endanger the success of his general movement. No one knew this better than did Fitz-John Porter. No one questions his ability as a soldier, nor doubts his knowledge of military law, nor questions his perfect familiarity with the rules of army movements. He knew them all as perfectly as any officer in the Army, and he knew that they each and all excluded discretion from the case in which he was then a present and most forceful factor. He elected to disregard his definite knowledge of law, of rule, of duty, and to assume a discretion which belonged to no one but his superior officer. He knew that to allow such an assumption to obstruct the obligation to obey would put an end to effective military operations. Therefore he practiced willful disobedience, and hence involved elements of greater aggravation than the said article of war required to constitute a crime which might be punished with death. Discretion has no place in military law when an officer or soldier has received a lawful command from his superior. If it were otherwise, there could be no effective military law, no forceful discipline, no harmonious unity working to a single purpose or end because of one supreme authority. This doctrine is as old as military law and as necessary as armies in conflicts of arms. It has now and then been challenged, but never with success in any civil or military tribunal called on to give lawful utterance concerning it.

Long ago the Supreme Court of the United States, in the case of Martin vs. Mott (12 Wheaton, 19), gave so forceful expression to the doctrine that a man must be stupid not to understand it. In that case the court said:

> We are all of opinion that the authority to decide whether the exigency has arisen belongs exclusively to the President, and that his decision is conclusive upon all other persons. We think that construction necessarily results from the nature of the power itself and from the manifest object contemplated by the act of Congress. The power itself is to be exercised upon sudden emergencies, upon great occasions of state, and under circumstances which may be vital to the existence of the Union. A prompt and unhesitating obedience is indispensable to the complete attainment of the object. The service is a military service and the command is of a military nature; and in such cases every delay and every obstacle to an efficient and immediate compliance necessarily tend to jeopard the public interests. While subordinate officers or soldiers are pausing to consider whether they ought to obey or are scrupulously weighing the evidence of the facts upon which the commander-in-chief exercises the right to demand their services the hostile enterprise may be accomplished without the means of resistance. If "the power regulating the militia and of commanding its services in times of insurrection and invasion are (as it has been emphatically said they are) natural incidents to the duties of superintending the common defense and of watching over the internal peace of the confederacy," these powers must be so construed as to the modes of their exercise as not to defeat the great end in view. If a superior officer has a right to contest the orders of the President upon his own doubts as to the exigency having arisen, it must be the right of every inferior officer and soldier; and any act done by any person in furtherance of such orders would subject him to responsibility in a civil suit, in which his defense must finally rest upon his ability to establish the facts by competent proofs. Such a course would be subversive of all discipline and expose the best-disposed officers to the chances of ruinous litigation. Besides, in many instances the evidence upon which the President might decide that there is imminent danger of invasion might be of a nature not constituting strict technical proof, or the disclosure of the evidence might reveal important secrets of state which the public interests, and even safety, might imperiously demand to be kept in concealment.

And in the opinion from which I have quoted the court refers approvingly to the case of Vanderheyden vs. Young (11 Johns. N. Y. Reports, 150), which involved a construction of the same act of Congress—the act of February 28, 1795—drawn in question in the case of Martin vs. Mott. The issue presented the element of discretion in the matter of obeying the command or order of a superior, and the court very emphatically announced that the subordinate must obey and not debate, question, or hesitate; and said:

> To countenance such a construction of the act would be monstrous. Every trial would either subject all the archives of a State to an examination before the court and jury, or the defendant would inevitably be found guilty. No man would dare obey the orders either of the President or his superior officer, lest, peradventure, the President had either abused his authority or misjudged in relation to the occurrence of the fact which authorized him to call forth the militia.
> It is a general and sound principle that whenever the law vests any person with a power to do an act, and constitutes him a judge of the evidence on which the act may be done, and at the same time contemplates that the act is to be carried into effect through the instrumentality of agents, the person thus clothed with power is invested with discretion, and is quoad hoc a judge. His mandates to his legal agents on his declaring the event to have happened will be a protection to those agents, and it is not their duty or business to investigate the facts thus referred to their superior, and to rejudge his determination. In a military point of view the contrary doctrine would be subversive of all discipline; and as it regards the safety and security of the United States and its citizens, the consequences would be deplorable and fatal.

Apply the doctrine of these cases to the one we are now considering, and what must be the result? Why, a demonstration that the court-martial which found Fitz-John Porter guilty of "disobedience of orders under the ninth article of war," and of the specifications based on said charge, could have done no less than it did except by an atrocious violation of duty and an inexcusable disregard of the law applicable to the case.

It does not matter that the cases from which I have quoted related to the duties and actions of the President. In all military affairs the general in command of an army is as supreme over his subordinate officers in regard to his orders and movements and their duties and obligations as would be the President in case he should assume the direction of the operations of the forces in person. The law is the same in either case; and the duty arising thereunder is the same in either case. It is not necessary to argue this proposition, nor does it require skill in military movements and affairs to understand it. It is in effect the breath of life to the body of conquering military operations. It is not difficult of comprehension to either soldier or civilian.

It does not require a study of maps, nor an investigation of plans of battle, nor yet of intricate calculations concerning the chances of success or failure based on such data as the positions and numbers of opposing forces. These may be, and doubtless are, subjects of curious inquiry to the military expert and tactician, but they are of no practical consequence in resolving the principle of law which threads this case through and through. Therefore let us keep to the record in this case, keeping our minds free from all of the extrinsic facts and intruding sentiments with which it has been surrounded. It is important that we should do this, for the effect of our action herein will not spend its force on Fitz-John Porter. We are about to do a thing which will reach beyond him and determine whether the necessarily hard lines of military law shall enforce effectiveness in our Army in the future or give way to the dangerous and demoralizing theories advanced in this case, and which affirm the right of an inferior officer to exercise his own discretion touching the execution of the lawful commands of his superiors. We are to determine by our resolution of this case whether or not that forceful rule of the Army Regulations shall continue to give life and power to our military establishment which says:

> All inferiors are required to obey strictly, and to execute with alacrity and good faith the lawful orders of the superiors appointed over them.

This is a public question and not one which only concerns Fitz-John Porter. Whatsoever answer we shall give to his appeal in this case, that we will give to every officer and soldier in our present and future armies. We can not escape the legitimate and necessary effect of our action by planting ourselves on grounds of personal regard for him or by declaring our love for manifestations of the merciful uses of power. The former has no rightful place in the field of public affairs if it tends, as in this case it does, to jeopard the general welfare. The latter we are estopped from proclaiming by the attitude of Porter himself. He does not in any sense acknowledge that his conduct was wrong or that he even made a mistake. He does not ask for favor or mercy. He affirms that he had the right to exercise a discretion in the matter of obeying or disobeying the lawful command of his superior; and on this ground, and not that of favor or mercy, he asks for the passage of this bill and his restoration to the rank in the Army from which he was dismissed by the judgment of a court of competent jurisdiction.

We can not too carefully consider this aspect of the case; for it is far-reaching in its tendencies. If the duty to obey is to give way to the discretion of subordinates, we should be consistent in our action, and repeal the ninth and forty-sixth articles of war and the Army regulation which enjoins obedience. If the commander of a corps may exercise discretion and refuse or neglect to execute the lawful commands of his superiors, the right can not stop with him, but go trooping down through all grades of his inferior officers, and on to the private soldiers under them. If it belongs to him it belongs to them. It can not be confined to the headquarters of a major-general, but may as rightfully go with the picket on an exposed line and the sentinel on a dangerous post. And when it abides with them all, as it must if it rests with any, then will we have reached the end of effective military law and of forceful military discipline. Both are hard and harsh; but this must be so, or military officers may prove to be worthless and expensive luxuries and armies disorganized mobs.

Mr. President, before we reach this juncture in our affairs by the passage of this bill it will be well to measure our steps and know whither they are tending. Let us not forget that when on the night of the 27th of August, 1862, sentinels were placed at their posts around and about the corps of Fitz-John Porter, the forty-sixth article of war said to every one of them:

Any sentinel who shall be found sleeping upon his post, or shall leave it before he shall be regularly relieved, shall suffer death or such other punishment as shall be inflicted by the sentence of a court-martial.

There is no discretion for the soldier recorded in the hard lines of this article of war. The weary sentinel, whose overtaxed energies might have cried never so loud on that fateful night for rest, was required to keep awake or die. Does any one believe that Fitz-John Porter would for a moment have listened to a plea of the right to use discretion if an offending sentinel had set it up? If not, why not? Is the forty-sixth article of war more unbending to the private soldier than is the ninth to the officer placed over him? Not so; but to the weary private soldier posted as a sentinel to care for the safety of the Army on that memorable night the alleged right belonged in same degree that it did to General Porter. The forty-sixth article of war said to the private soldier posted as a sentinel, "Keep awake or die," and at the same time the ninth article of war said to General Porter:

Any officer * * * who shall disobey the lawful commands of his superior officer shall suffer death, or such other punishment as shall, according to the nature of his offense, be inflicted on him by the sentence of a court-martial.

Both articles are hard and go about hand in hand with possible death. But they have one admirable quality in common—they place commissioned officer and private soldier on a just equality so far as the obligation of obedience is concerned. They put them both where our highest civil court says they must stand—out of and away from the field of discretion, and held in place by the common duty of unquestioning obedience. And not a few private soldiers have felt the heavy hand of the forty-sixth article of war upon them. It has sent some of them to death, others to disgrace and imprisonment. Had the latter presented as a defense a right to exercise the discretion which is advanced as the chief support of the case we are now considering, death would have been their sentence instead of the milder one of imprisonment. Such a plea would have been regarded as an aggravation of the offense in the case of a common soldier, and no bill would have made its appearance in Congress for his relief. Such bills seem to be reserved for cases of offenders in high position, whose assumed discretion and palpable disobedience could occasion a thousand-fold greater disaster than would be likely to spring from any act a private soldier might perform. This is a feature inseparable from this case as it will go to the country for its judgment. And it will not tend to hold that judgment back from declaring that Fitz-John Porter in asking this exceptional action whereby Congress is expected to justify his assumption of discretion and disobedience of orders therein and thereby demonstrates his unfitness for restoration to the official rank in the Army from which he was dismissed. And will not this judgment of the country be in exact accord with the predicament in which he has presented himself to Congress? Let us still keep to the record of this case and see what answer we shall find to this question.

The first charge against him, and being one on which he was tried and convicted, was as follows:

CHARGE 1ST. Violation of the ninth article of war.

There were several specifications under this charge. The first was as follows:

Specification 1. In this, that the said Maj. Gen. Fitz-John Porter, of the volunteers of the United States, having received a lawful order, on or about the 27th August, 1862, while at or near Warrenton Junction, in Virginia, from Maj. Gen. John Pope, his superior and commanding officer, in the following figures and letters, to wit—

Here follows the order, which I have already quoted—

did then and there disobey the said order, being at the time in the face of the enemy. This at or near Warrenton, in the State of Virginia, on or about the 28th of August, 1862.

That order was delivered to General Porter about half past 9 o'clock p. m. of August 27, 1862. What did it command him to do? To "start at 1 o'clock to-night and come forward with your whole corps, or such part of it as is with you, so as to be here [Bristoe Station] by daylight to-morrow morning."

Surely this was definite enough for any person to understand it. General Pope was General Porter's superior. The former issued the order. The latter received it, and when he received it the Army regulation said to him:

All inferiors are required to obey strictly, and to execute with alacrity and good faith, the lawful orders of the superiors appointed over them.

The Supreme Court of the United States said to him in the opinion from which I have already quoted:

If a superior officer has a right to contest the orders of the President upon his own doubts as to the exigency having arisen, it must be the right of every inferior officer and soldier. * * * A prompt and unhesitating obedience is indispensable to the complete attainment of the object. The service is a military service, and the command is of a military nature, and in such cases every delay and every obstacle to an "efficient and immediate compliance necessarily tend to jeopard the public interests."

And the ninth article of war said to him:

Any officer or soldier who * * * shall disobey any lawful command of his superior officer shall suffer death, or such other punishment as shall, according to the nature of his offense, be inflicted upon him by the sentence of a court-martial.

Here we have the law: a lawful command, duty, and admonition. But no element appears in the case thus presented with which Fitz-John Porter was not perfectly familiar. At the public expense he had been educated into a complete knowledge of all of the lines of the situation in which he found himself on that crucial night of the 27th of August, 1862. In none of them did he find that with him rested the slightest degree of discretion whether or not he would obey with "alacrity and good faith" the lawful command of his superior officer.

As an educated soldier he knew that the right to exercise discretion in regard to the subject-matter of that order rested exclusively with General Pope, who, as commander of the Army of Virginia, issued it, and who alone was responsible for its consequences. It would have been a strange example of military literature had it been issued in form corresponding with the interpretation which Fitz-John Porter assumed to give it; and had General Pope issued it in that form he would have been ridiculed and laughed at the world over by every man having knowledge of military affairs and the rigid rules of law governing them. Let me formulate it in harmony with the assumption of Fitz-John Porter, and as an illustration of the audacious travesty of military law which he asks the legislative department of this Government to approve. Here it is as he would have us to read it, namely:

HEADQUARTERS ARMY OF VIRGINIA,
Bristoe Station, August 27, 1862—6.30 p. m.

GENERAL: The major-general commanding directs that you start at 1 o'clock to-night and come forward with your whole corps, or such part of it as is with you, so as to be here by daylight to-morrow morning [but use your discretion as to when you will start and when you will get here]. Hooker has had a very severe action with the enemy, with a loss of about three hundred killed and wounded. The enemy has been driven back, but is retiring along the railroad. We must drive him from Manassas and clear the country between that place and Gainesville, where McDowell is. If Morell has not joined you, send word to him to push forward immediately [but you will use your discretion in this regard]; also send word to Banks to hurry forward with all speed to take your place at Warrenton Junction [but, of course, you are expected by me to use your discretion in this respect]. It is necessary on all accounts that you should be here by daylight [but you will determine in your discretion whether you will be here at that time, or later, or at all]. I send an officer with this dispatch who will conduct you to this place [but use your discretion about coming]. Be sure to send word to Banks, who is on the road to Fayetteville, probably in the direction of Bealeton [but do not regard this as a limitation on your discretion]. Say to Banks, also, that he had best run back the railroad trains to this side of Cedar Run [but, of course, this is left to your discretion]. If he is not with you write him to that effect [but let your discretion determine whether or not you will do so].

By command of Major-General Pope.

GEORGE D. RUGGLES,
Colonel and Chief of Staff.

Maj. Gen. J. F. PORTER,
Warrenton Junction.

This is the order as Fitz-John Porter says he had the right to read it. At all events it is in harmony with his action under the order which he did receive. If General Pope had issued it in the form here given would it not be conclusive proof that lunacy had come upon him? Who could doubt it? Still, why set him down as a lunatic? If discretion runs by implication through the lines of a military order, why not write it therein? If it be a power which an inferior officer may rightfully exercise, what are its limitations? If it exists at all, there can be no limitations which would make such an order as I have formulated an absurdity or an evidence of lunacy. But if such discretion be a part of our code of military law, how can a superior officer issue a mandatory order to his subordinates? And how long could military discipline be maintained with such a foundation as this for its support? How could a general in command of an army ever dare to risk an engagement with every officer under him possessed of a discretionary power to obey or not the orders which constituted the organizing and effective force of the movement? But it is to just this absurd predicament and to this disorganizing doctrine we must come in order to approve the case which Fitz-John Porter has placed before us.

When we shall have done this, then let us go a step further in order to enforce consistency. Let us be true to the line on which we move, and amend the ninth article of war so that it shall read:

Any officer or soldier who shall [except in the exercise of his discretion] disobey the lawful command of his superior officer shall suffer death or such other punishment as shall be inflicted on him by the sentence of a court-martial.

And then let us prove our thorough devotion to consistency by directing that the Army regulation relative to disobedience shall hereafter read as follows, namely:

All inferiors are required to obey strictly and to execute with alacrity and good faith the lawful orders of the superiors appointed over them [except in such cases as, in the exercise of their discretion, they may fail, neglect, or refuse to obey].

These are the proper lines of reform for us to follow when we shall have approved the appeal which Fitz-John Porter has brought here from the judgment of the court-martial which tried and convicted him. These lines of reform will lead us to those pleasant and peaceful times in which Congress will be relieved from the perplexities of trying appeals from courts-martial, for there will then be no convictions from which appeals may be taken.

But we must not stop in our march toward that perfect reform which will allow all officers in our Army to do as they please under the refreshing shelter of this beautiful doctrine of the right to exercise discretion. We must be just and fair toward the young men we are now educating and may hereafter educate at the West Point Military Academy, and direct the professors and instructors there engaged in preparing the cadets for an efficient discharge of their duties when they come to be officers in our Army to instill into their minds the beauties, the duties, and safety of this new doctrine of discretion. Let them be enlightened concerning the great mistake made by the Supreme Court of the United States when it announced that subordinate officers and agents must obey the orders and commands of their superiors, and have no discretion in the premises. Let them be taught that when they shall have become officers of the Army each one of them will be possessed of a discretionary power superior to any lawful command that may be issued by those placed in authority over them; that this doctrine was settled in the great appeal of Fitz-John Porter from the judgment of the court-martial which convicted him to the Congress of the United States.

It will not require very vigorous instruction to enable them to understand that a discretion which will justify disobedience is superior to the authority that issues an order that may be disobeyed. In this way they will come to understand that a new rule in military law has come into force which allows the discretion of an inferior officer to supplant the command of his superior; that a lieutenant has become a "bigger man" than a major-general, and that a soldier in the ranks is a still "bigger man" than a lieutenant. It is to this that this doctrine of discretion comes at last, and this is the end of efficient armies. When this juncture shall have been reached, then let us do one other thing of practical good in view of the predicament in which we will find ourselves placed—abolish our military establishment as a thing wholly expensive and utterly worthless.

Mr. President, the deadly virus of this doctrine of discretion has already got into the blood of our military system. Its eruptive effect has appeared in the actions and expressions of too many of our military characters, both in and out of the Army, who are held together by the tender threads which are spun at West Point, and I greatly doubt if these phenomena of affinity and considerate regard would have appeared in this case had Fitz-John Porter been a volunteer officer. But the very fact that they have appeared within the circle of this case should intensify our purpose to prevent the virus from spreading more widely than it has already gone. The conservative hand of persuasive caution may handle those tender threads with effective safety now; but if we withhold its gentle manipulations they may develop into cables of such enduring strength as to hold the most forceful factor of military power and discipline in helpless bondage. We must not shut our eyes to the fact that we are dealing with a grave public question, and one with which personal considerations, the likes and dislikes of individuals, should have no more to do in determining our course of action than should the danger of human life have force in the mind of the commander of an army when about to put it in motion for the purposes of offensive operations. Hence I have tried to avoid all personal discussion in what I have said touching this case. I found the true question of this controversy in the order of the 27th of August, 1862, and in Fitz-John Porter's conduct relative thereto. I have used this data in order to present intelligently the principle of military law to which I have endeavored definitely to direct the attention of the Senate. I might have drawn other and forceful illustrations of the principle from the order of August 29, 1862; but they would have been but duplications, in every practical sense, of the others. This would have consumed time without resulting benefit to the case and its discussion as viewed from my standpoint. Judged from this standpoint the case is exceptional in our history; and too great care can not be taken that it shall not establish a precedent in which the Congress of the United States invites insubordination to organize the forces and elements of disaster in the Army of this nation.

Mr. President, so supreme has this feature of this case been in my mind that I have not cared to analyze the motives of the man who affirms the rightfulness of the conduct which constituted the grave crime of which he was convicted by a court of competent jurisdiction, and presents it as a reason why we should restore him to the rank from which he was degraded. Such analysis has been made by others, and I leave it as they have presented it, pouring its flood of light upon the strange and criminal conduct of this man; it intensifies my appreciation of his offense, but it does not magnify its proportions, and it seems to me that the obtuseness evidenced by him concerning the true character of his disobedience of the lawful command of his superior by presenting it and his speculations relative to its effects as reasons in favor of his restoration to a position which may enable him to repeat the offense does not warrant us in expecting better things of him in the future. On the contrary, it is a plain indication that, regardless of the motive which may have incited him, he is an unsafe, not to say an unfit, man to be restored to the position of colonel in the Army of the United States.

It will not do, in view of the great public interest involved, for us to justify his flagrant act of disobedience by giving the sanction of an act of Congress to the specious speculations by means of which he attempts to show that good results followed from the crime of which he was convicted. There are counter speculations by many men quite as able and far less interested than he. While he may claim that the Army of Virginia was saved from utter disaster by his disobedience of orders, the others assert that his criminal conduct robbed that army of a pronounced victory. Their speculations can never determine the conflict of opinion which they represent, and we are thrown back upon the hard fact that he disobeyed the lawful commands of his superior officer. About this there is no dispute, and the fact that he interposes the element of discretion proves that this is true, for why should he plead discretion if he had not disobeyed?

Mr. President, the bill under consideration for the relief of Fitz-John Porter looks not only to his restoration to the position of colonel in the Army of the United States, but it also provides that he may be placed on the retired-list, and specially increases it that this may be done. If it is desired to make the retired-list of the Army unpopular with the people, this is a sure road by which to reach that result, and the effect will extend to the retired-list of the Navy also in the minds of the people. Both lists combined, as last published, embrace seven hundred and nine officers. The aggregate annual pay is $1,674,171.28, the Army list being $1,059,066.28, and the Navy list $615,105. The average annual pay of the officers on the former is $2,434.64, and of the latter $2,261.42. This combined establishment is not an inconsiderable one either in number of officers or aggregate cost. The liberality of the average pay per officer is quite apparent to every mind. It is not my purpose to enter upon the consideration and discussion of the many suggestions which readily flow from these interesting facts. I have only now to say that this system of providing for both fortunate and unfortunate officers of the Army and Navy was not intended at the time of its institution as a haven of rest for men who disregard the orders of their superiors and plead the discretion of inferiors in justification thereof. Nor will the country tolerate any such abuse of the system. Beyond this suggestion I do not care to extend my observations now concerning the retired-lists of the Army and Navy.

Mr. President, most sincerely do I hope that we may never again have need to use our Army in actual war. We are now blessed with profound peace. I trust it may never be broken, either by domestic strife or foreign complications. But our past admonishes us that we are not exempt from the chances which turn national quietude into conditions of war. In this regard we are like all other nations. Hence we maintain our military and naval establishments. We love peace, but we realize that we may have war, and so we ought to observe and practice the philosophy of the trite and oft-repeated saying, "In time of peace prepare for war," and we do recognize and attempt to practice this philosophy. This is shown by the fact that we support military and naval academies for the education of young men who shall officer and command an army and a navy, erect fortifications, build ships of war, and do such other things as may enable us to promptly meet the exigencies and possibilities of war. But what are all of these things worth if they lack the element of effectiveness? And what so tends to enforce the presence of this element as that unbending rule of the military law of all countries which exacts unquestioning obedience? We hope for peace, but we know that war may come. We maintain an army. Let it be efficient. It can not be this except as obedience rules its every member. The bill now commanding our attention proposes to eliminate obedience and substitute discretion. Can we afford to pass it? Can we allow sentiment, sympathy, regard for the pleading of an individual to capture and control our judgment in such a case? We are about to use a public power in a public case. The fact that only one man appears in this bill does not and can not change the nature of the question relative to which we are to exercise this power. It is not Fitz-John Porter who is before us, but the public welfare and the efficiency of the Army of the United States. He will soon pass away and be forgotten. But the effect of such a precedent as the passage of this bill will establish will run with the long line of this nation's future and weaken every army we may put into the field of war.

Mr. President, suppose we were at this time engaged in actual war, would this bill commend itself to the better judgment of the members of this body? Suppose the events of August, 1862, were now present with us, would the better judgment of the Congress of the United States pronounce in favor of restoring an officer who had been dismissed from the Army by judgment of a court-martial for disobedience of orders to his rank and command? Would we for one moment entertain a proposition to restore such an officer and send him back to the command of a corps in the Army, carrying with him our declaration that he could exercise a discretion whether or not he would obey the lawful orders of his superior? Put the individual out of this case, and let our judgment stand before the real question with which we are dealing, and we will have little difficulty in pronouncing the defeat of this bill. Let us surround ourselves with the conditions of August, 1862, and in the presence of their threatening possibilities calmly consider the question of clothing a subordinate officer with discretion instead of duty to obey, and we will unhesitatingly declare that it can not be done.

The lively realization which at that time we had of the supreme duty of an officer to obey the orders of the commander of the army of which he was a member should be just as active now as it was then. We are dealing with principle, not with a man. We are confronted by the general welfare and the requirements of the common defense. These are too immense in their proportions to be hidden from our view by the person of Fitz-John Porter. What they demand, and not what he desires, should hold us to that line of public duty which it seems to me surrounds this case. It is possible that the years which move us away from the war in which he was adjudged to have failed in the highest duty of a soldier may be carrying toward another. We all hope it may not be so. But who can tell what store the future has for us in this regard? No one can tell; and so that trite saying which I have quoted repeats to us the admonition, "In time of peace prepare for war." How better can we do this than by maintaining that universal principle of military law which enjoins obedience upon all subordinate officers and forbids to them the exercise of discretion in that regard. This is the principle which organizes efficiency and maintains discipline. It gives force to armies and wins victories. It is public law, and must not be sacrificed to individual desires. We would not abolish it in time of war, and we must not do it in time of peace, for if we do the result may be the establishment of a sure city of refuge for spite, jealousy, incompetency, cowardice, and treachery.

Mr. President, thus far I have treated this case as though it were within the compass of the constitutional powers of Congress; as though it involves no more than an exercise of legislative discretion to do or not to do the thing recommended to us by the Committee on Military Affairs. I preferred to treat it from this standpoint in the first instance because of the wide range over which the discussion has been conducted both in and out of Congress. It seemed to me the better course of argument to endeavor to demonstrate that, conceding the power to act, it would be an unwise exercise of legislative discretion for Congress to pass the bill now under consideration. The concession was made solely for the purposes of that line of argument, and that the wisdom of the public policy ordained by our Constitution relative to such questions as this case presents may the more clearly appear.

Fitz-John Porter was convicted, by a court of competent jurisdiction, of a very grave military crime. In pursuance of such conviction the court pronounced sentence against him, and this was approved by the President of the United States. This was a judicial proceeding, and when it reached the stage stated it was final and conclusive. Porter asks Congress to review that judicial proceeding, reverse the action of the court and the President, and to restore him to the rank and rights of which he was deprived by the execution of the sentence pronounced against him. He plants himself on the definite declaration that he was "unjustly declared guilty." This raises the very question which was presented to the court for ascertainment. The court acted, and pronounced his guilt. In this it acted judicially. We are asked to review and reverse that judicial action. If we undertake to do this, what kind of power must we exercise in the premises? Why, judicial, of course. But Congress does not possess judicial power. Therefore Porter asks Congress to exercise a power which it does not possess, in order to justify him in the use of a power which did not belong to him. This is an exact characterization of the case which he presents to Congress. The first clause of the first paragraph of his memorial is:

> Your memorialist would respectfully represent that, in January, 1863, he was most unjustly declared guilty of certain charges preferred against him before a court-martial, &c.

The concluding paragraph of his memorial is:

> In view of all the foregoing facts, your memorialist would pray that such action may be taken by Congress as will restore him to the positions of which the sentence of said court-martial unjustly deprived him.

But that court-martial was a judicial tribunal; it possessed judicial powers; its verdict was a judicial finding; its sentence was a judicial act, which, when approved by the President, became conclusive. This is the law as expressed by the Supreme Court of the United States. That court in the case of ex parte Reed (100 United States Reports, 13), in speaking of the character and effect of the proceedings of a court-martial, said:

> It is the organism provided by law and clothed with the duty of administering justice in this class of cases. * * * Its judgments, when approved, as required, rest on the same basis and are surrounded by the same considerations which give conclusiveness to the judgments of other legal tribunals, including as well the lowest as the highest, under the circumstances.

There is no conflict in the authorities concerning the conclusiveness of the final approved judgment of a court-martial. And this applies to every phase and element involved in the cases tried by court-martial as fully as it does to those tried in the civil courts. A former trial and conviction or acquittal by a court-martial is as perfect a plea in bar against a subsequent prosecution for the same offense as though it had transpired in the highest civil court in the land. It is not necessary to cite authorities to sustain the assertion that in every respect the approved judgment of a properly constituted court-martial is as comprehensively and as absolutely conclusive as that rendered by any other court. No one will dispute it; and if it should be attempted, the person essaying the effort would be confronted by an unbroken line of authorities.

Mr. President, if the Congress of the United States occupied the place in our Constitution that the Parliament does in that of Great Britain, we could surmount the obstacle presented by the doctrine of conclusiveness to which I have turned in this case. The Parliament possesses all power. It may make and unmake the constitution of which it is a part. It may exercise legislative and judicial functions. It may regard or disregard the decisions of courts at its own will. It may review, reverse, or affirm judicial decisions. Nothing is conclusive against the power of Parliament. That body is a kind of political omnipotence. Its will as expressed in its acts is the supreme law of the realm. Wholly different is it with us. The Constitution is our supreme law. It clothes the Congress of the United States with legislative, and expressly withholds from it judicial, power. This latter power it confers on another department of the Government. In all instances except that of the original jurisdiction of the Supreme Court, Congress may create, confer, and regulate the jurisdiction of the courts. But it can not exercise judicial power. It may create courts, but it can not review their proceedings and decisions.

Whence, then, comes our authority to pass this bill? We are asked to do it because Fitz-John Porter alleges that he was "most unjustly declared guilty." How can we determine this presented issue except by examining into the record, the law and the facts which make up the case of which he complains? This is what he asks us to do. It is what the Committee on Military Affairs had to do before it could arrive at the conclusion which it presents in its report to the Senate. Are we to approve that conclusion and reverse the decision of a court of competent jurisdiction? What would such action by the Senate be but an exercise of the highest character of judicial power? Before we enter upon this enterprise is it not well for us to recall that the Constitution, which authorizes our presence in this Chamber, says:

> The judicial power of the United States shall be vested in one Supreme Court, and in such inferior courts as the Congress may from time to time ordain and establish.

And that—

> All legislative powers herein granted shall be vested in a Congress of the United States, which shall consist of a Senate and House of Representatives?

The Congress can enact and repeal laws, but it can not fetter the judicial power nor bind it to the legislative will even by enacting interpretations of its own acts. The judicial power may declare a manifestation of the legislative will unconstitutional and void, but the legislative power can not return the compliment by reversing an expression of the judicial will. All will concede the proposition that whenever judicial power is to be exercised the most that Congress can do is to confer jurisdiction on some tribunal already provided or to create some new one for the purpose. Even in the government of the Army and Navy it creates or provides for tribunals to exercise the judicial functions which may be necessary thereto. Hence the court-martial, whose proceedings are judicial, and therefore beyond the power of Congress to review. In these provisions of the Constitution and those relative to the executive power we find the lines of political harmony which resolve the three departments into one forceful governmental unity.

We can not pass the bill now under consideration without disturbing this harmony and molesting this unity. And from this consideration again springs forth to confront us the supreme character of the public question which runs through the provisions of this bill. We can not make a movement toward granting the request of Fitz-John Porter's memorial until we shall have first forced this public question out of the way and resolved to assume judicial power, because he definitely tells us that his complaint is that he "was most unjustly declared guilty of certain charges preferred against him before a court-martial convened in the city of Washington." As I have already said, the proceedings of that court-martial, its judgment and sentence, were judicial, and at no time and in no event could they be interfered with except by the exercise of judicial power, save only that before execution the executive clemency might interpose. This does not belong to Congress. And so the public question involved forbids our further proceeding except in disregard of it. At least this is the case as it appears to me.

Mr. President, if we are to proceed to review and reverse the judgment of the court-martial which tried and condemned Fitz-John Porter, are we to stop with his case, or, having opened the door, allow others to make their complaints, and proceed with all who may come alleging that they have been "most unjustly declared guilty?" There are cases in which this charge can be made with far greater truth than in the one now before us. If we issue the invitation by the passage of this bill I do not doubt we will get plenty of responses. And why should we stop with courts-martial cases? The judgments of the Supreme Court are not more conclusive than those of courts-martial when executed. Why shall we say to the citizen who may affirm that the Supreme Court has most unjustly decided against him that we can not entertain his complaint or give ear to his prayer for justice? What reason can we give to the complaining citizen? If we assume judicial power in the present case, why not hold it and extend it to others? We can give no reason in any other case which does not apply to this one of Fitz-John Porter.

We are treading on dangerous ground, and the future, in my judgment, will demonstrate this assertion as a truth if we pass this bill. It is not a wise thing for us to do to proclaim that Congress has resolved itself into a court of appeals to which parties feeling themselves wronged by the judgments of courts may come for relief. And it seems to me that a right appreciation of the public questions, which can not be pushed out of the way by the personal considerations which ramify this case, must work a defeat of this bill. I shall place my vote against it on the ground of the public questions which to me seem supreme. It may be that they do not impress others as they do me, but I can not rid my mind of the conviction that great peril lurks in this measure, and that it can not constitutionally be enacted into a law. Wrong precedents in public action turn into plague-spots in a nation's progress; hence the great degree of caution which should characterize our movements in such cases as the one with which we are now dealing. Whatever of personal inclination may operate as a motive to action should be held in check by a sense of duty ever watchful of the public weal. Unimportant as this bill may seem when considered in conjunction with our national concerns, it still involves elements of mischief which a discreet regard for the public safety ought to cause us to refuse to enact it into a law. It is entitled a "bill for the relief of Fitz-John Porter." This seems a harmless thing; but it is far from being what it seems. Give it the force of Congressional sanction, and it will assault every principle of law and of public policy which I have discussed. It is more than a private bill. It is full of public dangers, crammed with mischievous possibilities, and void of a single element which the future can plead in justification of its appearance among the laws of the United States.

Mr. MANDERSON obtained the floor.

Mr. LOGAN. It is now after 5 o'clock, and I presume rather late for the Senator from Nebraska to proceed.

Mr. MANDERSON. I shall be very willing to give way.

Mr. LOGAN. If agreeable to the Senator, I will move an executive session after making a suggestion. I think we can get through with the bill to-morrow by commencing early; at least I hope so. If no other gentlemen desire to speak than those I know of now I think we can complete the bill to-morrow. Therefore I will move, if agreeable to the Senator from Nebraska, that we go into executive session, for the purpose of giving him the floor to-morrow morning.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. HAWLEY in the chair). The Senator from Nebraska [Mr. MANDERSON] will be entitled to the floor when the Senate resumes the consideration of the bill. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Illinois [Mr. LOGAN] that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After five minutes spent in executive session the doors were reopened, and (at 5 o'clock and 20 minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

WEDNESDAY, March 12, 1884.

The House met at 12 o'clock m. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. JOHN S. LINDSAY, D. D.

The Journal of yesterday's proceedings was read and approved.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. I call for the regular order.

The SPEAKER. The Chair, if there be no objection, will lay before the House an executive communication and sundry personal requests of members.

There was no objection.

THE NORTHERN PACIFIC RAILROAD.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of the Interior, in response to a resolution of the House calling for information in regard to the definite location of various parts of the line of the Northern Pacific Railroad; which was referred to the Committee on Pacific Railroads, and ordered to be printed.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

By unanimous consent, leave of absence was granted as follows:

To Mr. PETERS, for to-day, on account of sickness in his family.

To Mr. CHACE, until to-morrow.

To Mr. SNYDER, for ten days, on account of important business.

To Mr. STEWART, of Texas, indefinitely, on account of sickness.

To Mr. GEORGE D. WISE, for eight days from the 11th day of March, on account of important business.

To Mr. CARLETON, from the 13th to the 24th instant.

To Mr. MAYBURY, for ten days from this day.

THE LATE HON. THOMAS H. HERNDON.

Mr. JONES, of Alabama. I ask unanimous consent that Saturday, the 12th day of April, be fixed as the time for the delivering of tributes to the memory of the late Thomas H. Herndon, late a Representative-elect from the State of Alabama.

There was no objection, and it was so ordered.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

The SPEAKER. The regular order is demanded, which is the call of committees for reports.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. I move that the morning hour for the call of committees for reports be dispensed with.

The motion was agreed to—two-thirds voting in favor thereof.

Mr. HAMMOND. I ask unanimous consent to take from the House Calendar for present consideration the bill (H. R. 4411) to amend section 101 of the Revised Statutes of the United States so as to allow the chairman of a subcommittee of a committee of either House of Congress to administer oaths. It is of some importance to have an early passage of this bill. I think it will give rise to no discussion.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. As the passage of that bill is a matter of necessity for the expedition of business before committees I withdraw the call for the regular order for a moment, but will renew it if the bill gives rise to any debate.

Mr. WELLER. I call for the regular order.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Georgia asks unanimous consent to take from the House Calendar for present consideration the bill he has indicated.

Mr. LORE and Mr. FIEDLER objected.

Mr. WELLER. I withdraw my objection on being informed of the character of the bill.

The SPEAKER. Objection is made on the right. The bill is not before the House.

POST-OFFICE APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. I move that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

Mr. HOLMAN. I suggest to the gentleman from Illinois whether it would not be better to limit debate on the pending paragraph to fifteen minutes.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. I will say to my friend from Indiana I have conferred with the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. HORR], and he is of opinion but a small amount of debate will be required for the paragraph. I concluded, therefore, it was not necessary to limit debate at this time. If we find it is likely to be extensive, I can then move that the committee rise for the purpose of limiting debate.

Mr. HOLMAN. Very well.

The motion was agreed to.

The House accordingly resolved itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, Mr. BUCKNER in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The House is in Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union and resumes consideration of the bill (H. R. 5459) making appropriations for the service of the Post-Office Department for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1885, and for other purposes.

The pending paragraph is as follows:

Office of the First Assistant Postmaster-General:

For compensation to postmasters, $10,500,000. And no salary of any postmaster under the act entitled "An act to adjust the salaries of postmasters," approved March 3, 1883, shall exceed the sum of $4,000 per annum.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Michigan [Mr. HORR] has moved to amend the paragraph by striking out "$10,500,000" and inserting in lieu thereof "$12,250,000." The gentleman from Michigan is recognized.

Mr. HORR. I hope the Committee of the Whole will now come to a vote on the first amendment offered, the other amendment having been withdrawn. For the purpose of making a further statement I will move to strike out the last word, and when I get through, unless some one desires to reply, I will withdraw that motion.

This item of appropriation is for compensation of postmasters, and the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. TOWNSHEND] claims that the amount now in the bill is sufficient for this purpose. I am sure if he will use his pencil and his knowledge of multiplication and addition, instead of using his imagination, he will ascertain the fact that after the sum shall have been increased to the amount proposed by my amendment, even then there will probably be a deficiency.

I desire to submit to the Committee of the Whole just a few facts in connection with this item. Under the old law postmasters receive as compensation 60 per cent. on the first $100 of receipts of their offices, 50 per cent. on the next $200, and 40 per cent. on the balance. Under the new law the postmasters receive as compensation 100 per cent. on the first $50 per quarter of receipts of their offices, 60 per cent. on the next $100, 50 per cent. on the next $200, and 40 per cent. on all in excess of $350.

Under this new law every postmaster the receipts of whose office amounts to $250 per quarter will receive as compensation $160 per quarter; under the old law he would receive only $130 per quarter. There is at once a difference of $30 in favor of the postmasters under the new law. Again, under the new law every postmaster whose receipts are less than $50 per quarter gets the whole of it as compensation. There are in the United States over 30,000 offices where the receipts are less than $200. Suppose they averaged only $100; there is a difference at once of $1,200,000 which these little postmasters will get whose receipts are less than $50 per quarter more than they would receive under the old law. Now, when you take that into account you will see that it is utterly impossible by any application of mathematics or estimates that are anywhere near accurate to bring this item down to $12,250,000. It will be more instead of less.

Now, all I have to say is to repeat what I said at the beginning: we ought to make this appropriation as nearly as we can ascertain exactly the amount that will be required. If we make it too little, the postmasters will get their money anyway and keep it, and we will simply make a deficiency necessary. If we make the appropriation too much, the money will remain in the fund, and it will not cost the Government one single cent more. I say, therefore, that as business men we should make this appropriation as nearly as we can the sum that will be required.

Mr. HOLMAN. I had hoped that after the lengthy general debate on this subject the debate under the five-minute rule could be made somewhat brief. But my friend from Michigan [Mr. HORR] reiterates what has been said over and over again as to the character of this appropriation and as to the character of the legislation of the last session.

I wish to say to the Committee of the Whole that the appropriation for the compensation of postmasters for the present year was $9,250,000, and the appropriation proposed in this bill is $10,500,000; an increase of $1,250,000 for the next year over and above the appropriation for the present year.

The law was amended during the last session in regard to the compensation of postmasters, and it is possible that it will be found that the expense resulting from that legislation may be beyond what we are able to anticipate at this time. But this appropriation of $10,500,000 is believed to be sufficient by the Committee on Appropriations.

Mr. REED. On what grounds?

Mr. HOLMAN. If it is not sufficient——

Mr. REED. On what grounds is it believed to be sufficient?

Mr. HOLMAN. If my friend will allow me; if it is not sufficient there will be no trouble at all in providing for the deficiency long before the money will be required. On the other hand, if the appropriation is made too large it only encourages extravagance in a Department of our Government. The one method is absolutely safe, doing no possible harm to the Post-Office Department, not crippling it to the tithe of a hair; while the other method will tend only to unnecessary extravagance in one of the Departments of the Government.

I wish to say that the expenditures in the last year for this purpose were but $10,315,394. I do not apprehend that in the absence of any motive for increasing salaries Congress has passed a law upon the suggestion of the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. BINGHAM] that will produce the extraordinary increase of salaries claimed by the gentleman from Michigan. I do not believe that the House or Senate have deliberately gone to work to increase salaries when no public reason existed for their increase.

I think that when this law is carried out practically no such evil results will be found to follow at all. I trust not. Up to this time we could not tell, else undoubtedly there would have been incorporated into this bill a proposition to repeal so much of the act of my friend from Pennsylvania as increases largely the compensation of officers who are already respectably paid.

Mr. REED. I have not the slightest desire to meddle with this discussion, for the gentleman from Michigan has explained very clearly the mathematical principles upon which his amendment rests. I only take this opportunity to comment upon the characteristic speech of the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN]. He announces to us that the Committee on Appropriations has made in this bill a certain appropriation; and he says that this is believed to be sufficient. I ask him upon what ground he believes it to be sufficient; and he gives me and gives this House no reply. In addition to that he announces to the House that if we appropriate more than will be actually needed for this purpose we shall "encourage extravagance." Now how can that be possible? The law prescribes what these officers shall receive; and if a thousand million dollars were appropriated not a single cent more than the law allows for their compensation could be spent by any human possibility. Yet the gentleman tells us that an extra appropriation will "encourage extravagance." How? Not one cent of any appropriation we may make for this purpose can be used for any other purpose. Yet the gentleman tells us that if we appropriate too much it will cause extravagance. How, and why?

Now I comment on this as an example of the manner in which appropriation bills are treated on that side of the House and by gentlemen belonging to the Appropriation Committee. In the first place they propose in the bill an appropriation which the Post-Office officials, being moved thereunto by no improper motive, declare will not be sufficient; and then gentlemen of the committee decline to give us any reason why a sufficient appropriation should not be made. They proclaim vaguely that to do the right thing will cause extravagance; and there they leave the matter. And gentlemen on the other side follow such leading!

Mr. HISCOCK. Mr. Chairman, I do not care to say much on this subject, but I do ask the attention of the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN] to what I am about to say. Does the gentleman claim that it is in the power of the Post-Office Department to regulate the amount which shall be expended for this particular service? I would like to have him answer that question here and now.

Mr. HOLMAN. Yes, sir; there is one mode in which the amount of expenditure can by affected by the action of the Post-Office Department, as the gentleman is very well aware.

Mr. HISCOCK. Does the gentleman say——

Mr. HOLMAN. I hope the gentleman will hear my full answer.

Mr. HISCOCK. Does the gentleman say, as a Representative from the State of Indiana and upon his responsibility as a member of this House, that the Post-Office Department can regulate the amount which shall be expended for salaries of postmasters?

Mr. HOLMAN. The Post-Office Department can not regulate the rate of compensation.

Mr. HISCOCK. Has the Department any control over the amount to be expended in this direction?

Mr. HOLMAN. I hope the gentleman will allow me to answer his question. As the gentleman is well aware, there is but one mode by which the amount expended for this branch of the service can be affected by the Post-Office Department within the limits of the law; and that is by an increase of post-offices beyond the necessities of the people. I had occasion to say last evening—and I hope the gentleman will allow me to answer his question fully—that while it is desirable this appropriation should be ample to authorize the increase of post-offices up to the full requirements of the wants of the country, yet it is not desirable to encourage the establishment of post-offices without any public reason or excuse; and it is in this way that an undue expenditure may occur.

Mr. HISCOCK. As I understand, and I ask the attention of the gentleman again, there is no way in which this expenditure can be curtailed by the Department except by refusing to locate new offices.

Mr. HOLMAN. I did not say that.

Mr. HISCOCK. Is there any other way? I would like the gentleman to give an explicit answer.

Mr. HOLMAN. The gentleman has my answer in my own words. If he wishes me to repeat it, I will do so.

Mr. HISCOCK. Then the gentleman proposes simply to say to the Post-Office Department, "If you keep within the limits of this appropriation you must refuse new post-offices when they are required."

Mr. HOLMAN. We propose to say to the Post-Office Department that we desire the establishment of every post-office that the public interests may require; every one. But we do not wish to see post-offices established beyond the wants of the people. Now will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. HISCOCK. Yes, sir.

Mr. HOLMAN. The appropriation made for this purpose last year was $9,250,000.

Mr. HISCOCK. Yes, sir.

Mr. HOLMAN. Did the gentleman as a Representative of the State of New York and chairman of the Committee on Appropriations deem that appropriotion at the time sufficient?

Mr. HISCOCK. I did. And as I have heard a great deal said on the other side in reference to our attempt last year to cut down appropriations, I undertake to say it will be found upon examination that the aggregate of the appropriations which we gave last year will be sufficient for the expenditures of the current year.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. REED obtained the floor and said: I yield my time to the gentleman from New York [Mr. HISCOCK].

Mr. HISCOCK. It is true that in some particular instances, like this perhaps, we did not give enough, for the reason that during the last days of the session the House passed legislation regulating the salaries of postmasters and reducing the rate of postage; and on account of those two enactments it was utterly impossible for the Department to calculate the amount which would be required for the postal service for the current year.

I do not want to be misunderstood about it. There was no intention on our part to cut down the amount.

Mr. HOLMAN. Will the gentleman from New York allow me to interrupt him?

Mr. HISCOCK. Certainly.

Mr. HOLMAN. The gentleman thought the bill brought before the House by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. BINGHAM] would reduce the salaries of postmasters instead of increasing them.

Mr. HISCOCK. I do not know what I thought about it at that time. I do not remember exactly, but I do know this, I do know that when you cut down this system of appropriation—gentlemen on the other side of the House from the Southern and Western States I call your attention to it, for it is there they want the new post-offices located—you on that side of the House are interested in this question while we of New York are not interested in it, New England is not interested in it, Ohio is not interested in it; you gentlemen of the new States, West and South, are interested in it—I repeat, Mr. Chairman, that when you gentlemen on the other side cut down this system of appropriation you deny to your own people the establishment of new post-offices which are constantly being required in a growing country.

Mr. SKINNER, of New York. Let me ask the gentleman whether it was not the understanding or the intention of the committee last year that the new salaries of postmasters should take effect on the 1st of October, whereas it was decided that under the law they took effect from and after the date of the passage of the act?

Mr. HISCOCK. Yes; that is true, and that made of itself a very great difference.

Mr. BINGHAM. Allow me to present here a few figures which I know the gentleman from New York desires to have stated.

Mr. HISCOCK. Certainly; I am happy to have my position fortified.

Mr. BINGHAM. The estimate of appropriation last year was $46,741,000, while the amount appropriated was $45,477,000. The committee only cut down the entire estimates of the Department $1,264,000. That was all, and that, too, was almost wholly on the point of postmasters' salaries. This shows the Committee on Appropriations of the last Congress in no way crippled the postal service.

Mr. HISCOCK. I wish to call the attention of the gentlemen on the other side of the House to the fact that when the Republican party came into power in this House we found staring us in the face a deficiency in the Post-Office Department of a million and a half dollars, which we had to provide for. Then, as now, that deficiency was largely in this item for salaries of postmasters. We were compelled to provide for it.

I appeal to you gentlemen on the other side of the House whether this policy of attempting to shear the appropriation bill with a view to making a little party capital on the ground of its being lower than some preceding appropriation bill of the same character, whether this fictitious political capital——

Mr. HORR. Watered stock. [Laughter.]

Mr. HISCOCK. As my friend from Michigan says, whether this watered stock, this fictitious political capital, is worthy of you as the representatives of a great national party.

When we get a little further on in this bill I shall call to the notice of the House another fact, and I now ask the gentleman having charge of the bill——

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman's time has expired and the Chair recognizes the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. MONEY].

Mr. HISCOCK. I have been interrupted to that extent by questions propounded to me I hope there will be no objection to my finishing what I rose to say.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Mississippi is recognized as entitled to the floor under the rules.

Mr. HISCOCK. I ask the gentleman to yield to me a minute or two and he can get the floor again.

Mr. MONEY. I am willing to yield my place, but can not yield any of my five minutes.

Mr. HISCOCK. I will not ask for any of the gentleman's time, but will take the floor in my own right if there be no objection.

Mr. HOLMAN. How much does the gentleman wish to have his time extended?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair recognized the gentleman from Mississippi and he has yielded the floor to the gentleman from New York.

Mr. MONEY. I do not yield my time to the gentleman, but merely my place, expecting to get the floor after he has resumed his seat.

Mr. HOLMAN. I trust the gentleman from New York will indicate how much time he desires.

Mr. HISCOCK. Only about five minutes.

Mr. HOLMAN. Very well, go on.

Mr. HISCOCK. Mr. Chairman, there is another thing in this bill to which I wish to call the attention of the gentleman having charge of it as characterizing the proposed legislation. I admit it is not the item now under discussion, but further on in the bill we find an unexpended balance of a million dollars appropriated in the first session of the Forty-seventh Congress is reappropriated for the service of the next fiscal year; in getting up the bill that million dollars is taken out of the aggregate. Here it is worth while to point gentlemen on the other side to this fact that you may fully understand what is the policy of the Committee on Appropriations, for that policy denies you new post-offices in sparsely settled and growing districts. The bill on its face carries evidence that it is not intended to give what is required for the service, but simply to reduce the appropriation. You are compelled to make it something more than it was last year, because the service is growing.

Now, Mr. Chairman, if this appropriation would not cripple the service I would not say a word about it. I would not advocate its being increased. It has been intimated on the floor the effect will not be to cripple the service. The effect is undoubtedly to limit the service and prevent its growth. That is to be the effect of it, and I challenge the gentleman from Indiana and I challenge the gentleman in charge of this bill to refute the statements I have made.

Mr. MONEY. Mr. Chairman, as far as this particular amendment is concerned perhaps it is not materially important; but it is important that this committee in framing a bill of this character should act advisedly and with full knowledge of the facts.

Now, it is true in my judgment that this particular item will create a deficiency for the next fiscal year. But it does not lie in the mouth of gentlemen upon the other side to charge such a purpose as that upon the Committee on Appropriations in presenting this bill. The gentleman who has just addressed the House was himself for two years the chairman of that committee; and for the fiscal year which ended on the 30th of June, 1882, that gentleman reported a bill, and upon this single item of compensation to postmasters there was a deficiency exceeding $1,515,000. The Postmaster-General has explained why that deficiency occurred, and the reason assigned for the deficiency in that instance is sufficient to explain why a deficiency will also occur under the operation of the present bill.

It makes no sort of difference to the service whether this House shall appropriate $100,000,000 or $1,000,000 for the compensation of postmasters, because their compensation is fixed by law, is paid out of the revenues of their offices, and not by the appropriation bill.

Mr. HISCOCK. Will the gentleman permit me just here to ask him a question, and that is if the effect of the limiting of this appropriation is not to be a denial of the creation of new post-offices?

Mr. MORSE. No.

Mr. HISCOCK. I ask him, as chairman of the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads, if that is not to be the effect, that you prevent the creation of new post-offices by limiting the appropriation?

Mr. MONEY. I do not believe that will be the effect of it.

Mr. HISCOCK. Is it not to be the effect if you give an insufficient sum for the present postmasters' salaries or if you give a sum which is required only for the payment of the salaries of the present postmasters?

Mr. MONEY. I think not.

Mr. HISCOCK. And, further, let me ask the gentleman to answer plainly, if you only give such sum as is sufficient for their salaries—the number at present commissioned—if the Department is not necessarily then limited by the appropriation bill to the present number of offices and can not establish new ones?

Mr. MONEY. It is not so in any sense of the word. On the contrary, it makes no sort of difference, as I have said, what amount of money is appropriated for the salaries of postmasters, because their compensation is fixed by statute, and you can not limit by an appropriation the compensation they are entitled to, since their salaries are paid by themselves out of the receipts of their offices.

In explaining the deficiency of the year before last, which amounted on a bill which the gentleman from New York himself reported to a million and half of dollars, the Postmaster-General makes the following statement:

> The expenditure was $1,115,394 in excess of the appropriation. The deficiency was unavoidable, since the law fixes the compensation of postmasters and authorizes them to retain it on account from the proceeds of their offices.

Now, Mr. Chairman, with that law before them, the Committee on Appropriations during the last session of Congress appropriated $9,250,000 for the salaries of postmasters, and there is to be of necessity a deficiency, which at the close of this year will amount to a deficiency of over a million and a quarter dollars, on the same account.

Mr. HORR. Will the gentleman from Mississippi, who is more familiar with these matters than I am, permit me to ask him a question in this connection?

Mr. MONEY. Certainly.

Mr. HORR. Is it not a fact that the Postmaster-General establishes new offices under a special law, which does not have any bearing upon the amount appropriated in the regular Post-Office appropriation bill?

Mr. MONEY. The appropriation bill has no effect upon the establishing of new offices at all.

Mr. HORR. That is what I thought.

Mr. MONEY. These new offices are established upon the request of the citizens themselves residing at the place, and the members here press them upon the consideration of the Department. The Post-Office Department then, if the grounds seem sufficient, establish the post-offices at such places, and establish them without any regard to the amount of money appropriated in the bill. The establishment of new offices is not governed by the amount in the appropriation bill; and in the preparation of the bill the amount of money appropriated is not limited with a view of curtailing the Department in the establishment of such offices. The Department will extend the number as they are needed; and, as I have read from the Postmaster-General's report, the postmasters pay themselves out of the proceeds of their offices.

Now, I stated that there would be a deficiency under this bill. There will be a deficiency for this fiscal year. There will be, because during this fiscal year up to the present date there have been established 4,000 new offices, and for the further reason that the increase of business——

Mr. ROGERS, of Arkansas, obtained the floor and yielded his time to Mr. MONEY.

Mr. MONEY. I am very much obliged to my friend. As I was proceeding to state, Mr. Chairman, there were over 4,000 new offices established in this fiscal year. The officers in charge of these pay themselves out of the proceeds of their offices. Consequently, there will be no limit to their number. In addition to that, the regular increase of business is about 11 per cent. per annum. As business increases, so, necessarily, increases the compensation of the postmasters. The figures show that their compensation keeps up with the total revenues of the postal branch of the Government pari passu; that is to say, that they average one-fourth of the total revenues of the Post-Office Department. It makes no difference, therefore, what we appropriate, it goes just in that way, and you can not limit that expenditure. But if that is a fault, it is a fault which has been shared by both sides of this House. The gentlemen on the other side of the House reported for the last two fiscal years the appropriation bills, and there were deficiencies just as serious as any that come in under the operation of the present bill. While I am not disposed to criticise this bill in an unfriendly spirit, I should willingly vote for an increase of the appropriation in the amount to be expended for the compensation of postmasters, for, necessarily, there will be an increase in the present fiscal year which will keep pace with the growth of the business of the country; and this will be found also in the next fiscal year. Still, it is a matter of no serious import. Nobody loses by it. I think the discussion of no importance, but I was anxious to place these facts before the committee.

Mr. HORR. I wish to ask the gentleman from Mississippi if he is not satisfied that it will take every dollar my amendment names to pay these salaries?

Mr. MONEY. I think it will.

Mr. REED. Will the gentleman from Mississippi permit me to ask him a question?

Mr. MONEY. Yes, sir.

Mr. REED. Will an overappropriation on this item by any possibility lead to extravagance?

Mr. MONEY. I do not think it can, because it is not a matter in the discretion of the Postmaster-General except in the establishment of new post-offices; and these post-offices are established, my experience shows, without any regard to the amount of money appropriated. Their establishment is simply based on the necessities of the communities which require postal facilities.

Mr. HISCOCK. I desire that there shall be no mistake as to this——

Mr. TOWNSHEND. Mr. Chairman, who is recognized as having the floor?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Colorado [Mr. BELFORD] is recognized.

Mr. BELFORD. On yesterday the gentleman from New York [Mr. SKINNER] alluded to the amount of revenues contributed by the West to the support of this Government. I desire to state that since its organization New York and New England have received 90 per cent. of the money paid into the national Treasury by the South and the West. It is time that the South and the West cease to follow the banners of Eastern leaders, whether they belong to one party or the other.

I represent what is called an infantile State. Let me call your attention, if I can, in the five minutes to which I am entitled to the floor, to a few facts which I have before me. Colorado last year contributed $473,864 to support the postal service. What was contributed by Louisiana, that was admitted to the Union under the administration of Thomas Jefferson? What did she contribute to the postal service?—$447,000; not as much as the young, vigorous, prosperous, and magnificent State of Colorado. Let us take Vermont. She contributed $339,000. West Virginia, $245,000.

And yet, in view of these contributions made by the West to the support of the Post-Office Department, we witness here a gentleman from the West standing up in the interest of Eastern Democrats to impair and contract the mail service of that country. Oh, you are doing it. You have reduced the estimates in this bill $4,000,000. You reduced the estimates on the naval bill $8,000,000. With a majority of seventy in this House you are afraid to vote on the bonded bill, which would keep out of the Treasury $70,000,000. That has been your history in every Congress in which you have had the majority; the history of a herd of political eunuchs, without manhood or virility. [Laughter and applause.]

Mr. TOWNSHEND. I can tolerate the jeers and amusement afforded the House by the gentleman from Colorado, for I have heard it often enough and seen enough of its influence on this floor to know it will not affect the vote on this amendment in any particular whatever. But I wish to take notice of the remarks made by one or two other gentlemen who have spoken.

In the first place, I assert that the bill presented by the Committee on Appropriations is the most liberal bill that was ever brought into this House for the postal service. It carries a larger amount of appropriations than any other postal bill ever brought into this House.

It was more fully appreciated and made a more liberal appropriation for the increase of the service than was done in the last Congress, at either session, or in any other Congress. And I further maintain that an intelligent investigation of the facts and of the data that can be ascertained demonstrates that this Committee on Appropriations has provided every dollar needed for the efficiency of the public service in the Post-Office Department.

Now, I want to call attention to something I said on yesterday. One or two of the gentlemen who have spoken here this morning have commented on what by their course last session they forced us to do when they brought in a bill which they knew, because they were told of it on this floor time and again, lacked a million or more of the salaries required to pay the postmasters. And yet the gentlemen then on the Committee on Appropriations on that side of the House took the floor, as I could show you here in this RECORD, and argued and insisted upon it, and the distinguished gentleman from New York [Mr. HISCOCK] stood by and aided them in inducing this House to believe that only nine millions and a quarter were needed for the salaries of the postmasters.

Mr. HORR. They were wrong, were they not?

Mr. TOWNSHEND. They were wrong and they knew it.

Mr. HORR. And you know you are wrong in this, and yet imitate them.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. Why did they do it? That they might come in here and play the rôle they play to-day; and that is to deceive the country and this House into the belief that there is a necessity for an enormous increase in this appropriation; that they might turn a lot of demagogues loose in the next campaign and point to the economy of the Republican House, and at the same time draw attention to the extravagance of a Democratic House.

Now, Mr. Chairman, we have given upon this item of this bill an increase of one million and a quarter above what was given last year, and yet these gentlemen come in and ask us to increase the appropriation three millions.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. REAGAN was recognized, and yielded his time to Mr. TOWNSHEND.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. This gentleman comes in to-day and asks us if it is worthy of us to appropriate what he believes to be a less amount than may be needed for the payment of salaries of postmasters. I ask him if it was not contemptible on the part of his own party and his committee in the last Congress to bring in a bill which they knew was insufficient to meet the demands of the public service and then at this session of Congress to come in here and arraign a committee which gives a million and a quarter more than they gave? I ask is that conduct worthy of the gentleman?

Mr. HISCOCK. Does not the gentleman know that he is trying to carry on the service for the next fiscal year upon the excess of appropriations which were made by us in the last Congress?

Mr. TOWNSHEND. I am satisfied——

Mr. HISCOCK. Does not the gentleman know that?

Mr. TOWNSHEND. I know it was the policy of the gentleman and his committee in the last Congress to create a deficiency in order that this House might be put into the position of making large and excessive appropriations.

Mr. HISCOCK. When the pension bill comes in there will be a reappropriation of unexpended balances made by the last Congress.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. The gentleman gets up here and pretends to be horrified at the idea that we are going to reappropriate a million of unexpended balances of appropriations for the several Departments, and would have us imagine that that is a crime.

Mr. HISCOCK. Oh, no.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. Do not interrupt me until I get through. And he does that in the face of the fact that he himself came into this House at the last session and asked for a reappropriation of $15,000,000 that lay unexpended.

Mr. HISCOCK. Now——

Mr. TOWNSHEND. I refuse to be interrupted.

Mr. HISCOCK. But, Mr. Chairman——

Mr. TOWNSHEND. I refuse to be interrupted.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. BLOUNT). The Chair trusts the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. TOWNSHEND] will be allowed to proceed without interruption.

Mr. HISCOCK. May I ask a question?

Mr. TOWNSHEND. Not now. I am not surprised that the gentleman is restive under the exposition of his conduct in the last House and also in this. I have only called attention to facts that can not be explained or disputed.

I am asked here by the gentleman from Maine [Mr. REED] and others this question: Suppose the appropriation for this purpose is too large, suppose you appropriate too much money, what would be the effect of it? They seem to think that it is perfectly harmless to appropriate large and unnecessary sums of money. Such was the argument used when the star-route lobby was around this Hall laboring to secure large and extravagant appropriations. Extravagance leads to corruption, as has been demonstrated by the history of the past, and as will be demonstrated by the history of the future, if the members of this House are not true to the interests of the people and do not guard against extravagant appropriations.

Mr. HORR. Permit me a moment. You do not claim that there is any similarity in that respect between the appropriations for the compensation of postmasters and appropriations for post-routes?

Mr. TOWNSHEND. I am only illustrating.

Mr. HORR. But your illustration is not fair.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. I repeat that extravagant and unnecessary appropriations lead to corruption. I do not say that it would occur in connection with this particular item.

Mr. HORR. The gentleman knows that no fair comparison can be made between the two items.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. I am opposed to extravagant and unnecessary appropriations. I am in favor of giving every dollar that is needed for the efficient discharge of the public service. But I am opposed on general principles to leaving temptations in the way of those who might be guilty of maladministration, somewhat upon the theory of the character described by a novelist of an individual who, when he found anything lying around loose, always appropriated it to himself, upon the plea that if he did not do so somebody else would.

The CHAIRMAN. The time for debate upon the pending amendment has been exhausted.

Mr. BINGHAM. I move to strike out the last word. I desire, without going outside of the question at issue, to invite the attention of the gentleman in charge of this bill to a few official figures that I have received from the Department to-day, and which I requested yesterday, in view of some of his statements. And first let me refer to the statistics in connection with the compensation of postmasters.

With reference to the strictures of the gentleman upon the Committee on Appropriations of the last Congress let me tell him this: The Post-Office Department asked for $46,741,000, and the Committee on Appropriations gave $45,477,000, a difference between the amount estimated for and the amount appropriated of $1,264,000.

Mr. MILLER, of Pennsylvania. And that was the Forty-seventh Congress.

Mr. BINGHAM. That was for the present fiscal year.

Mr. HORR. That is right; go on.

Mr. BINGHAM. This bill, according to the gentleman's own showing in his summary of the bill, makes a difference of nearly $5,000,000 between the amount estimated for and the amount appropriated. Yet he is calling the last Committee on Appropriations to account for laches and neglect, when, as I have stated, that committee appropriated within $1,264,000 of the amount requested by the Department.

Now, another point with reference to the appropriation for the compensation of postmasters. I agree with the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. MONEY] that postmasters are paid under a fixed statute. The law says that they shall be allowed to deduct their compensation from the receipts of their offices, turning into the Treasury only the net revenue. That is the law, and they are paid anyway.

Now let me show you one thing: For the fiscal year ending June 30, 1882, the Post-Office Department asked for $7,800,000 for compensation of postmasters, and the Committee on Appropriations gave what was requested. For the year ending June 30, 1883, the Department asked for $8,800,000, and the committee gave what was asked. For the year ending June 30, 1884, the Department asked for $10,134,000, and the Committee on Appropriations gave $9,250,000, a difference of $884,000. Condemn it if you choose.

Mr. HORR. It was wrong.

Mr. BINGHAM. Never mind that. I want to stop it right here so far as my vote is concerned. In this very bill, while you condemn the Committee on Appropriations of last year for giving $884,000 less than the estimate, you yourselves give $1,750,000 less than the estimate.

It does not make any difference whether you appropriate the amount indicated or not; but I am showing the tendency of this neglect on the part of Congress to appropriate the amount required for the service of the Department. The deficiency of the appropriation last year, as compared with what the Department asked, was $884,000; this year the Committee on Appropriations proposes to give $1,750,000 less than the Department estimates to be necessary. Let this matter stop right here and now. That is the only question we have to consider; not whether we are appropriating enough, because it does not make any difference whether the appropriation for this item be $100 or $12,000,000.

Mr. HORR. I hope we shall now have a vote on this amendment. There are fifty other amendments to be offered.

Mr. JOSEPH D. TAYLOR. I move to amend by striking out the last word.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. I take the floor for the purpose of moving that the committee rise to close debate. But if a vote can be taken at once I will not make that motion.

Mr. HORR. I take it that gentlemen on this side will not insist on further debate upon this amendment. Discussion can be had on other amendments.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. If there is to be a vote I withdraw my motion. [Cries of "Vote!" "Vote!"]

The question being taken on the amendment of Mr. HORR to strike out "$10,500,000" and insert "$12,250,000," the amendment was not agreed to; there being—ayes 74, noes 89.

Mr. DAVIS, of Illinois. I move to amend the pending paragraph by striking out all after the word "dollars," in line 22; the words proposed to be stricken out being the following:

> And no salary of any postmaster under the act entitled "An act to adjust the salaries of postmasters," approved March 3, 1883, shall exceed the sum of $4,000 per annum.

Mr. Chairman, in the closing hours of the last Congress we were congratulating ourselves upon the passage of a law which regulated the compensation of postmasters; and so far as it affected the first-class offices we were delighted with the change, as it was a simple recognition of fidelity and responsibility. That law provided, among other things, that where the income of any post-office was from $450,000 to $500,000 the salary of the postmaster should be $4,000 per annum; that where the receipts were from $500,000 to $600,000 the salary should be $5,000 per annum; and where the income was $600,000 and upward the salary should be $6,000. The only exceptions made in that law were with reference to the New York office and the office in Washington, D. C.

That enactment, Mr. Chairman, was a recognition of the business of these great offices and the responsibility that the postmasters at such offices are obliged to assume. It is believed that if in Government affairs we can transact our business in the same manner and with the same economy as our best business establishments, it will be a desirable result to accomplish. Now, in the city of Chicago we find that men requiring no greater ability or responsibility than the postmasters of our large cities are receiving in private establishments much larger salaries than this bill proposes to allow to these postmasters. You can walk across the street from the post-office in Chicago and go into the first business establishment and you will find men performing duties which require no greater talent or responsibility than the position of postmaster of a great city, and who receive $8,000 to $10,000 per annum. You can go into the banking establishments, into establishments such as Marshall Field & Co.'s, or the Farwells', or Henderson's, or Armour & Co.'s, or Carson, Pirie, Scott & Co.'s, and you will find men there—not the proprietors, understand, but men in charge of departments, such as the silk department, the hosiery department, or men having charge of the credits of the establishment and those looking after the economy of the concern—who are receiving $6,000, $8,000, $10,000, and all the way up to $15,000. The salary of the secretary of the board of trade is $8,000 per annum.

There is another reason why the postmaster in one of these large cities should receive some compensation for the responsibility which he assumes. You will find that the first act which one of these officers does after he is appointed is to go before a court and furnish bond in the sum of $600,000 to $1,000,000. The sureties upon this bond are required to qualify in that amount. You may say that this is not a hard matter to accomplish; but I call your attention to the fact that few men desire to go upon a postmaster's bond, for they guarantee not only the fidelity and integrity of the officer, but his ability to see that the amounts passing through the hands of his various employés, not appointed by himself, are not made away with, but that every dollar is accounted for.

Now, Mr. Chairman, it seems singular that when a bill of this kind is before the House the men who attack it——

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. ADAMS, of Illinois, obtained the floor and said: I yield my time to my colleague.

Mr. DAVIS, of Illinois. I thank my colleague for his courtesy. I say it is a singular fact that the men who oppose these appropriations come from localities that do not pay for this service in their own districts. We in Chicago are the parties who contribute this money for the salary of our postmaster; and we claim that you should permit us to give encouragement and remuneration satisfactory to men of great fidelity and integrity, and somewhere near proportionate to the responsibility assumed, so that the best talent and ability may be called into this service and the service thereby made most efficient.

I submit herewith a statement showing the States and Territories which pay a net revenue to the Government:

The following seventeen States and Territories pay $7,360,553 net revenue, and the service there is more than self-sustaining:

All the New England States and New York, New Jersey, Pennsylvania, Delaware, Michigan, Illinois, Wisconsin, Iowa, Minnesota, Dakota, and the District of Columbia.

The remaining thirty-two States and Territories have a deficit of $4,707,582, and the service is not self-sustaining.

This bill by this provision is a direct blow struck at nine of the postmasters of the country, a blow at nine of the great cities, eight of which are the great commercial centers of the country. The total revenue last year from these nine cities was $12,326,066, one-fourth of the entire revenue. And the net revenue received in these offices is $8,113,019, or one-sixth of the total revenue of the country.

I submit here a statement showing gross and net revenue and the amount of proposed reduction of salaries.

The gross revenue of these nine cities and proposed reduction of postmasters' salaries is as follows:

Cities.	Gross revenue.	Reduced salary.
New York	$4,413,821	$4,000
Chicago	1,949,180	2,000
Philadelphia	1,581,791	2,000
Boston	1,507,529	2,000
Saint Louis	843,730	2,000
Cincinnati	638,624	2,000
San Francisco	558,133	1,000
Baltimore	540,503	1,000
Washington	292,755	1,000
Total	12,326,066	17,000

One-quarter or more of the total revenue from the entire country.

The net revenue of these cities is as follows:

New York	$3,004,261
Chicago	1,332,549
Boston	998,528
Philadelphia	965,231
Saint Louis	554,678
Cincinnati	434,723
San Francisco	392,136
Baltimore	350,878
Washington	80,025
Total	8,113,019

One-sixth of the total revenue of the country.

That is not the only point in the matter. These men become responsible for large sums. They receive the funds of the money-order system, and the postmaster of the city of New York was responsible last year for money receipts, postal receipts, and money-order funds to the extent of $32,526,000. These nine offices last year received, in postal funds and money-orders, $75,449,543.

I submit herewith a statement of the total amount of postal moneys (same being postal receipts and deposits of money-order funds) received at these nine offices for the year ending June 30, 1883:

New York	$32,526,359 52
Chicago	12,297,035 23
Philadelphia	5,211,770 47
Boston	4,177,812 29
Saint Louis	8,790,910 31
Baltimore	2,465,782 15
Cincinnati	2,963,608 11
San Francisco	4,793,259 86
Washington	2,223,010 42
Total	75,449,548 36

There is no call, Mr. Chairman, for this act; there is no petition here, there is no request here, there is no man, woman, or child who contributes one cent, directly or indirectly, in these great cities for the support of this service who asks this act to be done. They look upon the advancement of the salaries of these postmasters from $5,000 to $6,000 as something desirable for the service in giving these men encouragement by granting to them salaries something like those paid in private life.

I was surprised, therefore, Mr. Chairman, that a gentleman from my own State of Illinois should permit a law of this kind to be presented to this House. We strike at the postmaster of the chief city of his own State, whose salary it is proposed to strike down by this bill. Does he not know that the income of that office pays for the service in that gentleman's own district? If we were to make this postal service a self-sustaining one in each district there is not a man, woman, or child who resides in his district who would ever see a letter from one end of the year to the other.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman's time has expired.

Mr. HOLMAN. I will move to amend the text by adding the following words:

Except the salary of the postmaster of the city of New York, which shall be $6,000.

Now, Mr. Chairman, the effect of this amendment is to re-enact the law just as it stood up to the last session of Congress. Up to that time the salaries of postmasters were limited to $4,000, with the exception of the State of New York, and there it was fixed at $6,000——

Mr. BINGHAM. Will the gentleman from Indiana permit me to interrupt him as to a question of fact?

Mr. HOLMAN. Certainly.

Mr. BINGHAM. The salary of the postmaster of the city of New York was increased from $4,000 to $6,000 in 1864, and then from $6,000 to $8,000 in 1875. We merely re-enacted in the act of 1883 what it was from 1875.

Mr. HOLMAN. My amendment should be modified so as to make it $8,000 instead of $6,000, and then it will be what the law was up to the last session of Congress. At the last session of Congress, by a wholly unconsidered bill—and no man living to-day can tell what the salary of the postmaster of New York is under the present limitation—all these salaries were increased. I am willing the salary of the postmaster of the city of New York should remain what it was and what it remained for years—what it remained during the whole period of the war, during the whole time of inflation, and as it stood at the last session of Congress when the law I have indicated was passed. There I beg you to leave it with the limitation of the other salaries which was the law up to the last session. I earnestly hope there will be no change in that law as it stood for so many years.

This side of the House is not responsible for that enactment. If I remember correctly they did not favor it. No man can tell the effect of the law, and if the Committee on Appropriations does not legislate—let me say that up to this time it has been impossible to tell exactly what the working of the law is.

Gentlemen say these salaries are not enough at $4,000. You pay most of the governors of the States no more than $4,000, while a large part of the supreme judges in the States do not receive salaries over $4,000. I am told here by gentlemen present that a majority of the governors of their States do not receive larger salaries.

But it is said there is great responsibility imposed upon these postmasters. I wish to call the attention of the committee to the question of responsibility. Large bonds we are told are required. Under the present state of the law there is indeed no responsibility, and I speak advisedly when I use that expression. Under the law of the last session of Congress there is no liability if the postmaster has the simple quality of integrity; no matter what defalcations may occur among his subordinates he is not responsible for them. Your Post-Office Department is authorized without appeal to Congress to relieve him entirely.

Mr. BINGHAM. Only up to $2,000.

Mr. HOLMAN. The Department has the power to relieve him entirely.

Mr. BINGHAM. Only up to $2,000.

Mr. HOLMAN. Up to $2,000, and then he may come to Congress. So I tell this committee there is no liability on the part of the postmaster and has not been if he has the quality of integrity. I admit it is the most valuable one in the public service. He is without responsibility if he has the simple quality of integrity and nothing more.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman's time has expired.

The Chair desires to ascertain of the gentleman from Indiana whether it is his intention to offer his amendment as an amendment to the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Illinois or does he offer it as an independent amendment to perfect the text?

Mr. HOLMAN. My amendment is an addition to the text of the bill.

Mr. HEWITT, of New York. Does the gentleman from Indiana modify his amendment as to New York?

Mr. HOLMAN. Certainly. I wish to restore that to just what it was last year.

Mr. MONEY. Mr. Chairman, I had been instructed by the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads to make the motion made by the gentleman from Illinois. It has been stated by the gentleman from Indiana, as a reason to guide us in fixing the salaries of postmasters at certain first-class offices, that the salaries of judges—supreme court judges of the various States—are fixed ordinarily at a much lower sum. I will respond to the gentleman by saying that those matters do not concern us at all. I know some of the great States of this Union do pay their governors only $1,000 a year, while some of the justices of the supreme courts in our States receive but from $3,000 to $3,500 a year. But that does not concern us. We are considering now a matter with which we have to deal and over which we have exclusive control.

I want to show that there is something more of responsibility attaching to these various offices than the gentleman from Indiana is disposed to admit. To-day there is a judgment, if it has not been revoked in the last few months, against the postmaster at New York and the late Postmaster-General, Mr. James, for about $70,000 because of the use in that office of a rubber stamp invented by a man named Campbell; and I venture to say that the gentleman from Indiana would not be willing to come in here and vote one dollar of the amount necessary to relieve his bondsmen in that case.

In that city, Mr. Chairman, the postmaster is required to give a bond of $1,000,000.

Mr. HOLMAN. Let me interrupt the gentleman to ask if that action was brought upon the bond of the postmaster or for a violation of the patent laws in the unauthorized use of a patented article?

Mr. MONEY. It was for the reason I have stated.

Mr. MORSE. Whatever it was, it was brought in the line of his duty.

Mr. HOLMAN. It was for the unauthorized use of a patent; and I venture to assert that no gentleman present will say that the postmaster of that city is ever expected to pay that judgment out of his own pocket.

Mr. MORSE. Then why do you not vote to strike out the bonds of the postmasters? It will make your own amendment more consistent.

Mr. MONEY. Whatever may be the ground of the judgment, it exists as I have said.

I will say, Mr. Chairman, that the Government does not require its officials to give bonds of $1,000,000 unless it means something. It makes no difference, as my friend says, whether a man gives a bond or not if he is honest. If he is honest the bond is a mere nominal thing. If a man has the character and capacity in the community in which he resides to enable him to raise a bond of $1,000,000 his services are certainly worth more than $4,000 a year.

Then there are seventeen postmasters affected by this clause. The revenue derived from these seventeen offices aggregates $14,500,000 annually. These seventeen postmasters are responsible for the collection and remittal to the Treasury of the United States of fourteen and one-half millions of dollars. The postmaster of the city of New York has under his control 1,500 clerks. It is the largest post-office in the world. It is a larger office than the Saint Martin's le Grand, in London. They handle 214 tons of mail matter on an average in New York every day; yet the compensation of the man in charge of all of this vast machinery is to be fixed by this bill at $4,000. The service is worth vastly more than you propose to pay for it. No man will question that fact.

Then, Mr. Chairman, we have a number of other postmasters throughout the country not doing quite so large a business as in New York but worthy of far greater salaries than you propose to fix here. Take the city of Philadelphia for instance; the business of that city amounted last year to $1,581,000.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. WHITE, of Kentucky. If I can obtain the floor I will yield to the gentleman from Mississippi.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair desires to state that the time allowed for debate has been exhausted upon this amendment.

Mr. DAVIS, of Illinois. I wish to ask a parliamentary question; if the amendment of the gentleman from Indiana is in order?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair understands it to be in order as an amendment to the text of the bill. A vote would be first taken upon that proposition.

Mr. MONEY. I move to strike out the last word.

The CHAIRMAN. There are two amendments pending——

Mr. HOLMAN. I think the gentleman has a right to amend the amendment.

Mr. BINGHAM. The amendment of the gentleman from Indiana is not an amendment to the pending amendment, but to the text, as I understand it.

Mr. MONEY. I move to strike out the last word.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. Mr. Chairman, I must insist upon a strict construction of the rule.

Mr. MONEY. Have I the floor?

Mr. TOWNSHEND. I do not wish to make the point of order on the gentleman from Mississippi, but I give notice that I will hereafter.

Mr. MONEY. Does the gentleman make the point of order?

Mr. TOWNSHEND. Not at present.

Mr. MONEY. It is the present that I am dealing with; I do not care for the hereafter. [Laughter.]

Mr. TOWNSHEND. If the gentleman wishes it I shall make the point of order now.

Mr. MONEY. I am wholly indifferent to what the gentleman may do in the matter.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. Then I make the point of order that the amendment is not in order, as there are two pending.

Mr. HOLMAN. The gentleman from Mississippi has a right to move to amend my amendment to the text.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. The gentleman from Illinois has an amendment pending; then the gentleman from Indiana has made an amendment to the amendment. It is not in order now to entertain another.

Mr. BINGHAM. No; the gentleman from Indiana moves an amendment to the text, as I understand it.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. But that is the pending amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair thinks the gentleman from Mississippi is in order. The proposition of the gentleman from Indiana is to amend the text. The gentleman from Mississippi moves to strike out the last word of that amendment. The amendment proposed by the gentleman from Illinois, to strike out a part of the text, is in the nature of a substitute.

Mr. MONEY. I have not the slightest interest in any increase of salaries of postmasters, because there is scarcely a single office of the second class in my State. I live in an agricultural State. But I know the best way to get the best service is to pay a reasonable price for it.

Here is a list of officers in this city who are merely head clerks, who do merely routine business, and twenty-three of these gentlemen are paid as much as it is proposed to pay to the postmaster at Philadelphia, who handles in a year $1,580,000. There are gentlemen in this city receiving salaries of $8,000, of $6,000, of $5,000—half a dozen of them; others $4,500. Here is an opportunity for the exercise of economy. I do not say they are getting too much. But if the gentleman is to deal in comparisons he need not go out of the limits of this jurisdiction to hunt up the salaries of State officers. He can find them in this capital; officers who have to give no bonds, who have no responsibilities in the sense that these gentlemen have, who are the superiors of a number of subordinates and bureaus.

There is nothing in this amendment which is obnoxious to a sense of sound economy. We will be entirely in the line of the precedents which a Democratic House has established of safe and sound economy if we give these postmasters the salary they are entitled to by reason of the character of their services, the amount of the bonds they have to give, the volume of business they transact, and the degree of competency required for the right administration of their offices.

These gentlemen stand on their bonds and responsibility, and in my opinion it is an unwise reduction in their pay when we put it down to a figure at which no competent man can serve. You know the seductions of great corporations have withdrawn the best brains of this country from the public service. You have seen judges of United States circuit courts going down from the bench to become attorneys of railroads. You find those corporations are gradually withdrawing from the public service the men most fit to grapple with the great questions which come before us for elucidation. Why is it? Because you do not provide sufficient compensation to encourage the highest talent, ability, and reputation of the country to remain in the public service. I say we will be unfaithful to our trust if we trim down in this way the salaries at the nine important offices reduced by this bill.

Mr. BINGHAM. Nine only.

Mr. MONEY. I think seventeen; but I will say nine. I do not care about the number. The only desire I have is simply to present the facts to this committee, that it may act intelligently. I have no interest in this amendment. I care not whether you adopt it or not. But I say from my experience with this Department of the Government, from my information, which has become somewhat intimate in regard to it, that this is not a reduction which commends itself to the good sense of this House.

Mr. HOLMAN rose.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. I move that the committee rise for the purpose of limiting debate.

Mr. HOLMAN. I wish only a moment.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. Very well. I withdraw the motion for the present.

Mr. HOLMAN. I have listened now, I believe, to the first argument I have heard from this side of the House in favor of either of two things, extravagant salaries or that your Government shall compete with the railroad corporations in their corrupting tendencies. I have listened for the first time to an argument in favor of either of those propositions coming from this side of the House. If it is true that the Democratic element of this country is proposing to rival and imitate the other side in their extravagant views touching the administration of our affairs, then the days of this Republic are numbered. If there is any one quality necessary to preserve the very foundations on which our free institutions rest it is honesty in your Government; and you will not have integrity unless you have economy. The terms "honesty in government" and "economy in government" are in our Republic convertible terms. They mean exactly the same thing.

Why, sir, during the whole period of the war even the other side of the House, with your inflated currency, were willing to let these salaries stand at $4,000, with as high a responsibility attached to the offices for all practical purposes as now. And now in a Democratic House it is proposed that salaries increased beyond reasonable limits in the last Congress shall be ratified and confirmed.

We are told that this is following safe Democratic precedents. When has such a proposition, argued in the spirit in which this has been argued by my friend from Mississippi, been brought forward by any portion of the Democratic party either here or in the great States of this Union? I do say, sir, with that model of government furnished to you by your great States, which in the interest not only of public economy but of public integrity provide that their salaries shall be moderate and reasonable, and fix the salaries of governors of great States and of supreme judges of great States at from $3,500 to $4,000, Congress in going beyond this strikes a deadly blow at the purity and integrity of our public service. And all attempts at reform in that service will be found to be a delusion and a snare unless you strike at the real extravagance of the salaries paid by the Government in comparison with the salaries in private life.

Mr. BINGHAM. I desire to move an amendment.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. I move that the committee rise.

The motion was agreed to; there being—ayes 75, noes 63.

The committee accordingly rose; and Mr. REAGAN having taken the chair as Speaker pro tempore, Mr. BLOUNT reported that the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union had had under consideration the bill (H. R. 5459) making appropriations for the service of the Post-Office Department for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1885, and for other purposes, and had come to no resolution thereon.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. I move that the House now resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, and pending that I move that all debate on the pending paragraph and amendments thereto be limited to twenty minutes.

Mr. HORR. I am willing to compromise with the gentleman on forty minutes. This is a matter which affects nine large cities. I think my proposition is a fair one.

Mr. BINGHAM. There are only some six controverted points in this entire bill, and I think more time should be allowed for debate on this one, which is of some importance.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. Very well. In order to save the consumption of time in the discussion of the matter I am willing to concede thirty minutes, and will move that all debate upon the pending paragraph and all amendments thereto be limited to thirty minutes.

The motion to limit debate was agreed to.

The motion to go into Committee of the Whole was then agreed to.

The House accordingly resolved itself into Committee of the Whole, Mr. BLOUNT in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The House is now in Committee of the Whole, and resumes the consideration of the Post-Office appropriation bill. By order of the House all debate upon the pending paragraph and amendments thereto has been limited to thirty minutes.

Mr. POTTER. I agree generally with all that has been said or that can be said by the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN] in favor of honesty and economy in the public service. But the cutting down of salaries so as not to be able to secure the kind of talent and ability which is necessary in the office to which the salary relates is not economy, it is waste.

I have had some occasion to know what is the value of such services as are required in the post-office of the city of New York and what amount of compensation would be adequate to secure the talent and ability necessary in the administration of that great office. The salary list in that office alone exceeds $800,000 a year. The postmaster is supposed to administer the force of that office, to regulate the compensation and manner of employment of his subordinates, and to systematize the business of that entire office so as to economize and produce the best results in that branch of the public service. And I aver that that talent can not be secured for $4,000 a year, nor for $6,000 a year; and I do not believe that $8,000 a year is an adequate compensation for the services required in the management of that office.

Mr. HOLMAN. Will the gentleman permit me to ask him a question?

Mr. POTTER. Very well.

Mr. HOLMAN. Does the gentleman expect by an increase of the salary beyond $8,000 a year to secure a more competent man as postmaster of New York city than has heretofore occupied that office?

Mr. HORR. This bill cuts his salary down to $4,000.

Mr. COX, of New York. I understand the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN] proposes $8,000 for the salary of the postmaster of the city of New York.

Mr. HOLMAN. Just what was allowed at the last session.

Mr. POTTER. I do not understand whether the salary now proposed is $8,000 or $6,000.

Mr. HORR. The bill makes it $4,000. The amendment of the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN] restores it to the present sum, $8,000.

Mr. POTTER. I say that $8,000 a year is not an adequate salary for the responsibility and labor required in that great office; it ought to be more than $8,000. In reply to the gentleman's question whether we can secure an adequate degree of talent for $8,000 I reply no, and I speak with some knowledge on the subject.

Mr. HOLMAN. Will my friend allow me? Has not the business of these various offices, including that of New York city, been well administered heretofore, and will he get those offices better administered by an increase of the salaries?

Mr. POTTER. I know that some of the best men, those who have given the best service to the Government in the post-office at New York, have left the service and gone into private employment. And I wish to say——

Mr. HOLMAN. Now——

Mr. POTTER. I do not wish to be interrupted further until I get through. I wish to say that the business of this great nation is in large measure at stake upon the promptness and certainty and correctness with which the mails in that great center of commerce are handled. The kind of talent which can administer that office most effectually for the good of the country would command in one moment in any other honorable private employment in the city $10,000 a year and upward.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. MORSE. I have had some experience regarding the postmasters in some of the large cities, particularly in Boston. I know that the commission of the postmaster in Boston recently expired, and on account of the small salary received and the large amount of bonds required there were not five applicants for that office. When my friend from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN] says that the bonds are of no consequence, I simply wish to state to him—although it may not be exactly fair to my postmaster—that I have been asked to sign his bonds and have refused to do so from the experience I have had here of the responsibility of so doing.

Mr. DUNN. And yet you would give the same man a bigger salary?

Mr. MORSE. I would.

Mr. DUNN. You think that the higher the salary the more honest the man?

Mr. MORSE. I know that my experience has been that the best lawyer and the best doctor are those who command the best prices.

Mr. DUNN. Would you sign a bond for the same man if he had a bigger salary?

Mr. MORSE. I would most decidedly. A man who handles the property of the Government and turns into its Treasury $1,000,000 a year, and who signs bonds of $200,000 and gets a salary of only $6,000 a year, to cut down his salary to $4,000 a year is simply a farce. No man in private business would expect to obtain a man for that amount of labor and responsibility for any such sum of money as that.

Mr. HOLMAN. The remarks of the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. MORSE] while somewhat personal to myself are quite natural to a gentleman who hangs a little loosely on our side of the House.

Mr. MORSE. I do on that question, certainly.

Mr. HOLMAN. And generally he is quite mild upon any Democratic line of policy. When the question was put to him in the case he brought forward for illustration, whether or not he would have signed the bond if the salary had been greater than it was, his answer was fair and prompt. But that the character and conduct and integrity of a public officer shall be in any degree influenced by the question of the amount of his salary is marvelous, unaccountable.

Why, sir, my friend from New York can not say that the present incumbent of the office of postmaster in the city of New York will perform the duties of the office any better than his predecessors, who received a smaller salary. He will not say that the great post-offices of this country will be any better administered in consequence of giving larger salaries. When you pay $4,000 you have reached a large salary. Do gentlemen remember that the only effect of the increase of salaries is to impose heavier burdens upon that great body of our people whose individual incomes are but a few hundred dollars yearly?

Mr. ADAMS, of Illinois. Where does this money come from?

Mr. HOLMAN. It comes from the labor of our people.

Mr. ADAMS, of Illinois. Does it not come from those who pay the revenues of the Post-Office Department? Does it not come from these large cities?

Mr. HOLMAN. I answer the gentleman by saying that the taxation of our people, out of which you pay the salaries of your Government officials, comes from the labor of the people. It is dug from the mines; it is pounded into shape in your shops; it comes from labor. Yet gentlemen of this House, in order to pay handsome salaries, extravagant salaries, far beyond the compensation paid in private employments for corresponding service requiring corresponding integrity, are willing to tax the great body of the people whose earnings are but a few hundred dollars a year.

One word further. Just as you have increased salaries—for, mark you, during the whole war period you did not make this increase—just as you have increased salaries the want of integrity in the administration of your Government has begun to appear.

Mr. HORR (to Mr. HOLMAN). Why do you not move to cut down your salary?

Mr. HOLMAN. I am willing to do it—perfectly willing.

Mr. HORR. Well, why do you not do it?

Mr. HOLMAN. I have tried to do it more than once.

Mr. REAGAN. Mr. Chairman, as I understand the bill in the form recommended by the Committee on Appropriations is simply intended to restore the law to what it was before the act of the last Congress and to allow to postmasters generally in our large cities—making an exception perhaps in the case of New York and possibly one other city—a salary of $4,000. The objection is made that competent and responsible gentlemen can not perform the duties of postmasters in these cities for $4,000 a year. Mr. Chairman, the salaries of the governors of more than half the States of this Union do not exceed $4,000. Few of our State officials, whether governors, judges of supreme courts, or other officers, receive more than $4,000 a year.

Mr. HORR. Will the gentleman let me ask——

Mr. REAGAN. No, sir. When I have but five minutes I must decline to be interrupted. The gentleman makes it a rule to interrupt every one who speaks on this side of the House. I am trying in my five minutes to show why I propose to support the action of the Committee on Appropriations on this subject.

One of the evils of our time is imperialism. Everything tends in that direction. That which distinguishes the English Government in theory from ours is its policy of imperial salaries—the enriching of the office-holding class, who receive extravagant salaries, while those whose labor pays are depressed in poverty.

Here are members of this House called upon constantly to act on great questions affecting vital interests amounting to millions and hundreds of millions of dollars—men who in order to discharge their duties properly should devote to them a life of labor and preparation—and our salaries are limited to $5,000. Go to the Departments and you find that almost every head of a bureau must have at least $5,000. Every official under the Federal Government must have an extravagant salary. The tendency of this system is demoralizing, and it would seem that in proportion as salaries are high those who receive them are able to live without labor and employ others to do their work; for I believe under this Government there is generally one head man who has a clerk who gives directions to a man under him, who does the work. Thus it takes three officers generally to do the work of one, and the one who does nothing must have an extraordinary salary for doing nothing.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. BINGHAM. With reference to the remarks of the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN] on the subject of the obligation of a postmaster upon his bond, I wish to say that it was my honor to be for six years postmaster at the city of Philadelphia. I gave bond in $300,000, and during that time three defalcations occurred in the office.

Mr. HORR. By subordinates?

Mr. BINGHAM. Yes; by my subordinates. I was able from the bondsman of one to obtain the amount of the defalcation, but for the other two defalcations I had to go to my own pocket to pay them into the Treasury of the United States. That same obligation exists to-day, and that is the reason why for the large amount of moneys handled the Government requires a large bond from the postmaster.

Another point. The gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN] has lectured the House upon our duty as to economy. He comes in with this bill and proposes to save on postmasters' salaries in nine cities $17,000, but knowing the intelligence, independence, and knowledge of business performed in New York city on the part of its Representatives, and the one before me especially, knowing he could not carry his side of the House if he proposed to cut down the compensation of the postmaster of that city annually to $4,000, instead of saving $17,000 on this bill, he gives to the New York postmaster the old salary of $8,000 and then comes in with a new proposition to strike down the salaries of the other eight postmasters of the great cities of the country, reducing their compensation to the extent of $13,000. Let me say you have just voted $10,500,000 for the payment of the salaries of the postmasters of the country. The nine post-offices do 27.3 per cent. of your entire business, and the salaries paid these men under the present law is $53,000. They do 27 per cent. of your entire business, and yet their compensation is only $53,000, while for the other 73 per cent. of the business your postmasters' salaries amount to something over $10,450,000. And what do these officers do? They handle $12,300,000 of your $47,009,000.

In the money-order business alone they handle $41,000,000 of the $125,000,000.

As the chairman of the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads at the last session of Congress I reported the bill which was then passed increasing the compensation of the postmasters of the country, and although the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN] strenuously opposed the bill, it nevertheless had the support of many gentlemen on the other side of the House. It had the support generally in the House of intelligent members and those disposed to do what was right toward these faithful officers of the Government. Only eleven members voted against it.

I wish to say that in 1864 we increased the compensation of the postmaster of the city of New York from $4,000 to $6,000 a year, at which rate of salary that office remained until 1875, when, in consideration of the growth of the postal business in that city and the largely increased responsibility imposed upon the postmaster, Congress then increased the salary from $6,000 to $8,000 a year. The postal business in almost every one of the eight great cities has increased until it is in fact equal to what it was in New York in 1864 when the salary of the postmaster of that city was increased from $4,000 to $6,000. If it were right in 1864 to increase the compensation of the postmaster of New York to $6,000 and in 1875 to $8,000 because of the increase of the postal business in that city, then by parity of reasoning it is only just and right on the part of this House, in view of the work done, in view of the bonded obligation imposed upon the postmasters, in view of the responsibility, and in view of the fact that one-fourth of the revenue of the Post-Office Department comes from those cities, to pay their postmasters compensation to the amount of $53,000.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. TOWNSHEND. Mr. Chairman, I wish the House to understand the real question now pending before I make any general remarks. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. DAVIS] moves to strike out the paragraph so far as it places a limitation upon the salaries of postmasters, while the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN] moves an amendment to the text excepting from the operation of the paragraph the city of New York, and fixing the salary of the postmaster at New York city at $8,000 a year. If the committee shall sustain that amendment to the paragraph in the bill it will leave the law where it was before the act of the last session of Congress was passed. If, on the contrary, the paragraph in the bill is thrown out, it will open the door to the payment of large and exorbitant salaries to these postmasters.

Mr. BINGHAM. Only $53,000.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. Now, I do not believe, Mr. Chairman, we can get any better talent or any better service from the average member of Congress to-day than we got fifty years ago, when Clay and Webster were members here. I do not believe you get any better intelligence or any better service to-day in any of the Executive Departments of the Government than we had occupying those offices some years ago. And for one I am opposed to the payment of exorbitant salaries to the office-holders under this Government. When we pay salaries to Government office-holders so much larger than are paid elsewhere for the same character of service it inevitably leads to the establishment in our midst of an aristocratic class, and against the establishment in this republican form of government of any such class those who framed our Constitution made every provision within their power. Benjamin Franklin, the great philosopher and statesman, saw the danger which would arise from the payment of high salaries, and I will read a word or two from what he said in the debates in the Federal convention of 1787:

> Besides these evils, sir, though we may set out in the beginning with moderate salaries, we shall find that such will not be of long continuance. Reasons will never be wanting for proposed augmentations. * * * Hence, as all history informs us, there has been in every state and kingdom a constant kind of warfare between the governing and governed, the one striving to obtain more for its support and the other to pay less. * * * Generally, indeed, the ruling power carries its point, the revenues of princes constantly increasing; and we see that they are never satisfied, but always in want of more. The more the people are discontented with the oppression of taxes the greater need the prince has of money to distribute among his partisans and the troops that are to suppress all resistance and enable him to plunder at pleasure. There is scarce a king in a hundred who would not if he could follow the example of Pharaoh, get first all the people's money, then all their lands, and then make them and their children servants forever. It will be said that we do not propose to establish kings. I know it; but there is a natural inclination in mankind to kingly government. It sometimes relieves them from aristocratic domination. They had rather have one tyrant than five hundred. It gives more of the equality among citizens, and that they like. I am apprehensive therefore, perhaps too apprehensive, that the government of these States may in future times end in a monarchy. But this catastrophe I think may be long delayed, if in our proposed system we do not sow the seeds of contention, faction, and tumult by making our posts of honor places of profit. If we do, I fear that, though we do employ at first a number, and not a single person, the number will in time be set aside; it will only nourish the fœtus of a king, as the honorable gentleman from Virginia very aptly expressed it, and a king will the sooner be set over us.

Benjamin Franklin, sir, foresaw just what is transpiring here to-day. Excuses are constantly being brought up for an increase of the salaries of governmental officers. Until the last Congress no postmaster in the Union received a higher salary than $4,000, except in the city of New York, where special reasons existed for a larger sum.

Why gentlemen want to measure the salary by the amount of money disbursed or the responsibilities belonging to the business. Do they think that the duties of the postmasters at Chicago, or at Boston or Philadelphia, or New York are equal to the responsibilities resting upon the Postmaster-General? His salary is limited to $8,000. Take the subtreasury agents in the different cities, in Saint Louis, Chicago, Philadelphia, or Boston. They have under their control, in many instances, at least ten times the amount of public money that is disbursed by the postmasters. I do not know the amount of the bond that they give, but doubtless it is much larger than any of the postmasters in the Union. You can not measure, therefore, the salary by the amount of money that is disbursed.

Mr. HORR. Mr. Chairman, before the committee is called to vote upon the pending amendments I wish to say but a single word, so that the matter may stand squarely before us.

The gentleman from Illinois moves to strike out the clause, which will leave the salaries of postmasters as they are now; that is to say, New York at $8,000, the other seven large cities at $6,000, and Washington at $5,000. The gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN] moves to amend the amendment of the gentleman from Illinois and leave New York city at its old figure, $8,000, but he leaves the other eight large cities as they are in the bill; that is to say, at $4,000 each. Now, why the gentleman from Indiana should be partial to the city of New York is a mystery to me, except upon one ground. Why is he doing this for New York?

Mr. HOLMAN. Am I doing so in restoring the old law of the last session?

Mr. HORR. I can see but one reason for this outburst of generosity toward New York, and that is that New York city is the home of the New York Sun, which has just published his picture for the country. [Laughter.] Otherwise, I do not see why he would come before the House with an amendment undertaking to legislate in favor of New York and against the other great cities of this country.

Now, what is his proposition? If the gentleman from Indiana will say that that is his object, he has my hearty sympathy from this time on. But I wish the members of this committee to understand that here is an attempt to cut down the salaries of the postmasters at nine of the great cities, where we collect one-quarter of the postal revenues of the United States. It is not claimed that these men do not earn their salaries. I say they are worthy of what the old law gives to them. I differ with my friend from Illinois [Mr. TOWNSHEND]. I believe the salaries of Congressmen are none too high at the present time. I try to earn my money. I can readily see, however, how a man who has a feeling of depreciation about what he is doing might feel as he does. [Laughter.] But if a man is conscious of doing his duty he ought to be conscious that he is earning the amount of the salary he receives.

The CHAIRMAN. The time allowed for debate has expired. The question will now be taken upon the amendment proposed to the text of the bill by the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN].

Mr. BINGHAM. That was not an amendment proposed by the gentleman from Indiana. He simply suggested it to perfect the bill. The only amendment to the bill is that of the gentleman from Illinois.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Indiana attempts to perfect the bill by an amendment.

Mr. HORR. I submit that the vote should be first taken upon the resolution of the gentleman from Illinois.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair thinks otherwise.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. I submit that it is the right of the gentleman from Indiana to amend the text first, and that his amendment is first in order.

Mr. HORR. I insist that the motion of the gentleman from Indiana is not to perfect the bill. If it was I would yield to him at once.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair thinks otherwise.

The Clerk will report the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Indiana.

The Clerk read as follows:

> At the end of line 25 add the following:
> "Except the salary of the postmaster of the city of New York, which shall be $8,000 per annum."

Mr. BINGHAM. I rise to a question of order. Can a gentleman without the authority of the committee perfect this bill?

The CHAIRMAN. This is no question about an attempt on the part of any gentleman to perfect the bill. It is a question to be submitted to the committee.

The committee divided; and there were—ayes 53, noes 94.

Mr. HOLMAN. I believe there is no quorum.

The CHAIRMAN. The point of order being made that no quorum has voted, the Chair will appoint tellers.

Mr. HOLMAN and Mr. HORR were appointed tellers.

The committee again divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 50, noes 112.

So the amendment of Mr. HOLMAN was not agreed to.

Mr. HEWITT, of Alabama. I move a further amendment by inserting $6,000 instead of $8,000; the same amendment proposed by the gentleman from Indiana with the exception of the amount.

The CHAIRMAN. That motion is in order. The Clerk will report the proposed amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Except the salary of the postmaster at the city of New York, which shall be $6,000 per annum.

The committee divided; and there were—ayes 38, noes 101.

So the amendment was not agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is now on the amendment of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. DAVIS], which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Strike out all of the paragraph after the word "dollars," in line 22, namely, these words: "And no salary of any postmaster under the act entitled 'An act to adjust the salaries of postmasters,' approved March 3, 1883, shall exceed the sum of $4,000 per annum."

The question being taken on agreeing to the amendment, there were—ayes 106, noes 32.

Mr. HOLMAN. No quorum.

Mr. HORR. I hope the gentleman will not insist upon the point as to a quorum. It only takes time to have a vote by tellers.

Mr. HOLMAN. I must insist upon a quorum. This amendment takes an important feature out of this bill.

Mr. DAVIS, of Illinois. It takes no feature out of the bill that ought to be preserved. It only leaves the law as it is.

The CHAIRMAN. The point being made that a quorum has not voted, the Chair will order tellers, and appoint the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN] and the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. HORR].

The committee again divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 117, noes 45.

So the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. I give notice that in the House I will demand the yeas and nays on that amendment.

Mr. DAVIS, of Illinois. I trust you will.

The Clerk read the following paragraph:

For compensation to clerks in post-offices, $4,775,000.

Mr. HORR. I offer the amendment which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

In line 27 strike out "$4,775,000" and insert "$4,900,000;" so that it will read: "For compensation to clerks in post-offices, $4,900,000."

Mr. HORR. In offering this amendment I wish to say to the committee that this item varies from the last one in this respect, that if you fail to appropriate the money required we fail to get the service. The Post-Office Department get clerks where they are needed only in case that money is furnished to pay them with.

My friend from Illinois [Mr. TOWNSHEND] who has charge of this bill has been very careful to state to this House that his bill appropriates more than the committee of the last Congress appropriated. Now, right here I wish to say to this committee that I do not believe that is a basis on which we can figure at all. Whether some committee of some other Congress did right or wrong is no reason why we in this Congress should not do right. But in this instance, notwithstanding the immense increase in the demand for this branch of the public service, my friend from Illinois will notice that he has not given one shilling in excess of last year's appropriation. And yet the Postmaster-General will tell you, if you will inquire, that there will not be a dollar of last year's appropriation left at the end of the year. I showed on Saturday that there were already on file in the Departments 2,604 applications for increase of this service.

What is this service? It is to give clerks to men who live at the distributing points on the various railroads and at points where the mail diverges and is separated, so that the postmasters who receive small salaries at those points can do that distributing. Many of them are at places where the offices bring in no revenue.

Now, there were over 9,000 miles of new road built last year. Many clerks are needed for new places on these lines. Is there a member in this committee who has not somewhere in his district an office that needs an extra clerk? I doubt if there is a man west of the Alleghanies or south of the Ohio River who has not a demand for extra service of this kind in his district. This bill does not appropriate one shilling for next year's increase and growth; and if you refuse to give it you take it out of the service. It can not be thrown into a deficiency bill, as the former item could be. You cripple the service if you do not make the appropriation.

Mr. HORR. I do not desire to occupy more time, and I think the committee should give this extra $125,000 without debate.

Mr. WHITE, of Kentucky. I heartily concur in what the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. HORR] has just said. In place of having this item $4,775,000 it should be at least $6,000,000. The poorest paid men in the service of the United States are the fourth-class postmasters, to whom so small an allowance is made for clerk-hire. I have made some inquiry concerning this, and the facts are simply startling. There are in the United States 45,956 fourth-class post-offices, and the average pay is $169.64. There are in the United States out of that entire number of fourth-class postmasters but 927 that receive any allowance for clerk-hire. To those that do receive an allowance the average is $244.32 per office. Now, sir, it strikes me that that is the place for us to make some improvement in the service. Is it any wonder that the fourth-class postmasters have no furniture sufficient to protect the mails? Is it any wonder when you step into the fourth-class post-offices to see such a laxity in the discharge of the duties imposed upon the postmasters by the Government? Do you not know that nearly all these postmasters may be called upon by the Pension Office to give important information to the Pension Bureau in regard to the credibility of witnesses? Do you not know that these men handle registered packages? It strikes me, sir, that this state of affairs should not be allowed to continue while we have so much money in our Treasury. I am not one of those like the gentleman from Colorado who want to throw it out any way so that you get it out. I am not one of those who can say with him that because the Democratic party refused to consider the whisky bill the other day therefore you put seventy millions more in the Treasury and therefore ought to be condemned for it. I am aware of the fact that we have fifteen hundred millions of debt.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. CUTCHEON was recognized.

Mr. WHITE, of Kentucky. May I ask the gentleman to yield to me?

Mr. CUTCHEON. I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. WHITE, of Kentucky. I am not one of those that are afraid of having too much money in the Treasury. Notwithstanding the character given to the gentleman from Colorado by my colleague from Kentucky [Mr. WILLIS] with regard to his willingness to vote for the whisky proposition, I say all honor was due to those of the Democratic party who refused to consider that whisky bill. But, sir, when it is a fact we have $150,000,000 in the Treasury, when it is a fact we have money coming in more rapidly than our bonds are falling due, it does seem to me that we ought to pay men for their services when it is established that they performed the service.

We ought to make in this bill a sufficient appropriation to enable the Post-Office Department to give an allowance for clerk-hire to every distributing office. There are 1,028 post-offices located at county seats where there is no allowance whatever for clerk-hire to aid in distributing the mails. There are hundreds of post-offices on railroads where the canceled stamps amount to practically very little, and yet the work imposed upon the postmasters is more than that performed by any page on this floor or any messenger in our corridors, and more, perhaps, than that performed by half the clerks in the Departments, whose salaries do not exceed $1,000 a year. It seems to me that is a shame, a crying evil, and something ought to be done to do justice and equity to these hard-worked and inadequately paid fourth-classed postmasters. I thank the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. CUTCHEON] for his courtesy for yielding to me.

Mr. CUTCHEON. Mr. Chairman——

Mr. TOWNSHEND. I move that the committee now rise for the purpose of limiting debate.

Mr. HORR. Oh, no; do not do that. Let us have a little debate on this paragraph.

The question was taken on the motion of Mr. TOWNSHEND; and upon a division there were—ayes 52, noes 58.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. No quorum has voted.

The CHAIRMAN. It does not require a quorum to determine the motion that the committee rise.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. Then I call for tellers.

Tellers were ordered; and Mr. TOWNSHEND and Mr. HORR were appointed.

The committee again divided; and the tellers reported that there were—ayes 95, noes 68.

So the motion was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. BLOUNT reported that the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union had had under consideration the bill (H. R. 5459) making appropriations for the service of the Post-Office Department for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1885, and for other purposes, and had come to no resolution thereon.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. I move that the House again resolve itself into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union for the purpose of further considering the Post-Office appropriation bill. Pending that motion, I move that all debate upon the pending paragraph and amendments thereto be limited to ten minutes.

Mr. HORR. I hope the gentleman will not do that. The pending paragraph is one of the most important in the bill, and goes to the efficiency of the entire service. There has been but a few minutes of time consumed in debating it.

Mr. HISCOCK. Make it thirty minutes.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. The gentleman from New York [Mr. HISCOCK] suggests thirty minutes. I will agree to that.

Mr. HORR. I move to make it forty-five minutes.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. Then I insist upon my original motion.

Mr. HORR. I hope there will be no feeling about this matter.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. I will agree to the suggestion of the gentleman from New York [Mr. HISCOCK], and move to limit debate to thirty minutes.

Mr. BINGHAM. Make it thirty minutes on either side.

Mr. HORR. I move to amend so as to give forty minutes for debate.

Mr. BISBEE. I move to amend so as to make it one hour.

The SPEAKER. One amendment at a time. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. TOWNSHEND] moves to limit debate to thirty minutes and the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. HORR] moves to amend so as to make it forty minutes.

The question was taken upon the amendment; and it was not agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The question recurs upon the motion to limit debate to thirty minutes.

Mr. HORR. I move to make it one hour.

Mr. BISBEE. That is right.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 66, noes 78.

Before the result of the vote was announced,

Mr. HORR called for tellers.

The SPEAKER. No quorum having voted, the Chair will order tellers, and appoint Mr. HORR, of Michigan, and Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois, to act as tellers.

The House again divided; and the tellers reported that there were—ayes 43, noes 121.

So the amendment was not agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The question recurs upon the motion of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. TOWNSHEND] to limit debate to thirty minutes.

Mr. HORR. I move to amend so as to make it fifty minutes.

The question was taken; and upon a division there were—ayes 63, noes 76.

Before the result of the vote was announced,

Mr. HORR said: Of course we are entitled to tellers, no quorum having voted. But I submit to the gentleman from Illinois that inasmuch as there has not been twenty minutes of time expended in debate on this paragraph my request for forty minutes is modest.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. In reply to the gentleman I will say that his side of the House has occupied fifteen minutes and this side has not occupied one minute. I am perfectly willing to give thirty minutes, at the suggestion of the gentleman from New York [Mr. HISCOCK], and that it be equally divided between the two sides of the House. That will give the other side one-half hour of the debate and this side only fifteen minutes.

Mr. HISCOCK. I suggest to the gentleman to make it forty minutes.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. I insist upon my motion.

The SPEAKER. No quorum having voted on the amendment of the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. HORR] the Chair will order tellers, and appoint Mr. HORR, of Michigan, and Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois.

The tellers took their places and began the count, during which,

Mr. O'NEILL, of Missouri, said: I move that there be a call of the House.

The SPEAKER. The House is now dividing and the tellers have not reported.

The tellers resumed and concluded the count; and reported that there were—ayes 15, noes 133.

Mr. VALENTINE. No quorum has voted.

Mr. TURNER, of Kentucky. I move that there be a call of the House.

Mr. VALENTINE. That is right.

Mr. TURNER, of Kentucky. It is now but 3 o'clock, and gentlemen ought to be here and attend to public business.

The question was taken; and a call of the House was ordered.

The Clerk called the roll, and the following members failed to answer to their names:

Anderson,	Dowd,	Jones, J. T.	Skinner, T. G.
Bayne,	Dunham,	Jordan,	Smith,
Beach,	Ellis,	Kean,	Springer,
Belford,	Fiedler,	Kelley,	Stephenson,

Cox, S. S.	Houk,	Phelps,	Worthington,
Culbertson, W. W.	Hurd,	Randall,
Davis, L. H.	Hutchins,	Russell,

The SPEAKER. The doors will now be closed.

Mr. MORRILL. I ask that my colleague, Mr. PETERS, be excused. He is detained at his boarding-house by the serious illness of his son, who is sick with diphtheria.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. I demand the regular order.

The SPEAKER. This is the regular order. It is in order now to offer excuses for members who are absent. The gentleman from Kansas [Mr. MORRILL] asks that his colleague, Mr. PETERS, be excused from attendance at the session to-day on account of sickness in his family.

Mr. VALENTINE. The gentleman from Kansas [Mr. PETERS] was excused by order of the House this morning.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks the gentleman from Kansas was granted leave of absence this morning.

Mr. VALENTINE. Yes, sir; for the reason just stated by his colleague.

Mr. TALBOTT. I ask that my colleague, Mr. COVINGTON, be excused on account of sickness in his family.

There being no objection, Mr. COVINGTON was excused.

Mr. EVINS, of South Carolina. I desire to state that my colleague, Mr. HEMPHILL, is absent by leave of the House.

The SPEAKER. The records of the House will show that.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. I move that further proceedings under the call be dispensed with.

The motion was agreed to; there being on a division—ayes 93, noes 59.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. I wish to make a parliamentary inquiry. I desire to know, Mr. Speaker, what is the question now before the House.

The SPEAKER. The question is now upon the amendment of the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. HORR] to limit debate in Committee of the Whole on the pending paragraph of the Post-Office appropriation bill and all amendments thereto to fifty minutes.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. On that question I call for the yeas and nays.

Mr. HORR. I ask unanimous consent to make a statement, which will occupy but a moment. [Cries of "Objection!" and "Regular order."]

The SPEAKER. The regular order is demanded. The question is upon ordering the yeas and nays on the amendment of the gentleman from Michigan.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. REED. I suggest to gentlemen on the other side that by granting forty-five minutes [cries of "Regular order!"] they might save a great deal of time.

The SPEAKER. The clerk will call the roll.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 41, nays 154, not voting 125; as follows:

YEAS—41.

So Mr. HORR'S amendment was rejected.

During the roll-call,

Mr. YORK moved to dispense with the reading of the names.

Mr. WELLER objected.

The following pairs were announced from the Clerk's desk:

Mr. WILKINS with Mr. EZRA B. TAYLOR, for to-day.

Mr. HOUK with Mr. ROBERTSON, of Kentucky, on all political questions, for to-day.

Mr. ANDERSON with Mr. COVINGTON, on all political questions, for to-day.

Mr. NICHOLLS with Mr. CHACE, until further notice.

Mr. GOFF with Mr. SNYDER, on all political questions, until further notice.

Mr. BAYNE with Mr. CLARDY, until further notice.

Mr. MORGAN with Mr. MORRILL, until further notice.

Mr. PAIGE with Mr. HATCH, of Michigan, until further notice.

Mr. HAYNES with Mr. GRAVES, until further notice.

Mr. PEELLE, of Indiana, with Mr. STOCKSLAGER, until further notice.

Mr. CANNON with Mr. MUTCHLER, until further notice.

Mr. TOWNSHEND with Mr. WASHBURN.

Mr. HEMPHILL with Mr. RUSSELL, until the 13th instant.

Mr. KETCHAM with Mr. HUTCHINS, until the 13th instant.

Mr. JORDAN with Mr. STRUBLE, for three days from the 10th instant.

Mr. ELLIS with Mr. KELLOGG, for ten days from March 3.

Mr. SKINNER, of New York, with Mr. SKINNER, of North Carolina, until March 30.

Mr. HENDERSON, of Illinois, with Mr. SPRINGER, on all political questions, until Friday, March 14.

Mr. BURLEIGH with Mr. BEACH, until Thursday next.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. I am paired with the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. WASHBURN], not to break a quorum. I believe there is a quorum voting, and I withdraw my vote.

The vote was then announced as above recorded.

Mr. HORR. I should like to make a statement, if gentlemen will permit.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. I hope that will be done.

The SPEAKER. The Chair hears no objection.

Mr. HORR. I do not wish to be put in a false position before this House. I do not think gentlemen on the other side of the House understand the negotiations which had taken place between the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. TOWNSHEND] and myself or they would not have any feeling in this matter. I have not any at the present time. I think the gentleman from Illinois will bear witness, and I know the House will, that I have made no attempt at any time to prolong this debate unreasonably.

There had been a twenty-minute debate on this important amendment when the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. TOWNSHEND] said to me, "I am going to move that the committee rise." I know the gentleman will correct me if I am at fault in my memory. He asked, "How much time do you want?" I told him there were eight or nine men on our side who wished to speak, and I wanted at least forty minutes, which would make it an hour and a quarter. He replied, "I can not give it." Then I said, "Make it an hour and I will try to shut some of our men out." The gentleman was then called away, and we had no chance to negotiate further. He rose upon the floor and moved the debate be limited to ten minutes. I suggested to him to make it forty minutes, whereupon my friend from New York, not in a voice for the reporters to hear, but in sotto voce, said to the gentleman from Illinois, "Make it thirty minutes." The gentleman from New York knew nothing of the circumstances under which I was situated, and while I was asking for this small matter of ten minutes the gentleman from Illinois at once took advantage of the statement of my friend from New York and insisted on thirty minutes. I merely asked for forty minutes, one-half of what our people thought they ought to have.

I say to the majority of this House I had no idea of getting up any feeling of the kind. If the gentleman from Illinois and myself had been allowed to arrange this matter there would not have been one moment of delay.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. Now, Mr. Speaker, if the gentleman from Michigan is through, I desire to state that twenty minutes' debate had been consumed upon this amendment by the opposite side of the House before I made the motion that the committee rise.

Mr. VALENTINE. I think the gentleman is in error about that.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. I think not. Certainly fifteen minutes had been consumed.

Mr. VALENTINE. Only twelve.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. Fifteen minutes, I am sure. I will ask the Chair if I am not correct?

The SPEAKER. The present occupant of the chair was not in the House at that time.

Mr. VALENTINE. The Chair had recognized the gentleman from Michigan for five minutes.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. We will not contend about that, however. The time is not material, whether fifteen or twenty minutes. All the time had been occupied by that side.

Mr. COSGROVE. I think we had better have the regular order.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. I do not think it would be entirely fair to demand the regular order until this matter is clearly understood.

Mr. COSGROVE. We have already spent a great deal of time on this question. Let us dispose of it now. However, I will withdraw the demand for the present.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. After the entire time had been occupied by the opposite side of the House I went to the gentleman from Michigan and told him that it was my desire to move that the committee rise for the purpose of limiting debate, as it seemed there were still a number of gentlemen on that side who desired to be heard. We endeavored then to arrange the time. The gentleman has correctly stated the transaction between us. We were unable to agree upon the time. I consulted with some of my friends on this side and they were of the same opinion as myself, that the debate should be closed in ten minutes; that there had been enough of debate on this item. My proposition, therefore, was to close the debate in ten minutes, one-half to be given to gentlemen upon the other side, which would have allowed them five minutes more, notwithstanding the fact that they had occupied all of the time previously in the discussion. Just as I was making the suggestion to the gentleman from Michigan the gentleman from New York [Mr. HISCOCK], who was the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations in the last Congress, a gentleman who I apprehend is as familiar with this bill as almost any member on that side of the House, suggested to me that we allow thirty minutes. I at once accepted his suggestion, being unable to agree with my friend from Michigan. I believe debate enough has already occurred on the amendment. Every gentleman who spoke upon both sides of the House discussed this very item of the bill; and it strikes me that having consumed already some fifteen or twenty minutes, the fifteen minutes additional I now propose is all that can be reasonably requested.

Mr. HOLMAN. The gentleman overlooks the fact, too, that it has been debated for two or three days in general discussion.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. I now demand the previous question.

Mr. HORR. If the gentleman from Illinois will give us twenty minutes he may have as much time as he wants on that side. You may take another hour on that side if you want to. I am willing to concede anything. I do not want to wrangle over the time allowed for debate on this bill.

Mr. GIBSON. You have already filibustered over an hour on it. [Cries of "Regular order!"]

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois demands the previous question upon his motion to limit debate upon this paragraph and pending amendments to thirty minutes.

The question was taken. The House divided; and there were—ayes 101, noes 22.

Mr. HORR. No quorum.

The SPEAKER. The point of order being made that no quorum has voted, the Chair will appoint tellers.

Mr. HORR and Mr. TOWNSHEND were appointed tellers.

The House again divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 150, noes 26.

So the previous question was ordered; and under the operation thereof the motion to limit debate to thirty minutes was agreed to.

The motion that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union was then agreed to.

The House accordingly resolved itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, Mr. BLOUNT in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. By order of the House all debate upon this paragraph and pending amendments is limited to thirty minutes. The Clerk will report the pending amendment of the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. HORR].

The Clerk read as follows:

In line 27 strike out the words "seven hundred and seventy-five" and insert instead the words "nine hundred;" so that it will read, "For compensation to clerks in post-offices, $4,900,000."

Mr. HOLMAN. I wish to say a word or two in regard to this proposition. The committee will observe that the expenditures under this head for the last year amounted to some $4,367,079. That was the expenditure for the last year, and the proposition is to fix the amount by this bill at $4,775,000, an increase of over $400,000 upon the last year's bill. The amendment proposes a still further increase, making it $4,900,000.

I wish to state one of the motives, at least, which I think influenced some gentlemen in fixing this amount at $4,775,000. That is, that the present efficient Postmaster-General issued an order during the past summer, which most of you gentlemen saw, in which he called upon postmasters who were allowed clerks to devote their own time to their respective offices. It can not be assumed that that order was issued without a motive. That motive was manifestly to break up a custom now so prevalent, and which has existed for years in those offices which are entitled to clerks or to which clerks are assigned, throwing the whole duty of the office on the clerks, the postmaster himself being seemingly a gentleman of elegant leisure.

Now, when you add to the force employed under the expenditures of the present year $4,775,000—when you add to that the whole body of the postmasters themselves, who, upon the fair inference to be drawn from the order of the Postmaster-General, have not performed efficiently their duties, why you have a force for the next year greatly beyond what you have for the present year.

There is another fact to which I wish to call the attention of the committee, and especially of my friend from Michigan. This is an appropriation in bulk, in a single item. The assignment to the post-offices is the act of the Post-Office Department. That Department not only determines how many clerks shall be assigned to each office, but also fixes their compensation. Now I admonish gentlemen of this fact, that two things are to be apprehended in making this kind of appropriation: first, the improper increase of the number of clerks; and, secondly, the improper increase of their salaries. And there is no reason to apprehend but what any increase to the extent of $200,000 will be exhausted, not in the increased amount of clerical force, but in the increase of salaries. The bane and evil of your public service is this everlasting increase of salaries. You are creating in your public departments a mere mercenary sentiment in regard to public duty, instead of your officers being actuated by the higher motive of performing faithfully a duty beneficial to the Government and to the whole people. I think the appropriation proposed of $4,775,000, with the additional service of the postmasters themselves, is a very ample appropriation.

Mr. CUTCHEON. I would be glad in the five minutes allowed me to have the attention of the committee while I attempt to discuss what is purely a business proposition from a business standpoint. It seems to me if the Government were to act as a private individual or corporation would do under like circumstances, when we have an agent in charge of any department of our business who makes estimates from the data in his possession, on those estimates we ought to act. In this case the Postmaster-General is the agent of the United States. He has better opportunities and better facilities for knowing what the demands of this Department will be than any of us have or can have.

I speak from some experience in this particular line. Just prior to coming here I had charge of one of the leading post-offices in our State for a period of six years, and I state here what every man within the sound of my voice knows, that there is not a second or third class post-office in any of our districts that does not demand greater clerk-hire now. Right here of all places in the world we touch the people. It does not make much difference that you voted down the amendment to the preceding paragraph. It will not affect any postmaster in the United States. His salary is fixed by law and is drawn out of the public revenues that pass through his hands. By your action on that item you can not touch his salary; you only enlarge the deficiency bill of next year. But when you touch the clerk-hire you touch the service itself and cripple it.

It is the clerk in the office who touches the people; it is the clerk who opens the packages of mail; it is the clerk who stands at the delivery-window and who separates and delivers the mails to the different star routes, and when you touch the clerk-hire you touch the very vitals of the system itself. When you reduce the appropriation below what is sufficient for clerk-hire you cripple the post-office system through its entire length and breadth. If you refuse an appropriation for the postmaster's salary you do not prevent him from doing his duties and drawing his pay. But when you refuse an appropriation for clerk-hire your action does cripple the post-office system.

Let us look at this from a business standpoint. You offer us in this bill precisely the same amount we had last year. Is that reasonable when we look at the progress being made by this country, with its population increasing at the rate of one million four hundred thousand a year according to the estimate of the Government statistician? And yet you make no appropriation in this bill for that increase of almost a million and a half of population. Is that reasonable?

There are on file in the Post-Office Department 2,604 applications for additional clerk-hire. And it is needed in every first and second class post-office in the country. Why, Mr. Chairman, there is not a single first or second class post-office in my district that has not since I have been a member of this House applied for additional postal-clerk hire.

Right here, as I have said, is the very vital part of our postal system. The people come to the post-office and are waited upon by the clerks. If you do not grant a sufficient appropriation for this purpose we are cut off from having additional clerks, and the people will have to wait for their mails. No fourth-class post-office and no third-class post-office under the present system is allowed any clerk-hire at all, except simply for the separation of the mails. No other clerk-hire at all is allowed. And I undertake to say that to-day one-half of the clerk-hire in second-class post-offices is paid out of the salary and out of the pocket of the postmaster himself. During my six years' experience in that capacity, in spite of every effort I could make, I had to pay one-half of the clerk-hire out of my own salary. And I know that to be the experience of every second-class post-office in my district.

I appeal to gentlemen, in view of the vast annual increase of our population, in view of the extension of the post-office system, in view of the fact that there are 2,604 applications for additional clerk-hire, to grant the additional appropriation proposed by the amendment.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. TOWNSHEND. The gentleman from Michigan [Mr. CUTCHEON] has asked that this question be settled upon a business basis, and I am willing to discuss it with that spirit and in that light. For 1883 there was appropriated for this service $4,385,000; the expenditures amounted to only $4,367,900, and there was left in the Treasury $17,920 unexpended balance of the appropriation. Now in this bill we have appropriated $407,921 more than the expenditures of last year amounted to for this branch of the service.

Mr. HORR. Do not mislead the House; you do not mean that. You mean more than the expenditures in 1883, not in 1884.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. That is what I said; the expenditures of last year.

Mr. HORR. Oh! Then I misunderstood the gentleman.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. We give in this bill nearly a half a million of dollars more for clerks in post-offices than was expended last year.

Now I want to ask the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. CUTCHEON], as he seems to have based his argument for an increase of the clerical force of the Post-Office Department upon the fact that new offices are continually being opened and new postmasters required, if he forgets the fact that these new offices are only fourth-class offices and can not have any clerks? The increase in the number of post-offices does not in any degree whatever increase the number of postal clerks required.

Mr. HORR. What I claimed was that there were new distributing offices continually established, not that there were new post-offices.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. I was speaking of the gentleman's colleague [Mr. CUTCHEON]. I want now to call the attention of the Committee of the Whole to the real reason why there are applications coming up from some post-offices for more clerks. The reason is given by the Postmaster-General himself, and I will read you from his own report. The reason is that in some localities influential politicians, or influential persons at any rate, flock around the Department and by their influence secure a larger allowance for clerk-hire for some favored offices, to the detriment perhaps of other offices that do not have a sufficient allowance for clerk-hire. If they would disregard the influences brought to bear to secure a disproportionate number of clerks at certain offices, and the clerks were distributed in the proper manner, in my judgment we would not need to increase the appropriation for this purpose even as largely as we have done.

Now listen to what is said by the Postmaster-General, who I have heretofore said is a fair and upright man and whose suggestions in my judgment are entitled to consideration. What does Postmaster-General Gresham say?

> Postmasters, backed as many of them are by influential friends, have in some cases been unreasonable in their demands for allowances, and it is not surprising that some of them have received more than their share of the appropriation, while others have received less.

There is the secret of it, gentlemen. In some cities and places powerful influences are brought to bear in order to secure an increase of the clerical force in the post-offices of those cities, while no doubt some other offices are left with a scant supply. That is the reason that there is this great demand for an increase in the clerical force.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. BINGHAM. I desire, as it was the last part of the speech of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. TOWNSHEND], who, recognizing, as did the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN] in connection with this bill, the just tribute which should be paid to the Postmaster-General, to say to the gentleman from Illinois that he should have read two paragraphs more of the report of the Postmaster-General, immediately following that which he did read. I will read them.

> The estimate for clerk-hire for the next fiscal year, it will be observed, is relatively smaller than the appropriations for previous years.
> I have directed a general revision to be made of the allowances for clerk-hire, and hope to be able to make some reductions without impairing the efficiency of the service.

The subject to which the gentleman refers does not relate to the question of appropriations, but simply to the question of administration on the part of the Postmaster-General.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. Will my friend allow me to interrupt him right here?

Mr. BINGHAM. Let me give my sequence.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. Only to call attention to the fact——

Mr. BINGHAM. Very well.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. To call attention to the fact that the last paragraph which the gentleman has read shows that the Postmaster-General by a revision of the service will be able to get along with even a less number of clerks than is now provided for.

Mr. BINGHAM. Not so; he asks for $125,000 more than he had last year, and then tells you what he does with what he has received. For the next fiscal year he wants $125,000 more than was given him for the present year, and he states that he is going to make a revision of that which is properly a question of administration.

Another point made by the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN] was this: He stated that the Postmaster-General had given directions that the postmasters should themselves perform the services of their offices, and states that in that way there will be a great reduction in the expenditures for that branch of the service. That instruction had no reference whatever to the ordinary services of postmasters; it referred only to the compensation of postmasters for transacting the money-order business. The Postmaster-General declares that the postmasters who did not do the money-order business themselves could not employ a clerk to do it and then the postmasters themselves draw the compensation. That matter we have now corrected by legislation.

One point more. This appropriation for clerk-hire goes only to first and second class post-offices, numbering five hundred and eighty-seven, and to such third and fourth class post-offices as are separating offices. Now, for the sake of illustration, how much of this appropriation of $4,775,000 do you think the post-office in New York city will receive? Over $800,000.

The natural growth of the postal service each year is estimated at 10 per cent., but on account of increased business resulting from the reduction of postage it is believed the increase for the coming year will be from 17 to 20 per cent. Yet under this bill no office can raise the salary of a single subordinate, nor do you allow for the estimated increase of 20 per cent. during the next year a single dollar.

It is here that I make my point against the Committee on Appropriations—that they have conceded everything for material, that they propose to give the public every opportunity to buy postage stamps, but in the offices in the great cities, in the five hundred and eighty-seven first and second class offices, you do not make provision for the employment of a single additional man. The Postmaster-General tells you that he thinks by a revision he can secure greater economy in the service; but, having in view the increase of business, he asks on this item $125,000 additional, which you refuse. You laud him to a certain extent, but you do not stand by him upon practical questions. Your laudation is not consistent with your acts.

Mr. HORR. Mr. Chairman, it does seem to me that when this amendment is understood no man here can for a moment believe that it is not in the interest of efficient service. My friend from Illinois [Mr. TOWNSHEND] states that the Postmaster-General has an idea that he can save some money by a certain cutting down. The Postmaster-General does so state; but he adds that after all this cutting down, after doing the best he can do, he will still need $125,000 additional for this service next year.

Now, mark you, there has been for several years an increased expenditure of about $350,000 a year. But this Postmaster-General, whom gentlemen on the other side praise so much, comes in and says: "I think I can prevent this large increase next year, and can make the service efficient if you will give me $125,000 over and above what you gave me last year." He says he will undertake to rearrange the service so that you need not increase the appropriation more than $125,000. But my friend from Illinois while praising the Postmaster-General, proposes to deny him this $125,000 which he asks. While the Postmaster-General is willing to undertake to do the same amount of work for less money you seek to prevent him from increasing the service in any manner, you propose to prevent him from making any provision for the new distributing post-offices which are springing up all over the West and the South.

New railroads are being built; star routes are being started from new places. A postmaster who is receiving but $200 a year may need one of these clerks to distribute the mail and send it out in the different bags. In such cases the Post-Office Department has been in the habit of allowing these clerks. You can not ask the postmaster in such cases to employ a clerk at his own expense; his salary is too small. This increase which the Postmaster-General now says he needs is to provide for this service in the South and West—in the rural districts—not in the large cities. I admit that with the growth of our large cities an increase of business is to be expected. But deny the appropriation now asked by the Department and you cripple this service all over the great West and South.

I say that in a spirit of fairness we should not treat the Post-Office Department in this way. Gentlemen admit that from the postage paid by the people there is to be a surplus of over $2,000,000—it may amount to $5,000,000 in the fiscal year we are providing for in this bill; I mean that much more than this bill now aggregates; yet with this increased revenue coming in, applicable to this very purpose, they propose to cut down this necessary service. Thus the Department is to be crippled, as gentlemen must know—what for? I do not know. Why do you do it? I can not tell. If I should tell what I think, I would have to impugn the motives of gentlemen here; and you who know me know how slow I am to do anything of that kind. [Laughter.] No, no; I do not believe you gentlemen are going to vote to cripple this service. I say that this bill has not been drawn in a spirit of friendliness toward the postal service, the service that lies nearer to the hearts of the American people to-day than any other service of the Government. Strike down this service, and you strike down the great interests not only of the large cities but of the rural population. These clerks are needed all over the United States. The Postmaster-General, in his frugality, has tried to reduce the expenses of this branch of the service so as to require but $125,000 additional; and I do not believe this House is going to refuse him the very reasonable amount which he asks. No man can for a moment defend such legislation. This service is too sacred to be attacked in this way.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. TOWNSHEND. Mr. Chairman, to show how unfair some of our friends are on the other side in their treatment of the Committee on Appropriations, I again desire to call attention to the figures made by the Post-Office Department and to the figures made by the last Congress.

As I have already shown, the unexpended balance left in the Department on the 30th of June last was over $17,000, and they received an appropriation of $4,385.

Mr. HORR. You do not claim that that $17,000 goes to this fund?

Mr. TOWNSHEND. Just wait for one moment. Over and above the expenditures of 1883 we gave an increase of nearly half a million.

Still a further fact stares you in the face. This same service was clamorous in its demands upon the last Congress, just as it is now. What did the Committee on Appropriations do when these clamors were made for increase of the clerical force? The Department sent in an estimate last year insisting they needed and must have $4,850,000, or only $50,000 less than the demand for this year. But what did the Committee on Appropriations then do? Did you then have the same respect for the estimates of your Department which Republican members have professed for them to-day? Oh, no; the Committee on Appropriations of the last Congress disregarded the estimates of the Department. By its action it said to the Department: Your estimates are extravagant, are unnecessary, for your committee recommended and your Congress appropriated only $4,775,000, whereas the Department said they could not get along without $4,850,000. I say they are compelled, in the face of their own record, to repudiate the estimates of their own Department. Is it fair for them to come in here and charge us with being penurious and with being unfriendly to the postal service? It is unfair on their part to use such arguments.

I insist, sir, this bill which I hold in my hand is the most liberal bill making appropriations for the postal service ever reported by any Committee on Appropriations in the House of Representatives. Last year you reduced the expenditures of the postal service below the expenditures of the year previous. This year we have increased the expenditures for the postal service $2,000,000 more than for the preceding year. I repeat, you cut down the appropriations last year below those of the previous year, while we have raised them $2,000,000, and yet you come in here and clamor for a still greater increase.

I understand you. In this you are only carrying out the programme of the last session of Congress. I do not complain of your action, but I do complain of Democratic members, who went before the people proclaiming themselves to be in favor of economy, coming in here and voting on this floor against their pledges to their constituents, and aiding gentlemen on the other side of the House in saddling upon us extravagant appropriations.

The CHAIRMAN. The time fixed for debate is exhausted.

The question recurred on Mr. HORR'S amendment.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 79, noes 111.

So the amendment was disagreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

For payment to letter-carriers and the incidental expenses of the free-delivery system, $3,600,000; $45,000 of which may be used, in the discretion of the Postmaster-General, for the establishment, under existing law, of the free-delivery system in cities where it is not now established.

Mr. SKINNER, of New York. I move, in lines 29 and 30, to strike out "$3,600,000" and in lieu thereof to insert "$4,000,000."

Mr. TOWNSHEND. I move the committee rise.

Mr. SKINNER, of New York. I will yield for that purpose.

Mr. MILLS. You will have the floor in the morning.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. If it is the wish to go on now I am content.

Mr. HISCOCK. No; let us rise.

Mr. SKINNER, of New York. I am aware this amendment will excite debate and it can not be finished to-night, and I therefore move the committee rise.

Mr. WILLIS. We can sit an hour or so longer.

The motion was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. BLOUNT reported that the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union having had under consideration the Post-Office appropriation bill had come to no resolution thereon.

And then, on motion of Mr. WELLER (at 5 o'clock and 5 minutes p. m.), the House adjourned.

PETITIONS, ETC.

The following petitions and papers were laid on the Clerk's desk, under the rule, and referred as follows:

By Mr. BLANCHARD: Memorial of the Louisiana Educational Society, for national aid to the cause of education—to the Committee on Education.

By Mr. J. H. BREWER: Petition for a harbor of refuge at Atlantic City, N. J.—to the Committee on Rivers and Harbors.

By Mr. WAIT: Petition of H. H. Osgood and others, to promote the efficiency of the Revenue-Marine Service—to the Committee on Commerce.

By Mr. WORTHINGTON: Petition of citizens of Peoria, Ill., relative to the Chinese restriction act—to the Committee on Foreign Affairs.

SENATE.

THURSDAY, March 13, 1884.

Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. E. D. HUNTLEY, D. D.

The Journal of yesterday's proceedings was read and approved.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATION.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate a communication from the Attorney-General, transmitting, in response to a resolution of the 25th ultimo, information in regard to the failure of the Central and Union Pacific Railroad Companies to comply with the requirements of the act of May 7, 1878, and the steps taken by him relative thereto; which, with the accompanying papers, was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary, and ordered to be printed.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore presented a petition of the Chamber of Commerce of the city of Tacoma, on Puget Sound, in Washington Territory, praying that the proposition before Congress to declare a forfeiture of the Cascade land grant to the Northern Pacific Railroad Company in aid of the construction of the Cascade division of its main line be non-concurred in; which was referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

Mr. CONGER presented the petition of William Greenough and 86 other citizens of Sault Ste. Marie, Mich., in favor of granting to the Catholic church of that place the strip of land lying between their latitude, 97°, and the Saint Mary's River in case of the sale of the Fort Brady military reservation; which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

He also presented the petition of George Johnson, of Detroit, Mich., praying compensation for wrongs, injuries, and losses suffered by him in consequence of the illegal and wrongful action of the military authorities during the war of the rebellion; which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. COCKRELL presented an affidavit to accompany the bill (S. 948) granting a pension to Emma A. Porch; which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. DOLPH. I present a memorial of the Chamber of Commerce of the city of Tacoma, Wash., remonstrating against the forfeiture of the Cascade land grant to the Northern Pacific Railroad Company. I ask that it be read.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair will state to the Senator from Oregon that a memorial from the same chamber of commerce was sent to the Chair, which the Chair laid before the Senate and had referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

Mr. DOLPH. I was not in when the Chair presented it. If the memorial presented by the Chair was not read I ask that this be read, so that it may go into the RECORD.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Oregon asks unanimous consent that the memorial presented by him be read. Is there objection? The Chair hears no objection.

The memorial was read, and referred to the Committee on Public Lands, as follows:

Memorial to Congress against the forfeiture of the Cascade land grant.

To the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled:

Your memorialist, the Chamber of Commerce of the city of Tacoma, on Puget Sound, in Washington Territory, begs leave respectfully to represent to your honorable bodies:

1. That the Northern Pacific Railroad Company was chartered to build a line of railroad from Lake Superior to Puget Sound; that it has built said line from Duluth to Wallula, in the eastern part of Washington Territory, from which place westward to Portland, in Oregon, its passengers and freight for all portions of Washington Territory west of the Cascade Mountains are transported over the railroad and river lines of another company; that in continuation of its main line direct to Puget Sound across the Cascade Mountains it has built twenty-five miles of road westward from Ainsworth, near said Wallula, which road has been accepted by the President of the United States, and still carries on such building westward; that it has built one hundred and fifty miles of road from Portland to Tacoma, its western terminus; that from Tacoma eastward it has built thirty miles of its direct line across the Cascade Mountains, making in all fifty-five miles of its Cascade division already built; that about two hundred miles of said Cascade division yet remain to be built, and that until the same be built the Northern Pacific Railroad will not have been completed from Lake Superior to Puget Sound.

2. That the distance from Ainsworth, where said Cascade division connects with the main line, to the Puget Sound terminus of the road by the present route down the Columbia River is over one hundred miles longer than the distance between the same points by the uncompleted Cascade division.

3. That the country through which the uncompleted portion of the Cascade division has been located is rich in timber, coal, iron, copper, and other minerals, and in agricultural capabilities, which can not be developed until that division is completed.

4. That the fuel and lumber which abound west of the Cascade Mountains are needed in the settlement and development of the fertile prairie country on the eastern side of that range, while the products of the latter need a direct and cheap outlet to the Pacific Ocean such as that division, when completed, will afford.

5. That a railroad across the Cascade Mountains is demanded not only by the interests of farmers, miners, lumbermen, and traders, but also by political considerations of the highest importance, since a real union of the eastern and western portions of Washington Territory is impracticable without such a road, and the existing relations between these mountain-severed portions call for a speedy construction of the road.

6. That Washington Territory now has a population of not less than 125,000, which is increasing with great rapidity, and the varied interests of all classes of this population will be greatly promoted by the completion of said Cascade division.

7. That your memorialist is advised that there is before your honorable bodies a proposition to declare forfeited the grant of land across the Cascade Mountains made by the Government to the Northern Pacific Railroad Company to aid in the construction of the Cascade division of that company's main line by reason of the non-completion of the road within the time allowed the company to build it.

8. That your memorialist earnestly prays your honorable bodies, on behalf of the business interests of the city of Tacoma, and, as it believes, in the interest of the whole people of this Territory, to forbear declaring said forfeiture, and to continue said land grant to the Northern Pacific Railroad Company for such further period as shall be deemed reasonably necessary to enable the company to complete the Cascade division.

9. That the declaration by Congress of the forfeiture of the Cascade land grant would delay the completion of that road, and thus work enormous injury to the people of this Territory.

10. That such a declaration would work injustice and ruin to the many thousands of people who came hither and embarked their lives and fortunes on the early development of this Territory by means of the completion of the Northern Pacific Railroad; and that on behalf of these people your memorialist earnestly and respectfully protests against any declaration of the forfeiture of the Cascade land grant.

11. That the present values of land and other property in this Territory are largely based upon the confident belief that Congress would not delay or prevent the completion of the Northern Pacific Railroad; and that such is also the basis of a great number of time contracts throughout the Territory; for which reason the recall of the Cascade land grant from the Northern Pacific Company would effect widespread disturbance of the most important business interests.

12. That the cost of constructing the remaining two hundred miles of the Cascade division must necessarily be very great; that in view of the present condition of the money market and the violent fluctuations of railroad securities your memorialist has strong reason to fear that, unless Congress shall grant to the Northern Pacific Railroad Company a reasonable extension of time within which to complete the road, that company will be unable to effect such completion within the next three years, and that meanwhile the loss caused by such inability to the people of this Territory will be great and irreparable.

Wherefore your memorialist, on behalf of the business interests of Washington Territory, prays that the proposition to declare a forfeiture of the Cascade land grant may fail to secure the concurrence of your honorable bodies.

By order of the chamber.

J. W. SPRAGUE, President,

Attest:

STUART RICE, Secretary.

Mr. DAWES. The citizens of that part of the city known as Northeast Washington held a large meeting last evening to memorialize Congress in reference to the presence of steam railroads in that part of this city and to protest against the continuance of them there. They pray Congress for their removal, and also favor the bill lately introduced by the Senator from Vermont [Mr. MORRILL] on that subject. I present their petition, and move that it be referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. SAWYER. I present a memorial of members of the International Institute for Preserving and Perfecting Weights and Measures and from other citizens of the United States in opposition to the French metric system and praying that it shall not be made legal in any Government transaction. I am at a loss to know to what committee the memorial should be referred, but I suggest the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. MORRILL. It should be referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. SAWYER. I do not care particularly to which committee it is referred.

Mr. CONGER. The memorial itself refers to the use of the metric system in our river and harbor surveys by name, and refers to a great many matters connected with navigation and the improvements of rivers as well as to a great many other subjects. In the other House a similar paper was referred to the Committee on Coinage, Weights, and Measures. I think the memorial should go to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. MORRILL. I will merely say that the question has always heretofore been considered by the Committee on Finance. I have no sort of objection to its going to any other committee, but matters in relation to the metric system as to coinage have always been referred to the Committee on Finance. I hardly think it would be wise to divide the jurisdiction of this question.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair understood the Senator from Wisconsin to withdraw his suggestion to refer the memorial to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. SAWYER. I said at first that I did not care particularly, but I am inclined to think the Committee on Commerce is the proper committee to take charge of the memorial.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Wisconsin that the memorial be referred to the Committee on Commerce.

The motion was agreed to.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. VEST, from the Committee on Commerce, to whom was referred the bill (S. 907) to authorize the construction of a bridge over the Missouri River at or near Sibley, in the State of Missouri, reported it with amendments.

Mr. MORRILL, from the Committee on Finance, submitted a report to accompany the bill (S. 1153) authorizing the Secretary of the Treasury to deliver to the rightful owners the contents of certain boxes deposited in the Treasury Department by the Secretary of War, heretofore reported from that committee.

Mr. HARRISON, from the Committee on Territories, to whom was referred the bill (S. 1682) to enable the people of that part of the Territory of Dakota south of the forty-sixth parallel of north latitude to form a constitution and State government and for the admission of the State into the Union on an equal footing with the original States, and for other purposes, reported it with amendments, and submitted a report thereon.

TREASURY CATTLE COMMISSION REPORT.

Mr. HAWLEY. By direction of the Committee on Printing I ask for the present consideration of the following order:

Ordered, That 1,500 copies of the report of the Treasury Cattle Commission, transmitted to the House of Representatives by the Secretary of the Treasury December 21, 1883 (Executive Document No. 44, Forty-eighth Congress, first session, House of Representatives), be reprinted, the supply having been exhausted.

The Senate, by unanimous consent, proceeded to consider the resolution.

Mr. HAWLEY. This comes within the rule. It is a small pamphlet and pertinent to the discussion now going on in regard to pleuro-pneumonia. The supply is exhausted.

Mr. COCKRELL. How many copies does this authorize?

Mr. HAWLEY. One thousand five hundred copies.

Mr. COCKRELL. What is the cost?

Mr. HAWLEY. The cost is probably four or five cents apiece.

Mr. COCKRELL. Ought we not to have more than that?

Mr. MILLER, of California. I think 1,500 copies will be enough. It is a very important document in relation to the foot-and-mouth disease and pleuro-pneumonia, treating of the measures necessary to be taken to stamp it out. It was printed, and the supply has been exhausted. I think 1,500 copies will be enough.

The resolution was agreed to.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Mr. HARRIS introduced a bill (S. 1830) for the relief of Charles W. Biese; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

He also (by request) introduced a bill (S. 1831) to provide for preliminary surveys and location of the Potomac and Chesapeake free ship-canal; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. MORGAN introduced a bill (S. 1832) for the relief of W. C. Dodge; which was read twice by its title.

Mr. MORGAN. I present with the bill a statement of the facts upon which the case is predicated. I move the reference of the bill, with the accompanying paper, to the Committee on Patents.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. VOORHEES introduced a bill (S. 1833) for the relief of Julius A. Kaiser; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

Mr. SAULSBURY introduced a bill (S. 1834) granting a pension to Eliza C. Woodall; which was read twice by its title.

Mr. SAULSBURY. The bill is accompanied by the petition of Mrs. Woodall, who is the widow of Daniel Woodall, late colonel of the First Delaware Regiment. I move that the bill and petition be referred to the Committee on Pensions.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. WALKER introduced a bill (S. 1835) for the relief of L. A. Morris; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. PLUMB introduced a bill (S. 1836) granting a pension to Sarah Hague; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. PIKE introduced a bill (S. 1837) for the relief of George P. Howe; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. PENDLETON (by request) introduced a bill (S. 1838) for the erection of a public building at Akron, Ohio; which was read twice by its title, and, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds.

Mr. PLUMB introduced a joint resolution (S. R. 75) making an appropriation to eradicate the foot-and-mouth disease; which was read the first time at length, as follows:

Be it resolved, &c., That the sum of $25,000, or so much thereof as is necessary, be, and hereby is, appropriated, to be used under the direction of the Commissioner of Agriculture and in co-operation with the proper authorities of the State of Kansas, in eradicating a contagious disease popularly known as the foot-and-mouth disease, now prevailing to an alarming extent among the cattle of that State; the expenditure of the above sum, or any part thereof, to be limited to the emergency now existing, and full report of such expenditure and the result thereof to be made to Congress by the Commissioner of Agriculture at the earliest practicable date.

The joint resolution was read the second time by its title, and referred to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry.

FORT WALLACE RESERVATION.

Mr. VAN WYCK submitted the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Interior inform the Senate whether any and what railroad corporation is attempting to obtain a portion of the Fort

Wallace reservation, and that he furnish copies of correspondence alleging reasons for the same.

CHEROKEE INDIAN ROLL.

Mr. PLUMB submitted the following resolution; which was considered, by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Interior be directed to transmit to the Senate the roll of the Cherokee Indians east of the Mississippi River, made in accordance with the act approved August 7, A. D. 1882.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. CLARK, its Clerk, announced that the House had passed a bill (H. R. 4411) to amend section 101 of the Revised Statutes of the United States so as to allow the chairman of a subcommittee of a committee of either House of Congress to administer oaths; in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate.

COURT OF ALABAMA CLAIMS.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair lays before the Senate the Calendar under the eighth rule, the first case being Order of Business 139, which is the bill (S. 573) amending an act re-establishing the Court of Commissioners of Alabama Claims and for the distribution of the unappropriated moneys of the Geneva award, approved June 5, 1882.

Mr. HARRIS. That seems to be an adverse report. Let it go over.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Objection being made, it goes over.

CATTLE DISEASE.

Mr. PLUMB. I ask unanimous consent to make a report from a committee.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and the report will be received.

Mr. PLUMB. The Committee on Agriculture and Forestry, to whom was referred the joint resolution (S. R. 75) making an appropriation to eradicate the foot-and-mouth disease, instruct me to report it back without amendment and with the recommendation that it do pass. I am also instructed by the committee to ask for its present consideration.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Kansas asks unanimous consent that the joint resolution be now considered.

Mr. SHERMAN. I should like to have it read.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The joint resolution will be read at length for information.

The joint resolution was read.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the joint resolution?

Mr. SHERMAN. As I believe that the object of the joint resolution will be best accomplished by the passage of the House bill under consideration yesterday, I object for the present, and hope that the pleuro-pneumonia bill may be taken up and passed as quickly as possible, of which I am in favor.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The joint resolution is objected to and will be placed on the Calendar.

Mr. PLUMB. I give notice that I shall to-morrow move to take it up and consider it. After the notice that was filed yesterday by the Senator from Texas [Mr. COKE] and the manifest disposition to debate the pleuro-pneumonia bill I feel quite sure that the emergency which is now upon the people of Kansas and the whole Western country with reference to this most important interest will not be met by waiting for the passage of the House bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair is obliged to state to the Senator from Kansas that debate is not in order.

Mr. PLUMB. Is it in order to move to take up the joint resolution?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It is not in order. It was reported this day, and objection is made to its consideration.

FITZ-JOHN PORTER.

Mr. SEWELL. I move to lay aside the Calendar for the purpose of taking up the bill (H. R. 1015) for the relief of Fitz-John Porter.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the motion of the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. SEWELL].

Mr. MILLER, of New York. Yesterday the public business was laid aside for the consideration of this bill, and now it seems to be the disposition of those pressing it to lay aside what we call the Private Calendar, or the unobjected cases. I feel bound to do what I can to prevent the bill from displacing all other business in the Senate. Therefore I move to lay the motion of the Senator from New Jersey on the table, and upon that motion I call for the yeas and nays.

Mr. BAYARD. I should like to ask the Senator from New York whether the bill that he desires to press upon the consideration of the Senate has been printed? I endeavored to comprehend yesterday the condition of the measure he had in charge, but owing to the complex character of the amendments that had been proposed by him it was quite impossible to understand what the effect of the bill would be. Therefore an order was made by the Senate yesterday, upon the application I think of the Senator from Ohio [Mr. SHERMAN], to have the amendments printed, in order that we should understand the precise tenor and effect of the measure. I will ask the Senator from New York whether that has been done? I have failed to find the reprinted bill on my table.

Mr. MILLER, of New York. In answer to the question of the Senator from Delaware I will state that I understand the bill, with the proposed amendments, has been printed, and while it is not yet upon our tables, it is probably in the Capitol building at this time, or at all events it is on the way here from the office of the Public Printer. But my motion did not indicate that I proposed to call up that bill. I moved to lay upon the table the motion of the Senator from New Jersey to proceed to the consideration of the Fitz-John Porter bill, but in deference to the views of a number of Senators who desire to speak upon that question, and knowing that it must be met sooner or later, I am disposed to give way to their wishes, and with the consent of the Senate I will withdraw my motion to lay the motion on the table, and let the vote be taken directly on the motion of the Senator from New Jersey to take up the Fitz-John Porter bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair did not hear the Senator from New York when he made the motion to lay on the table, and therefore did not state it. The Chair is of opinion, in view of the previous practice of the Senate and the present rule so far as the Chair understands it, that a motion to proceed to the consideration of a particular bill is not subject to a motion to lay that motion on the table. That has always been the practice of the Senate and the decisions of its previous presiding officers during many years.

Mr. MILLER, of New York. The decision of the Chair leaves the matter where my withdrawal would have left it, to proceed to vote on the motion of the Senator from New Jersey.

Mr. CONGER. As I have said before, I shall be willing to postpone this bill for the consideration of the public business, but I understand the Senator from Illinois [Mr. LOGAN] is prepared to go on with his remarks this morning, and I hope that the bill may be taken up and disposed of. I shall vote for the motion of the Senator from New Jersey.

Mr. SEWELL. I hope the motion will be agreed to, because certain Senators have arranged to speak to-day, and it is as much for their convenience as anything else that I made the motion at this time. I think the Senate ought to give unanimous consent to proceed with the bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the motion of the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. SEWELL].

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 1015) for the relief of Fitz-John Porter.

Mr. MANDERSON. Mr. President, it is not with the expectation that I may be able to add anything of value to the already vast accumulation of argument brought to bear upon the bill for the relief of Fitz-John Porter that I crave the indulgence and attention of the Senate. Gentlemen of distinguished ability occupying places at both ends of the Capitol, lawyers of great erudition whose reputation is national, soldiers of distinction whose names are "as familiar in our mouths as household words," have spoken and written upon the theme until it seems almost worn threadbare. He who would glean in a field wherein such expert harvesters have worked their sickles of research and reason must needs be content with slender poil.

It is not at all surprising that the interest of those who are to vote for or against this bill should remain unabated, nor is it astonishing that the general public should continue to be interested in the subject-matter. Since midsummer of 1862 this contest has continued. From the high noon of civil strife down through the eventful time to this peaceful eventide of national repose, through war and through peace, this claimant has urged that he has been most unjustly dealt with, and prayed for vindication. If an individual, however humble, was to be seen in midchannel battling bravely with combating waves in a veritable "struggle for life," with what deeply felt interest would the bystanders watch his efforts, their feeling intensified perhaps by the fact that they were powerless to help. Here, in the face of the world, for nearly a quarter of a century has progressed a contest where the stake was dearer than life—a struggle to vindicate impeached honor, to clear smirched loyalty, to brighten tarnished reputation. What wonder is it, then, that the interest continues and that even the fledgelings of the Senate should desire to record the reasons that prompt their votes for or against this bill?

Let the conclusion of the observer of this contest be what it may, he can not but be struck with the persistency of this claimant for relief. His motto seems to have been, "Hope against hope, and ask till ye receive." I for one would gladly reward such earnest endeavor. Nothing would delight me more than to say to this man pleading for restoration of good name and fame, "You have been unjustly dealt with. The tribunal that pronounced you guilty of disobedience of the orders of your superior, of disloyalty to your chief, was mistaken in its findings of fact. Blinded by the passions of the hour, prejudiced by the desire for some victim upon whom to rest the stinging blame of defeat to our arms, you were sacrificed. The 'sober second thought' has shown how greatly you have been maltreated. Take what of reparation a sorrowful and now grateful country can afford to you. Be restored to all rights of which you have been deprived."

Senators, if I could say this to this claimant after full investigation and with determination to do my full duty, without bias or prejudice, I would not stop here. I would not be content with the half-way and inadequate reparation provided in this bill. No, no! I would go further in the name of justice and the right and say, "There shall be given to you, General Fitz-John Porter, full and abundant righting of all your grievous wrongs. Be restored to the position in the Army of the United States yours in the natural order of events if this gross injustice had not been inflicted upon you. We can not restore to you the years that are past, but with a nation's apology to you we order that the only recompense within earthly power to bestow—emolument, wealth—shall be yours." I do not understand that the advocates of this bill base the argument for its passage upon the proposition that it is in the nature of clemency or pardon, but rather on the ground that it is a new finding of fact upon new trial had, in which the claimant's entire innocence of the offenses heretofore charged has been fully established. If this be so, why stop with the inadequate and paltry reparation for wrong inflicted provided for by this bill?

Mr. President, I came to the consideration of this case in a somewhat unusual manner. When elected to my seat in this honorable body I confess to an almost inexcusable ignorance of the history and merits of the Fitz-John Porter case. During those gloomy days in the country's history when the court-martial assembled, in the fall and winter of 1862, and, with General Hunter as president, and Generals Hitchcock, King, Prentiss, Ricketts, Casey, Garfield, and other distinguished military leaders composing the court, proceeded, under oath and with the sanction of the Constitution and laws, to try General Porter for disobedience of the orders of his superior and for shameful neglect to bring the troops under his command into battle, when other divisions of the Army to which he was attached were engaged, within distance where he could do great good, it was not my fortune to be where the news of the day was within reach. I was of the Army of the West, far removed from Washington, and where, by reason of our distance and the fact that we had usually sufficient on hand to keep us very busy, we knew but little of what was going on in the armies of the East.

The war over, being engrossed with the duties and cares of civil life, the facts pertaining to the Porter case continued unknown to me. At last I entered upon its investigation from the standpoint of the accused. The first article presented to me and carefully read was the paper of General Grant, "An undeserved stigma," published in the North American Review; this was followed by the letters of Generals Grant, Terry, and others; then the defensive pamphlet of Mr. Lord, and the report of the majority of the Committee on Military Affairs of the Senate. This material, followed by numerous conversations with many gentlemen of the Army of the United States who are warm champions of the claimant, aroused in me much of sympathy for him and a strong bias in his favor. It was as though I had listened to the testimony of the defendant and heard the impassioned appeals of his counsel only.

Evidently it was my duty not to stop here. The case of the State had surely been fully made out, else the conviction at the hands of the competent tribunal of 1862 would not have followed. I went, therefore, to its record, and have tried calmly, dispassionately, as a juror to sift all the evidence, or as a judge reviewing the testimony under the law, to reach my duty in the vote to be given upon this bill. I confess to a feeling of some disappointment when I say that my vote will be in the negative. I would gladly join the ranks of those who, from a desire to do justice as they see the course of justice, or from motives of mercy as they see it right to be merciful, will take the stain of over twenty years' duration from this appealing old man; but, under the law and facts as I see them, whether this proceeding be one of judicial review or the exercise of clemency, this bill should not pass.

Not at length, Mr. President, but in such brief words as I may, I desire to give the reasons prompting me to this conclusion.

The report of the majority of the committee asks for "a revision of the action of the court-martial." Adopting the language of the advisory board, it asks that the Congress shall "annul and set aside the findings and sentence of the court-martial in the case of Maj. Gen. Fitz-John Porter and restore him to the position of which that sentence deprived him." In other words, Congress is asked to act judicially and review the action of the highest tribunal having jurisdiction of the person and offense charged. A most dangerous precedent, truly, and one that, if followed, will surely bring greater evils in its train than even failure to give such vindication as the placing of Porter upon the retired-list of the Army, with the rank and pay of colonel, were he entirely innocent.

What was the tribunal by which this accused was tried and found guilty? It has become "good form," "in these piping times of peace," to sneer somewhat at and belittle the court-martial. Will gentlemen inclined to do so recall the fact that, while no jury is called to pass upon the guilt of the party accused, it is the court where trial by one's actual peers is more nearly approached than in any other tribunal? The judges of the law and fact are taken from the profession, the calling, and, as near as may be, are of the same station—rank—as the party accused. Under the safeguards thrown about it by the law and military custom the action of the court must needs be calmly deliberative.

The accused may be heard in his own behalf and a latitude is given in the production and examination of his witnesses almost unknown in the civil courts. The prosecuting attorney of the civil law, keen for conviction, alert for the State, merciless to the prisoner, aiming frequently by unfair means and tricks of the profession "to make the worse appear the better cause," gives place to the judge-advocate, bound under his oath to be the counsel of the accused person, protecting his rights and required to see to it that no injustice or unfairness is practiced upon him. In the taking of the testimony nothing is left to the uncertain memories of those who are to pass upon it. All is written, that it may endure and pass to the reviewing authority. In cases such as this no less a person than the President of United States forms the court of last resort, the tribunal finally to decide, and in this particular case the experienced lawyer, the sound jurist, the great patriot, the compassionate man—Abraham Lincoln—reviewed the action of the court.

The Congress of the United States created this judicial system under the Constitution. Says Benét in his Treatise on Military Law:

> The Constitution of the United States empowers Congress "to raise and support armies; to provide and maintain a navy," and "to make rules for the government and regulation of the land and naval forces." As an essential part of these powers it belongs exclusively to Congress to obtain or provide for courts-martial and define their jurisdiction; to make their sentences final and conclusive or subject to a reviewing authority; to designate by whom they shall be convened and then confirmed or disapproved, and generally to make such statutory provisions concerning them as in their wisdom may be deemed proper and necessary.
> A court-martial is the proper and sole tribunal for the trial of military officers. It is a lawful tribunal, existing by the same authority that any other court exists, and the law military is a branch of law as valid as any other, and it differs from the general law of the land in authority only in this—that it applies to officers and soldiers of the army, but not to other members of the body-politic, and that it is limited to breaches of military duty.

Says the Supreme Court of the United States in case of Ex parte Reed (100 United States Reports, 13):

> The constitutionality of the acts of Congress touching Army and Navy courts-martial in this country, if there could ever have been a doubt about it, is no longer an open question in this court. It is the organism provided by law and clothed with the duty of administering justice in this class of cases. Its judgments when approved as required rest on the same base and are surrounded by the same considerations which give conclusiveness to the judgments of other legal tribunals, including as well the lowest as the highest under the circumstances.

Said Attorney-General Cushing in 1854, speaking of the reviewing power:

> The decisions of the President of the United States in cases of this sort are that of the ultimate judge provided by the Constitution and the laws. Like that of any other court in the last resort of the law it is final as to the subject-matter.

This then the character of the court that tried Fitz-John Porter, and these the circumstances under which he was tried. A legally constituted tribunal, composed of his peers, "good men and true," having jurisdiction of his person and the offense charged, upon full trial, under all the safeguards of law, finds him guilty as charged. The highest reviewing power in the land examines the record and approves the finding. It is now proposed practically to usurp judicial powers by the legislative branch of the Government and "revise and annul" the action of this court. It is a proposition that may well startle the student of our form and frame of government. The dangers to flow from encroachment by one of the co-ordinate branches of the Government upon the rights and privileges of another have been depicted by all our great writers upon the Constitution. The Supreme Court in numerous adjudications has often sounded the alarm. From a case that happens to be at hand I quote familiar law, but not the less important because it is familiar. Says the Supreme Court in 13 Wallace, page 147, in the case of United States vs. Klein:

> It is of vital importance that these powers (the legislative and the judicial) should be kept distinct. The Constitution provides that the judicial power shall be vested in one Supreme Court and such inferior courts as the Congress shall from time to time establish. The same instrument in the last clause of the same article provides that in all cases, other than those of original jurisdiction," the Supreme Court shall have appellate jurisdiction both as to law and fact, with such exceptions and under such regulations as the Congress shall make. It has already provided that the Supreme Court shall have jurisdiction of the judgments of the Court of Claims on appeal. Can it prescribe a rule in conformity with which the court must deny to itself the jurisdiction thus conferred, because and only because its decision, in accordance with settled law, must be adverse to the Government and favorable to the suitor? This question seems to us to answer itself. The rule prescribed is also liable to just exception as impairing the effect of a pardon and thus infringing the constitutional power of the Executive. It is the intention of the Constitution that each of the great co-ordinate departments of the Government—the legislative, the executive, and the judicial—shall be in its sphere independent of the others. To the Executive alone is intrusted the power of pardon, and it is granted without limit. Pardon includes amnesty. It blots out the offense pardoned and removes all its penal consequences. It may be granted on condition. * * * Now, it is clear that the Legislature can not change the effect of a pardon any more than the Executive can change a law. Yet this is attempted by the provision under consideration. The court is required to receive special pardons as evidence of guilt and treat them as null and void. It is required to disregard pardons granted by proclamation on condition, although the condition has been fulfilled, and deny them their legal effect. This certainly impairs the executive authority and directs the court to be instrumental to that end.

I can not refrain from quoting upon this interesting subject from a distinguished military writer:

> This distribution of powers affords another strong and almost impassable barrier against danger from a standing army. If Congress controlled entirely, the military system would turn to despotism. If the Executive alone controlled, it would lead to oligarchy. The arrangement adopted harmonizes well with the theory of our institutions. It has ever been held of vital importance to separate as distinctly as possible the legislative from the executive power.

Mr. President, if it should come to this Senate as an original proposition that, after conviction had by a general court-martial and approval of its finding by the President of the United States, the Congress should, upon the record as made, or upon additional testimony, re-try the cause, or that, upon conviction of heinous crime by one of the circuit courts of the United States, Congress should take to itself the rights of an appellate court to review the record, afford a new trial, and increase the sentence or let the convicted prisoner go, the advocates of this bill would stand aghast. It may be that Congress has the right to do indirectly that which it can not do directly. It may be that under its undeniable power to increase or decrease the Army of the United States it may require the Executive to issue commissions to whomsoever it pleases, but for one I do not believe it. This bill trenches upon such dangerous ground that if I believed Fitz-John Porter all that the advisory board pronounce him, "a gallant soldier, unworthy of condemnation," I would not support it. It is not only a usurpation of judicial power, but of the pardoning and appointive power of the Executive.

Mr. President, during the last twenty years I have been engaged in the practice of law As I look back along the path of my professional life I see many wrecks. Frequently where I have been of counsel for the defendant, owing to the ignorance of courts, the imbecility of jurors, the perjury of witnesses, and I fear sometimes the incapacity of defendant's attorney, conviction has resulted. The cases have gone to the courts of last resort under the law. The unfortunate victims of the ignorance, the imbecility, the perjury, or the incapacity are confined within prison walls undergoing a "continuing sentence." If this precedent is to be established, how gladly would I bring their cases to this new tribunal. Here are none of the uncomfortable barriers that hedge in a court. Loud and persistent asseveration will do here instead of testimony. Ex parte affidavits will do better than living witnesses. Declamation may take the place of legal argument. The party lash may be able to accomplish more than the charge of a court. A member of this Congressional bench may play the rôles of witness, counsel, advocate, juror, judge, all at one time. Yes, if I am to correct the blunders and repair the misfortunes of my professional career, let me come with the causes of my unfortunate clients to this new tribunal, that has the power under this proposed precedent not only to construe but to make the law, that is bound by no rules of evidence, no code of procedure, but may simply "exercise its own sweet will."

If this legislative body is to revise the action of the Porter court-martial and its sentence, what if it should find him guilty as charged, and the degree of his guilt greater than found by the court? Shall its revision extend to the enlarging of the sentence as well? Under the provisions of the Articles of War, flowing from violation of the ninth or the fifty-second article, there may come the penalty of death. If we are to have new trial and new judgment, why not new sentence? The reviewing Executive evidently thought the punishment not commensurate with the offense. How strong the testimony against this accused must have been when he with the kindest heart that ever throbbed in human breast could say, as Abraham Lincoln said, "I have read every word in that record, and I tell you Fitz-John Porter is guilty and ought to be shot." Such was his language at the time as evidenced by that reliable gentleman, known to many here, the former law partner of Lincoln, Mr. Leonard Swett, of Chicago. He writes to the Chicago Tribune of date February 9, 1884, as follows:

CHICAGO, February 9.

As the question of Fitz-John Porter is now occupying public attention, a conversation I once had with Mr. Lincoln upon the question seems pertinent. I was standing in his room in the White House, near the foot of the long table behind which he sat, he standing with me, and we talking upon some subject foreign to the one he introduced when he called my attention to a large record [pile of manuscript] lying near us on the table. "That," said he, "is the record in the Fitz-John Porter case." The trial had then just closed, and the record of the evidence taken in it was, as I understood, before him for action. "You know," said he, "if I know anything, it is what evidence tends to prove and when a thing is proven. I have read every word in that record, and I tell you Fitz-John Porter is guilty and ought to be shot." He then added something the words of which I can not remember, but the substance was: "He was willing the poor soldiers should die, while he from sheer jealousy stood within hearing of their guns waiting for Pope to be whipped." I know nothing of Fitz-John Porter's case, but have deemed it my duty, as I happened to hear this conversation, to make it public.

Yours, truly,

LEONARD SWETT.

Were corroboration of the statement of Mr. Swett needed it could be found in the sworn testimony of Hon. Robert T. Lincoln before the advisory board. He is testifying as to the statement of his father in regard to the Porter case, made shortly before his death; and I read a short extract:

I recollect the distinct remark that he made, but at what period in the conversation I do not now recollect. He said that the case would have justified in his opinion a sentence of death.

Mark it! I do not say that Fitz-John Porter deserved death. I do not believe that he was either a traitor to his country or a coward. Of what offense I believe him guilty, under the proof and all the proof, whether taken before the court-martial or the advisory board, I will seek to show before I get through; but what I insist upon is this: if we are to revise this trial, if the matter is to be heard by this Congress exercising judicial powers, if the case is to be tried de novo, we should have the right not only to reward, but to punish; not only to reinstate, but to destroy; not only to confer rank and honor, but to take liberty and life itself, if such be even-handed justice after full trial.

It would be most interesting matter for investigation to determine upon what rules we are now to determine the guilt or innocence of this convicted one. Is it to be because of error of law by the court-martial? If so, where is the assignment of error? Is it because the weight of testimony was in favor of the accused and not of the Government? We are taught by the books that a verdict or finding of facts should not be disturbed if there is any evidence upon which to found it; that the trial body that has had the benefit of seeing the witnesses who testified is better qualified to weigh the testimony and pass upon the truth or falsity of statements made under oath. Is it because of newly discovered evidence? None has been brought before this Congress. If it appears anywhere is it not merely cumulative in its character, and do not the authorities agree that a new trial should not be awarded because of newly discovered evidence that is merely cumulative? Will it be claimed that we should overturn the finding of the court-martial and the approval of the reviewing President because three distinguished gentlemen, sitting without legal authority, proceeding without reference to law or the rules of evidence, investigating sixteen years after the event, have given it as their opinion that Porter should not have been convicted? Appellate courts, reviewing boards do not usually act upon the unauthorized opinions of mere outsiders. And so we might go on in wearisome speculation as to what manner of thing this is that is presented here for judicial action by a legislative body. Thanks to the wisdom of the past, there is no precedent for the strange action asked of this Congress. I fear greatly the effect of the one likely to be here created. These considerations would prevent me from voting for this bill even did I believe Fitz-John Porter innocent of all that has been charged against him.

But is he so? In answering this question I do not propose to enter into any lengthy review of the testimony. He was charged with disobedience of orders under the ninth article of war, and misbehavior before the enemy under the fifty-second article of war. Let us glance very hurriedly at the proof in the record sustaining these charges, and take them in the order they are given.

On the 27th day of August, 1862, General Porter being the commander of the Fifth Corps of the Army of Virginia, commanded by General John Pope, received about 9.30 o'clock in the evening an order commanding him to start with his corps at 1 o'clock that night on the march from Warrenton Junction, where he was then encamped, to Bristoe Station, a distance of nine miles. It is admitted that he failed to obey the order, and claimed as matter of defense that in the discretion that rested in him he was not only excusable but justifiable in his disobedience. In the effort on the part of interested friends to exculpate this man from the charges made against him a new and most dangerous doctrine is attempted to be introduced in military law, namely, that the inferior may deliberate upon an order received from his superior and disobey, if in his opinion such disobedience is the part of better wisdom or superior judgment. A monstrous doctrine, subversive of discipline, and one which, if carried into practice, will be fraught with dread disaster if this country should again engage in war. I submit that such is not the law as written by the best military writers; it has never been the practice where there was competent, efficient chieftainship.

Obedience, strict, prompt, unquestioning, active, whole-souled, painstaking, willing, cheerful obedience is the highest duty of the soldier. Let us get away from the glamour thrown around this case by prominent advocates anxious for the restoration of Fitz-John Porter, and see what the best writers say upon this subject. Says Hough, in his Precedents in Military Law:

Disobedience of positive orders is highly criminal, and may arise either out of the refusal of the officer or soldier to act as ordered, or refusing to march whither ordered, or disobeying orders given on service relative to an attack upon the enemy. Whether the orders of the superior enjoin an active or a passive conduct, the officer or soldier subject to them is equally obliged to obey; otherwise every military operation or enterprise would be made to depend not on the prudence or wisdom of the commander, but on the will or caprice of the soldiery either for the success or defeat of its object. Prompt, ready, unhesitating obedience in officers and soldiers to their superiors is so necessary to the safety of the military state and to the success of every military operation or arrangement, that it would be highly injurious to the interests of the army were disobedience in any case to be left unpunished.

And again, on page 103 of his much-valued work, he says:

Obedience to command is the chief military virtue, in relation to which all others are secondary and subordinate, and disobedience is reckoned among the principal military crimes, and is justly liable to the most exemplary punishment. The object of assembling any force might be defeated if orders were not strictly obeyed even to the very letter. The operation of an army in the field, in which combination and concentration of its forces are so often required, might be frustrated if there should be any disobedience on the part of any officer commanding a force destined to join and act with such army.

Let me depart from the quotation for a moment to call attention to the statement of the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. SEWELL], made yesterday, that his indictment against General John Pope was that he showed his utter lack of ability to concentrate his army in the presence of the enemy. He did lack that ability, but why? This record answers. His orders to his subalterns that would lead, if obeyed, to concentration, were, so far as Fitz-John Porter was concerned, persistently disobeyed.

Here there must be no discretion allowed; one supreme head directs the whole of the motions of the force and of its component parts. So general is the rule that the orders of the superior shall be imperative on the military inferior, that it will not admit of exception unless when the orders or the things commanded to be done are directly contrary to law.

Now let us turn to De Hart's Military Law, and on page 165 we read:

Hesitancy in the execution of a military order is clearly under most circumstances a serious offense and would subject one to severe penalties; but actual disobedience is a crime which the law has stigmatized as of the highest degree and against which denounced the extreme punishment of death, and accordingly an offense of this nature, from the great danger which might result from it, would be very nicely scrutinized by courts-martial ere a justification would be admitted upon the ground that there was no lawful authority for the command given. In every case in which an order is not clearly in derogation of some right or obligation created by law, the commands of a superior must meet with unhesitating and instant obedience.

So then, under the authorities I have read, there was no discretion resting in the commander of the Fifth Army Corps. The command to march was a lawful one, issuing from an unquestioned superior—the chief of the army to which he was attached. It gave the reason for the haste desired. It said:

Start at 1 o'clock and come forward with your whole corps so as to be here by daylight to-morrow morning. Hooker has had a very severe action with the enemy, with a loss of about three hundred killed and wounded. The enemy has been driven back, but is retiring along the railroad. We must drive him from Manassas. Send word to Morell to push forward immediately. Send word to Banks to hurry forward. It is necessary on all accounts that you should be here by daylight.

Here was an order most explicit, filled with reasons for prompt obedience, and, as I think, must strike every one as filled with something else. This reiteration and urging to prompt obedience is convincing that the chief was fearful that it would not be promptly obeyed. The same urging to obey is found in every order issued by Pope to Porter during those dark days. It looks as though the chief felt some distrust of the fealty of his follower, and I submit that the truth of history shows that distrust to have had abundant foundation. Porter did not march at 1 o'clock. He did not arrive at Bristoe at daylight. He arrived about 10 o'clock. But it is claimed that he could not. The statement is not borne out by the proof. It is said the night was dark. There are those upon this floor who have marched infantry troops when the nights were as "dark as a pocket."

During the Atlanta campaign men moved for miles through the dense Georgia woods, without roads, when the course of the column could only be tracked by the phosphorus of unburned matches rubbed upon the palm of the uplifted hand. It is shown that many commands, confederate and Federal, did march that night. There is the positive testimony of many witnesses that it was starlight, not raining, not cloudy, and troops marched without difficulty. The men were tired, it is said. The head of his column went into camp at Warrenton at 10 o'clock in the morning and his command was all up before dark. It is absurd to say that his head of column could not have started at 1 o'clock. It is claimed that the road was bad. Numerous witnesses say on oath that it was hard and dry. But it is suggested that it was blocked with wagons. The quartermaster in charge of the transportation swears that at 1 o'clock and from that time until daylight there were no wagons upon the road; that he parked them by the side of the road in the forepart of the night and moved them out again about daylight. At any rate, if Porter had desired to obey the order and reach Bristoe by daylight he could have taken his choice of roads, for the testimony is that there were two distinct roads, one on each side of the railroad, and on either one of the three roads troops could readily march.

But it is claimed by the Senator from New Jersey that Porter was not needed, and such is the suggestion found in the report of the advisory board; that there was no necessity for his being there by daylight. I do not propose to reply to that argument, except to make this suggestion, that it would remind me somewhat of a defense that might be interposed by a burglar who, when brought to trial for a burglary, should say: "True, I broke into your house in the night season, but there was nothing there for me to steal."

No! He did not care to obey. He was indifferent to the wishes of his superior. He had no respect for his chief; and neglect of his desires, the frustration of his plans, was in accord with the real wishes of Fitz-John Porter's heart. The criticising, captious, disgruntled letters to Burnside written on those days show it. Even the complimentary and easily satisfied advisory board are compelled to recognize it when they say in their report: "It is our duty to say that the indiscreet and unkind terms in which General Porter expressed his distrust of the capacity of his superior commander can not be defended."

Porter must have been familiar with the sixth article of war: "Any officer who shall behave with disrespect toward his commanding officer shall be punished." I take it he had read the language of that celebrated writer, O'Brien in his work on American military law: "There is no doubt that contempt or disrespect to any superior officer is punishable. Many cases in point might be cited. It is as a general rule not deemed a justification that the disrespectful expressions are truly merited." He must have been familiar with the law; yet, feeling distrust of the capacity of his chief, holding him in contempt, expressing his feelings to General Burnside, and undoubtedly to others, he was guilty of that violation of his duty that even the advisory board is compelled to say "can not be defended." It was so notorious that even General McClellan had to beg of him to be loyal to his commander.

Yes, here is the key-note of all this unfortunate business. It explains the constant delay, the ever-recurring disobedience, the failure to fight upon the 29th. He held Pope in contempt. He was jealous of his leadership. He dreaded a victory that would advance him further. He did not desire defeat to our arms, but he was not anxious to see Pope win victory. Ah! the curse of this jealousy among the leaders of the armies of the East. McClellan, Hooker, Burnside, Meade, Pope—all fell as its victims. I thank God that the generals of the armies of the West knew not the base feeling. Generous rivalry there was between the divisions and corps composing the Armies of the Tennessee and the Cumberland, but among its great leaders, McPherson, Logan, Sheridan, Thomas, Grant, Sherman, there were no heart-burnings from jealousy, hatred, and ill-will. [Applause in the galleries.]

It is not my purpose to go into the testimony bearing upon the transaction of the 29th of August. Suffice it to say that on that day a battle was fought that raged from about 9 o'clock in the morning until 9 at night. In that battle at different times and with varying intervals every part of the army commanded by General John Pope was engaged, except the Fifth Corps commanded by General Porter. He was within hearing distance of the booming of the artillery and the rattle of musketry. He knew "the fight was on." He did not participate, and his whole action during that day evidenced a determination not to join in the battle with the troops under his command. Had he joined the fighting line and given to the men of his gallant corps the opportunity to help their fellows the great disaster of the next day—the ill-fated 30th of August, when he did fight and with the rest of the Army of Virginia was worsted—might have been averted.

I believe from careful examination of the testimony that, actuated by that distrust of and contempt for his commanding officer of which I have heretofore spoken, he deliberately and willfully disobeyed the order of the morning of August 29 urging him to march toward Gainesville. I believe it to be established that the order of 4.30 p. m. ordering him "to push forward into action at once on the enemy's flank, and if possible on his rear," although much delayed in its delivery, yet reached Porter in time to have enabled him by vigorous effort to strike a blow with telling effect. But instead of giving willing, prompt, and unhesitating obedience he ordered two regiments to feel of the enemy, and before they had opportunity so to do caused their return to the resting, passive, unaiding line of his corps. And so it was during all those closing days of August, 1862. Neither entreaty nor order, the sight of battle in which his comrades were being worsted, nor the sound of guns, could prompt him to help with the strong arms of his ten thousand gallant men the commander whom he hated. He would help to weave no laurels for Pope's inferior brow. No. Pope's star must go down in disgrace and defeat. Read the significant dispatch to Burnside sent on the 28th, in which this envious subaltern says: "My lucky star is always up about my birthday, the 31st, and I hope Mc.'s is up also." "Mc.," whose star is to be in the ascendant, is General McClellan. This great soldier is shocked at Porter's want of loyalty to his chief.

Look at this significant letter, written on September 1:

I ask you for my sake, that of the country, and of the old Army of the Potomac that you and all friends will lend the fullest and most cordial co-operation to General Pope in all the operations now going on. The distresses of our country, the honor of our arms are at stake, and all depends now upon the cheerful co-operation of all in the field. This week is the crisis of our fate. Say the same thing to all my friends in the Army of the Potomac, and that the last request I have to make of them is that for their country's sake they will extend to General Pope the same support they ever have to me.

* * * * * * *

GEORGE B. McCLELLAN,
Major-General.

To Major-General PORTER.

Imagine any one writing a letter to Sherman or Sheridan or Thomas or McPherson to be true to Grant.

But a few months before the day when Porter rested idly in the shade while the loud-mouthed cannon gave to him unheeded invitation, a far different scene was enacted in the West, and I would like to hold it up in contrast. The capture of Fort Donelson had opened clear pathway by water and by land to our forces, and Grant, with his army, was near Pittsburg Landing. The glorious victory of Thomas at Mill Springs, the fall of Bowling Green, and the surrender of Nashville had cleared Middle Tennessee for the marching columns of Buell. Along the beaten roads during the pleasant spring days they moved. On April 6, with the impetuous Nelson and the gallant Crittenden in the lead, the head of Buell's army approached Savannah, on the Tennessee River. The day was nearing its close and the tired men were longing for camp and rest. Suddenly the faint sound of a distant gun. Another and another in quick succession. The straggling lines of troops instinctively gathered in more compact form. Without command to that effect the marching step quickened. The sullen boom of the artillery was more distinctly heard as the distance lessened. The fact was apparent. Our brothers of the Army of the Tennessee were engaged. The battle was on, but miles away and across the deep and rapid river. A long and wearisome march had been made that day by these divisions. Tired and hungry and likely so to remain, for there were no cooked rations in the haversacks and the wagons miles to the rear and not likely to come up. The leaders of these commands need no orders to hasten on and let the rest be taken after the battle is lost or won. The "sound of the guns" is all the order needed. The "old sea-dog" Nelson, taking to water naturally, I suppose, leaves the main road and leads his division over a shorter one through a swamp. Crittenden hurries on to Savannah. The waiting transports are loaded to the guards. The river is crossed, and Grant's gallant troops, disheartened by the long day's fight at fearful odds, welcome with glad shouts and tears of joy the leaders and men to whom the din of arms is an invitation and "the sound of the guns" an order. The rich reward is that on the next day the battle of Shiloh is continued and won, victory is wrested from the jaws of defeat, and the rebel retreat to the South goes on.

The honorable Senator from New Jersey who addressed the Senate on yesterday gave us several instances where subaltern officers had disobeyed orders and had not been punished upon trial had. Did it strike him as he read the account that all the instances of violation of orders mentioned by him were those where the alleged military offense was fighting without orders? Unfortunately Fitz-John Porter was not so charged. Were it so, he would have no need to be a suppliant asking Congress to "revise and annul" the sentence of a court-martial.

Mr. President, I oppose this bill because of the law and the facts; because of the dangerous precedent and the bad example; because it is destructive of discipline and injurious to the well-doing of our Army; because I believe it to be eternally right so to do. [Applause in the galleries.]

Mr. LOGAN. Mr. President, in 1865, when war had ceased, when our citizens were no longer aroused by the distant rumbling of artillery, when blood had ceased to flow, and the good women of our country, as ministering angels, had ceased to smooth the brow of the weary and wounded soldier, when all breathed freely once more, we then had reason to suppose that all things necessarily connected with the prosecution of the war against rebellion would remain undisturbed, and that all proceedings on the part of those in charge of national affairs which had been conducted in accordance with the laws and the Constitution were settled forever upon principles of equity and justice.

In the prosecution of the war against treason they believed they were preserving to future generations a great Government, and that all nations of the earth might receive beneficial lessons from the course pursued by those who had maintained the national unity and supremacy. We did not believe that the history as it was then honestly made would be reversed, that the judgment of courts fairly, legally, and honestly entered would in after years find a Congress that would set them aside and rewrite the history of the trial; not only rewrite it, but write it down against those who preserved the Government and in favor of those who failed at a perilous moment, that, too, at a time when all the power and the patriotism should have been combined for the purpose of producing one grand result for the benefit of mankind.

TRIED BY A LEGALLY CONSTITUTED COURT.

Turning back the wheel of time to 1863 we find the trial of Fitz-John Porter by a legally constituted court for the disobedience of orders lawfully issued to him by his superior and commanding officer. In that trial forty-five days were consumed and many witnesses were heard. The court determined the case against him and dismissed him from the service of the United States. That court was composed of nine officers, a part of whom were learned in the law, and a majority of them learned in military science. That sentence was approved by the then President of the United States.

But, sir, what is the scene presented to the American people to-day? It is not the trial of an officer for failing to perform his duty during a battle or for failing to observe an order issued by a superior officer. No, sir; but it is the trial before the Congress of the United States in 1884 of the court that condemned this man; it is the trial of the President who signed the verdict, it is a trial of the living and the dead who performed their duties on that occasion.

PORTER APPEARS AS A PROSECUTOR AGAINST THE COURT.

Talk about this being a trial of Fitz-John Porter. Sir, he has been tried and convicted and twenty years have passed, but to-day he appears as a prosecutor before the Congress of the United States, against a court legally authorized, and against the martyred President of that time. It is the trial of those who are living; it is the trial of the graves of those who are dead with a charge that they dealt unjustly by him; that they dealt with prejudice against him; that they violated the laws in their verdict; that they misconstrued the evidence; that they rendered an unjust and an unjustifiable decision against him. These are the questions that we are called upon to-day to determine.

In deciding a question like this it would seem at least that it should be examined fairly, impartially, and be understood according to the facts and the evidence on that trial, without either prejudice against those who tried or prejudice in favor of the man who was tried.

We find, however, on one side of the Chamber a solid vote in favor of this bill. Without desiring to criticise the vote of any one, I hope I may be, pardoned, however for making one remark. It is perfectly natural that when those who engaged in rebellion against a great Government like this failed of success and had themselves been pardoned by the Government should, without any examination of the evidence in the case whatever, feel a sympathy for those who had been during the war dismissed the service of the United States. Why? Because they would naturally sympathise with them and say, "I have been forgiven, therefore I forgive everybody else for any dereliction during the war, no matter whether they were criminally guilty or not, especially when they were convicted for not marching or fighting against us."

I can understand the sympathy that exists on that side of the Chamber for this man, but let me say that sympathy ought not to go to the violation of a great principle that underlies the very structure of our Government, and the regulating of the armies of the United States, their discipline and organization.

APPLY THE EVIDENCE.

I desire, however, to discuss this question first from a legal standpoint, applying the evidence thereto, and then ask the question whether any Senator in this Chamber, taking the whole case as it stands to-day, can lay his hand upon his heart and conscientiously say, "I am acting according to the law and according to the facts of the case" in voting to restore Porter?

First, what is the law in reference to the obedience of orders? A portion of it was read by my friend from Nebraska [Mr. MANDERSON], but I will read the law as it has been laid down in works that are received as authority both in England and America, in fact all over the civilized world, for the same principles apply everywhere so far as this question is concerned. You will find in the authority quoted by the Senator from Nebraska known as De Hart the same language that he read, which I quote. De Hart says this as a rule laid down in military law:

> Hesitancy in the execution of a military order is clearly, under most circumstances, a serious offense, and would subject one to severe penalties; but actual disobedience is a crime which the law has stigmatized as of the highest degree, and against which is denounced the extreme punishment of death. (De Hart, page 165.)

The same author says further:

> "In every case, then, in which an order is not clearly in derogation of some right or obligation created by law, the command of a superior must meet with unhesitating and instant obedience." So vital to the military system is this subordination of will and action deemed, that it is secured by the most solemn of human sanctions. Each officer and soldier, before entering the service, swears that he "will observe and obey the orders of the officers appointed over him."

Pendergrast lays down the law relating to officers of the army in his revised edition in the following language:

> The duty of military obedience to the commands of superior officers is most fully recognized by courts of law; and it has been held that disobedience never admits of justification; that nothing but the physical impossibility of obeying an order can excuse the non-performance of it; and that when such impossibility is proved, the charge of disobedience falls to the ground. The learning on this subject is to be found in the great case of Sutton vs. Johnstone (1 Term Reports, 548), which was an action by Captain Sutton, of his majesty's ship Isis, against Commodore Johnstone, for arresting and imprisoning him on charges of misconduct and disobedience to orders in the action with the French squadron under M. Suffrein, in Ponto Praya Bay, in the year 1782; and there the two chief-justices (Lord Mansfield and Lord Loughborough) laid down the law in the following terms:
> "A subordinate officer must not judge of the danger, propriety, expediency, or consequence of the order he receives; he must obey; nothing can excuse him but a physical impossibility. A forlorn hope is devoted; many gallant officers have been devoted; fleets have been saved and victories obtained by ordering particular ships upon desperate services, with almost a certainty of death or capture."

Mr. Pendergrast, in his citation, makes the reservation, always understood, that the order given is not manifestly and clearly illegal.

The General of the American Army (Sherman), in referring to this principle of obedience to orders in action (24th February, 1870), reenunciated the rule laid down by the two eminent lord chief-justices. He says:

> The stronger the force of the enemy present at the time the officer received the orders, the greater the necessity for him and his troops to pitch in, even if roughly handled, to relieve, pro tanto, the other forces engaged.

That being the law, I defy any one to show that this has not been the rule since armies have been organized and since battles have been fought. It being the law that an order must be obeyed unless there is a physical impossibility to obey, the question before the court-martial was, what is the statute law of the United States in reference to punishment for disobedience of orders? You find that article 9 of the Articles of War as read yesterday afternoon by my friend from Iowa [Mr. WILSON] is in the following language:

> Any officer or soldier who shall strike his superior officer, or draw or lift up a weapon, or offer any violence against him, being in the execution of his office, on any pretense whatsoever, or shall disobey any lawful command of his superior officer, shall suffer death, or such other punishment as shall, according to the nature of his offense, be inflicted upon him by the sentence of a court-martial.

The court-martial in examining the case find, first, what is the general law regulating armies; in other words, what is the common law governing the case? In the second place, what is the statute law of the United States in reference to the obedience of orders? It is that a lawful order from a superior officer must be obeyed. Its disobedience carries with it the penalty of death.

THE QUESTION BEFORE THE COURT-MARTIAL.

What had the court-martial that tried Fitz-John Porter to examine? What question was before them at the time they were organized for his trial? It was this: Did Fitz-John Porter receive a lawful order? No one has ever questioned that proposition. If he received a lawful order was it a physical impossibility for him to obey that order? If it was demonstrated that it was an impossibility for it to be obeyed, then, as a matter of course, they had no right to convict him. It was his duty to show that impossibility. Did he do it? Does the evidence disclose any such state of facts? If so, I ask any Senator on this floor to point out to me wherein it was impossible for this order to have been obeyed.

A question has been suggested in the argument here that he did not know the necessity for obeying the order strictly. I suppose that no Senator who has read the testimony will state that as a fact. Did not General Pope send him two orders prior to the 6.30 order of the 27th of August notifying him that the enemy was in a certain position and that he must be there as speedily as possible? He had received two orders prior to that giving him notice of the position of the enemy and requiring him to move as rapidly as possible.

WHY GENERAL POPE ISSUED THE ORDER.

The first proposition is to examine this case fairly, so that no one shall be deceived in reference to it, and to understand that General Pope issued not only a proper order, but one based upon good reasons at the time. It has been said that Pope managed the campaign badly; that the order was issued without good reasons; that there was no necessity for this man Porter being there the next morning; that the necessity disappeared when he arrived. For the purpose of understanding properly this question as we go along let us examine the reasons that prompted General Pope to issue the order. You will find on page 13 of the sworn testimony before the court-martial this statement by Pope:

General Hooker's division had had a severe fight along the railroad, commencing some four miles west of Bristoe Station, and had succeeded in driving the division of General Ewell back along the road, but without putting it to rout; so that at dark Ewell's forces still confronted Hooker's division along the banks of a small stream at Bristoe Station. Just at dark Hooker sent me word, and General Heintzelman also reported to me, that he, Hooker, was almost entirely out of ammunition, having but five rounds to a man left, and that if any action took place in the morning, he would, in consequence, be without the means of making any considerable defense.

Without taking up the time of the Senate to read the evidence which has been given to the Senate time and again, I will briefly restate the situation as shown by the testimony. Jackson was at Centreville with his corps; Hooker's division was at Bristoe Station engaged in a battle with Ewell's division; Fitz-John Porter was ten miles away that night with his corps; Hooker's division was out of ammunition, there being but five cartridges to the man. Why was this order issued? Is there a man on either side of the Chamber who understands anything about military operations who does not know that it is a part of the science of war for every good general to take advantage of such a position and try to strike the enemy in detail? It was perfectly natural for Pope to expect that his division would be attacked at daylight next morning by Jackson, who was only a few miles away at Centreville, before the support would come from the rear.

POPE DID INFORM PORTER OF THE NECESSITY OF A NIGHT MARCH.

But it is said that he (Porter) was not sufficiently advised by Pope, and did not see the necessity of a night march. This is not true; he was notified both on the 26th of August and on the 27th, prior to the 6.30 order, so that he was to be ready to move and act quickly. To show this I will merely give the two orders mentioned, which are as follows. They tell their own story:

HEADQUARTERS ARMY OF VIRGINIA,
Warrenton Junction, August 26, 1862—7 o'clock p. m.

GENERAL: Please move forward with Sykes's division to-morrow morning through Fayetteville to a point two and a half miles of the town of Warrenton, and take position where you can easily move to the front, with your right resting on the railroad. Call up Morell to join you as speedily as possible, leaving only small cavalry forces to watch the fords. If there are any troops below, coming up, they should come up rapidly, leaving only small rear guard at Rappahannock Station. You will find General Banks at Fayetteville. I append below the position of our forces, as also those of the enemy. I do not see how a general engagement can be postponed more than a day or two.

McDowell, with his own corps, Sigel's, and three brigades of Reynolds's men, being about thirty-four thousand, are at and immediately in front of Warrenton; Reno joins him on his right and rear with eight thousand men at an early hour to-morrow; Cox, with seven thousand men, will move forward to join him in the afternoon of to-morrow; Banks, with six thousand men, is at Fayetteville; Sturgis, about eight thousand strong, will move forward by day after to-morrow; Franklin, I hope, with his corps, will by day after to-morrow night occupy the point where the Manassas Gap Railroad intersects the turnpike from Warrenton to Washington city; Heintzelman's corps will be held in reserve here at Warrenton Junction until it is ascertained that the enemy has begun to cross Hedgman's River. You will understand how necessary it is for our troops to be in position as soon as possible. The enemy's line extends from a point a little east of Warrenton Sulphur Springs around to a point a few miles north of the turnpike from Sperryville to Warrenton, with his front presented to the east, and his trains thrown around well behind him in the direction of Little Washington and Sperryville. Make your men cook three days' rations and keep at least two days' cooked rations constantly on hand. Hurry up Morell as rapidly as possible, as also the troops coming up in his rear. The enemy has a strong column still farther to his left, toward Manassas Gap Railroad, in the direction of Salem.

JOHN POPE,
Major-General, Commanding.

Maj. Gen. FITZ-JOHN PORTER,
Commanding Fifth Army Corps.

This order of Pope on the 26th shows that Porter was thus early notified of what was expected.

Also the following:

HEADQUARTERS ARMY OF VIRGINIA,
Warrenton Junction, August 27, 1862—4 o'clock a. m.

GENERAL: Your note of 11 p. m. yesterday is received. Major-General Pope directs me to say that under the circumstances stated by you in relation to your command he desires you to march direct to this place as rapidly as possible. The troops behind you at Barnett's Ford will be directed by you to march at once direct to this place or Weaverville, without going to Rappahannock Station. Forage is hard to get, and you must graze your animals as far as you can do so. The enemy's cavalry has intercepted our railway communication near Manassas, and he seems to be advancing with a heavy force along the Manassas Gap Railroad. We will probably move to attack him to-morrow in the neighborhood of Gainesville, which may bring our line farther back toward Washington. Of this I will endeavor to notify you in time. You should get here as early in the day to-morrow as possible, in order to render assistance should it be needed.

I am, general, very respectfully, your obedient servant,

GEO. D. RUGGLES,
Colonel and Chief of Staff.

Maj. Gen. F. J. PORTER,
Commanding Fifth Army Corps.

Any discreet officer would have expected exactly what Pope did. So he says to Porter, "You must come and be here by daylight." He issued this order and demand that Porter should come by daylight. Here is the order:

HEADQUARTERS ARMY OF VIRGINIA,
Bristoe Station, August 27, 1862—6.30 p. m.

GENERAL: The major-general commanding directs that you start at 1 o'clock to-night and come forward with your whole corps, or such part of it as is with you, so as to be here by daylight to-morrow morning. Hooker has had a very severe action with the enemy, with a loss of about three hundred killed and wounded. The enemy has been driven back, but is retiring along the railroad. We must drive him from Manassas and clear the country between that place and Gainesville, where McDowell is. If Morell has not joined you, send word to him to push forward immediately; also send word to Banks to hurry forward with all speed to take your place at Warrenton Junction. It is necessary, on all accounts, that you should be here by daylight. I send an officer with this dispatch, who will conduct you to this place. Be sure to send word to Banks, who is on the road from Fayetteville, probably in the direction of Bealeton. Say to Banks also that he had best run back the railroad train to this side of Cedar Run. If he is not with you, write him to that effect.

By command of Major-General Pope.

GEO. D. RUGGLES,
Colonel and Chief of Staff.

Maj. Gen. F. J. PORTER, Warrenton Junction.

P. S.—If Banks is not at Warrenton Junction leave a regiment of infantry and two pieces of artillery as a guard till he comes up, with instructions to follow you immediately. If Banks is not at the junction instruct Colonel Clary to run the trains back to this side of Cedar Run, and post a regiment and section of artillery with it.

By command of Major-General Pope.

GEO. D. RUGGLES,
Colonel and Chief of Staff.

So it will be seen that two orders prior to that time had been issued notifying him of the fact that the enemy was in his front and that he must hurry without any delay, and yet it is said that Porter did not know this. He did know it, but if he did not it is not for the subordinate officer to know, it is for the officer who issues the order to have reason for issuing such an order, and if it is a lawful order it is the duty of the subordinate to obey. Oh, but, says the Senator from New Jersey, Porter's officers told him that there was no necessity for obeying this order; that they could get there in the morning early enough. As we go along I propose to show that Fitz-John Porter did not intend to obey the order. He did not notify his generals commanding his divisions of the necessity of this order being obeyed. General Sykes, who was the officer that commanded the regulars under Fitz-John Porter, in his evidence before the court-martial testifies as follows:

Q. Do you remember whether you were made acquainted with the urgent language of the order—

Speaking of the 6.30 order of the 27th of August, 1862—stating that by all means General Porter must be at Bristoe Station by daylight the next morning?

Now mark what General Sykes says:

A. No, sir, I think not; for I am satisfied that if that urgency had been made known to us we would have moved at the hour prescribed.

Showing that this man did not even let the officers commanding his divisions know the urgency of his being there the next morning. General Sykes had agreed with him that night to postpone his march in obedience to that order, but when he comes to testify he says that if he had known the urgency of that order he would have been in favor of obeying it and moving at the time.

THE SURROUNDING CIRCUMSTANCES.

Now let us examine for a moment another proposition. When a man is tried for an offense there is always something in connection with the circumstances surrounding the case that gives an idea to a jury or to a court of his intention. In order, then, to ascertain the intention of this man Porter, to show that he did not intend to obey the orders, I call the attention of Senators to the letters referred to by the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. MANDERSON] that he wrote to General Burnside before receiving these orders and afterward too, showing that at the time he had contempt for Pope, and if he obeyed Pope it would be because he was compelled to do so. No man can infer anything from these letters other than that he did not intend to support Pope.

DETERMINATION THAT POPE SHOULD NOT SUCCEED.

Then, Mr. President, there is a long history in connection with the conduct of Porter, but I will not take the time of the Senate to read it, though I have order after order issued by General Halleck to General McClellan, just across the Potomac, to send Franklin and his command to the support of Pope. When he was ordered to send them, when there was a necessity for it, he sent back for the reasons but was compelled to send the troops, but when sent they did not arrive, showing that there was a combination and determination that this man Pope should not succeed.

Take the conduct of Fitz-John Porter in front of Winchester at the beginning of the war, when General Patterson was ordered to move and attack General Joe Johnston—just before the first battle of Bull Run was fought and when he had nineteen thousand troops and General Joe Johnston of the confederate side had but nine thousand. He was within ten miles, and when he was ordered to attack Joe Johnston to prevent him from joining the rebels at Manassas Junction, Fitz-John Porter persuaded Patterson, as the records, sworn to, show, to move twenty miles to the right, under pretense that it was the best move to make. So by this move Johnston was let loose and made his move on to Manassas and turned the battle against McDowell. So I charge here, and I defy contradiction, that Fitz-John Porter was the cause of the loss of the first battle of Bull Run and refused to fight in the second. [Applause in the galleries.]

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. FRYE in the chair). No applause can be allowed in the galleries, and the Sergeant-at-Arms will be instructed to arrest any person in the galleries who hereafter indulges in it.

WAS IT IMPOSSIBLE TO OBEY THE ORDER?

Mr. LOGAN. Now, Mr. President, let me call the attention of the Senate for one moment to the evidence and see whether or not it was an impossibility for this order, known as the 6.30 order, to be obeyed. The order was issued at 6.30 in the afternoon of August 27, 1862, when Porter was nine miles away. The order was delivered by Capt. Drake De Kay, one of the staff officers of General Pope, at 9.30 p. m. That order directed him to start at 1 o'clock precisely and be at Bristoe Station at daylight, which was about 4 o'clock.

I ask what is the necessity for Senators here to say that darkness, trees, bridges, or anything else was in the way of Fitz-John Porter? Fitz-John Porter did not examine the roads, and there is no evidence to show that he did. Fitz-John Porter did not try to clear the roads, and there is no evidence to show that he did. He sent two officers to Pope and asked Pope to clear the road for him. Sir, it will not do to say that a man is excusable for disobeying an order when he does not try to obey it. He gave no orders to his commanding officers to move at 1 o'clock, he gave no orders for them to be ready to move at 1 o'clock, he gave no orders to them to be ready to move prior to 3 o'clock in the morning. The evidence of Drake De Kay shows that there were four miles of that road from Porter's camp to where the teams were being parked, with no obstruction in the way. He did not attempt to move that four miles. The evidence of Frederick Myers, the quartermaster in charge, shows that the wagons were all parked out of the way by 2 o'clock and the road was clear, and Porter still did not move; in fact he did not move until after sunrise the next morning. The head of his column touched the road at 4 o'clock right at his camp, and the evidence of one of the officers who was near Porter at that time shows that Porter was in his tent, and the sun was up before he mounted his horse; and yet Senators say that because he could not obey the order was the reason he did not do it.

Why do not Senators say that he tried to obey the order, as an excuse? But they can not say this. He did not, and the evidence shows that he did not. If he did not try to obey the order, he certainly disobeyed it. No obedience is disobedience. If there was disobedience of the order, I ask any Senator here to-day, no matter on which side he may have plumed himself, to tell me what a court-martial could do on a trial of a man for disobedience of orders if the evidence disclosed the fact that he did not try to obey the order? What kind of a verdict would they find? I ask what kind of a verdict could a jury or a court-martial find? They must find, according to their oaths, that he did not obey the order. If he did not obey the order, then, as a justification for not obeying it, was there an impossibility? The evidence does not show that fact. That being true, then I ask any man how he can vote to condemn that court-martial, the President who approved its judgment, and the whole country who approved it at that time, merely out of sympathy for this man because it is said he has been punished sufficiently?

THE EVIDENCE AS TO THE CONDITION OF THE ROAD PREPARED FOR PORTER.

Why, sir, I will give the evidence of twenty-one witnesses swearing to different points showing this state of facts to be true: That the road was open at 2 o'clock in the morning; that four miles of the road was open from his camp that night when he received the order; that he did not move until five hours after the order directed him to move; that he moved at a time when the wagons were coming out of park, which was off the road, into the road; that the road became obstructed not while he could have moved, but after the time had expired when he was to have been at Bristoe Station.

General Pope swore the road was in good condition, &c.

Drake De Kay delivered the order at 9.30.

OTHER WITNESSES.

Chauncey McKeever, known as General McKeever, a man well known here by nearly everybody, testifies that there was nothing to prevent the troops being put in motion on that night of the 27th of August.

Col. Robert E. Clary, who was sent by Porter to move the trains forward beyond Cedar Run, testifies that a proper force had been sent forward to clear the road; that there was nothing to prevent the troops from moving that night if a force had been sent to clear the road; that when he passed over it there was only a small portion of the road obstructed.

Solomon Thomas testifies that he moved out on the road in the morning; that they lay there until 9 o'clock on the morning of the 28th before they were moved forward; that the roads were in good condition, and when they moved out there was no obstruction. He was part of this command.

General Butterfield testifies that General Porter sent two aids to Pope that night to ask Pope to clear the road for him (Porter); that he did not know the urgency of the order, nor did he know whether any attempt had been made to clear the road.

Captain Duryea testifies that he marched from Warrenton that night up to 12 o'clock, and experienced no difficulty whatever in marching.

Capt. William W. Macy testifies that he marched that night until 10 o'clock, and experienced no difficulty, and had marched many times on darker nights.

Lieutenant Brooks testifies that he traveled that night from beyond Warrenton to Warrenton Junction, from Warrenton Junction to Bristoe Station, and from Bristoe Station along to Greenwich; that he had no difficulty in finding the road, and that the roads were good.

General Thomas McCoy testifies that he marched all the night of the 27th and until 1 o'clock in the morning with his command, and they experienced no difficulty in marching.

Colonel Buchanan testifies that he was at Porter's headquarters at 3 o'clock in the morning; that there was no stirring in the camp; that he waited until after sunup before he could see General Porter; that after that time Porter asked him to send a detachment of his cavalry forward to clear the road, so that he could march his troops, which was done.

William E. Murray testifies that he marched with his command that night until 10 o'clock; that the roads were dry and in good condition.

William M. Campbell testifies that he marched that night, finding no difficulty in the roads or darkness of the night.

Maj. William Birney testifies that he marched with his command in the direction of Bristoe Station on the night of the 27th; also marched again before daylight; that he experienced no difficulty on account of the character of the night or the roads, and that his entire brigade accompanied him.

J. H. Stine testifies that he marched with the whole brigade to which he belonged until after 9 o'clock at night, and found no difficulty either in the roads or in the darkness of the night.

Capt. John P. Taylor testifies that he is well acquainted with that country; that he was over the road from Warrenton Junction to Bristoe Station frequently; that wagons could go on either side of the road; that it was an open country, so that troops could move either on or at the side of the roads without difficulty.

The truth is, the evidence does show that there were but two little strips of wood from Warrenton Junction to Bristoe Station. It was all open field, and the fences had been burned. There was no trouble whatever in troops marching either on the road or outside of the road.

Samuel G. Hill, of Gibbon's brigade, testifies that his brigade marched that night until 10 o'clock; that he was up until 3 o'clock in the morning, and that the night was clear.

Major Duvall testifies that he rode from Warrenton to Catlett Station, from Catlett Station to Bristoe Station; thence to Manassas Junction; that there were wagons in the road, but no particular obstruction; that he traveled from eighteen to twenty miles that night.

James Haddow testifies that he marched with his command after sundown from Catlett Station to Bristoe Station; that the next morning (the 28th) he went from Bristoe Station back to Catlett Station; thence to Warrenton with three ambulances, and that they had no material difficulty in passing; that they met Porter's troops on the way.

Lieutenant Tiffany and N. P. Beach accompanied Haddow and testified to the same.

General Jubal Early testifies that he marched on the night of the 27th without experiencing any difficulty on account of the night.

Henry Kid Douglass, adjutant-general of Jackson, of the confederate army, testifies that Jackson's whole command moved away from Centreville up to near Groveton with all their brigade trains during the night of the 27th.

General Myers, quartermaster who had charge of the trains, testifies that the road was good from Warrenton Junction to Bristoe Station; that he parked the trains and kept them going into park, reducing the number all the time in the road; that there was a road on either side of the railroad; that there was nothing to prevent troops from moving that night; that he brought the head of the wagon trains into the road at daylight on the morning of the 28th.

I follow this with the more extended testimony of these witnesses on these points.

The evidence shows not only that ample provision had been made for the movement of Porter's troops, but it also shows that the road was a good one, that troops passed over it that day, wagon trains passed over it that day; that the railroad had been repaired; that trains were run out all the way. The evidence shows that there was a road on either side of the railroad. The evidence shows that these roads were open. The evidence shows that it was an open country all the way, except one or two little strips of woods that came down beyond his camp and one near Kettle Run, so that the troops could march outside of the road, and did so during that day.

EXCUSES GIVEN.

Mr. President, what is the excuse given by his friends? It is that it was a dark night. I will not take up time in discussing the question as to the darkness of the night, except to say that the evidence contradicts that statement. Suppose it was a dark night; does that make it impossible for men to march? I appeal to every Senator on this side of the Chamber who was in the Union Army, I appeal to every Senator on that side of the Chamber who was in the confederate army, if they would make such a statement; I would appeal to my friend from Kentucky [Mr. WILLIAMS]. No matter how he may vote out of sympathy, he knows that the cry that a man can not move on account of a dark night when there was a road to go on is utterly false.

SOME NIGHT MOVEMENTS THAT WERE MADE.

I have never desired to give my experience or say what I have done, but I will say now to the Senator from New Jersey, when he defends Fitz-John Porter for not moving nine miles at night so that he might fight a battle the next morning, that the records of our war show that I moved ten thousand men one night in a rain where we had to feel our way, ay, crossed the Mississippi River at daylight and marched fourteen miles, and came onto the battlefield in the midst of a heavy engagement, went into action at once with my men tired—but no matter, the soldiers went in with a will and turned the tide and the day was won.

Tell me that you can not move at night! Why, sir, moving around Vicksburg we marched night and day. After the battle of Jonesborough—I think my friend who spoke last [Mr. MANDERSON] was there—we moved to Lovejoy Station. In moving back, when the rain was pouring in torrents, I covered the rear of the Union Army when I could see neither road nor path.

Take the marches at the winding up of the rebellion; take the marches in Virginia at the time Richmond was evacuated; take the marches of Sheridan and of Crook; take the marches of the Fifth Corps—this same Fifth Corps that Fitz-John Porter commanded and did not command to fight at the second battle of Bull Run, after he was relieved from its command, however—it marched night after night. The history of the rebellion shows that the Fifth Corps marched for five days and nights, almost incessantly, helping to fight battles, under a different commander. And yet Senators make an excuse for this man that he could not attempt even to march that corps, he would not even try to obey an order to march, because it was dark!

LITTLE SCRAPS OF HISTORY.

Sir, it might not be amiss right here to call the attention of Senators to some little scraps of history. We may go far back in the history of wars, we may travel back as long as battles have been fought of which history gives an account, and we find night marches. Take, for instance, the battle of Arbela, fought by Alexander the Great against Darius. The night but one before that battle Alexander made the march in the dark to get on the battlefield by daylight. So you may take many others. Take the battle fought by Demosthenes at Syracuse. His assault was made in the dead of night by climbing around the crags on a pathway to the enemy. So, too, you may take the marches of Caius Claudius Nero when he escaped from the front of Hannibal and marched by night and day without ceasing to Metaurus, and there the battle was fought. His troops were hidden in the camp of Livius until the battle commenced; they won the battle after night and day marches, and the first that was known by Hannibal that Nero had escaped him was when he threw Hasdrubal's head into his—Hannibal's—camp.

Sir, the battle of Waterloo is recognized as a great battle, one of the fifteen great battles of the world. The battle of Waterloo was commenced in early day, and fought far into the night. The charge that was made by Napoleon with his reserve guard on the Iron Duke was made after 8 o'clock, and at 9 o'clock Wellington moved with his whole line and dispersed and drove the French army from his front. Do you tell me that you can not move troops by night? History is full of it. Battles in history show that great victories have been won in the night and that great marches have been made in the darkness and gloom of the night.

For the purpose of calling my friend's attention to the difference between an officer in 1862 and one in 1572 I should like to have read for his benefit a little scrap of history found in the second volume of Motley's Dutch Republic, on page 414:

The Secretary read as follows:

The Scheldt, flowing past the city of Antwerp and separating the provinces of Flanders and Brabant, opens wide its two arms in nearly opposite directions before it joins the sea. Between these two arms lie the isles of Zealand, half floating upon, half submerged by, the waves. The town of Tergoes was the chief city of South Beveland, the most important part of this archipelago, but South Beveland had not always been an island. Fifty years before, a tempest, one of the most violent recorded in the stormy annals of that exposed country, had overthrown all barriers, the waters of the German Ocean, lashed by a succession of north winds, having been driven upon the low coast of Zealand more rapidly than they could be carried off through the narrow straits of Dover. The dikes of the island had burst, the ocean had swept over the land, hundreds of villages had been overwhelmed, and a tract of country torn from the province and buried forever beneath the sea. This "Drowned Land," as it is called, now separated the island from the main. At low tide it was, however, possible for experienced pilots to ford the estuary, which had usurped the place of the land. The average depth was between four and five feet at low water, while the tide rose and fell at least ten feet; the bottom was muddy and treacherous, and it was moreover traversed by three living streams or channels, always much too deep to be fordable.

Captain Plomaert, a Fleming of great experience and bravery, warmly attached to the king's cause, conceived the plan of sending re-enforcements across this drowned district to the city of Tergoes. Accompanied by two peasants of the country, well acquainted with the track, he twice accomplished the dangerous and difficult passage, which, from dry land to dry land, was nearly ten English miles in length. Having thus satisfied himself as to the possibility of the enterprise, he laid his plan before the Spanish colonel, Mondragon.

That courageous veteran eagerly embraced the proposal, examined the ground, and after consultation with Sancho d'Avila, resolved in person to lead an expedition along the path suggested by Plomaert. Three thousand picked men, a thousand from each nation—Spaniards, Walloons, and Germans—were speedily and secretly assembled at Bergen-op-Zoom, from the neighborhood of which city, at a place called Aggier, it was necessary that the expedition should set forth. A quantity of sacks were provided, in which a supply of biscuit and of powder was placed, one to be carried by each soldier upon his head. Although it was already late in the autumn the weather was propitious; the troops, not yet informed as to the secret enterprise for which they had been selected, were already assembled at the edge of the water, and Mondragon, who, notwithstanding his age, had resolved upon heading the hazardous expedition, now briefly, on the evening of the 20th October, explained to them the nature of the service. His statement of the dangers which they were about to encounter rather inflamed than diminished their ardor. Their enthusiasm became unbounded as he described the importance of the city which they were about to save and alluded to the glory which would be won by those who thus courageously came forward to its rescue. The time of about half-ebb tide having arrived, the veteran, preceded only by the guides and Plomaert, plunged gaily into the waves, followed by his army, almost in single file. The water was never lower than the breast, often higher than the shoulder. The distance to the island, three and a half leagues at least, was to be accomplished within at most six hours or the rising tide would overwhelm them forever. And thus, across the quaking and uncertain slime, which often refused them a footing, that adventurous band five hours long pursued their midnight march, sometimes swimming for their lives, and always struggling with the waves, which every instant threatened to engulph them.

Before the tide had risen to more than half-flood, before the day had dawned, the army set foot on dry land again at the village at Irseken. Of the whole three thousand only nine unlucky individuals had been drowned; so much had courage and discipline availed in that dark and perilous passage through the very bottom of the sea. The Duke of Alva might well pronounce it one of the most brilliant and original achievements in the annals of war. The beacon fires were immediately lighted upon the shore, as agreed upon, to inform Sancho d'Avila, who was anxiously awaiting the result at Bergen-op-Zoom, of the safe arrival of the troops. A brief repose was then allowed. At the approach of daylight they set forth from Irseken, which lay about four leagues from Tergoes. The news that a Spanish army had thus arisen from the depths of the sea flew before them as they marched. The besieging force commanded the water with their fleet, the land with their army; yet had these indomitable Spaniards found a path which was neither land nor water, and had thus stolen upon them in the silence of night. A panic preceded them as they fell upon a foe much superior in number to their own force. It was impossible for 't Zeraerts to induce his soldiers to offer resistance. The patriot army fled precipitately and ignominiously to their ships, hotly pursued by the Spaniards, who overtook and destroyed the whole of their rear-guard before they could embark. This done, the gallant little garrison which had so successfully held the city was re-enforced with the courageous veterans who had come to their relief. His audacious project thus brilliantly accomplished, the "good old Mondragon," as his soldiers called him, returned to the province of Brabant.

Mr. LOGAN. Here is an instance in 1572 where three thousand soldiers marched three leagues and a half, a distance of over nine miles, through an arm of the sea that came up to their chins, during the time when the tide was coming in, and they had to make the march by a certain time in order to reach the land. They did it, carrying their ammunition on their heads and saved the garrison. Yet you tell me that Fitz-John Porter with a corps refused to march nine miles at night when there was no sea there to overflow him, but because of the darkness of the night, upon a steady, firm road, and that it was a physical impossibility for him to march. Will an American soldier say that he can not do that which a Spanish, Walloon, or German soldier could do? Will an American soldier say he can not march where a foreigner might march? Will an American soldier say he can not march on dry land nine miles when a foreigner marched three thousand men not on dry land but on a slippery bottom where the ocean's waves came up to the chins of the soldiers, and he made that march in the dead of night when darkness was upon his army and saved the troops that he went to succor? In the name of all that is under and above the earth will Americans claim that they can not perform that which other men can do?

Suppose Fitz-John Porter had been ordered to march through water four feet deep nine miles that night, he would have said it was a physical impossibility, and you gentlemen who are voting to relieve him would have agreed with him; but here is a man who tells you that it was not a physical impossibility, for he did it, says this history. If an American Senator can excuse an American officer from marching nine miles in the night on a good road where there are two roads after having read this history, it ought to bring a blush to the cheek of every American.

No, sir, it is not because he was convicted in violation of law, it is not because he was unjustly condemned. That is not it. The court has all passed away except three, I believe. Lincoln was assassinated; Garfield was assassinated. It is easy to denounce the action of the dead, for they can speak not; but it is not always well in a country like this to denounce the conduct of good and true men in the performance of their duty for the benefit of men who failed to perform their duty.

SOME RECENT HISTORY.

I have a little history here to which I wish to call the attention of the Senate. Some who were major-generals of the Army have a history themselves. I discover some gentlemen very anxious to insist in word, speech, and vote that this man Porter was improperly condemned who should look well to their own record. I have the proceedings of fifty-one dismissals of officers from the Army copied from records of the War Department. I will read some of them. They were poor volunteer officers, that is true:

Lieut. Henry C. Smith, "for insubordination, disrespect to his commanding officer, and disobedience of orders." He was dismissed.

Lieut. James Walton, "absent without leave and disobedience of orders."

Capt. Henry D. Wishart, of Pennsylvania, dismissed for deserting his company during action. "The general commanding regrets that he has not the authority to inflict the sentence of death."

Senators are putting this on the ground of excuses for people. Here is a poor fellow who could not stand the racket and he dodged a little; he was dismissed, and the general says he regrets he has not the power to inflict the sentence of death.

Seth L. Woodworth, of Illinois, was dismissed for skulking.

Captain Paulus was dismissed for absence without leave.

Reuben Platt, lieutenant, was dismissed for "misdemeanor when the regiment was marching against the enemy."

I will not read them all at this time, but will ask to give them with my remarks. There are fifty-one cases, all dismissed; and I wish to call the attention of both sides of the Chamber to the fact that these fifty-one officers were dismissed by a commanding general without even giving one of them a trial. Not one ever had a trial by court-martial, but were dismissed peremptorily by order of the general commanding, some for skulking, some for absence, some for disobedience of orders, and one for disrespect to his commanding officer. That general is a tender-hearted man, I presume. Would the Senator from New Jersey like to know who the general is that dismissed those fifty-one officers without giving them even the right to a court-martial. His name is signed to this order, and I will read it: "By order of Major-General ROSECRANS."

General Orders No. 30.

HEADQUARTERS DEPARTMENT OF THE CUMBERLAND,
Murfreesborough, Tenn., February 24, 1863.

By virtue of the authority delegated to the major-general commanding by the Secretary of War, the following-named officers are dismissed the service of the United States from the dates set opposite their respective names:

Maj. H. C. Rogers, Fourth Ohio Cavalry, from December 25, 1862, for absence without leave.

Lieut. James Ritt, Fourth Ohio Cavalry, from April 1, 1862, for absence without leave.

Lieut. Wellington B. Straight, Fourth Ohio Cavalry, from September 12, 1862, for absence without leave.

Lieut. John Shade, Fourth Ohio Cavalry, from December 26, 1862, for absence without leave.

Lieut. Adam Kunk, Fourth Ohio Cavalry, from September 6, 1862, for absence without leave.

Lieut. Thomas D. Burdsal, Fourth Ohio Cavalry, from September 6, 1862, for absence without leave.

Capt. J. W. Marvin, Third Ohio Cavalry, from January 21, 1863, for absence without leave, breaking his arrest, and drunkenness.

Capt. John Fenfrock, Sixty-fourth Ohio Volunteers, from November 5, 1862, for deserting his command while on the march.

Second Lieut. James H. Baty, Fifth Kentucky Volunteers, from January 22, 1863, for absence without leave.

Second Lieut. L. H. Albert, Thirty-ninth Indiana Volunteers, from January 22, 1863, for desertion.

First Lieut. John W. Scott, Company G, Forty-second Illinois Volunteers, from January 11, 1863, for absenting himself without leave and for disabling himself by contracting a disease which unfits him for military duty.

Lieut. Henry C. Smith, Eightieth Illinois Volunteers, from January 22, 1863, for insubordination, disrespect to his commanding officer, and disobedience of orders.

Second Lieut. James Walton, Ninety-fourth Ohio Volunteers, from January 22, 1863, for absence without leave and disobedience of orders.

Lieut. A. C. Brown, Tenth Wisconsin Volunteers, from January 23, 1863, for repeated misbehavior and absenting himself without leave when his regiment was marching to meet the enemy.

First Lieut. G. W. Riley, Fifteenth Indiana Volunteers, from January 29, 1863, for having disabled himself by contracting a disease which disqualifies him for military service.

Second Lieut. E. Bierce, Thirtieth Indiana Volunteers, from January 29, 1863, for straggling and permitting himself to be captured.

Capt. B. W. Canfield, One hundred and fifth Ohio Volunteers, from January 29, 1863, for disobedience of orders and gross neglect of duty in allowing his train, consisting of thirty-four wagons and one hundred and eighty-four animals, under charge of one hundred and sixty-four men, to be surprised and captured by scarcely superior force of the enemy, without any resistance on his part. The commanding general regrets his inability to inflict the extreme penalty of the law upon one so deserving an ignominious death.

Surg. H. M. Crouse, Fifty-seventh Indiana Volunteers, from November 9, 1862, for absence without leave.

Lieut. Col. Jacob Ruckstuhl, Fourth Kentucky Cavalry, from January 5, 1863, for absence without leave.

Capt. Henry Shaffer, Fourth Kentucky Cavalry, from January 5, 1863, for repeated absence without leave.

Capt. Patrick McGowan, Fourth Kentucky Cavalry, from January 5, 1863, for repeated absence without leave.

Maj. W. J. Clift, First Middle Tennessee Cavalry, from January 10, 1863, for absence without leave while his regiment was engaged with the enemy at the battle of Stone River.

First Lieut. R. H. Shively, First Middle Tennessee Cavalry, from January 10, 1863, for absence without leave while his regiment was engaged with the enemy at the battle of Stone River.

Second Lieut. H. N. S. Shipp, First Middle Tennessee Cavalry, from January 10, 1863, for absence without leave while his regiment was engaged with the enemy at the battle of Stone River.

First Lieut. S. L. Gregg, Nineteenth Indiana Battery, from October 27, 1862, for absence without leave.

Col. O. S. Hamilton, Eighty-sixth Indiana Volunteers, from January 13, 1863, for incompetency.

Capt. John Burton, Fourth Indiana Volunteers, from January 13, 1863, for intemperance.

First Lieut. Henry Weck, Seventy-ninth Illinois Volunteers, from January 13, 1863, for cowardice in the face of the enemy at the battle of Stone River.

Second Lieut. William C. Willard, Seventy-ninth Illinois Volunteers, from January 13, 1863, for cowardice in the face of the enemy at the battle of Stone River.

Capt. David Jamison, Twenty-ninth Indiana Volunteers, from January 13, 1863, for cowardice and deserting his command in the midst of the battle of Stone River.

Capt. W. W. Schuyler, Twenty-ninth Indiana Volunteers, from January 13, 1863, for cowardice and deserting his command in the midst of the battle of Stone River.

Capt. S. H. Williams, One hundred and fifth Ohio Volunteers, from J. nuary 13, 1863, for drunkenness while on duty.

Lieut. John Mangold, Ninth Ohio Volunteers, from January 15, 1863, for absence without leave.

First Lieut. Joseph J. Armatage, Eighty-sixth Indiana Volunteers, from January 15, 1863, for abandoning his company in the presence of the enemy at the battle of Stone River.

Captain Klein, Seventy-ninth Pennsylvania Volunteers, from January 15, 1863, for absence without leave.

First Lieut. E. H. Benedict, Seventy-ninth Indiana Volunteers, from January 15, 1863, for cowardice and misbehavior on the battlefield.

Capt. Duncan C. Reed, Twenty-fourth Wisconsin Volunteers, from January 27, 1863, for deserting his command while engaged with the enemy on the pretext of sickness.

Second Lieut. Albert B. Forbes, Eighty-eighth Indiana Volunteers, from January 17, 1863, for drunkenness on the field of battle.

Second Lieut. Jesse Ball, Eighty-eighth Indiana Volunteers, from January 17, 1863, for tendering his resignation, assigning as a reason that he was tired of the service and opposed to the President's proclamation.

Col. W. B. Casselly, Sixty-ninth Ohio Volunteers, from December 31, 1862, for drunkenness on the morning of the 31st December, at the most critical moment of the battle of Stone River, rendering him incapable of receiving or giving commands, thereby imperiling the safety of his entire regiment.

Capt. John Watts, Seventy-second Indiana Volunteers, from January 19, 1863, for disobedience of orders, gross carelessness, and neglect of duty while on picket.

Capt. M. Noble, One hundred and first Ohio Volunteers, from January 21, 1863, for absence without leave.

Second Lieut. O. L. Peck, One hundred and first Ohio Volunteers, from January 21, 1863, for absence without leave.

Lieut. S. G. Wright, acting assistant quartermaster Thirty-sixth Brigade, from November 21, 1862, for signing a false voucher.

Surg. W. H. Myers, Thirtieth Indiana Volunteers, from November 26, 1862, for stealing horses, abandoning his post when regiment was marching in the face of the enemy, he being the only medical officer on duty, and absence without leave.

Lieut. G. P. Stiles, Thirty-first Ohio Volunteers, from February 2, 1863, for absence without leave for more than sixty days.

Lieut. S. B. Conn, Sixty-fourth Ohio Volunteers, from February 2, 1863, for absence without leave for more than sixty days.

Second Lieut. Arthur Bennett, Seventy-seventh Pennsylvania Volunteers, from February 2, 1863, for absence without leave.

Capt. Henry D. Wishart, Seventy-seventh Pennsylvania Volunteers, from February 2, 1863, for cowardly conduct in the face of the enemy and deserting his company during the action of December 31, 1862, at Stone River, under the disgraceful pretext of sickness. The general commanding regrets that he has not the authority to inflict the sentence of death.

Lieut. Seth L. Woodworth, Company B, Seventy-ninth Illinois Volunteers, from February 2, 1863, for skulking in the rear at the beginning of the battle, disobedience of orders, and pretending lameness.

Capt. M. L. Paulus, Ninety-third Ohio Volunteers, from February 5, 1863, for being absent without leave and without sufficient cause from December 31, 1862, to January 3, 1863.

Lieut. Reuben Platt, Ninth Indiana Volunteers, from February 9, 1863, for repeated insubordination, absence without leave, and misdemeanor when the regiment was marching against the enemy.

By command of Major-General Rosecrans.

C. GODDARD,
Assistant Adjutant-General and Chief of Staff.

Without speaking of any member of the House of Representatives, I can speak of the General. When he appeals to this country to reinstate Fitz-John Porter, who was tried by a court-martial, who was convicted by a court-martial lawfully organized, and the sentence approved by the President of the United States, I ask him who appeals for the restoration of those fifty-one poor volunteer officers who were dismissed by a stroke of his pen without anything on the records as to what they were accused of except his own statement? I should like to see the tender heart turned toward the poor unfortunate volunteer as well as toward the man who happened to have been educated at the expense of the Government. Who pleads for those men? Who introduces bills to restore those men? No Senator, no Member of Congress, nobody pleads for them. Nobody asks that the tender heart shall turn toward them, dismissed without a court, without a trial, by merely the will of the commanding officer. Yet we are told that this is all right. They were mere volunteer officers.

HOW TO-DAY'S RECORD STANDS.

But, sir, that is about the way matters are moving in this country now. There is a class that must feed on the bounty of the Government; kicked out of the Army or not, it makes no difference, they must be put back and they must be supported by the Government. They are asking reinstatement by Congress every day. Why? Because at some time they performed service. They have been dismissed very true (dishonorably), but no difference.

Sir, there were two millions of men who performed service in this country, volunteer soldiers, privates and officers, and no bill has ever passed the Senate to put one of them on the retired-list; and not a volunteer officer has ever been placed there, no matter how badly wounded or shattered or torn, it makes no difference. A man has to go through the portals of the regular Army to receive the bounty of this Government on the retired-list. Whether he be armless, without legs or eyes, it makes no difference. If he was a poor volunteer, kick him out of the service by an order, not by a trial, and it is all right; but if a man who happened once to belong to the regular Army fails in his duty, disobeys orders, shows his disobedience and his contempt for his superior officer, all that side of the Chamber come up in solid phalanx for him, and they generally obtain a few allies from our side for the purpose of helping them along to reverse history. Men who attempted to destroy the Government, when forgiven (and I say this with all due respect—they will not complain, for they did try to destroy the Government), come to you, and undertake to reverse history on your side of the case, and you rush forward to assist them in doing it, and expect to gain the plaudits of the people of this country for so reversing history against the Union people of this Government; it is done on the ground of charity. Charity for what? Charity for your country? Charity for truthful history? Charity for a person. Therefore reverse the history of the case, turn the wheel backward, cast a stigma upon two dead Presidents, upon an honorable court-martial, for the benefit of a man who failed in the hour of trial to perform his duty toward his country. If that is the course that is going to be pursued it will not be long until all the history of the war will in a certain sense be reversed.

I for one, no matter what men may say, will follow my convictions of right. I am charged with following this man unnecessarily. I follow no man. I have my honest convictions and by my convictions I will stand. If I were the only man in this country who would stand in the Senate Chamber and defend the name and fame of Lincoln, Garfield, and the men who condemned this man, I would say, solitary and alone, "I will stand here in defense of right against a man who tries to tear down the reputation of those men in order to build up one for himself which he does not deserve."

THE SECOND BRANCH OF THE CASE.

Mr. President, I now desire to call the attention of the Senate to the second branch of this case, which is in reference to the 29th of August, 1862, and the orders on that day. I will not go over the testimony in full, for I propose by leave of the Senate to file the evidence in the case with my argument to sustain every proposition that I make. I have it compiled from the records as sworn to.

What is the case of the 29th of August? The Senator from New Jersey [Mr. SEWELL] commenced his speech by having a letter read from General U. S. Grant. If there is any one in this country who has a higher admiration for the military genius of General Grant than I have, I do not know him. I served under General Grant for three years. I went into the Army almost at the same time he did. I have known him for a great many years. I would not say one word that would deprive him of the great reputation that he has justly won before the American people. I will take his letter as read by the Senator on yesterday, and I propose to examine the paragraph for myself upon which he laid so much stress and see what I can make of it.

THE BATTLE ON THE 29TH OF AUGUST.

The controversy in this case on the 29th is about three orders. The first order was issued about 6 o'clock in the morning; the second was the joint order; and the third was the 4.30 order, which it is said he did not obey, nor, strictly, any of them. On that point the Senator from New Jersey makes the same mistake that all persons have made who defend Fitz-John Porter for the disobedience of that order. They insist that there was no battle on the 29th. If there had been a battle on the 29th, then Fitz-John Porter was guilty; but inasmuch as there was no battle on the 29th, he could not be guilty of violating an order to fight when there was no fighting to be done. That is the reasoning

The proposition is this: If there was a battle on the 29th, and Fitz-John Porter failed to fight when he was ordered to fight, then he is guilty; if there was no battle, he is not guilty, as there was no fighting to do. Is not that it?

Now, let us see if General Grant does not fall into the very same error. What does he say?

Until in 1881—

Mark the language, and I call the Senator's attention especially to it:

Until in 1881, when I re-examined for myself, my belief was that on the 29th of August, 1862, a great battle was fought between General Pope, commanding the Union forces, and General Jackson, commanding the confederate forces; that you, with a corps of twelve or more thousand men, stood in a position across the right flank of Jackson and where you could easily get into his rear; that you received an order to do so about 5 or 5.30 o'clock, which you refused to obey because of clouds of dust in your front, which you contended indicated an enemy in superior force to you; that you allowed Pope to get beaten while you stood idly looking on, without raising an arm to help him. With this understanding—and without a doubt as to the correctness of it, I condemned you.

What does he mean by this statement? He means that if there was a battle on the 29th and Porter stood there with twelve thousand men and did not fight and did not attempt to fight, he was guilty and Grant condemned him; but since he ascertained that there was no battle on the 29th he has changed his opinion. That is the whole case as General Grant puts it. I will agree with Grant on that proposition. I agree right here that if the evidence does not show that there was a battle fought on the 29th that I may be wrong so far as the order to attack is concerned, and if I cannot show by confederate and Union testimony that there was a battle fought on the 29th, and not only that, but by the report of the Senator himself, who says in his report that he had to change one battalion of his regiment to the position of the other on account of exhausting his ammunition—that is substantially the language of the Senator's own report—on the 29th, the battle was raging so furiously; in this I am not mistaken.

CONFEDERATE TESTIMONY.

Now let us see whether I am correct. These gentlemen do not like the evidence that was taken before the court-martial. It does not seem to agree with their case. They want confederate testimony. Inasmuch as they want confederate testimony let me give them a little of it. I bring General Lee now to prove my side of the case as I state it. General Lee says—I read from his official report:

Generals Jones and Wilcox bivouacked that night east of the mountain—

That is the night of the 28th; I do not want to consume time in reading the whole report—and on the morning of the 29th the whole command resumed the march, the sound of cannon at Manassas announcing that Jackson was already engaged.

That was at 9 o'clock in the morning.

Longstreet entered the turnpike near Gainesville, and moving down toward Groveton, the head of his column came upon the field in rear of the enemy's left—which had already opened with artillery upon Jackson's right, as previously described. He immediately placed some of his batteries in position, but before he could complete his dispositions to attack the enemy withdrew, not, however, without loss from our artillery. Longstreet took possession [position?] on the right of Jackson, Hood's two brigades, supported by Evans, being deployed across the turnpike and at right angles to it.

That is in the rear of Pope's left—

Now he goes on and gives the description, and winds up with saying:

While this demonstration was being made on our right a large force advanced to assail the left of General Jackson's position, occupied by the division of General A. P. Hill. The attack was received by his troops with their accustomed steadiness, and the battle raged with great fury.

THE TESTIMONY OF UNION OFFICERS.

That is the language of Lee. The battle raged with great fury on the 29th. Now, I can prove it by every report made by Union officers, and I have the names of the different ones making the reports and I will give them——

Mr. EDMUNDS. How far was Porter from that battle at that time?

Mr. LOGAN. About two miles to the left.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Then he could have heard the cannon.

Mr. LOGAN. The evidence all shows that his troops heard the artillery all day.

Now let me show you the number of reports of Union officers, and I especially call the attention of the Senate to them. They are as follows: General Pope, General McDowell, General Reynolds, General Schenck, General Robinson, General Grover, General Kearny, General Sigel, General Milroy, General Stahel, Lieutenant Haskins, General Carl Schurz, Lieutenant-Colonel Muhleck, Colonel Kryzanowski, and divers other Union officers' reports, and each and every one of them not only show a battle but heavy loss on the 29th, and not only that, but I assert the fact and will put it in evidence that the battle was desperate and bloody. The fight was so severe that the confederate reports show that all the field officers of one whole command were lost save two.

And yet with all these facts before the country and before this body Senators will say there was no battle on the 29th.

I will now give the names of the confederate officers who made reports of that battle. Here is the report of the Senator from New Jersey. He was in the battle—I have quoted it—he says he was out of ammunition and changed one-half his command around in order to let the others have a chance, his ammunition being exhausted. The Senator knows this to be his report. That was on the 29th.

Mr. SEWELL. Will the Senator allow me to interrupt him?

Mr. LOGAN. Certainly.

Mr. SEWELL. There is no question of the fact that there was severe fighting on that day. It was by isolated brigades, though; it was not a general battle.

Mr. LOGAN. "Isolated brigades." Yes, I should say there was one isolated command that did not fight at all. [Great laughter.] But you may call it what you please. Sir, you know if you are a military man—and I do not doubt the proposition; you served honorably during the war—there never was a battle fought yet when all the troops on both sides were engaged at the same time, unless it was a mere small detachment. There is no man certainly who was in the Army but knows that battles were all fought by brigades and divisions, one fighting now and another again, and so on as different movements were made. There is my friend who has an honorable record as an army officer [Mr. MILLER, of California]; he knows that what I say is true. Every man who has served in the Federal or confederate army knows the same thing. On the 29th every man you had under Pope except Porter was engaged in battle that day, and yet you say it was not a battle, and on that ground General Grant says because there was no battle on the 29th Porter ought to be excused, but if there was any battle on the 29th he "condemned him."

WHAT GENERAL GRANT'S LETTER PROVES.

Now, what does Grant's letter prove? It proves exactly what you do not want proven. It proves that if there was a battle on the 29th Porter was properly condemned. You agree there was. Therefore he was properly condemned. There is the kind of argument that you have used in this case from the time it was first before Congress, denying that there was a battle on the 29th, when Lee, Longstreet, Hood, Jones, Ewell, and Jackson, and the whole confederate forces recognize the fact and report that there was a severe battle, a severe struggle on that day, which is corroborated by your own officers, and the excuse made is that there was no fight on the 29th, therefore Porter is not culpable because he did not fight, for there was no battle going on.

If there was a battle on the 29th, Porter was guilty. I said I would stake the whole case on that proposition and take General Grant's letter to support my statement; and the very evidence that the Senator from New Jersey introduces to support his side of the case when the facts are brought to light condemn his friend.

ORDERS TO POPE.

On the morning of the 29th General Porter was lying near Manassas Junction; he received a verbal order. Without referring to the date I will try to give it correctly, for I do not want to detain the Senate by reading it, but I will put these orders in my remarks. I can state them. As I said, on the morning of the 29th General Pope sent a verbal order to General Porter, ordering him to push as rapidly as possible towards Gainesville; that if he did not move expeditiously we would lose much. General Porter refused to obey that order because it was not in writing. I have a letter from the man that carried that order to General Porter. Porter admits in his own statement that he received that order, but he wanted it in writing. Then General Pope had to give him an order in writing. This is the order:

HEADQUARTERS ARMY OF VIRGINIA,
Centreville, August 29, 1862.

Push forward with your corps and King's division, which you will take with you, upon Gainesville. I am following the enemy down the Warrenton turnpike. Be expeditious, or we will lose much.

JOHN POPE,
Major-General, Commanding.

The object of this order was to enable General Porter with a large force to intervene near Gainesville, on the Warrenton pike, between Jackson and Longstreet, and thus regain the advantages lost by the retreat of King and Ricketts early that morning. After that order was given in writing Pope issued what is called the joint order—the McDowell and Porter order. That order directed McDowell and Porter to march in the direction of Gainesville until they moved far enough to throw the right down onto the left of the army of Pope and to be in position that night, so that if they had to fall back to fall behind Bull Run.

HEADQUARTERS ARMY OF VIRGINIA, Centreville, August 29, 1862.

GENERALS MCDOWELL AND PORTER: You will please move forward with your joint commands towards Gainesville. I sent General Porter written orders to that effect an hour and a half ago. Heintzelman, Sigel, and Reno are moving on the Warrenton turnpike, and must now be not far from Gainesville. I desire that as soon as communication is established between this force and your own the whole command shall halt. It may be necessary to fall back behind Bull Run, at Centreville, to-night. I presume it will be so on account of our supplies. I have sent no orders of any description to Ricketts and none to interfere in any way with the movements of McDowell's troops, except what I sent by his aid-de-camp last night, which were to hold his position on the Warrenton pike until the troops from here should fall on the enemy's flank and rear. I do not even know Ricketts's position, as I have not been able to find out where General McDowell was until a late hour this morning. General McDowell will take immediate steps to communicate with General Ricketts and instruct him to join the other division of his corps as soon as practicable. If any considerable advantages are to be gained by departing from this order, it will not be carried out. One thing must be held in view, that the troops must occupy a position from which they can reach Bull Run to-night or by morning. The indications are that the whole force of the enemy is moving in this direction at a pace that will bring them here to-morrow night or the next day. My own headquarters will, for the present, be with Heintzelman's corps or at this place.

JOHN POPE,
Major-General, Commanding.

AN EXPLANATION OF THE JOINT ORDER.

There ought to be an explanation of this order. It is not very entertaining to the Senate to deal with maps, but I used to have a good deal to do with them when I had charge of a corps and also of an army, and therefore I naturally take to them. Why was the order given in that way? It is very simple when understood, as it may be if any one will look at the military situation, and I will explain it in a moment.

Jackson had moved around from Centreville by Sudley Springs behind what is called the Independent Railroad, which was a cut, and formed his line in rear of the railroad cut, letting his right run up in the direction of the road that ran from Gainesville to Centreville. Bull Run Creek runs down in this direction [indicating]. They were to move from Dawkin's Branch up to Gainesville, striking this turnpike road. The intention was to strike the turnpike, and the fact that Porter was told to be in a condition to fall back behind Bull Run shows that to be true, because on the road that he was then marching he could not fall behind Bull Run without traveling clear around to Centreville, but by passing through and letting his right swing over to this road he would be on the turnpike road which passed down across Bull Run to Centreville on this turnpike. That was the situation, and that is what Pope intended. After Porter had gone as far as Dawkin's Branch, five miles away from Gainesville, he says that, seeing dust, &c., he concluded to stop there. I do not give his language, but that is the substance. He did stop there; he staid there the whole day; that is, the head of his column did.

Mr. SEWELL. Will the Senator allow me a word?

Mr. LOGAN. Certainly.

Mr. SEWELL. The evidence of General Butterfield goes to show that he threw a brigade across Dawkin's Branch, his line deployed, and he rode in advance of his brigade to look at the ground, when suddenly his brigade was withdrawn, and he found McDowell and Porter together. It was on McDowell's order that it was withdrawn, and he says, "Put your troops in here to the right; you are too far out."

Mr. LOGAN. If the Senator had just waited a moment he would have gotten all the facts and more than he has given. I was stating that at Dawkin's Branch he stopped. That is true, is it not? McDowell came up with him at Dawkin's Branch. They had some conversation. He says that McDowell told him to put his troops in here. McDowell, he states, said this is no place to fight a battle. McDowell declares he did not say so; but that is immaterial. Porter said, "If I put my troops in I will get into a fight." McDowell replied, "That is what we came here for."

General Butterfield, of whom you speak, did not take his brigade, but he took part of it, went across the branch into open ground, and he says that he expected that an attack would be made, that he looked around and his whole regiment was gone, and he was left there by himself. He says he does not know how his regiment got away. He does not know who ordered it away, and does not know anything about it except that he was left there with one staff officer.

Mr. SEWELL. Give the rest of it.

Mr. LOGAN. I will give the whole of it as I go along. General Porter went back to Bethel chapel, two miles and a half, or three, to the rear of Dawkin's Branch, at the junction of the roads. There he staid the whole day; his corps was lying along that road with their arms stacked, and he never moved them one inch. Morell's brigade was up to the front and he put skirmishers out, and the only order that Porter gave to Morell during that day was to deploy a regiment, which he did. The next order he gave was to hide them in the woods, which he did, all except one battery, that Morell says he could not get in—Hazlett's battery; he could not get it into the woods under cover. That was the only order he got until late in the afternoon, after 6 o'clock in the evening, and Porter says that from the dust in the road he imagined or thought that a great force was marching down upon him, and therefore he hid his men in the woods.

I want to take the argument the Senator made yesterday. He said the judicious and soldierly conduct of Porter saved that army from destruction; that holding his troops in front of Longstreet kept Longstreet from moving off against Pope and destroying Pope; holding them there so long as he could have them in view. He did not have them in view, because he hid his men in the woods so that Longstreet could not see them. He says so and the Senator knows it. Instead of holding them in view to deter Longstreet from moving on Pope, he hid them in the woods so that they could not be seen, and so let Longstreet move on Pope. Not only that, sir, but before I get through, instead of your twenty-five thousand troops in front of Fitz-John Porter, I can demonstrate from the evidence that Longstreet had but six thousand that he could have used against Porter. He (Longstreet) never had twenty-five thousand troops under him present on that day, and I will prove that by Longstreet's own statement.

Mr. Porter, he says, obeyed the joint order. He was to go to Gainesville. Porter says, or the Senator says for him, that Porter could not fall over to the right; he could not move to the right so as to join Pope on the left. Why does he say that? Capt. James Stevenson, who is well known to many Senators here—he is connected with the Geological Survey—was a captain in a New York regiment. He was sent to Porter's corps for the mail, and he crossed from Pope's left through these very woods on horseback with the mail. During that very time that Porter says Longstreet had twenty-five thousand troops right in his front this man Stevenson rode by himself on horseback and carried the mail over to Porter's corps. One man on horseback could pass through these woods unmolested, and Porter was afraid to go in there for fear he would be destroyed with his twelve thousand men.

THE NUMBER OF TROOPS ENGAGED.

Let us see for a moment how many troops were there. This map shows that Longstreet first formed his men on Pageland lane. Here [indicating] was Jackson's right. Longstreet formed, throwing his left around on Jackson's right. Here was Pope throwing his left up this road, the turnpike road [indicating]. Porter, then, by moving here, would have struck Longstreet on the right flank; and according to all the testimony and the maps that your own friends have made for you, if he had moved forward on that road he would have struck Longstreet on the right flank. There is Longstreet's right flank, and there is the road passing up to the right of Longstreet. He could not have moved without striking him on the right flank. If Longstreet had met him he must have thrown his left around here [indicating] to face Porter instead of already facing him, as he is said to have been. This statement about its being impossible for Porter to pass on to the right of the enemy is sheer nonsense.

Now, let us see if we can find about how many troops were in Porter's front. I take General Longstreet's report, General Lee's report, General Wilcox's, General Hood's, General Anderson's, and see what they state. Longstreet on the 29th had (General Wilcox's brigade, Featherstone's brigade, General Pryor's brigade) six thousand three hundred men; General Hood (Texas brigade, Law's brigade, Evans's brigade) six thousand three hundred men—they average up very nicely according to their statements, I do not know how they got them so evenly; General Kemper (Kemper's brigade, Pickett's brigade, and Jenkins's brigade) six thousand one hundred men; and General Jones (Drayton's brigade and Toombs's brigade) six thousand three hundred men; making in all twenty-five thousand men. That is the number that General Longstreet gives.

Now, let us examine the testimony for a moment. General Lee says in his report that General Anderson's division came up in the evening of the 30th. General Anderson's division was seven thousand men, according to the testimony. They came up in the evening of the 30th, and not on the 29th. Now, subtract that from your twenty-five thousand and how many have you? Take a pencil and make your figures. The Senator says there were twenty-five thousand in front of Porter; we have got them down to eighteen thousand.

Now let us see what General Lee says and what General Longstreet says. They say that Wilcox's division, Kemper's brigade, Jenkins's brigade, and Evans's brigade, Hunton's and Hood's divisions went into action at Groveton at 4 o'clock, in all making over twelve thousand men taken from the eighteen thousand men, that went into action at Groveton at 4 o'clock. Lee had sent Wilcox's division, he says in his report, over to support Jones. Jones's brigade was over on the railroad, near the Cole house, watching Porter, when he saw some movement made, and that was the same time Porter hid his men in the brush. Wilcox's division was sent to support Jones; but Lee says, and so does Longstreet, that the column disappeared immediately; they do not say where, but Porter explains that they disappeared in the woods. Then he says he withdrew Wilcox's Division and threw it down to Groveton. There are twelve thousand men withdrawn from that eighteen thousand and sent to Groveton in action against Pope's left; and Longstreet and Lee both say that they remained there until 11 o'clock at night before they withdrew from Groveton. Now how many have you left in front of Porter? Six thousand men, and that was Jones's command and his support—but six thousand men. The evidence shows that Longstreet did not have another man there anywhere near Porter, and they were not in his front, they were over by the railroad; and that is the only command that Longstreet had anywhere near Porter at 4 o'clock and during the whole time from 4 o'clock until 11 o'clock at night, and at 11 o'clock at night he says they withdrew to their line, which was at Pageland lane, and not in front of Porter, so that Mr. Porter, when he received the order, instead of having twenty-five thousand men in his front, had but six thousand men; not in his front either, but in a position where they could have probably been employed against an assault.

The truth is, Stuart's report shows, and so does Porter's report, that the dust was thick; and Stuart says the dust was made by drawing brush along the road. I have repeated this before, and I do not wish to refer to it again; but that is the evidence in this case, and the evidence is what we must be guided by.

WHAT PORTER SAID BEFORE THE COURT-MARTIAL AS TO THE FORCES IN HIS FRONT.

In order to sustain what I say about that, suppose we take what Mr. Porter says. I want to call the attention of the Senate to this fact: Mr. Porter and his friends insist that there were twenty-five thousand men in his front and that he knew it, and Pope did not. I believe that is the statement. Fitz-John Porter stated to the contrary before the court-martial, that there must have been from ten thousand to fifteen thousand men in his front. Now he says there were twenty-five thousand; the Senator says so, and he knew it then, he says; but yet in his statement before the court-martial Porter said there must have been from ten to fifteen thousand men. How is it that he did not know then that there were twenty-five thousand, when he now claims that he did know it? If ten thousand, he (Porter) had more men than they had, for his morning report showed that he had thirteen thousand men for duty on the 29th. Twelve thousand five hundred is the estimate that is given by the witnesses. When he believed there were not more than ten or fifteen thousand he would not attack. Now, the Senators who try to excuse him say there were twenty-five thousand. When did they make this grand discovery? When you come to examine the reports of the confederates showing the number of men that they had in battle that day at Groveton, it turns out that Longstreet had but six thousand men anywhere near where Porter could have got at them at all. All the reports agree in this. Wilcox, who was here on duty in the Senate, makes the same statement as to the number moved to Groveton at 4 o'clock. In all the letters that they have written they do not pretend—that is dodged artfully—to state where their troops were that day.

Six thousand men! He did not even know that. How could he know anything about it? He was back at Bethel chapel the whole day, five miles away from the enemy.

Mr. SEWELL. Does the Senator want me to answer that question?

Mr. LOGAN. Certainly.

Mr. SEWELL. You have a recollection of the Buford dispatch?

Mr. LOGAN. I have.

Mr. SEWELL. That covers the ground.

Mr. LOGAN. Covers what ground?

Mr. SEWELL. That the troops were there.

Mr. LOGAN. Where?

Mr. SEWELL. That they passed through Gainesville.

Mr. LOGAN. Does that prove that they were in Porter's front?

Mr. SEWELL. Certainly. It was the only way they could get there.

Mr. LOGAN. The Senator is an artful man and I like these dodges. Now let me show the Senator the map.

Mr. SEWELL. I know it.

Mr. LOGAN. Yes, you know it; but I will explain it to others who do not know it. There is the road [indicating]. Buford says they were marching on down there. Here was Porter over here [indicating]. Seventeen regiments of infantry marched through Gainesville at 9 o'clock, says Buford's dispatch, but he never said they were marching in the direction of Dawkin's Branch. He said they were marching on the pike, and that is the pike down to Groveton; and General Lee in his report says that they marched down the pike to Groveton and went into battle against Pope's left; but the Senator will insist on saying they were in front of Porter, while he can not find a scintilla of testimony that supports him in such a statement.

Mr. SEWELL. You will find it in General Longstreet's report and his evidence.

Mr. LOGAN. You do not find General Longstreet saying any such thing. General Longstreet says his corps amounted to twenty-five thousand men, and I do not doubt that; but in his report he tells us that all his corps were in the fight at Groveton except one division. I know what Longstreet says. He says that he had twenty-five thousand men in his command, and if this man had attacked him any time after 12 o'clock he would have been terribly abused, but does not say his men were on the ground. I have his evidence, and here is his report made as soon after as possible, which says that D. H. Anderson came up on the 30th late in the day.

I ask the Senator whether he takes the report of a man made immediately after a battle? Mr. Longstreet and several other gentlemen who belonged to the confederate army have tried to make this matter as easy as possible for Fitz-John Porter; nobody doubts that. But I am taking their reports as they made them, the report of Lee, of Longstreet, of Jackson, and the whole of them, and they all agree that these troops were in the battle at Groveton on the 29th and not in front of Porter. And will any Senator tell me that the reports of Jackson, of Longstreet, of Lee, of Wilcox, of Hood, of Evans, and of all these men who were under Longstreet and engaged in battle that day, made within the next few days, are not true, and that Longstreet, after loss of memory in twenty years, shall contradict the whole thing; which, however, he does not do? No, sir; I defy any man to take the reports of the confederates themselves and disprove the statement I have made; they prove it, sustain it in every particular. And nowhere in the evidence of any of them do they contradict the fact that the troops I mention were engaged at Groveton on the 29th.

THE 4.30 ORDER.

Now let us examine the 4.30 order, which was as follows:

HEADQUARTERS IN THE FIELD, August 29—4.30 p. m.

MAJOR-GENERAL PORTER: Your line of march brings you in on the enemy's right flank. I desire you to push forward into action at once on the enemy's flank, and if possible on his rear, keeping your right in communication with General Reynolds. The enemy is massed in the woods in front of us, but can be shelled out as soon as you engage their flank. Keep heavy reserves and use your batteries, keeping well closed to your right all the time. In case you are obliged to fall back, do so to your right and rear, so as to keep you in close communication with the right wing.

JOHN POPE,
Major-General, Commanding.

General Pope was near the right of his line. General Ricketts was with him, and kept note of the movement of troops on that day. General McDowell withdrew from Porter at about 12 o'clock with his division, and he went from Bethel chapel up the Sudley Springs road until he struck the pike running to Groveton; he took that, and arrived there and put his division in battle on the left center. At the time he was going into battle, when he reported to Pope, he (Pope) had concluded to make a movement along the whole line and to assault the enemy at every point. So he sent an order to Porter then to assault and strike the enemy on his right flank or in the rear, that he must do it at once, and the men under McDowell moved forward; his whole army moved forward. It was about 6 o'clock, when it moved forward, and he expected Porter to do the same thing. Instead of that, he (Pope) had Longstreet's whole corps, except Jones's division, in his front at Groveton, and Porter, lying with his arms stacked for three miles along the road, never moved nor did he fire a shot. Was there any excuse for that? They say he did not receive the order in time. When did he receive the order? He says at 6.30. The Senator said yesterday at 6.30. The evidence, however, does not bear him out in that statement.

I know the fact that when a Senator makes a statement it is sometimes taken against the sworn testimony of the witnesses if it serves the purpose, but it does not serve mine so well. The evidence of Pope's aid who delivered that order, the evidence of the orderly who went with him, is that it could not have been later than half after 5 o'clock when that order was delivered. The sun on the 29th day of August, 1862, set at 6.36, and he received the order at half past 5. But suppose he did not receive it until 6.30. Take that for granted for the sake of the argument. He had then nearly two hours of daylight in which to have made his assault; and will any man tell me that Longstreet was right in his front? If Longstreet was immediately in front Porter did not have far to go to strike the enemy, and why did he not do it? Why did not that soldier—whom Senators speak of as being a grand soldier—strike the enemy? It may be very well for Senators to say that he was a man of great experience; he was a man of great genius; he knew more than Pope. That is the argument. Pope was an ignoramus and this man was a wise man; and therefore, being a wise man, he knew better than to fight when he was ordered to fight, because the man that ordered him did not know as much as he did!

Fitz-John Porter is a man of great imagination, and a man who thinks he can overturn the history of the country, and that he does find help to do it I agree. He finds help on this side that he ought not to find; he finds men helping him who ought not to assist, but still they are found.

WHAT PREVENTED THE ASSAULT?

Now let us see for a moment whether he could have assaulted or not. I repeated a moment ago from history the fact that at the great battle of Waterloo the last assault made by Napoleon's guards on the guards of the Iron Duke (Wellington), was made after 8 o'clock on the 18th day of June, 1815, and there the order was given by Wellington that has gone down into history, "Up, guards, and at them!" And at 9 o'clock Wellington formed his line and moved forward and broke the French army into pieces; and yet Fitz-John Porter could not move at 6.30, when the Senator says that he had his troops up at Dawkin's Branch deployed ready to attack! Why did he not do it?

Mr. SEWELL. Will the Senator allow me to interrupt him?

Mr. LOGAN. Certainly.

Mr. SEWELL. The head of his column was deployed ready for an attack, but his whole troops were not in line; the joint order did not contemplate the fighting of a battle at that place, but it contemplated going to Bull Run. He was in a position to hold himself to protect his own column on the road and to hold Longstreet there.

Another item I would call the Senator's attention to: the twilight at Brussels is entirely different from the twilight at Bull Run; it lasts about two hours later.

Mr. LOGAN. If the gentleman would take two hours off we should have it exactly, and in doing that Wellington's attack would, according to the Senator, be an hour after dark. So that does not help the Senator's case.

I wish to answer the Senator in the same way he tries to answer me. He says the reason was that the joint order did not contemplate an attack. That was the order issued in the morning. I am talking about the order of 4.30, which directed him to attack at once; but the Senator says because the previous order did not contemplate an attack, therefore he had no right to obey the 4.30 order. In other words, to illustrate: if the rebellion is going on and I am ordered to move on Jackson, Miss., from Vicksburg and to be there at a certain time, because the troops at Jackson were going to attack, and I meet some troops on the road, I say, "Well, I will not fight these fellows, because I am ordered to go to Jackson before I fight." [Laughter.] That is the reasoning of the Senator.

Mr. SEWELL. The Senator drew a comparison between Wellington at Waterloo and Porter on Dawkin's Branch. He is perfectly right about the time at Waterloo, but there had been a fight going on there all day in open sight, open view.

Mr. LOGAN. So there had been at Bull Run since 9 o'clock.

Mr. SEWELL. There I differ with the Senator in opinion, and I say there the Guard were in line and they could not help it.

Mr. LOGAN. The difference is this: Napoleon's Guard had not been in the battle at all at Waterloo, and they never engaged until 8 o'clock, when they were ordered to assault the guards of Wellington. That is just the position this man Fitz-John Porter was in. They were the reserve of Napoleon's army and had not been engaged in battle, but they assaulted at 8 o'clock and Wellington assaulted at 9. The battle had been going on the major part of the day, and so had the battle of Bull Run from 9 o'clock in the morning until 9 o'clock at night, and yet your friend did not assault! No time in the day was proper for him to assault and no part of his column was in action.

Mr. EDMUNDS. You mean that the cannon were still firing at half past 8?

Mr. LOGAN. I mean the battle was still going on at 9 o'clock and did not cease until that time. I mean that McDowell's corps commenced its battle at 6 o'clock and continued to 9 o'clock, as the reports on both sides show. Assault after assault was made, and yet Porter's Army Corps could not assault, but the confederates could. Longstreet's corps could assault at Groveton at 8 o'clock at night, moving down at 4 o'clock to do it, but we could not do it. Oh, sir, it is a bandbox soldier that must only fight by sunlight. When did Sheridan ever ask for daylight, if necessary to save a battle?

A FEW COMPARISONS.

I should like to give a little experience here just for the benefit of the Senator. I do not know whether any of my friends on the other side were there or not. If they were, they left early; they will remember that. At the battle of Resaca General Thomas R. Woods, the brother of Judge Woods, of the Supreme Bench, commanded a division, and Judge Woods commanded one of his brigades. They were in my command. At 9 o'clock at night at Resaca, under my orders, General Woods assaulted the line of works of the rebels, a curtain running from the fort down to the river, and took it when it was so dark that you could not see where the line of works was. I sat on my horse and could only tell the position of either side by the flash of the guns.

Talk about being destroyed! I will give you an instance of one brigade at the battle of Baker's Creek, where thirty thousand of the enemy were opposed to two divisions of our troops. One brigade, a small brigade at that, under my orders marched two miles down a ravine and moved into the rear of those thirty thousand men and opened on them, scattered and dispersed them, and we captured much of their artillery and nearly as many men as the brigade itself had. Of course it took its chances; but it did it. If Fitz-John Porter had performed his duty as well as that little brigade did the Army of Virginia would not have been depleted as it was on that day.

THE POSITION PORTER OCCUPIED THAT DAY.

Having disposed, as I believe at least, of the question of the number of troops in front of Fitz-John Porter at that time, let us come back to the proposition for a moment and see the position he occupied during that day, to show whether he intended to engage in the contest. As I said, his troops were lying on the road from three to four miles, with arms stacked, during the day. He had but two regiments deployed at any time during the whole day, and then he withdrew them and put them in the brush. Further than that, when he received that order, will the Senator insist that he ever told one of his officers, staff officers or anybody else, that he had received an order to attack? The evidence shows that when that order was delivered to him he was lying down under a tree resting. The order was handed to him; he read it, folded it up, and put it in his vest pocket. General Sykes, who was sitting by his side, testifies that Porter never told him what the order was; that he never knew that Porter had received an order to attack. Morell says the same. Every commander that he had who has given testimony at all testifies that he did not give them any information that he was directed to attack at any time or any place. So when he sent word to Morell to put his command in line, Morell says that he was deploying his regiment, and while he was deploying it he got an order to withdraw it and go into camp for the night.

Fitz-John Porter was charged with having allowed some of his officers to retreat during the day. That has been persistently denied. The evidence does show that when General Sturgis reported to him with his brigade and informed him that there was a battery being established in his front and called his attention especially to it, he said no, and gave Sturgis an order not to move forward and assault the enemy. But what was the order? To move back to Manassas and go into a defensive position. That was the order that Sturgis received, and the only one received that day from Fitz-John Porter. Sturgis went into the battle, but he did not go in by the order of Porter. He himself moved his troops to the front and engaged with the enemy on the next morning.

When Porter was ordered to bring his whole command on the battlefield, Griffith's brigade, a part of Porter's command, retired to Centreville, and remained at Centreville during the whole battle. It came there on the night of the 29th and remained there, and never fired a gun. Piatt commanded a brigade, and he makes the statement and publishes it to the world that he received no orders at all. He reported that day, and the only way he got into the battle was by going on his own motion and engaging in the battle on the 30th. He received no orders whatever from Porter. In all the evidence an order can not be found that Porter ever gave to a solitary regiment, brigade, or division to engage in the battle, or even in a skirmish, with the enemy at any time during that day.

Porter received the order I will say at 5.30 o'clock. The Senator says at 6.30 o'clock. What was the order? To move at once, and attack the enemy on the right flank and in rear, if possible, keeping his right well refused, so as to strike back on the left of Pope's line, using his artillery freely. That was the order given to Porter. Will you tell me why he did not attempt to obey that order? There has not been an order given to Porter up to the present time that he obeyed, except to move forward, which he did to Dawkin's Branch, and there stopped. Then, instead of starting at 6 o'clock in the morning when he was ordered, he did not start until 9 o'clock. In all this case I defy any friend of Fitz-John Porter to put his finger on one order requiring immediate action which he obeyed. He utterly refused to obey any order given to him either to move or to fight.

ONE OF PORTER'S EXCUSES FOR REFUSING TO FIGHT.

Suppose we take it for granted that Longstreet had twenty-five thousand men drawn up in line right in Porter's front, what of it? Does a man always expect to fight inferior forces? Many times during the late war the confederates fought us with one-half the number we had. We fought them sometimes with one-half the number they had. The only rule of warfare that I know is to strike the enemy where you find him, if your army is engaged. To say that a man shall not fight because he expects to be whipped is something new in military science. It is something that I have never been taught before. Since I came to the Senate I have learned that this is the idea of some gentlemen, but never during my little experience in the Army did I so understand it.

Speaking of small armies assaulting great ones, the world's history is full of such cases. At the battle of Marathon the Athenians, a handful almost, in the afternoon assaulted the Persian hordes and drove them from the land, slaying six thousand of the Persians, when only about two hundred of the Athenians were slaughtered, owing to the impetuosity of the assault.

Now let me contrast this man's conduct on the 29th of August with the conduct of an officer at the battle of Marengo. There, when the battle was lost, when the troops were leaving the field, when Dessaix said the sun was receding and the enemy advancing, that great soldier, who fell in that conflict, with six thousand men moved forward without orders, assaulted the enemy, and turned defeat into victory. So, too, this man could have done if he had obeyed his orders; but he failed to do it, failed in every instance.

I could name quite a number of victories won by an army inferior in numbers in our war. When Vicksburg was first surrounded with thirty thousand men inside its walls we had only twenty-seven thousand men to impale them there, and miles of our line were only held by a skirmish line. The enemy did not know it, however. It was a mere picket line, that they could have gone through any day or night. They supposed of course that there was a column of troops behind, but it was not true. In many instances throughout the late war cases of the kind occurred. Yet, forsooth, to-day a man with twelve thousand five hundred troops fails to assault an enemy for fear that he will be whipped. A man is a good commander who can possibly command more than that number of troops in a battle. He may command a corps with his division commanders having their orders to manage their divisions; he may command an army with his corps commanders having their orders, but the immediate control of twelve thousand troops in a battle will be satisfactory to the genius of almost any man in military affairs.

THE REAL QUESTION IN THE CASE.

There is but one more point in this case that I desire to discuss. The Senator from New Jersey has said that Fitz-John Porter was a good soldier prior to this time. I do not dispute it. He says he did well the next day. I do not dispute that. It was absolutely necessary for him to do something on the next day. After our army was broken to pieces perhaps he had to help. Nobody questions that. The question before the Senate is not whether a man has been a good soldier or a poor soldier. The question before the court-martial was: Did he disobey his orders; were they lawful; could they have been obeyed?

THE LAST ORDER ISSUED BY POPE TO PORTER ON THE 29TH.

General Pope, finding that it was impossible to have Porter obey any of his orders, finally issued the following order, directing him to march on the battlefield and report to him, with his command, in person, also to note the time of the receipt of the order, for the reason that Porter had avoided noting the time of the sending or receiving of any orders or dispatches during that day:

HEADQUARTERS ARMY OF VIRGINIA,
In the Field, near Bull Run, August 29, 1862—8.50 p. m.

GENERAL: Immediately upon receipt of this order, the precise hour of receiving which you will acknowledge, you will march your command to the field of battle of to-day, and report to me in person for orders. You are to understand that you are expected to comply strictly with this order, and to be present on the field within three hours after its reception, or after daybreak to-morrow morning.

JOHN POPE,
Major-General, Commanding.

Maj. Gen. F. J. PORTER.

The very issuing of the above is proof that Pope could not get Porter to obey any of his orders, and in fact this order was not literally obeyed, as Porter did not bring his whole command on the field of battle on the 30th.

With all these facts before us who can say that he was unjustly found guilty?

The maxim of Napoleon, "to always march to the sound of the enemy's guns," was totally unheeded by Porter.

To sum up his conduct on the 29th in brief: The battle began at Groveton at 9 o'clock the 29th; he was at Dawkin's Branch at 12 o'clock, on a plain road to Gainesville, within two miles of Pope's left, where the battle was raging; he had his troops stack arms along the road from Bethel chapel to Dawkin's Branch, a distance of three miles; his troops did not move from their position of resting during the whole day. The sound of battle was heard by his command during the entire day until 9 o'clock at night; he was ordered to move to Gainesville in the morning—to push forward. He was ordered to join his right on Pope's left; he was ordered to attack the enemy. He did not obey these orders; he did not try to obey any or either of them. He heard the shock of battle, the shouts of triumph and despair, but he moved not while the red-throated cannon belched forth missiles of death; while musketry rattled as the long-roll on a thousand drums; while infantry assaulted and cavalry charged; while men fell in death's embrace and the wounded cried for help; while the blood of his comrades flowed like water. While his commanding officer and his fellow-soldiers anxiously listened for the sound of his guns, he lay beneath the shade of a tree, putting his orders in his pocket, without informing his officers what they directed him to do. Sir, does history record such action in any soldier prior to this time? Where is the man other than Porter that ever lay with twelve thousand men who were panting to move to the aid of comrades within two miles of a battle for nine weary hours without firing a gun or even trying to ascertain if he could be of any assistance?

Sir, no such case can be found; and we are asked to condemn the court-martial that convicted him for his disobedience of orders. Was ever such request made by such a man? The only information sent by him during the day to his superiors was that he was going to retire or retreat to Manassas, and this was received just as the battle was hottest. Dust, sir, dust, was his only excuse. Men in buckram haunted him all the day. Let the many widows and orphans made that day and the many graves of brave men who fell on that field bear testimony against him in all time to come.

This thing of sympathy for a man because he has been punished for disobedience of orders is one thing, but the law and the just verdict of a court is another. You are not asked to sympathize with this man. You are asked to overturn the verdict of a court. You are asked to declare the law contrary to what the law was as expounded by that court. You are asked to reverse the verdict of a lawfully constituted tribunal. You are asked to reverse the record made by the President of the United States. I ask you whether you can do it as a legal proposition? You may do it in violation of the law, you may do it in violation of right and justice in reference to military conduct, but when you do that, do not place it upon the ground that you sympathize with this man and are justified in your action.

Our sympathy goes out to all humanity. The poor down-trodden man in Europe has our sympathy. The poor man in this country has our sympathy. The man who has to labor night and day should have our sympathy; the sick, the sore, and distressed should have our sympathy; and our sympathy should lead us to do what? To extend to them food or raiment, to give them employment or aid them in all proper ways, but not to do that which overrides law. It is not that which will override justice; it is not that which will override the principles which underlie this Government, and destroy the morale of our grand little Army, that can be justified on the ground of sympathy.

THIS BILL ESTABLISHES A DANGEROUS AND BAD PRECEDENT.

Mr. President, when every day poor, unfortunate, crippled officers are having their bills to put them on the retired-list referred to the Military Committee reported against, and why? Because they were dismissed from the service or because they resigned from the service, and therefore are not in law entitled to be put back. That has been the rule in the Congress of the United States, and the exception to the rule is made in favor of a man who was dismissed from the service for wanton disobedience of orders in the time of a great battle. And this is to be made the exception. Why? Will some Senator tell me? Why are these appeals made? I ask when the soldier who sleeps in the far-off grave is forgotten, when only his name is known by the monument that is above him, saying that he fought for his country, and that is all; when he is remembered by a poor little pension to his heirs, a man who stood with his musket in time of battle with courage against the enemy, this pittance is allowed to his heirs; for what? For his loyalty, for being true to his Government, for obeying orders even to the loss of life. But here comes a man who failed his superior officers, who was dismissed from service, and asks to be reinstated; reinstated for what? For disobedience of orders; for failing when failure was disaster. He asks you to put him back in the Army, to be supported with a $3,000 salary as long as he may live. For what? Sir, if this man is to be restored, where is the Union officer that was wounded in battle, where is the crippled officer to-day, whether he belonged to the regular Army or to the volunteers, who would not be entitled to the same consideration? Yet the Senate would not vote for it. I tell you, Mr. President, make not these distinctions; make not this record. It is not one of honor, nor do I believe the country will so regard it.

EQUALITY AND JUSTICE TO THE PEOPLE.

I have tried to hurry through and not detain the Senate too long. I say, in conclusion, that the war for the Union was fought to preserve a great Government, to preserve the rights of citizens, to give them protection under the law, and to secure equality of rights and justice before the law. If this act of wrong, as I deem it, shall be perpetrated by the Congress of the United States, it will be declaring that those who failed in the hour of trial are those who shall be honored in the hour of triumph; it will be declaring to the world that the record of those in the Army who failed at the important time is as good as that of those who sustained the Government; that the honor and glory of the whole Army of the United States shall not be maintained alone by the honors it won, but shall be maintained by the honors lost by its unworthy members. When we returned to our homes and our peaceful pursuits, when the armies of a million of men melted away into the paths of peace, we then expected, and ought to expect now, that nothing would be done by Congress at least that would mar that thought that should be in every man's mind, that equality and justice should be done to all according to the laws and Constitution of our land, that justice should be done the living and that justice also should be meted out to the reputation of the dead.

So then for the honor of this nation let not its representatives mar the record that loyalty made in behalf of this great Government and for the benefit of this people.

I have deemed it to be my duty as a member of this body to oppose at all times a proposition of this character, because I believe it to be wrong in theory and certainly wrong in practice. I believe it will demoralize the Army and have a demoralizing effect upon the country.

DANGER OF THE FIRST STEP.

I say in all kindness to the other side of this Chamber (it will perhaps have no effect), your course, assisted by a few of our side in this case, will prevent the people of this country as long as you shall proceed in this way from having confidence that you intend to administer the affairs of the Government fairly. The opening of the doors for Fitz-John Porter does not mean Fitz-John Porter. It means breaking down the barrier, the wall between the good and the bad and those who failed in time of trial and those who did their duty. It means opening the door on the retired-list to Porter and to other men who failed us in our trials who shall follow in his wake. It means more. I do not care what a few gentlemen who were in the Union Army may say, I do not care what a few gentlemen who were not in the Union Army may say; but the great body of the American people do not believe in breaking down the barriers between the men who failed in time of need and the men who stood at their posts.

When I say that, I am speaking of our loyal people. I mean that the people do not believe in your coming here to regulate courts-martial for us, that we settled during the war. They do not believe it is just; they do not believe it is right. I am speaking the truth to you, and the people will emphasize it hereafter. Let your confederacy regulate its own courts-martial while it existed in opposition to this Union, but do not come here from under that flag with numbers sufficient to put disgraced men back in the Army, to cast slurs upon our men who did their duty, to trample in the dust the authority that suppressed your confederacy. Let not your feelings go that far. If they do, I tell you that more years than you think will pass over your heads before you will have the confidence of the American people.

There are some friends on this side of the Chamber who join with the other side. They are entitled to their views. I say to them, you will open the doors to danger in this country when you do this act. It is not an act of kindness to this man; it is an act of injustice to the Army; it is an act of injustice to the loyal people of this country; it is an act of injustice to the memory of Lincoln and those who were associated with him at the time; it is trampling under foot the law and the facts. You who were the friends in the hour of trial, you who stood by then, should not falter now. You are to-day doing that which you would not have done ten years ago. But to-day the consciences of some people are getting so easy that we must do everything that is asked for men who failed us in the hour of our greatest danger, for men who are entitled to nothing except what they received. We are asked in charity which is no charity to violate the law, to violate the proper rules of civil conduct, to violate the judgment of a court, to violate the order of a President made according to law and in justice, as shown at that time and now. I hope at least that men who have stood by the country in the hour of trial will not weaken in the hour of triumph in the interest of those whose triumph would have proved disastrous to the country.

The conscientious feeling that I have performed my duty according to my honest convictions to my country, to the honor of our now faithful little Army, to my comrades in arms during the war, to the living and the dead that took part in the judgment of the court, to the loyal people that loved this country and helped to save it, shall be in my own breast through life my reward for my action in this case.

APPENDIX.

EVIDENCE, REPORTS, AND ORDERS IN THE FITZ-JOHN PORTER CASE.

Badeau on the subject of marches, says:

It was late in the evening before Grant reached Burkeville, where he found that Ord had moved to Rice's Station and intrenched in front of Lee. The general-in-chief at once reported the situation to the Government.

And here is his dispatch:

The troops are pushing now, though it is after night, and they have had no rest for more than one week.

That was the way General Grant moved armies.

Now let me show what General Grant understands by an imperative order, by an order that means to be obeyed. Here is his language on page 586 of the third volume of the Military History of U. S. Grant by Badeau:

I am moving the cavalry column on Appomattox depot. There are eight trains of cars at that point to supply Lee's army. Everything is being run out of Lynchburg toward Danville. Our troops are reported at Liberty. This must be Stoneman.

When Crook received his orders to rejoin Sheridan he was very unwilling to obey, and went in person to Grant to complain.

Crook did not disobey Sheridan's order, but he went to Grant. He was ordered by Grant to report to Sheridan, but was unwilling to obey, and he went to Grant; for what? To be excused from obeying the order. What did he say?

His troops—

Crook said—

were tired and worn; they had marched all day, forded the river, and fought a battle, in which they had been repelled. Not a thousand men were fit to move.

What did Grant say?

But Grant was peremptory; the emergency was immediate; Sheridan had asked, and Crook was obliged to conform. Accordingly, the cavalry crossed the stream again in the night and set out to rejoin Sheridan.

Now let me read again about marches day and night. On page 596 of the same volume you will find this:

Ord marched his men from daylight on the 8th until daylight on the 9th of April, halting only three hours on the road—a terrible march; but the men understood that they were conquering their enemy as effectually by marching as by fighting, and did not murmur. Griffin did as well as Ord. His troops marched twenty-nine miles and bivouacked at 2 a. m. on the 9th; then moved again at 4, and reached Sheridan's position at 6, just as Lee was approaching in heavy force to batter his way through the cavalry.

Again—

Crook was soon hotly engaged. He ran his guns to the front and held his ground in spite of a heavy onset of the enemy, for the rebels must make their way through now or all was lost. Lee's force was infantry and greatly outnumbered Sheridan, and the cavalry leader soon sent back, urging Ord to hasten forward; at the same time he directed Crook to fall back slowly and sacrifice no more men in trying to check this heavy force. Gibbon, Griffin, and a division of colored troops were ensconced in the woods waiting for orders to advance. It looked as if Sheridan was deserting the field and meant to allow the rebel army to pass. Lee's men gave once more the battle-yell and quickened their pace and doubled their fire, when suddenly, the cavalry having all retired, the infantry line emerged from the woods, and the rebellion was over.

Now, let us go further, to show some of these marches:

All night the Army of the Potomac marched, though it had been allowed no rest for five full days and nearly as many nights; marched without food; as its commander said, "As ready to die from fatigue and starvation as from the bullets of the enemy."

On page 622 of Badeau's Military History of U. S. Grant I find:

The marvelous marching, not only of Sheridan but of the men of the Fifth and Twenty-fourth Corps, was doing as much as a battle to bring the rebellion to a close. Twenty-eight, thirty-two, thirty-five miles a day in succession these infantry soldiers marched—all day and all night. From daylight till daylight again, after more than a week of labor and fatigues almost unexampled, they pushed on to intercept their ancient adversary, while the remainder of the Army of the Potomac was at his heels.

GRANT'S OPINION OF THE PORTER CASE IN 1874.

WASHINGTON, April 18, 1874.

MR. PRESIDENT: It is no doubt known to you that General Fitz-John Porter claims to have procured evidence since his trial, not attainable at the time, which would either acquit him of the crime of which he stands convicted or greatly modify the findings and sentence of the court-martial before which he was tried, and that he has embodied in a printed pamphlet the kind and character of this evidence and what he expects to establish by it, together with an appeal for a rehearing of his case.

It is widely asserted by those who sympathize with him, and probably believed by many who have no personal interest in his case, that influences hostile to him have restrained you from examining this statement of his case, and have thus worked great injustice, by preventing the Executive from considering statements or evidence which might vindicate his character.

It is needless to say to you that I have never used any influence with you, personal or other, to prevent the investigation of his statements, nor even intimated to you in any manner that I objected to any action you might think proper to take in the matter.

Nevertheless, as I do not wish even to seem to consent to any additional misconceptions concerning me or my action in this case, I beg (if you have not already done so) that you will yourself, Mr. President, examine as fully into the question as you think justice or mercy demands; or that you will order a board of competent officers of high rank, unconnected with the armies or transactions involved, to investigate fully the statements of this new evidence made by General Porter, and report to you what, if any, bearing it would have upon the findings and sentence of his court-martial, even if it could be fully established.

I am, sir, very respectfully, your obedient servant,

JOHN POPE.
Brigadier-General, U. S. A.

General U. S. GRANT,
President of the United States.

EXECUTIVE MANSION, Washington, D. C., May 9, 1874.

MY DEAR GENERAL: Your letter of the 18th of April, in regard to your position in the matter of a rehearing of the Fitz-John Porter court-martial, was duly received. You are under the apprehension that I had not fully examined the case, or rather that the public so thought, and that you had used means to prevent me from giving the subject fair consideration.

In reply, I will make two emphatic statements: First, to the best of my recollection I have never had but one letter from you on this subject prior to the one I am now answering, and that simply contained the request that, if I contemplated reopening the case, I examine both sides. I read during the trial the evidence and the final findings of the court, looking upon the whole trial as one of great importance, and particularly so to the Army and Navy. When General Porter's subsequent defense was published I received a copy of it, and read it with care and attention, determined if he had been wronged and I could right him I would do so. My conclusion was, that no new facts were developed that could be fairly considered, and that it was of doubtful legality whether by the mere authority of the Executive a rehearing could be given.

Yours, truly,

U. S. GRANT.

General JOHN POPE, U. S. A.
True copies.

C. S. ILSLEY,
Captain and Aid-de-Camp.

PORTER'S ANIMUS TOWARD POPE.

Porter received his order from Pope at about 9.30 at night. Prior to that time he wrote a letter to General Ambrose E. Burnside of this character:

WARRENTON, 27—p. m.

To General BURNSIDE:

Morell left his medicine, ammunition, and baggage at Kelly's Ford. Can you have it hauled to Fredericksburg and stored? His wagons were all sent to you for grain and ammunition. I have sent back to you every man of the First and Sixth New York Cavalry except what has been sent to Gainesville. I will get them to you after a while. Everything here is at sixes and sevens, and I find I am to take care of myself in every respect. Our line of communication has taken care of itself, in compliance with orders. The army has not three days' provisions. The enemy captured all Pope's and other clothing; and from McDowell the same, including liquors. No guards accompanying the trains, and small ones guard bridges. The wagons are rolling on, and I shall be here to-morrow. Good night!

F. J. PORTER, Major-General.

Porter was not satisfied with his first letter. At about 4 o'clock, August 27, 1863, the same day, he wrote another letter, as follows:

WARRENTON JUNCTION, August 27, 1862—4 p. m.

General BURNSIDE, Falmouth:

I send you the last order from General Pope, which indicates the future as well as the present. Wagons are rolling along rapidly to the rear as if a mighty power was propelling them. I see no cause for alarm, though I think this order may cause it. McDowell moves on Gainesville, where Sigel now is. The latter got to Buckland Bridge in time to put out the fire and kick the enemy, who is pursuing his route unmolested to the Shenandoah or Loudoun County. The forces are Longstreet's, A. P. Hill's, Jackson's, Whiting's, Ewell's, and Anderson's (late Huger's) divisions. Longstreet is said by a deserter to be very strong. They have much artillery and long wagon trains.

The raid on the railroad was near Cedar Run, and made by a regiment of infantry, two squadrons of cavalry, and a section of artillery. The place was guarded by nearly three regiments of infantry and some cavalry. They routed the guard, captured a train and many men, destroyed the bridge, and retired leisurely down the road toward Manassas. It can be easily repaired. No troops are coming up, except new troops, that I can hear of. Sturgis is here with two regiments. Four were cut off by the raid. The positions of the troops are given in the order. No enemy in our original front. A letter of General Lee, seized when Stuart's assistant adjutant-general was taken, directs Stuart to leave a squadron only to watch in front of Hanover Junction, &c. Everything has moved up north. I find a vast difference between these troops and ours. But I suppose they were new, as they to-day burnt their clothes, &c., when there was not the least cause.

I hear that they are much disorganized, and needed some good troops to give them heart, and I think head. We are working now to get behind Bull Run, and, I presume, will be there in a few days, if strategy don't use us up. The strategy is magnificent, and tactics in the inverse proportion. I would like some of my ambulances. I would like, also, to be ordered to return to Fredericksburg and to push toward Hanover, or with a large force to strike at Orange Court House. I wish Sumner was at Washington, and up near the Monocacy with good batteries. I do not doubt the enemy have large amounts of supplies provided for them, and I believe they have a contempt for this Army of Virginia. I wish myself away from it, with all our old Army of the Potomac, and so do our companions.

I was informed to-day by the best authority that, in opposition to General Pope's views, this army was pushed out to save the Army of the Potomac, an army that could take the best care of itself. Pope says he long since wanted to go behind the Occoquan. I am in great need of ambulances, and the officers need medicines, which, for want of transportation, were left behind. I hear many of the sick of my corps are in houses on the road very sick. I think there is no fear of the enemy crossing the Rappahannock. The cavalry are all in the advance of the rebel army. At Kelly's and Barnett's fords much property was left, in consequence of the wagons going down for grain, &c. If you can push up the grain to-night please do so, direct to this place. There is no grain here to-day or anywhere, and this army is wretchedly supplied in that line. Pope says he never could get enough. Most of this is private.

F. J. PORTER.

But if you can get me away, please do so. Make what use of this you choose, so it does good.

F. J. P.

GENERAL POPE'S TESTIMONY RELATING TO MOVEMENTS AUGUST 27, 28, AND 29.

General Pope, the commander of that army, testified as follows:

Maj. Gen. John Pope was called by the Government, sworn and examined, as follows:

By the JUDGE-ADVOCATE:

Q. Will you state to the court what position you occupy in the military service of the United States?

A. I hold a commission as brigadier-general in the regular Army and as major-general of volunteers.

Q. What was your position and command and what the field of your operations on the 27th of August last?

A. Do you mean my military position as commander?

Q. Yes, sir.

A. I commanded the Army of Virginia, which, as originally constituted, consisted of the army corps of McDowell, Banks, and Frémont. These, by the 27th of August, had been re-enforced by a portion of General Burnside's command, by General Heintzelman's corps, and on the morning of the 27th by a part of General Porter's corps. A portion of my command also consisted of the troops under General Sturgis, which had begun to come up to Warrenton Junction. I was myself on the morning of the 27th at Warrenton Junction. The field of operations of the army at that time covered the region of country between the Warrenton turnpike and the Orange and Alexandria Railroad.

Q. At what time on the 27th did you leave Warrenton Junction and in what direction did you march?

A. I left Warrenton Junction before midday, I think, though the precise hour I do not remember, and moved east along the railroad, following the movements of Hooker's division, toward Manassas Junction.

Q. At what time did General Porter arrive with his command, or the portion of his command of which you speak, at Warrenton Junction?

A. I think between the hours of 7 and 10 o'clock in the morning of the 27th of August.

Q. How many troops had he then with him?

A. He reported to me that he had brought up Sykes's division of regulars, numbering forty-five hundred men.

Q. Did you see his troops; and, if so, what was their condition?

A. I only saw them at a distance as they passed along; not sufficiently near to ascertain anything about that.

Q. Did you, or not, after you left Warrenton Junction and proceeded along the road east, issue to Major-General Porter an order in reference to the movements of his troops; and, if so, what was the character of that order?

A. I issued an order to General Porter late in the afternoon of the 27th, directing him to move with his command at 1 o'clock that night to the position I then occupied at Kettle Run; that if General Morell, with his other division, was not up to Warrenton Junction when he received that order, to send back and hurry him up, and to come forward himself with the troops which he had. That is my remembrance of the order. I gave him some further directions concerning General Banks's movement, the substance of which I remember very well, but not the precise words.

Q. Will you look at this order, which is dated "Headquarters Army of Virginia, August 27, 1862, 6.30 p. m., Bristoe Station. To Major-General F. J. Porter, Warrenton Junction," and state whether or not that is the order to which you refer in your answer?

A. That is the order I issued.

(The accused admitted that the order shown to witness is the order, a copy of which is set forth in the first specification of the first charge.)

Q. Will you explain to the court the reasons for the urgency of the order, as indicated by the following words of the order: "It is necessary on all accounts that you should be here by daylight. I send an officer with this dispatch, who will conduct you to this place?"

A. General Hooker's division had had a severe fight along the railroad, commencing some four miles west of Bristoe Station, and had succeeded in driving the division of General Ewell back along the road, but without putting it to rout; so that at dark Ewell's forces still confronted Hooker's division along the banks of a small stream at Bristoe Station. Just at dark Hooker sent me word, and General Heintzelman also reported to me, that he, Hooker was almost entirely out of ammunition, having but five rounds to a man left, and that if any action took place in the morning, he would, in consequence, be without the means of making any considerable defense. As it was known that Jackson, with his own and the division of A. P. Hill, was at or in the vicinity of Manassas Junction, and near enough to advance to the support of Ewell, it was altogether probable that if he should learn the weakness of our forces there he would unite and make an attack in the morning. It was for that purpose that I was so anxious that General Porter's corps should be present by daylight, the earliest moment at which it was likely the attack would be made.

Q. What distance would General Porter have had to march to have obeyed your orders?

A. About nine miles.

Q. And within what time; from 1 o'clock until when?

A. He would have had until daylight. I do not remember exactly what time daylight was; perhaps 4 o'clock, perhaps a little earlier. I directed him to move at 1 o'clock, in order to give his command as much time to remain in their beds at night as possible; supposing that it would occupy him perhaps three hours to get upon the ground. I had expected him there certainly by 4 o'clock.

Q. You had just passed over the road along which he was required by this order to march; will you state its condition?

A. The road was in good condition everywhere. At most places along the road it was a double road on each side of the railroad track. I am not sure it was a double road all the way; a part of the way I know it was.

Q. Did General Porter obey that order?

A. He did not.

Q. At what time on the 28th did he arrive at Bristoe Station, the point indicated in your order?

A. As the head of his column came to Bristoe Station I took out my watch; it was twenty minutes past 10 o'clock in the morning.

Q. Did he at that time, or at any time before his arrival, explain to you the reason why he did not obey the order?

A. He wrote me a note, which I received, I think, in the morning of the 28th; very early in the morning, perhaps a little before daylight. I am not quite sure about the time. The note I have mislaid. I can give the substance of it. I remember the reasons given by General Porter. If it is necessary to state them I can do so.

The accused asked if the witness had looked for the note.

The WITNESS. I looked for it, but have not been able to find it.

The JUDGE-ADVOCATE. I will not press the question.

The ACCUSED. I do not object to it. The witness says he has looked for the note and can not find it. I only want to know when and where he has searched for it.

By the JUDGE-ADVOCATE:

Q. What was the character of the night; was it starlight?

A. Yes, sir; as I remember, it was a clear night; that is my recollection.

Q. If there were any obstacles in the way of such a march as your order contemplated, either growing out of the night or the character of the road, will you please state them?

A. There was no difficulty in marching, so far as the night was concerned. I have several times made marches with a larger force than General Porter had during the night. There was some obstruction on the road in a wagon train that was stretched along the road, marching toward the Manassas Junction, in rear of Hooker's division; not sufficient, in my judgment, to have delayed for a considerable length of time the passage of artillery. But even had the roads been entirely blocked up, the railroad track was clear, and along that track had passed the larger portion of General Hooker's infantry. There was no obstruction to the advance of infantry.

Q. Whatever obstacle, in point of fact, may have existed to the execution of this order, I ask you, as a military man, was it, or not, the duty of General Porter, receiving this command from you as his superior officer, to have made efforts, and earnest efforts, to obey?

A. Undoubtedly it was his duty.

* * * * * * *

Q. You mentioned that in going from Warrenton Junction toward Bristoe Station, on the morning of the 27th of August, you saw many stragglers of Hooker's command on the railroad; were they, or not, in sufficient numbers to have impeded the march of infantry along the track?

A. Shortly after I started east from Warrenton Junction we came upon the railroad again just east of Cedar Run, and from that time until we reached Bristoe Station the road was lined with stragglers from Hooker's division. Those stragglers commenced singly, then two or three together, then half a dozen, until we had got three or four or five miles from Warrenton Junction toward the east, when they began to be in bodies of forty or fifty or one hundred together, marching along the railroad going eastward, between Warrenton Junction and Bristoe Station. I think the most of them had gotten up to their command at Bristoe Station during the night, though I continued to see small bodies of them coming along the railroad track on the morning of the 28th of August. They occupied the whole track during the day of the 27th as we were going eastward, but all of them, or the larger portion of them, got to Bristoe Station during the night of the 27th of August.

Q. Were there, to your knowledge, any openings in the track, such as to have made it dangerous for infantry to march along said track at night?

A. Along the road between Warrenton Junction to Kettle Run, which is perhaps three miles west from Bristoe Station, the track had been torn up in places; but during the day of the 27th of August I directed Captain Morrell, of the engineers, with a considerable force, to repair the track up to the bridge over Kettle Run, which had been burned. He reported to me, on the night of the 27th, that he had done so; so that from Warrenton Junction to the bridge over Kettle Run there was no obstruction on the railroad of any description. The bridge at Kettle Run had been burned; but a hundred yards above the bridge the road crossed the creek by a ford, and from there toward Bristoe the most of the country—in fact, nearly the whole of it—was open country.

TESTIMONY OF CAPT. DRAKE DE KAY—OPERATIONS ON AUGUST 27-29.

I now give the testimony of Captain De Kay, on page 43 of the general court-martial record:

Capt. Drake De Kay was then called by the Government, sworn and examined, as follows:

By the JUDGE-ADVOCATE:

Q. Will you state what position you hold in the military service?
A. First lieutenant, of the Fourteenth Infantry.
Q. What position did you hold during the campaign of the Army of Virginia under the command of General Pope?
A. Aid-de-camp to General Pope.
Q. Did you, or not, on the 27th of August last, bear a written order from Major-General Pope to Major-General Porter, who was then, I believe, at Warrenton Junction?
A. I did.
Q. Do you remember distinctly the character of that order, and would you be able to recognize it again upon having it read to you?
A. I did not read it.
Q. Did you, or not, after its delivery to General Porter, learn from him its character?
A. I was aware of its character by word of mouth, either from General Pope or from his chief of staff.
Q. Will you state its character as you understood it?
A. That he was to proceed at 1 o'clock that night to move up to Bristoe Station with his command.
Q. Do you mean at 1 o'clock on the morning of the 28th of August?
A. Yes, sir.
Q. At what hour of the 27th of August did you deliver this order to General Porter?
A. Between 9 o'clock and half past 9 p. m.; I think about half past 9; I could not say within half an hour.
Q. Had you any conversation with General Porter at the time in relation to the order or the execution of the order by him?
A. Yes, sir; some conversation.
Q. Will you please state it, as far as you can recall it?
A. I arrived, as I have said, about half past 9 o'clock, at his tent, and found General Porter and two or three generals there—General Sykes and General Morell, and, I think, General Butterfield, though I am not sure whether he came in afterward or not. I handed General Porter the order, which he read and then handed to one of the generals, saying as he did so, "Gentlemen, there is something for you to sleep upon." I then said that the last thing that General Pope said to me on leaving Bristoe Station was that I should remain with General Porter and guide the column to Bristoe Station, leaving at 1 o'clock, and that General Pope expected him certainly to be there by daylight, or relied upon his being there by daylight; something of that nature; those may not be the exact words; I only give to the best of my recollection, of course. General Porter then asked me how the road was. I told him that the road was good, though I had had difficulty in getting down on horseback, owing to the number of wagons in the road; but I told him I had passed the last wagon a little beyond Catlett Station from this direction. I told him that as they were moving slowly he would probably be up with them by daylight. I also stated to him that his infantry could take the railroad track, as many small squads of men had gone up that way. These small squads, I would state here, though I did not state that to General Porter, were stragglers from Hooker's corps; I should think some six or eight hundred of them, which we passed in going down to Bristoe Station; they all took the railroad track as the shortest and easiest road.
Q. What remark, if any, did General Porter make, either to you or to the generals with him, in reply to your statement in reference to the road and the expectation of General Pope?
A. He stated—I do not think to me; he spoke generally to all who were in the tent—that his troops had just got into camp; that they had been marched hard that day; that they would be good for nothing if they were started at that time of night; that if their rest was broken they would be good for nothing in the morning on coming up with the enemy.
Q. Did you, or not, make known to him that you were there for the purpose of conducting him under the order of General Pope?
A. I did.
Q. Did he, or not, at the moment, announce any purpose either to obey the order or not to do so?
A. I do not recollect precisely.
Q. From the remarks made by General Porter in your hearing, in reply to these statements of yours, was or was not the impression made upon your mind that it was not his purpose to march in obedience to his order?
(Question objected to by the accused.
The judge-advocate stated that he merely wished to arrive at the fact whether there was any determination made known to the witness in regard to this order in any way; he was not particular as to the form of the question to be asked.
The accused withdrew his objection.)
A. There was no order issued to my knowledge, of course, one way or the other. That would have been done through General Porter's assistant adjutant-general. I can only say that I was aware of the determination not to start until daylight, inasmuch as I laid down and went to sleep.
Q. Do I or do I not understand you, then, to say that there was an evident determination on the part of General Porter not to march until daylight?
A. There was.
Q. Have you any knowledge as to the time at which his troops had arrived at Warrenton Junction?
A. Only the fact that the regulars—Sykes's division—were in camp at Warrenton Junction at about 10 o'clock in the morning of that day, which fact I am aware of from having visited several officers of my regiment in their camp.
Q. These regulars were a portion of General Porter's command, were they not?
A. Yes, sir.
Q. Have you any knowledge how far the troops under General Porter had marched on that day?
A. I have not.
Q. What was the character of the night of the 27th of August?
A. To the best of my recollection it was a cloudy night, but not rainy.
Q. What was about the distance between Warrenton Junction and Bristoe Station?
A. I supposed it to be ten miles; they say nine miles.
Q. What was the distance from Bristoe Station to Catlett Station, where you passed the last of the wagons?
A. I can not tell you exactly; six miles, I should think.
Q. At what hour did you pass the last of those wagons?
A. Half past 8 p. m., I should think.
Q. Did you remain overnight and wait until the march of General Porter's command the next day?
A. I did.
Q. At what hour, in point of fact, did he move from Warrenton Junction?
A. I should think the head of the column left about 4 o'clock in the morning; I am not positive about the hour.
Q. At what rate did the command march after it left Warrenton Junction?
A. I could not say at what rate. We started at or about 4 o'clock in the morning, and marched along quietly, without any apparent haste, meeting with no obstruction or detention, except that arising from the wagons we found in the road. The head of the column arrived at Bristoe Station about 10 o'clock, I should judge.
Q. At what point did you overtake the wagons, and how many of them do you suppose there were?
A. I do not recollect. There was a large park of wagons near Warrenton Junction—about half way between Catlett Station and Warrenton Junction—which left for Bristoe Station at daylight. We overtook those wagons. They were in park when I passed down to Warrenton Junction the previous evening; therefore I can not tell when we overtook the end of the train which I had passed near Catlett Station the evening before.
Q. What is the meaning of the term "in park?"
A. In camp.
Q. Had General Porter's command marched at 1 o'clock in the morning would he or would he not have passed those wagons in camp?
A. He would have passed them in camp, probably.
Q. Was or was not the march throughout at the usual rate at which troops move, or was it slower?
A. It was at the rate at which troops would move if there was no necessity for rapid movement.

TESTIMONY OF COL. FREDERIC MYERS, AUGUST 27.

Col. Frederic Myers, of the Quartermaster's Department, who is now dead, testifies (general court-martial record, page 106):

Lieut. Col. Frederic Myers was then called by the Government, and sworn and examined, as follows:

By the JUDGE-ADVOCATE:

Q. Will you state to the court in what capacity you served in the Army of Virginia, under Major-General Pope, during his late campaign, in July and August last?
A. I was chief quartermaster to General McDowell.
Q. Where were you on the night of the 27th of August last?
A. I was with the trains of the army, about a mile and a half from where General Hooker had his battle on the 27th.

He was with the trains about a mile and a half from where General Hooker had the battle of the 27th. General Hooker's battle on the 27th was at Bristoe Station, where these troops were to be marched that night.

Q. Did you, or not, receive any instruction from General Pope on that day relating to your train along the road from Warrenton Junction to Bristoe Station? If so, state what they were.
A. I was ordered to move the trains in rear of General Hooker. Just before dark General Pope with his staff rode up, and I reported to him that General Hooker was in action ahead of me, and asked him if I should go into park with my trains. He replied that I could do so or go on, as I thought best.
Q. What did you do; did you go into park or did you continue on?
A. I went into park, and gave directions to all the quartermasters to go into park.
Q. At what hour on the following morning were those trains upon that road put in motion?
A. The head of the train commenced moving just at daylight.
Q. What was the condition of the road between Warrenton Junction and Bristoe Station at that time, so far as regards the passage of wagons, artillery, &c.?
A. It was in excellent condition at that time.
Q. Do you remember the character of that night—the night of the 27th of August? If so, will you please state it?
A. I was up nearly all that night. It was quite dark; there was no moon.
Q. Did the night change in its character toward the morning or was it the same throughout?
A. It was a dark night. I could not state about it toward morning particularly.
Q. In view of the condition of the road as you have described it, and also the character of the night, was or was not the movement of troops along that road practicable that night?
A. I do not know of anything to hinder troops moving along the railroad there. There was a road running each side of the railroad. I should think it would have been easy for troops to move along there, although I may be mistaken in that.

FRANCIS S. EARL'S TESTIMONY AS ASSISTANT ADJUTANT-GENERAL, AUGUST 27-28.

Francis S. Earl, the assistant adjutant-general of General Morell, swears as follows (board record, pages 408–413):

Q. When did you, as acting assistant adjutant-general for Major-General Morell, on the 27th of August, first receive intimation that you were to move the next morning?
A. That was the day we moved to Warrenton Junction; I knew nothing of it until the next morning.
Q. About daybreak?
A. The order came to General Morell that we were to move in the morning; that was all I knew—that we were to move in the morning.
Q. When did you receive the first intimation that you were to move on the morning of the 28th?
A. I could not say whether it was the night before or whether it was during the night. I think it must have been before, because I knew we were to move at 3 o'clock in the morning.
Q. Were you up at 3 o'clock?
A. Yes; I was up at that time, and before, probably.
Q. You are quite positive you were?
A. Yes, sir.
Q. Have a distinct recollection of it?
Q. Yes; I recollect being up at that time.
Q. At what time did you arrive at Bristoe Station?
A. I should judge somewhere about 10 o'clock, between 9 and 10.
Q. Do you know of any orders having been given the night before or any effort made to clear that road from Warrenton Junction to Bristoe Station?
A. No, sir.
Q. From your position, would you have been likely to have known?
A. If I had really been acting as assistant adjutant-general of division, or feeling that I was in that position, I probably may have known of it.
Q. You considered you were acting in that capacity?
A. I considered myself more acting as an aid to General Morell, because I had not been announced as assistant adjutant-general.
Q. Who was acting as assistant adjutant-general?
A. Nobody but myself; he so considered me, though I had not been announced.

EVIDENCE OF GENERAL CHAUNCEY M'KEEVER, AUGUST 27-28.

General Chauncey McKeever, chief of staff of General Heintzelman, on page 151 of the board record, as it is called.

General McKeever says:

Q. If a peremptory order had been received at Warrenton Junction to move from that place to Bristoe at 1 a. m. on the night of the 27th and 28th of August, is it your opinion, as a military man, that the troops at Warrenton could have been put in motion on the road to Bristoe in order to comply with such a command?

A. They could have been put in motion, I presume. I know nothing to prevent their being put in motion.

Q. Do you recollect about what time it was daylight on the 28th of August?

A. I should think about 4 o'clock; maybe a little later—not much.

COL. ROBERT E. CLARY TESTIFIES, AUGUST 27.

Col. Robert E. Clary, called by accused, swears that he received a note from Porter about 10 o'clock to run the railroad trains east beyond Cedar Run; and in answer to question says, page 119, G. C. M. (court-martial record, page 118):

Q. You speak of pushing forward the trains. Do you mean the trains upon the railroad or ordinary wagon trains?

A. I mean railroad trains, loaded with our own stores, and I think some sick and wounded.

Q. In your opinion, could or could not General Porter, after the receipt of his order to move, which receipt was at 9.30 p. m. of the 27th of August, have cleared the road entirely of wagons by 1 or 2 o'clock that night, so that his march would not have been much impeded?

A. I think the troops could have passed over during the night had a sufficient force been sent in advance to have cleared the road of its obstructions, which, at the time I passed over it, extended only three miles, I think. When I passed over the road it was between 2 and 3 o'clock in the morning; what the obstructions had been previously to that time I am unable to say.

The examination by the judge-advocate here closed.

Examination by the COURT:

Q. Will you state whether at 1 o'clock the character of the night and the state of the road were such as, in your judgment, to render practicable the march of General Porter's troops to Bristoe Station to arrive at or about daylight?

A. Not without the preliminary steps which I have previously stated ought to have been taken.

Q. Were or were not the first three or four miles of the road from Warrenton unobstructed?

A. They were, as I passed over it.

TESTIMONY OF SOLOMON THOMAS, AUGUST 27-28.

Solomon Thomas, of the Eighteenth Massachusetts Regiment, Martindale's brigade, being a part of Morell's division, swears, on page 841 of the board record, as follows:

Q. On the 27th of August where were you?

A. We were moving on the Warrenton road toward Bristoe Station. I should think that we were encamped on that night some six to eight miles from Bristoe Station. We went in before sundown; probably the sun was an hour or an hour and a half high when we halted there.

Q. When did you move from there?

A. I was corporal of the guard that night, and was ordered to wake the men at 1 o'clock, which I did; and we were formed and moved out from our camp immediately after 1 o'clock.

Q. At what time did you start on your march?

A. We then started immediately from that, and marched a mile probably, when we were halted.

Q. How long did you remain there before you proceeded on your journey?

A. I know at 9 o'clock we were still there. We had halted in the first place expecting to stop for a moment, and halted in position. Then we were ordered to rest at will, and did so, and then were ordered to lie down, and then we lay down.

Q. That was the morning of the 28th?

A. Yes, sir; and lay in that position, as we felt disposed, until, I should think—according to the best of my judgment it was 10 o'clock before we were called to company. Then we started and marched for Bristoe Station.

Q. Do you recollect what the character of that night was, the 27th, and morning of the 28th of August?

A. I do. I recollect the roads were in good condition and that as we moved out there was no obstruction whatever in our way.

Q. You were wounded on the 30th?

A. On the 31st.

TESTIMONY OF GENERAL BUTTERFIELD, AUGUST 27.

Extract from General Butterfield's testimony (court-martial record, page 179):

General Porter called two aids, and sent them off to investigate the condition of the road and to ask General Pope to have the road cleared so that we could come up.

PORTER ASKS POPE TO HAVE THE ROAD CLEARED.

Q. Did you see the order of the 27th from General Pope or know anything about the urgency of its terms?

A. I did not read it.

Q. Did you learn of Capt. Drake De Kay that General Pope had taken measures to have the road cleared?

A. I did not.

Q. Can you state that, in point of fact, the road had not been cleared by General Pope's orders, or that at 1 o'clock at night and until later in the morning the road was all cleared; and can you state that the wagons that obstructed the road when you passed had not moved onto the road after daylight?

A. I can not; I have no knowledge upon that subject.

STATEMENT OF CAPT. W. B. C. DURYEA, AUGUST 27.

Capt. W. B. C. Duryea, called by the Government, and sworn and examined, as follows (court-martial record, page 113):

By the JUDGE-ADVOCATE:

Q. What is your position in the military service?

A. I am assistant adjutant-general to General Duryea.

Q. Where were you and in what position on the 27th August last?

A. We were on the march from Warrenton, and on the night of the 27th of August we halted, I should think, some three or four miles this side of Warrenton.

Q. At what hour of the night did you halt?

A. About midnight.

Q. In your march up to that hour did you experience any unusual difficulties growing out of the character of the night?

A. No, sir.

EVIDENCE OF WILLIAM W. MACY, AUGUST 27.

In the board record, page 583, will be found the evidence of William W. Macy:

William W. Macy, called by the recorder, being duly sworn, testified as follows:

Direct examination:

Q. Where do you reside?

A. Winchester, Ind.

Q. Were you in the military service of the United States in August, 1862; if so, in what capacity?

A. I was in the military service at that time; a sergeant, I believe.

Q. What regiment?

A. Nineteenth Indiana Volunteers, Gibbon's brigade, King's division.

Q. When you finally left the service, what rank did you hold?

A. I held the rank of captain, A Company, Twentieth Indiana, our regiment having become consolidated.

Q. Where were you on the 27th of August, 1862?

A. With Gibbon's brigade, on the march most of the day from Sulphur Springs toward the old Bull Run battle-ground.

Q. How long did your brigade continue its march that day?

A. About 10 o'clock, I think, or half past 10 that night.

Q. You then arrived at what place, as near as you can recollect?

A. I think it was called New Baltimore. We laid near a little town.

Q. What was the character of that night—the night of the 27th and 28th of August?

A. Rather a dark night; starlight dark night.

Q. Do you know what the character of that night was toward morning?

A. I am a little indistinct as to just the time. I was up at some time in the afterpart of the night.

Q. Once, or more than once?

A. Once that I recollect very distinctly, and I think only once.

Q. What was the character of the night then, so far as distinguishing objects?

A. I could see how to get a little way from the camp. I could see where the men laid as I went past the line where the soldiers were lying without running over them.

Q. How far could you see?

A. I do not know that I could state how far I could see to distinguish things. I could see when I passed the wagon trains enough to stay away from the horses' heels. I could see that the wagon teams were hitched up.

Q. In marching that night up to 10 o'clock, what difficulty, if any, did you experience on account of the character of the darkness of the night?

A. Most too dark to march pleasantly. We marched many nights as dark, though; some nights that were a good deal darker than it was that night we were on the march; but of course it is unpleasant marching after night.

Q. Your regiment, in the march, how was it as to keeping its formation?

A. Could keep the ranks, as far as that was concerned.

Q. What was the character of the roads, as to whether muddy or the reverse, on the night of the 27th of August?

A. They were not muddy unless we ran into a branch.

LIEUT. EDWARD BROOKS TESTIFIES, AUGUST 27.

Lieut. Edward Brooks called by the Government, and sworn and examined, as follows (general court-martial record, page 112):

By the JUDGE-ADVOCATE:

Q. What is your position in the military service?

A. I am a first lieutenant of volunteers in the Sixth Wisconsin Regiment.

Q. State to the court, if you please, whether or not you were serving with the Army of Virginia on or about the 27th of August last.

A. I was.

Q. In what place occupied by that army were you on the night of the 27th of August?

A. I was at Bristoe Station and at Greenwich.

Q. Do you remember the character of the night; if so, will you state whether it was of usual or unusual darkness?

A. It was not very dark; not so dark but what I could find my way through the woods.

Q. Was or was not the night of such a character as to offer any unusual difficulties to the march of troops?

A. It was not.

Q. What was the general condition of the road from Warrenton Junction in the direction of Manassas Junction?

A. It was very good.

Q. Did you have full opportunities of ascertaining the condition of that road on the night of the 27th of August?

A. Yes, sir.

Q. What opportunities did you have?

A. I traveled from beyond Warrenton to Warrenton Junction, from Warrenton Junction to Bristoe Station; and after arriving at Bristoe Station I went across the country to Greenwich.

Q. Have you, or not, frequently passed over the road?

A. Very often.

TESTIMONY OF COL. THOMAS F. M'COY, AUGUST 27.

Board record, page 640:

Col. Thomas F. McCoy, called by the recorder, being duly sworn, was examined, and testified as follows:

* * * * * * *

Q. Whose brigade and whose division?

A. Duryea's brigade, Ricketts's division, McDowell's corps.

Q. What rank did you leave the service with?

A. Colonel.

Q. Were you brevet brigadier-general?

A. Yes, sir.

Q. Where were you on the afternoon of August 25, 1862?

A. A little southwest of Warrenton.

Q. How late did you march that day and evening?

A. The 25th?

Q. Yes.

A. I don't think we marched on the 25th. We marched on the 23d.

Q. Until how late?

A. About 10 or 11 o'clock.

Q. On the 27th of August were you on the march late in the day?

A. Yes.

Q. Until how late did you then march?

A. All night, until 1 o'clock.

Q. What difficulty, if any, was experienced in marching that night?

A. We didn't have any difficulty in marching that night. There was a good deal of straggling among the soldiers.

STATEMENT OF COLONEL BUCHANAN, AUGUST 27.

Colonel Buchanan, of the Third Indiana Cavalry, on page 603 of the board record, in reference to Porter's movement from Warrenton Junction to Bristoe, testifies as follows:

Q. What conversation had you with General Porter before he started off to Bristoe Station?

A. On the evening before he started somebody gave me an order to be in readiness to move at 3 o'clock in the morning. I was in front of General Porter's headquarters at 3 o'clock in the morning, but I saw no one until after the break of day. Then some one came to me and told me to let the men get their breakfasts and let their horses be fed. That was done, and I immediately went back to the place I occupied. Some time afterward, after sunrise, I saw General Porter. I wanted to go back to Fredericksburg to my regiment. I only had about ninety men with me, and I expected to go back the day before. I rode out with him in the woods, where he was in camp, until we got into an open field. He asked me to send a detachment of the command I had forward to clear the road toward Bristoe Station two or three miles. This was done. I waited some little time, and the infantry began to move. About that time he handed me a letter, and directed me to give it to General Burnside, and told me I could go. I started toward Fredericksburg; he sent an aid after me and brought me back, and told me he was apprehensive that I might be captured. He told me to say to General Burnside—I can not get his language—but the idea was that there was no disaster that was very threatening as yet, and he hoped for the best.

EVIDENCE OF WILLIAM E. MURRAY, AUGUST 27-28.

Board record, page 586:

William E. Murray, called by the recorder, being duly sworn, testified as follows:

Direct examination:

Q. Where do you reside?

A. Winchester, Ind.

Q. Were you in the military service of the United States in the month of August, 1862; if so, in what capacity?

A. Yes; I was a member of Company C, Nineteenth Indiana Volunteers.

Q. In whose brigade and division?

A. Gibbon's brigade, King's division.

Q. Where were you on the night of August 27, 1862?

A. The night of the 27th our regiment was encamped near New Baltimore; a little to the north, I think, of New Baltimore; that is, we stopped there about 10 o'clock, perhaps.

Q. How long had you been marching before you made that halt on that day of the 27th?

A. We had been marching, I think, most of the day; not continuously, but back and forth.

Q. From sunset, how much of that time had you been marching up to 10 o'clock?

A. I am unable to state the distance.

Q. Were you marching during that time?

A. We were moving most of the time.

Q. Did you keep to the road, or in the fields, or both?

A. Generally to the road, except where we would meet obstructions in the way of cavalry or artillery; kept mainly in the roads.

Q. How was it after dark?

A. Much the same.

Q. Do you recollect the character of the roads at that time, as to whether they were dry or muddy?

A. I don't remember any mud; I think they were generally dry.

Q. Do you recall what the character of the night of the 27th of August was?

A. There was no moon, according to my recollection, but it was clear; we could see objects plain enough.

Q. At a great distance?

A. A rod or so.

Q. How much of that night were you up after coming to a halt at 10 o'clock?

A. I should think that I did not lie down till near midnight.

Q. Up to that time do you recollect what the character of the night was, as far as distinguishing objects was concerned?

A. My recollection is that it was the usual starlight night.

Q. Up to that time, during that night, what difficulty, if any, did you experience in marching?

A. No particular difficulty.

Q. How was the regiment, so far as its formation was concerned, on that march after sunset.

A. I think they kept their formation about as well as usual.

WILLIAM M. CAMPBELL TESTIFIES, AUGUST 27.

Board record, page 591:

William M. Campbell, called by the recorder, was sworn and examined, as follows:

Direct examination:

Q. State your residence.

A. I reside in Randolph County, Indiana.

Q. During the month of August, 1862, were you in the military service? If so, in what capacity?

A. I was in the military service, and in the Nineteenth Regiment of Indiana Volunteers, Gibbon's brigade, King's division.

Q. Where were you on the evening of August 27, 1862?

A. We were marching from the direction of Warrenton to Centreville, on a road that led in that direction, as far as I knew.

Q. On what is called the Warrenton, Gainesville and Centreville pike?

A. I think that was it; that is my recollection of it.

Q. How late did you march?

A. We marched until after night. I could not state how late it was, because I did not have any timepiece. It was after night when we stopped.

* * * * * * *

Q. What was the character of the night?

A. It was an ordinary night, without moonlight; that is my recollection about it; nothing extraordinary in any way; only an ordinary night, such as we had a good many of in Virginia about those times.

Q. How far could you distinguish objects?

A. We marched our regiments in companies, and got along without any difficulty that I recollect of. How far we could see I could not say.

J. H. STINE EXAMINED, AUGUST 27.

Board record, page 597:

J. H. Stine, called by the recorder, being duly sworn, testifies as follows:

Direct examination:

Q. Where do you reside?

A. I reside at Winchester, Randolph County, Indiana.

Q. During the month of August, 1862, were you in the military service of the United States? If so, in what regiment?

A. I was in Company C, Nineteenth Indiana Volunteers.

Q. Where were you on the afternoon, evening, and night of the 27th of August, 1862?

A. We started from Sulphur Springs near noon and marched north through Warrenton, going through there about 3 or 4 o'clock and on north toward the Bull Run battle-ground.

Q. At what time did your regiment halt?

A. We marched quite a time after 9.

Q. Where was the rest of the brigade?

A. The whole brigade was together.

Q. Where was the rest of the division?

A. I took a great interest in the history of the movement of troops, and that day we were understood to be going into battle; I don't positively recollect whether the whole of the division went into camp or not; I know the next day we were not together all the time.

Q. In marching during that evening, what difficulty, if any, did you experience in getting along?

A. None, particularly.

Q. Did you keep to the road?

A. Mainly we did, though sometimes we didn't.

Q. Do you recollect what the character of the night was on the 27th of August, 1862.

A. My recollection is that from, say, 8 to 10 o'clock, it was maybe toward from 8 to 11, it was not so light as afterward.

TESTIMONY OF WILLIAM BIRNEY, AUGUST 27.

Board record, page 683:

William Birney, called by the recorder, being duly sworn, testified as follows:

Direct examination:

Q. Where do you reside?

A. Washington city.

Q. In the month of August, 1862, what rank did you hold in the service of the United States?

A. I was major of the Fourth New Jersey Regiment; I commanded the Fifty-seventh Pennsylvania.

Q. You finally left the service with what rank?

A. Brevet major-general.

Q. Early that month I believe you were taken prisoner?

A. No, sir; I was taken prisoner at Gaines's Mill.

Q. When did you assume command of the Fifty-seventh Pennsylvania?

A. Immediately after my exchange. If my memory serves me, I was exchanged on the 13th of August and took command about the 15th.

Q. In whose division were you then?

A. Commanding the Fifty-seventh; I was in Kearny's, Heintzelman's corps.

Q. Where were you on the night of August 27, 1862, and the morning of the 28th?

A. I was in camp, a little north of the Alexandria railroad.

Q. Did you march any that night; if so, when, and for what length of time?

A. We marched that night, but the exact hour of starting I can not recollect. We marched some time before daybreak and in the direction of Bristoe Station.

Q. How many hours is it your recollection, about, that you marched?

A. I can not now say. I recollect marching some distance.

Q. What difficulty, if any, did you experience in marching that night, from the character of the night or the character of the roads?

A. I recollect no particular difficulty about the road.

Q. Were you then in command of the Fifty-seventh Pennsylvania?

A. I was.

Q. Did the entire brigade march with you?

A. Yes, sir.

Q. Do you recollect about what time you came to a halt?

A. I can not remember whether we halted before we got to Bristoe Station or not. We got to Bristoe Station at a very early hour.

EVIDENCE OF JOHN P. TAYLOR, AUGUST 27.

Board record, page 861:

John P. Taylor, called by the recorder, having affirmed, testified as follows:

Direct examination:

Q. Where do you live?

A. Reedsville, Pa.

Q. Were you in the military service of the United States in the month of August, 1862; if so, in what capacity?

A. I was captain of the First Pennsylvania Cavalry at that time.

* * * * * * * *

Q. Have you ever been over the road from Warrenton Junction to Bristoe Station?

A. Yes; quite frequently.

Q. What was the character of that road from Warrenton Junction to Catlett in 1862?

A. It is on the left side of the road from Warrenton Junction to Catlett. There is a stream that passes between Warrenton Junction and Catlett, I think at a distance not to exceed a mile.

Mr. BULLITT. Had the witness been over this road frequently before that?

A. Yes; I encamped at Catlett in the spring of 1862 for some three weeks immediately after the enemy vacated Manassas. We were there three weeks before the advance moved to Fredericksburg.

Q. Go on and describe the character of the road as it then was from Warrenton Junction to Catlett Station.

A. There is a stream passes down between Warrenton Junction and Catlett and a railroad bridge crosses there, and some trestle-work, but above the bridge it is almost level country for some miles west. At that time there was a strip of woods that came down near Catlett—a narrow strip of woods. We had moved all over that ground for a mile west of the railroad.

Q. Then coming from Catlett to Bristoe, what was the character of the road?

A. That is nearly a vast plain most of the way. There are two streams, I think—small ravines—but the country is a vast plain. General Gregg moved his division of cavalry a mile to the north of the railroad, in the night, from Bealeton to Auburn, about two or three miles north of Catlett.

Q. Across the country?

A. Yes; across the country about a mile, where there was no road.

Q. At that time could wagons go on each side of the road?

A. There were roads some distance there on each side of the railroad, and wagons and troops moved frequently in column.

Q. More than one road?

A. Oh, yes; the troops had made roads. Sometimes one road would get bad, and they would go off and make another road. The country was such they could have one almost any place.

By Mr. BULLITT:

Q. Were there any woods along the line of that road from Warrenton Junction to Bristoe Station?

A. There is a strip of woods that comes down at Catlett or near Catlett.

Q. Is that the only one?

A. There may have been others.

Q. I ask you, from your recollection, whether you know there were no others, or that there were others?

A. I don't recollect any woods, that is to any distance; I know there was on the right.
Q. Do you recollect whether there were any roads at that time that had been made by the army cutting through the woods and leaving stumps in the road?
A. No, sir.
Q. Do you recollect anything of that sort?
A. There were roads there in the spring of 1862 that the enemy had used during the winter of 1861-'62; fencing and everything was gone; it was an open country from Manassas to Warrenton Junction.
Q. Then it was an open country all the way from Manassas to Bristoe, was it?
A. Very nearly.

STATEMENT OF SAMUEL G. HILL, AUGUST 27-28.

Board record, page 589:

Samuel G. Hill, called by the recorder, being duly sworn, testified as follows:

Direct examination:

Q. Where do you reside?
A. Arbor, Ind.
Q. Were you in the military service of the United States during the month of August, 1862?
A. Yes; I was a private in the Nineteenth Indiana, Company C.
Q. Gibbon's brigade, King's division?
A. Yes, sir.
Q. Where were you on the afternoon of August 27, 1862?
A. On the road from Warrenton to Gainesville.
Q. How late were you marching?
A. We were marching until 10 o'clock at night.
Q. Do you recollect what the character of the night was?
A. It was a clear night.
Q. How much of that night did you have an opportunity of noticing?
A. Until probably 3 o'clock of the morning of the 28th.

SOLOMON THOMAS TESTIFIES, AUGUST 27-28.

Board record, page 803:

Solomon Thomas, of Morell's division, Porter's corps, called by the recorder, being duly sworn, testified as follows:

* * * * * * *

Q. On the 27th of August where were you?
A. We were moving along the Warrenton road toward Bristoe Station. I should think that we were encamped on that night some six to eight miles from Bristoe Station. We went in before sundown; probably the sun was an hour or an hour and a half high when we halted there.
Q. When did you move from there?
A. I was corporal of the guard that night, and was ordered to wake the men at 1 o'clock, which I did, and we were formed and moved out from our camp immediately after 1 o'clock.
Q. At what time did you start on your march?
A. We then started immediately from that and marched a mile, probably, when we were halted.
Q. How long did you remain there before you proceeded on your journey?
A. I know at 9 o'clock we were still there. We had halted in the first place expecting to stop for a moment, and halted in position. Then we were ordered to rest at will, and did so, and then were ordered to lie down, and then we lay down.
Q. That was the morning of the 28th?
A. Yes, sir; and lay in that position, as we felt disposed, until, I should think—according to the best of my judgment it was 10 o'clock before we were called to company. Then we started and marched for Bristoe Station.
Q. Do you recollect what the character of that night was, the 27th, and morning of the 28th of August?
A. I do. I recollect the roads were in good condition, and that as we moved out there was no obstruction whatever in our way.
Q. You were wounded on the 30th?
A. On the 31st.

TESTIMONY OF E. D. ROATH, AUGUST 27.

E. D. Roath, called by the recorder, being duly sworn, testified as follows:

Direct examination:

Q. Where do you reside?
A. Marietta, Lancaster County, Pennsylvania.
Q. Were you in the military service of the United States in August, 1862? If so, in what capacity?
A. I was in the military service of the United States in 1862, as captain of Company E, One hundred and seventh Regiment Pennsylvania Volunteers, Duryea's brigade, Ricketts's division.
Q. You finally left the service with what rank?
A. Captain, and was brevetted.
Q. On the night of August 27, 1862, where were you?
A. We were somewhere, I think, between Warrenton and a place called Waterloo; somewhere in the neighborhood of Warrenton.
Q. Did you make a night march that night?
A. We marched some; we were going from toward the Rappahannock across there.
Q. How late did you march?
A. I can not tell exactly what time we bivouacked. I know that we were all tired.
Q. Have you any recollection with reference to midnight as to what time you came into camp?
A. I could not tell, but I think it was somewhere near midnight; might have been 11 o'clock.
Q. Do you recollect whether you experienced any difficulty in marching?
A. No, sir; we did not.
Q. What was the character of the night as to darkness?
A. There was no moon; it was starlight; a little hazy toward morning, I think.

GENERAL JUBAL EARLY TESTIFIES, AUGUST 27.

General Jubal Early, confederate, testifies (board record, page 812) that he marched on the night of the 27th, between 10 and 12 o'clock, in the direction of Manassas, by way of Blackburn's Ford, and he experienced no difficulty whatever in marching.

Board record, pages 702, 705, 707, 708.

STATEMENT OF HENRY KYD DOUGLASS, AUGUST 27.

Henry Kyd Douglass, staff officer to General Jackson, testifies (on page 685, board record) that General Jackson's whole command moved away from Centreville on the night of the 27th, with all their trappings, up to the position, or near it, that they occupied on the day of the battle of the 29th.

I. H. DUVAL TESTIFIES, AUGUST 27.

Board record, page 820:

I. H. Duval, called by the recorder, being duly sworn, testified as follows:
Q. Where do you reside?
A. Wellsborough, W. Va.
Q. Were you in the military service of the United States in the month of August, 1862; if so, in what capacity?
A. I was major of volunteers, First West Virginia Regiment.
Q. Whose brigade and division?
A. I was in the fourth brigade, Ricketts's division.
Q. Where were you on the evening of August 27, 1862, and what did you do?
A. On the evening of August 27 I was with my brigade. We were about four miles, I think, northwest of Warrenton at that time—north or northwest—and I was directed by my colonel to carry a letter that he handed me from General Ricketts to General Pope.
Q. To what point?
A. It was supposed to be somewhere near Centreville. That was my order
Q. What did you then do?
A. I started and made the trip and delivered the letter.
Q. You left the camp about what time?
A. Nearly dark; it was after sundown.
Q. What road did you take?
A. I came back to Warrenton, and I followed then the road running from Warrenton in the direction of Catlett Station. I was directed to go that way and keep out of the way of the enemy.
Q. Did you pass through Warrenton Junction?
A. No, sir; I struck the road at Catlett.
Q. What direction did you then take?
A. I took the road leading from Catlett Station to Manassas Junction, by the way of Bristoe.
Q. Where did you find General Pope?
A. I found General Pope near Manassas Junction.
Q. What was the character of that night?
A. I don't know that I recollect distinctly in regard to that. I rode all night, though, until about 3 o'clock in the morning, when I took a little rest. I had no particular difficulty in finding the way.
Q. From Catlett Station to Bristoe did you meet with any obstruction to your movements?
A. There were a great many wagons along the line; there were some troops; but I went along without any particular obstruction. There were no obstacles that kept me from going.
Q. Did you have any escort with you?
A. No, sir.

TESTIMONY OF MAJOR DUVALL, AUGUST 27.

Major Duvall also testifies that he traveled eighteen or twenty miles that night.

Board record, page 832, paragraph 875:

JAMES HADDOW TESTIFIES, AUGUST 27.

James Haddow, called by the recorder, being duly sworn, testified as follows:

Direct examination:

Q. Where do you reside?
A. Barlow, Ohio.
Q. Were you in the military service of the United States on the 27th of August, 1862; if so, in what capacity?
A. I was in the military service as orderly sergeant of Company F, Thirty-sixth Ohio Infantry.
Q. When you finally left the service what rank did you hold?
A. Captain. I was transferred to Company E.
Q. Where were you at sunset on the 27th of August, 186-; about that time?
A. We were on the road between Catlett Station and Bristoe.
Q. Did you after that go toward Catlett Station; if so, at what time and under what circumstances?
A. We marched that night to Bristoe, arriving at Bristoe Station after dark some time; we remained there that night; on the following morning the regiment went on in the direction of Manassas; the company of which I was a member was detached and put in charge of a major of the medical department to go back in the direction of Warrenton with ambulances and obtain medical supplies; we returned to somewhere near Warrenton, passing Catlett Station at some distance on the morning of the 28th; we returned to Bristoe on the evening of the 28th.
Q. At what time did you set out from Bristoe Station to go in the direction of Catlett Station?
A. I could not give the hour, but pretty early in the morning—as soon as we got up and got breakfast.
Q. Did you during that day see General Porter's corps?
A. We met troops (it was a frequent habit to ask soldiers what troops they were), and they said they were General Porter's troops. Porter's troops lay at Warrenton Junction on the afternoon of the 27th, when we left there.
Q. What difficulty, if any, did you experience on the morning of the 28th in taking this ambulance train from Bristoe Station to Catlett Station?
A. I don't think we had any material difficulty in getting through; we must have had at least three ambulances; we passed through trains and passed troops; we must undoubtedly have made a march that day of sixteen miles; we could not have met with serious obstructions.
Q. Do you know what troops you met?
A. They said they were General Porter's; we inquired frequently; of course I was not acquainted with General Porter's corps; we had just reached the East from the West, and all troops were strange to me.
Q. On the morning of the 29th where were you?
A. After taking supper on the evening of the 28th, at Bristoe Station, some time after dark, we commenced marching again and marched to Manassas Junction, reaching there some time during the night; I don't know what hour; so early in the night that we lay down and slept, however, and on the morning of the 29th we were at Manassas Junction.

Board record, page 834, paragraph 878:

STATEMENT OF LIEUT. A. F. TIFFANY.

Lieut. A. F. Tiffany, called by the recorder, being duly sworn, testified as follows:

* * * * * * *

Q. What difficulty, if any, did you experience in getting along in your march from Bristoe toward Warrenton?
A. Nothing more than that which is common where there is a good many trains passing; sometimes the road would be full; sometimes we would pass around, then we would be on the road again; nothing so very unusual in the way of traveling.

EVIDENCE IN REFERENCE TO THE ORDERS OF THE AUGUST 29, 1862—REPORTS OF UNION OFFICERS.

In giving the following reports of Union officers I have been compelled in many cases to use extracts, for the reason that in cutting from the reports I could not take the pages, it being printed on both sides. The same is also the case with the confederate reports. But all material points are included, and these extracts apply solely to the 29th of August, 1862:

Report of Brig. Gen. John F. Reynold's division, attached to McDowell's corps.

HEADQUARTERS REYNOLDS'S DIVISION,
Camp near Munson's Hill, Virginia, September 5, 1862.

* * * * * * *

General McDowell joined the command at daylight, and directed my co-operation with General Sigel.

The right of the enemy's position could be discerned upon the heights above Groveton, on the right of the pike. The division advanced over the ground to the heights above Groveton, crossed the pike, and Cooper's battery came gallantly into action on the same ridge on which the enemy's right was, supported by Meade's brigade. While pressing forward our extreme left across the pike, re-enforcements were sent for by General Sigel for the right of his line under General Milroy, now hardly pressed by the enemy, and a brigade was taken from Schenck's command on my right. The whole fire of the enemy was now concentrated on the extreme right of my division, and, unsupported there, the battery was obliged to retire with considerable loss in both men and horses, and the division fell back to connect with Schenck.

Later in the day General Pope, arriving on the right from Centreville, renewed the attack on the enemy and drove him some distance. My division was directed to threaten the enemy's right and rear, which it proceeded to do under a heavy fire of artillery from the ridge to the left of the pike. Generals Seymour and Jackson led their brigades in advance; but, notwithstanding all the steadiness and courage shown by the men, they were compelled to fall back before the heavy fire of artillery and musketry which met them both on the front and left flank, and the division resumed its original position. King's division engaged the enemy along the pike on our right, and the action was continued with it until dark by Meade's brigade.

HEADQUARTERS ROBINSON'S BRIGADE,
Centreville, Va., August 31, 1862.

* * * * * * *

On Friday morning I was ordered to "support Colonel Poe's brigade and to develop his line of battle to the right." After crossing Bull Run I moved forward in two lines, the first composed of the Sixty-third Pennsylvania and five companies of the Thirtieth Ohio, which were temporarily attached to my command. Arriving on the ground assigned me, I remained for a considerable time exposed to a heavy artillery fire, after which I took up my position on high ground farther to the right. I was soon after directed by Major-General Kearny, commanding division, to move to the support of Poe's left, when I formed the Sixty-third and One hundred and fifth Pennsylvania in line of battle on the Leesburg road, holding the Twentieth Indiana and Ohio Battalion in reserve. At this time there was a heavy musketry fire to our left and front, and I was directed to move forward through the woods to turn the enemy and cut off his retreat through the railroad cut.

On arriving on the ground with the Sixty-third and One hundred and fifth Pennsylvania, Twentieth Indiana, and Third Michigan, I found the railroad already occupied by our own troops and the corn field in front filled with the enemy. I then deployed the Sixty-third and One hundred and fifth Pennsylvania along the railroad to the right of the troops in position, directing the Third Michigan to protect my right flank, placing the Twentieth Indiana in reserve, and throwing skirmishers to the front. Soon after taking this position the regiments on my left gave way and passed rapidly to the rear out of the woods, leaving my left flank entirely exposed.

As rapidly as possible I moved my command to the left to occupy the deserted ground, but before my troops could get fairly into position I was fiercely attacked by a superior force that had succeeded in crossing the road. I then threw forward my right wing, forming my line of battle at right angles to the original position, and checked the progress of the enemy. At this time General Birney brought up and turned over to me his Fourth Maine. He afterward sent me his First, Fortieth, and One hundred and first New York Regiments. These troops were deployed to the right and left of the railroad, and pushed forward to the support of my regiments in front, which were suffering severely from a terrific fire of musketry and the enemy's artillery posted on a hill to our right and rear. Our men now gained steadily on the enemy, and were driving him before them until he brought up fresh masses of troops (supposed to be two brigades), when, with ammunition nearly expended, we withdrew to our second position.

* * * * * * *

On the following day we continued our march for the plains of Manassas by the way of Centreville, and arrived upon the battlefield about 9 a. m. The battle had already commenced, and as my column moved to the front the shells fell with remarkable precision along the line of the road, but fortunately did no damage.

My brigade was temporarily placed under the orders of Major-General Sigel, whose troops were then engaging the enemy in the center. Under instructions received from him, I threw forward the First Massachusetts Volunteers to support his line, while my remaining four regiments were drawn up in two lines, sheltered from the enemy's fire by a roll of the field in front. This position was occupied until about 2.30 p. m.

In the mean time I rode over the field in front as far as the position of the enemy would admit. After rising the hill under which my command lay an open field was entered, and from one edge of it gradually fell off in a slope to a valley, through which ran a railroad embankment. Beyond this embankment the forest continued, and the corresponding heights beyond were held by the enemy in force, supported by artillery.

At 3 p. m. I received an order to advance in line of battle over this ground, pass the embankment, enter the edge of the woods beyond, and hold it. Dispositions for carrying out such orders were immediately made; pieces were loaded, bayonets fixed, and instructions given for the line to move slowly upon the enemy until it felt its fire, then close upon him rapidly, fire one well-directed volley, and rely upon the bayonet to secure the position on the other side.

We rapidly and firmly pressed upon the embankment, and here occurred a short, sharp, and obstinate hand-to-hand conflict with bayonets and clubbed muskets.

Report of General P. Kearny (by General Birney), of Heintzelman's corps.

CENTREVILLE, VA., August 31, 1862.

* * * * * * *

On the 29th, on my arrival, I was assigned to the holding of the right wing, my left on Leesburg road. I posted Colonel Poe, with Berry's brigade, in first line; General Robinson, First Brigade, on his right, partly in line and partly in support; and kept Birney's most disciplined regiments reserved and ready for emergencies.

Toward noon I was obliged to occupy a quarter of a mile additional on left of said road, from Schurz's troops being taken elsewhere.

During the first hours of combat General Birney, on tired regiments in the center falling back, of his own accord rapidly pushed across to give them a hand to raise themselves to a renewed fight.

In early afternoon General Pope's order to General Roberts was to send a pretty strong force diagonally to the front to relieve the center in woods from pressure. Accordingly I detached on that purpose General Robinson, with his brigade, the Sixty-third Pennsylvania Volunteers, Colonel Hays, the One hundred and fifth Pennsylvania Volunteers, Captain Craig, the Twentieth Indiana, Colonel Brown, and, additionally, the Third Michigan Marksmen, under Colonel Champlin. General Robinson drove forward for several hundred yards, but the center of the main battle being shortly after driven back and out of the woods, my detachment thus exposed so considerably in front of all others, both flanks in air.

* * * * * * *

That I might drive the enemy, by an unexpected attack, through the woods, I brought up additionally the most of Birney's regiments, the Fourth Maine, Colonel Walker and Lieutenant-Colonel Carver, the Fortieth New York; Colonel Egan, First New York, Major Burt, and One hundred and first New York, Lieutenant-Colonel Gesner, and changed front to the left, to sweep with a rush the first line of the enemy. This was most successful. The enemy rolled up on his own right. It presaged a victory for us all; still our force was too light. The enemy brought up rapidly heavy reserves, so that our farther progress was impeded. General Stevens came up gallantly in action to support us, but did not have the numbers.

II.—Battle of Groveton, near Bull Run, on Friday, August 29, 1862.

On Thursday night, August 28, when the First Corps was encamped on the heights south of Young's Branch, near Bull Run, I received orders from General Pope to "attack the enemy vigorously" the next morning. I accordingly made the necessary preparations at night and formed in order of battle at daybreak, having ascertained that the enemy was in considerable force beyond Young's Branch, in sight of the hills we occupied. His left wing rested on Catharpin Creek, front toward Centreville; with his center he occupied a long stretch of woods parallel with the Sudley Springs (New Market) road, and his right was posted on the hills on both sides of the Centreville-Gainesville road. I therefore directed General Schurz to deploy his division on the right of the Gainesville road, and, by a change of direction to the left, to come into position parallel with the Sudley Springs road. General Milroy, with his brigade and one battery, was directed to form the center, and to take possession of an elevation in front of the so-called "stone house," at the junction of the Gainesville and Sudley Springs roads. General Schenck, with his division, forming our left, was ordered to advance quickly to an adjoining range of hills, and to plant his batteries on these hills at an excellent range from the enemy's position.

In this order our whole line advanced from point to point, taking advantage of the ground before us, until our whole line was involved in a most vehement artillery and infantry contest. In the course of about four hours, from half past 6 to half past 10 o'clock in the morning, our whole infantry force and nearly all our batteries were engaged with the enemy, Generals Milroy and Schurz advancing one mile and General Schenck two miles from their original positions. At this time (10.30 o'clock) the enemy threw forward large masses of infantry against our right, but was resisted firmly and driven back three times by the troops of Generals Milroy and Schurz. To assist those troops, so hard pressed by overpowering numbers, exhausted by fatigue, and weakened by losses, I ordered one battery of reserve to take position on their left, and posted two pieces of artillery, under Lieutenant Blum, of Schirmer's battery, supported by the Forty-first New York Volunteer Infantry, beyond their line and opposite the right flank of the enemy, who was advancing in the woods.

* * * * * * *

At 2 o'clock in the afternoon General Hooker's troops arrived on the field of battle and were immediately ordered forward by their noble commander to participate in the battle. One brigade, under Colonel Carr, received orders, by my request, to relieve the regiments of General Schurz's division, which had maintained their ground against repeated attacks, but were now worn out and nearly without ammunition. Other regiments were sent forward to relieve Brigadier-General Milroy, whose brigade had valiantly disputed the ground against greatly superior numbers for eight hours.

To check the enemy if he should attempt to advance, or for the purpose of preparing and supporting an attack from our side, I placed four batteries, of different commands, on a range of hills on our center and behind the woods, which had been the most hotly contested part of the battlefield during the day. I had previously received a letter from Major-General Pope, saying that Fitz-John Porter's corps and Brigadier-General King's division, numbering twenty thousand men, would come in on our left. I did, therefore, not think it prudent to give the enemy time to make new arrangements, and ordered all the batteries to continue their fire, and to direct it principally against the enemy's position in the woods before our front. Some of our troops placed in front were retiring from the woods, but as the enemy, held in check by the artillery in the center, did not venture to follow, and as at this moment new regiments of General Hooker's command arrived and were ordered forward, we maintained our position, which Generals Milroy and Schurz had occupied in the morning.

During two hours, from 4 to 6 o'clock p. m., strong cannonading and musketry continued on our center and right, where General Kearny made a successful effort against the extreme left of the enemy's lines.

On the following morning (the 29th) at daylight I was ordered to proceed in search of the rebels, and had not proceeded more than five hundred yards when we were greeted by a few straggling shots from the woods in front. We were now at the creek, and I had just sent forward my skirmishers, when I received orders to halt and let my men have breakfast. While they were cooking, myself, accompanied by General Schenck, rode up to the top of an eminence some five hundred yards to the front to reconnoiter. We had no sooner reached the top than we were greeted by a shower of musket-balls from the woods on our right. I immediately ordered up my battery and gave the bushwhackers a few shot and shell, which soon cleared the woods. Soon after I discovered the enemy in great force about three-quarters of a mile in front of us, upon our right of the pike leading from Gainesville to Alexandria. I brought up my two batteries and opened upon them, causing them to fall back. I then moved forward my brigade, with skirmishers deployed, and continued to advance my regiments, the enemy falling back.

General Schenck's division was off to my left and that of General Schurz to my right. After passing a piece of woods I turned to the right, where the rebels had a battery that gave us a good deal of trouble. I brought forward one of my batteries to reply to it, and soon after heard a tremendous fire of small-arms, and knew that General Schurz was hotly engaged to my right in an extensive forest. I sent two of my regiments, the Eighty-second Ohio, Colonel Cantwell, and the Fifth Virginia, Colonel Ziegler, to General Schurz's assistance. They were to attack the enemy's right flank, and I held my other two regiments in reserve for a time. The two regiments sent to Schurz were soon hotly engaged, the enemy being behind a railroad embankment, which afforded them an excellent breastwork.

Fighting resumed next morning, August 29, and engaged the enemy until about 11 a. m., when we ran out of ammunition, and, not being able to get more, were ordered to the rear, where we remained that and the following day, August 30, until about 5 p. m.

Report of Colonel Krzyzanowski, commanding second brigade, Schurz's division, Sigel's corps.

NEAR ARLINGTON HEIGHTS, September 3, 1862.

At about half past 5 o'clock a. m. on the 29th of August I received orders from General Schurz to advance with my brigade. It was done in the following order: Two regiments in company column, left in front, and one regiment, the Fifty-fourth New York Volunteers, as reserve. On the right of me was Colonel Schimelpfennig with his brigade, and on the left General Milroy's brigade. A line of skirmishers having been established, we advanced toward the woods through which the Manassas Gap Railroad runs. As soon as we entered the woods I dispatched my adjutant to ascertain whether the line of skirmishers was kept up on both wings, and finding such was not the case and that I had advanced a little faster than General Milroy's and Colonel Schimelpfennig's column, I halted my skirmishers to wait until the line was re-established. However, being informed that General Milroy was advancing, I sent the Fifty-fourth Regiment to take position on my right wing and try to find the lines of Colonel Schimelpfennig's skirmishers, and then I advanced together with the former.

Scarcely had the skirmishers passed over two hundred yards when they became engaged with the enemy. For some time the firing was kept up; but our skirmishers had to yield at last to the enemy's advancing column. At this time I ordered my regiments up, and a general engagement ensued. However, I soon noticed that the Fifty-fourth and Fifty-eighth Regiments had to fall back, owing to the furious fire of the enemy, who had evidently thrown his forces exclusively upon those two regiments. The Seventy-fifth Regiment Pennsylvania Volunteers, which up to this time had not taken part in this engagement, was (at the time the Fifty-eighth and Fifty-fourth retired) now nobly led on by Lieutenant-Colonel Mahler upon the right flank of the enemy, and kept him busy until I had brought the Fifty-eighth at a double-quick up to its previous position, when those two regiments successfully drove the enemy before them, thereby gaining the position of the Manassas Gap Railroad.

The Fifty-fourth had meanwhile been ordered by General Schurz to take position with the Twenty-ninth Regiment New York State Volunteers in the interval of my brigade and that of Colonel Schimelpfennig.

At this time I observed on my right the brigade of General Roberts, to whom I explained my position, after which we advanced together a short distance; but he soon withdrew his forces, ascertaining that he got his brigade in between the columns of our division. We had occupied the above-named position only a short time when the enemy again tried to force us back, but the noble conduct of my troops did not allow him to carry out his design, and he did not gain one inch of ground. We were thus enabled to secure our wounded and some of our dead, and also some of the enemy's wounded, belonging to the Tenth South Carolina Regiment. We held this position until 2 p. m., when we were relieved by a brigade of General Kearny's division, and retired about one-fourth of a mile toward our rear, where we also encamped for the night.

* * * * * * *

At 2 o'clock Friday morning, August 29, I received orders to march at 3 a. m. and support General Kearny, who was in pursuit of the enemy. A march of ten miles brought us to the Bull Run battlefield. About 11 a. m. was ordered in position to support a battery in front of the woods, where the enemy with General Sigel's troops was engaged. Remaining about one hour in that position, was ordered to send into the woods and relieve two regiments of General Sigel's corps. I sent in the Sixth and Seventh New Jersey Volunteers. Afterward received orders to take the balance of the brigade in the woods, which I did at about 2 p. m. Here I at once engaged the enemy and fought him for a space of two hours, holding my position until our ammunition was all expended. About 4 o'clock we were relieved by General Reno and Colonel Taylor, but did not reach the skirt of the woods before a retreat was made and the woods occupied by the enemy. When I arrived out of the woods I was ordered to march about half a mile to the rear and bivouac for the night.

Report of Col. J. W. Revere, Seventh New Jersey Volunteers, Carr's brigade, Hooker's division, Heintzelman's corps.

IN THE FIELD, NEAR CENTREVILLE, VA., August 30, 1862.

SIR: I have the honor to report that this regiment, being ordered into the woods with the Sixth New Jersey Volunteers, proceeding [proceeded] to occupy them, relieving a New York regiment of General Steinwehr's division on the 29th instant at 11 a. m. on the extreme right of the position of our part of the army.

Advancing about fifty yards, we encountered the enemy's pickets, and a spirited engagement ensued, with varying success; and having been relieved by the timely advance of the Sixth Regiment New Jersey Volunteers, we drove the enemy from his position, but having been strongly re-enforced, he regained it about 1 p. m.

Report of Maj. F. Blessing, commanding Seventy-fourth Pennsylvania Volunteers, of first brigade, Schurz's division, Sigel's corps.

* * * * * * *

At 5 o'clock a. m., August 29, we left this place, meeting our brigade, commanded by Col. A. Schimelpfennig, at 6 o'clock. After a rest of about fifteen minutes the regiment was ordered to take its position on the extreme right of the army corps then advancing. Under cover of skirmishers in the front and right flank we advanced in quick-time over an open field until we arrived at the center of the woods, where in an opening we halted. The skirmishers met the skirmish line of the enemy, opened fire, and drove them into the woods. Forced by the heavy artillery fire of the enemy, we changed several times our positions. From the right flank came the report that a strong column was advancing, but that it was impossible to recognize whether friend or foe. It was afterward ascertained to be General Kearny's corps for our relief. The regiment was then ordered to the left, where it took its position in the general battle-line, after advancing about four hundred yards under the heavy fire of the enemy, driving the latter back and out of his positions, but by the withdrawing of a regiment stationed on the left of the Seventy-fourth the enemy took advantage, and, outflanking us, we were forced back about one hundred yards.

Forming again in column for attack, the regiment advanced in quick-time toward the enemy, who gave way until he arrived at the other side of the railroad dam. Here, again flanked by the enemy and under a galling fire of grape-shot and canister, the regiment had to leave its position, which it did by making a flank movement to the left, forcing the enemy to withdraw from the woods. We advanced over our former position, capturing an ambulance with two wounded officers, to the seam of the woods. At this point a heavy shower of grape-shot and canister pouring into us, we withdrew to the railroad dam. After resting here for about thirty minutes, we were ordered by General Schurz to support a battery on the extreme right, keeping in that position till the battery left. We then again joined our brigade. Wearied and exhausted, we camped for the night on the same ground the enemy held the night previous.

Report of Maj. Steven Kovacs, Fifty-fourth New York Volunteers, Second Brigade, Schurz's division, Sigel's corps.

CAMP NEAR ARLINGTON HEIGHTS, September 12, 1862.

SIR: I have the honor to report that on the 29th of August, 1862, the Fifty-fourth Regiment New York State Volunteers was drawn up in line of battle at 6 o'clock a. m. at Manassas, and ordered for reserve by General Schurz; at 8 o'clock, by his orders, was sent to the woods to drive out the enemy, and found them in large force. The regiment instantly became engaged, and it held the woods in spite of the superior numbers until 1 o'clock, when it was relieved by another regiment. In this engagement the officers and men behaved themselves bravely, especially the second color-bearer, William Rauschmüller, who, seeing his comrade (the first color-bearer) fall, instantly seized the flag, and at the same time he cared for his wounded comrade, took him to the rear, and immediately returned again to his proper place. After this the regiment was ordered to fall back to another wood about half a mile distant, with the order to be in column by division, to be ready for any emergency, and the regiment remained under arms all night.

Report of Capt. F. Braum, commanding Fifty-eighth New York Volunteers, Second Brigade, Schurz's division, Sigel's corps.

CAMP NEAR ARLINGTON HEIGHTS, September 12, 1862.

* * * * * * *

The 29th instant the regiment was ordered into action, and marching over a plain ground soon was engaged with the enemy, which had taken position in the woods. The regiment held the enemy in check from 8 o'clock in the morning till 12 o'clock p. m., when the regiment was relieved. The loss of the regiment was twenty-nine killed, wounded, and missing.

Report of Col. William Blaisdell, Eleventh Massachusetts Volunteers, Grover's brigade, Hooker's division, Heintzelman's corps.

CAMP NEAR ALEXANDRIA, VA., September 14, 1862.

After supporting several batteries the regiment was ordered to move forward and engage the enemy. At about 3 p. m., advancing about one mile to the edge of a heavy wood, then deploying and moving forward in line of battle until within range of the enemy's pickets, the line was halted, bayonets fixed. Again moving forward, driving the enemy's pickets before it, the regiment came upon and engaged a heavy line of the enemy's infantry, which was driven back and over a line of railroad, where the road-bed was ten feet high, behind which was posted another heavy line of infantry, which opened a terrific fire upon the regiment as it emerged from the woods. The Eleventh Regiment, being the battalion of direction, was the first to reach the railroad, and of course received the heaviest of the fire. This staggered the men a little, but recovering in an instant, they gave a wild hurrah and over they went, mounting the embankment, driving everything before them at the point of the bayonet.

Here, for two or more minutes, the struggle was very severe, the combatants exchanging shots their muskets almost muzzle to muzzle, and engaging hand to hand in deadly encounter. Private John Sawler, of Company D, stove in the skull of one rebel with the butt of his musket and killed another with his bayonet. The enemy broke in confusion and ran, numbers throwing down their muskets, some fully cocked, and the owners too much frightened to fire them, the regiment pursuing them some eighty yards into the woods, where it was met by an overwhelming force in front, at the same time receiving an artillery fire, which enfiladed our left and forced it to retire, leaving the dead and many of the wounded where they fell.

It was near the railroad embankment that the brave Tileston, Stone, and Porter, and other gallant men received their mortal wounds. Being thus overpowered by numerical odds after breaking through and scattering two lines of the enemy, and compelled to evacuate the woods and enter into the open fields beyond, the enemy pursuing us hotly to the edge of the woods, I was greatly amazed to find that the regiment had been sent to engage a force of more than five times its numbers, strongly posted in thick woods and behind heavy embankments, and not a soldier to support it in case of disaster. After collecting the regiment together and moving back to our original position we encamped for the night. The officers and men of the regiment fought with the most desperate bravery; not a man flinched, and the losses were proportionately severe. Out of two hundred and eighty-three officers and men who participated in the fight three officers and seven enlisted men were killed, three officers and seventy-four enlisted men were wounded, and twenty-five missing, making an aggregate of ten killed, seventy-seven wounded, and twenty-five missing, all in the space of fifteen or twenty minutes. The regiment bivouacked on the field.

General R. C. Schenck's report, by Colonel Cheesborough.

WASHINGTON, D. C., September 17, 1862.

* * * * * * *

On Thursday, 29th ultimo, we left Buckland Mills, passing through Gainesville, and proceeded on the Manassas Junction pike to within some four miles of that place, and then turned eastwardly, marching toward Bull Run. The scouts in advance reported a force of the enemy, consisting of infantry and cavalry, in front. We were hurried forward and formed line of battle with our right toward Centreville. Some few shells were thrown into a clump of woods in front where the enemy were last seen, but without eliciting any response. Some two hours elapsed when heavy firing was heard on our left, which we concluded was from McDowell's corps and the enemy who had worked around from our front in that direction. We were immediately put in motion, and marched on the Warrenton road and took position for the night on a hill east of the stone house, our right resting on the pike.

On Friday morning early the engagement was commenced by General Milroy on our right, in which we soon after took part, and a rapid artillery fire ensued from both sides. For some time heavy columns of the enemy could be seen filing out of a wood in front and gradually falling back. They were within range of our guns, which were turned on them and must have done some execution. An hour after we received the order to move one brigade by the flank to the left and advance, which was done. We here obtained a good position for artillery, and stationed De Beck's First Ohio Battery, which did excellent service, dismounting one of the enemy's guns, blowing up a caisson, and silencing the battery. Unfortunately, however, they were poorly supplied with ammunition, and soon compelled to withdraw.

Our two brigades were now put in motion. General Stahel, commanding first brigade, marching around the right of the hill to a hollow in front, was ordered to draw up in line of battle and halt. Colonel McLean advanced around the left of the hill under cover of the woods, pressing gradually forward until he struck the turnpike at a white house about one-half mile in advance of the stone house. General Milroy's brigade arrived about the same time. We were halted, and sent back for General Stahel, who took the pike and soon joined us. We then formed our line of battle in the woods to the left of the pike, our right resting on the road, and then pushed on slowly. Milroy, in the mean while, had deployed to the right of the road, and soon became engaged with the enemy. Our division was advanced until we reached the edge of the woods and halted.

In front of us was an open space (which also extended to the right of the road and to our right), beyond which was another wood. We remained here nearly an hour, the firing in the mean while becoming heavy on the right. The enemy had a battery very advantageously placed on a high ridge behind the woods in front of Milroy, on the right of the road. It was admirably served and entirely concealed. Our position becoming known, their fire was directed toward us. The general determined, therefore, to advance, and so pushed on across the open space in front and took position in the woods beyond. We here discovered that we were on the battle-ground of the night before, and found the hospital of Gibbon's brigade, who had engaged the enemy. The battery of the enemy still continued. We had no artillery. De Beck's and Schirmer's ammunition having given out, and Buell's battery, which had reported, after a hot contest with the enemy (who had every advantage in position and range), was compelled to retire. It was now determined to flank the battery and capture it, and for this purpose General Schenck ordered one of his aids to reconnoiter the position. Before he returned, however, we were requested by General Milroy to assist him, as he was very heavily pressed. General Stahel was immediately ordered to proceed with his brigade to Milroy's support.

It was about this time, 1 or 2 o'clock, that a line of skirmishers were observed approaching us from the rear; they proved to be General Reynolds's. We communicated with General Reynolds at once, who took his position on our left, and at General Schenck's suggestion he sent a battery to our right in the woods for the purpose of flanking the enemy. They secured a position and were engaged with him about an hour, but with what result we were not informed. General Reynolds now sent us word that he had discovered the enemy bearing down upon his left in heavy columns, and that he intended to fall back to the first woods behind the cleared space, and had already put his troops in motion. We therefore accommodated ourselves to his movement. It was about this time that your order came to press toward the right. We returned answer that the enemy were in force in front of us, and that we could not do so without leaving the left much exposed. General Schenck again asked for some artillery.

General Stahel's brigade, that had been sent to General Milroy's assistance, having accomplished its object under a severe fire had returned, and soon after General Stevens reported with two regiments of infantry and a battery of four 20-pound Parrott guns. With these re-enforcements we determined to advance again and reoccupy the woods in front of the cleared space, and communicated this intention to General Reynolds. He, however, had fallen back on our left some distance to the rear; he was therefore requested to make his connection with our left. The Parrotts in the mean while were placed in position, and under the admirable management of Lieutenant Benjamin did splendidly. Two mountain howitzers also reported, and were placed on our right in the edge of the woods near the road, and commenced shelling the woods in front of the open spaces, which were now occupied by the enemy, our skirmishers having previously fallen back.

The artillery fire now became very severe, and General Schenck was convinced that it was very essential that he should have another battery, and so sent me to you to get one. I arrived to find one, Captain Romer's, just starting. You also directed me to order General Schenck to fall gradually back, as he was too far forward; General Stahel on the left of the pike and Colonel McLean to the left of Stahel. I here state in my report that General Schenck, on receiving these re-enforcements, determined to advance again, and communicated his intention to General Reynolds. I carried this message myself, and, after some difficulty, found General Reynolds, and requested him to halt and form on the left of McLean. He had fallen back, however, some distance to the rear of McLean's line of battle, so much so that the enemy's skirmishers had actually flanked us, and in returning to the division I had a narrow escape from being captured.

I also asked General Reynolds to ride forward to meet General Schenck, who had directed me to say that he would be at the extreme left of our line for that purpose. General Reynolds neither gave me any positive answer as to whether he would meet General Schenck or any information as to what he intended to do. I do not know if he complied with the request to make his connection on our left, as, on my return to General Schenck, I was immediately sent to General Sigel to represent our position; and when returning again with the order to General Schenck to retire slowly, I met the command executing the movement.

My report was intended merely as a sketch of our movements for General Sigel's information, and I endeavored throughout to be as concise as possible and confine myself solely to the operations and movements of our division. I now submit the above statement, trusting that the explanations will be satisfactory to General Reynolds.

Report of Maj. Gen. S. P. Heintzelman.

ARLINGTON, VIRGINIA, October 21, 1862.

At 10 a. m. I reached the field of battle, a mile from stone bridge, on the Warrenton turnpike. General Kearny's division had proceeded to the right and front. I learned that General Sigel was in command of the troops then engaged.

At 11 a. m. the head of Hooker's division arrived; General Reno an hour later. At the request of General Sigel I ordered General Hooker to place one of his brigades at General Sigel's disposal, to re-enforce a portion of his line then hard pressed. General Grover reported, and before long became engaged, and was afterward supported by the whole division. General Pope arrived between 1 and 2 p. m. The enemy were driven back a short distance toward Sudley church, where they made another stand and again pressed a portion of our line back. All this time General Kearny's division held its position on our extreme right. Several orders were sent to him to advance, but he did not move till after the troops on his left had been forced back, which was near 6 p. m. He now advanced and reported that he was driving the enemy. This was not, however, until after the renewed heavy musketry fire on our center had driven General Hooker's troops and those he was sent to support back. They were greatly outnumbered and behaved with exceeding gallantry.

It was on this occasion that General Grover's brigade made the most gallant and determined bayonet charge of the war. He broke two of the enemy's lines, but was finally repulsed by the overwhelming numbers in the rebel third line. It was a hand-to-hand conflict, using the bayonet and the butt of the musket. In this fierce encounter of not over twenty minutes' duration the Second New Hampshire, Colonel Marston, suffered the most. The First, Eleventh, and Sixteenth Massachusetts and Twenty-sixth Pennsylvania were engaged. The loss of this brigade, numbering less than 2,000, was a total of 484, nearly all killed and wounded. I refer you to General Grover's accompanying report.

Had General Kearny pushed the enemy earlier it might have enabled us to have held our center and have saved some of this heavy loss. Kearny on the right, with General Stevens and our artillery, drove the enemy out of the woods they had temporarily occupied. The firing continued some time after dark, and when it ceased we remained in possession of the battlefield.

THIS DAY MUST NOT BE CONFUSED.

These all speak of the 29th, not confused with the 30th, for the 30th is in a separate part of the reports.

Lieutenant-Colonel Sewell, commander Fifth New Jersey, reports that on the 29th of August—

I was soon obliged to relieve my right wing with my left, the former having emptied their cartridge-boxes.

His command had emptied their cartridge-boxes and one wing had to be relieved by the other for that reason.

Captain Weidrick, commanding Battery I, New York Artillery, reports in action from 10 o'clock 29th until 3 o'clock, when they had to retire on account of loss of ammunition.

Captain Dilger, commanding battery, reports his battery engaged until his ammunition was expended and his battery relieved by another.

Colonel Thompson, One hundred and fifteenth Pennsylvania, reports continuous fighting until his command was relieved by fresh troops, sustaining heavy loss.

Col. G. C. Burling, Sixth New Jersey, was engaged until relieved by fresh troops. His loss was severe.

NEW EVIDENCE FURNISHED BY CONFEDERATE OFFICERS.

Fitz-John Porter says he found new evidence. What new evidence? The new evidence is produced by statements from officers of the confederate army for the purpose of showing that on that day he was not required to fight because there was no battle.

REPORTS OF CONFEDERATE OFFICERS.

General T. J. Jackson, who commanded the rebel forces on that day, in making his report April 27, 1863, or rather made, from the records he left, by his adjutant-general, says:

My troops on this day (29th) were distributed along and in the vicinity of the cut of an unfinished railroad (intended as a part of the track to connect the Manassas road directly with Alexandria) stretching from the Warrenton turnpike in the direction of Sudley Mill. It was mainly along the excavation of this unfinished road that my line of battle was formed on the 29th [August].

Assault after assault was made on the left, exhibiting on the part of the enemy great pertinacity and determination, but every advance was most successfully and gallantly driven back. General Hill reports that six separate and distinct assaults were thus met and repulsed by his division, assisted by Hays's brigade, Colonel Forno commanding. By this time the brigade of General Gregg, which, from its position on the extreme left, was most exposed to the enemy's attack, had nearly expended its ammunition. It had suffered severely in its men, and all its field officers except two were killed or wounded.

About 4 o'clock it had been assisted by Hays's brigade (Colonel Forno). It was now retired to the rea to take some repose after seven hours of severe service.

After seven hours of severe contest it was relieved because the men were exhausted.

And General Early's brigade, of Ewell's division, with the Eighth Louisiana Regiment, took its place.

On reaching his position, General Early found that the enemy had obtained possession of the railroad and a piece of wood in front, there being at this point a deep cut, which furnished a strong defense. Moving through a field he advanced upon the enemy, drove them from the wood and railroad cut with great slaughter, and followed in pursuit some two hundred yards.

They were driven back with great slaughter.

Early kept his position there until the following morning.

Now, to show that this was on the 29th let us see what he says in the conclusion of this report:

At a later period Major Patrick, of the cavalry, who was by General Stuart intrusted with guarding the train, was attacked, and, although it was promptly and effectually repulsed, it was not without the loss of that intrepid officer, who fell in the attack while setting an example of gallantry to his men well worthy of imitation. During the day the commanding general arrived, and also General Longstreet with his command.

REPORT OF GENERAL A. P. HILL.

Let me call attention to the report of General A. P. Hill, who was in that battle on the day of the 29th:

The evident intention of the enemy this day was to turn our left and overwhelm Jackson's corps before Longstreet came up.

The evident intention of the enemy, speaking of Pope's forces, was to turn Jackson's left and overwhelm him before Longstreet could arrive.

And to accomplish this the most persistent and furious onsets were made by column after column of infantry, accompanied by numerous batteries of artillery.

The enemy prepared for a last and determined attempt. Their serried masses, overwhelming superiority of numbers, and bold bearing made the chance of victory to tremble in the balance; my own division exhausted—

A. P. Hill's division exhausted—by seven hours' unremitted fighting, hardly one round per man remaining, and weakened in all things save its unconquerable spirit. Casting about for help, fortunately it was here reported to me that the brigades of Generals Lawton and Early were near by, and sending for them, they promptly moved to my front at the most opportune moment, and this last charge met the same disastrous fate that had befallen those preceding. Having received an order from General Jackson to endeavor to avoid a general engagement, my commanders of brigades contented themselves with repulsing the enemy and following them up but a few hundred yards.

MOST FURIOUS ONSLAUGHTS ON HIS COMMAND.

General Early reports the same thing in his report on the 29th of August, the time that he took his position, the time he was engaged, and reports it as a severe battle. So Taliaferro and so General Hood. Hood's force was a part of Longstreet's command. Now, what does Hood say? Speaking of the battle of the 29th, he says:

About 4 o'clock in the afternoon the enemy made a fierce attack upon General Jackson, his noble troops holding their ground with their usual gallantry.

At sunset an order came to me from the commanding general to move forward and attack the enemy. Before, however, this division could come to attention they were attacked, and I instantly ordered the two brigades to move forward and charge the enemy, which they did most gallantly, driving them in confusion in front of them. Colonel Law's brigade, being engaged with a very heavy force of the enemy, captured one piece of artillery, three stand of colors, and one hundred prisoners, and the Texas brigade three stand of colors. It soon became so very dark that it was impossible to pursue the enemy any farther. At 12 o'clock at night orders came to retake our position on the right of General Jackson.

There was one of the divisions that General Longstreet had General Wilcox to support in the attack at Groveton. And yet he says at 12 o'clock at night he was ordered to retake his former position. He staid there by Groveton.

WHAT GENERAL WILCOX SAID.

General C. M. Wilcox, of General Longstreet's command, said:

Pursuing our line of march, together with the division, we passed by Gainesville, and advancing some three miles beyond, my three brigades were formed in line of battle on the left and at right angles to the turnpike. Having advanced near three-quarters of a mile, we were then halted. The enemy was in our front and not far distant. Several of our batteries were placed in position on a commanding eminence to the left of the turnpike. A cannonading ensued and continued for an hour or two, to which the enemy's artillery replied.

At half past 4 or 5 p. m. the three brigades were moved across to the right of the turnpike, a mile or more, to the Manassas Gap Railroad. While here musketry was heard to our left on the turnpike. This firing continued, with more or less vivacity until sundown. Now the command was ordered back to the turnpike and forward on this to the support of General Hood, who had become engaged with the enemy, and had driven him back some distance, inflicting severe loss upon him, being checked in his successes by the darkness of the night.

After reaching General Hood's position but little musketry was heard. All soon became quiet. Our pickets were thrown out to the front. The enemy's camp-fires soon became visible, extending far off to our left, front, and right. Remaining in this position until 12 o'clock at night, the troops were withdrawn three-quarters of a mile to the rear and bivouacked, pickets being left to guard our front.

So that by 4 o'clock all the troops that were on the right of Longstreet were turned back onto Groveton and engaged there at Groveton, and staid there until 11 or 12 o'clock at night, leaving nothing but Jones's brigade in the direction of Porter.

REPORTS OF LONGSTREET'S OFFICERS AND OTHERS.

Report of Col. Edward L. Thomas, commanding second brigade, A. P. Hill's division, Jackson's command.

HEADQUARTERS THIRD BRIGADE, LIGHT DIVISION,
October 26, 1862.

* * * * * * *

On Thursday, August 28, near Sudley Ford, this brigade was held in reserve by order of General Hill; was under fire, but took no active part, and after the enemy gave way moved forward and bivouacked for the night on the field. Early on Friday, August 29, the march was resumed, with directions to be prepared for an attack near the railroad. General Gregg's brigade meeting the enemy there, this brigade advanced to his right, the regiments being thrown in successively until all became engaged. The enemy were in strong position on the railroad.

We at once advanced and drove them from it. This position we were ordered to hold, and, if possible, avoid bringing on a general engagement, and held it against several attacks of the enemy in strong force during the day. In the afternoon an overwhelming force attacked us, now almost without ammunition, in front and on the left flanks, and forced us back a short distance, when General Pender's brigade advanced promptly and in fine order to the assistance of the third, most of which joined General Pender, and together they drove back the enemy some distance beyond our previous position, which was held until night, the brigade bivouacking on the field.

Report of Brig. Gen. S. McGowan.

HEADQUARTERS SECOND BRIGADE,
A. P. HILL'S LIGHT DIVISION, SECOND ARMY CORPS,
Camp Gregg, Virginia, February 9, 1863.

* * * * * * *

Friday, the 29th, was the glorious but bloody day for the brigade. It may be allowed for us to claim that by holding the left steady on Friday we contributed to the success of the great battle on Saturday. The distinguished brigadier-general who commanded, and was present everywhere during the day and exerting himself to the utmost, was himself spared only to fall upon another victorious field (Fredericksburg), but many of our noblest and best officers and men fell there. The aggregate of the killed and wounded of the brigade in this battle was six hundred and thirteen (613).

Report of Brig. Gen. N. G. Evans, Longstreet's command.

HEADQUARTERS EVANS'S BRIGADE,
Near Winchester, Va., October 13, 1862.

* * * * * * *

On the evening of the 29th of August the brigade engaged the skirmishers of the enemy in considerable force on the south side of the road near Groveton, and rendered efficient co-operation to the commands of General Wilcox on the left and General Hood on the right in driving the enemy from his position. The enemy falling back, and the darkness of the night concealing his movements, I formed my brigade in the camp of the enemy, until ordered to fall back by the major-general commanding. Leaving a strong picket in my front, I withdrew about a mile to the rear.

Report of Lieut. Col. R. L. Walker.

HEADQUARTERS ARTILLERY BATTALION, March 1, 1863.

* * * * * * *

On Friday, the 29th of August, the batteries were placed in position on the ridge in rear and to the left of General A. P. Hill's division. Captain Braxton's battery was engaged early in the forenoon on the extreme left, with the loss of some of his horses. Upon the cessation of the enemy's fire ours ceased also. In the afternoon a section of Captain Pegram's battery hotly engaged the enemy on the right. His position was in rear of General Field's and Gregg's brigades. The loss of this section was very heavy, and, the fire continuing with unremitted severity, it was withdrawn. Captain Braxton was then ordered to the position, and, with five guns, held it, with loss, under a terrible fire, until night closed in upon the field. Captain Crenshaw's battery was also engaged during the day from a point in rear of General Pender's brigade.

Report of Col. J. B. Walton, of Longstreet's command, of second battle of Manassas.

HEADQUARTERS BATTALION WASHINGTON ARTILLERY,
November 30, 1862.

On the 29th August, 1862, the four batteries composing the battalion were assigned and served as follows: The fourth company, consisting of two six-pounder bronze guns and two twelve-pounder howitzers, under Capt. D. F. Eshleman, Lieutenants Norcom, Battles, and Apps, with Pickett's brigade; the second company, with two six-pounder bronze guns and two twelve-pounder howitzers, under Captain Richardson, Lieutenants Hawes, De Russey, and Britton, with Toombs's brigade; the first company, with three 3-inch rifle guns, under Capt. C. W. Squiers, Lieutenants E. Owens, Galbraith, and Brown; and the third company, with four light twelve-pounder guns (Napoleon), under Capt. M. B. Miller, Lieutenants McElroy and Hero, in reserve.

About noon on the 29th, the two batteries in reserve having halted near the village of Gainesville, on the Warrenton and Centreville turnpike, were ordered forward by General Longstreet to engage the enemy then in our front and near the village of Groveton. Captains Miller and Squiers at once proceeded to the position indicated by the general and opened fire upon the enemy's batteries. Immediately in Captain Miller's front he discovered a battery of the enemy, distant about 1,200 yards. Beyond this battery, and on a more elevated position, were posted the enemy's rifle batteries. He opened upon the battery nearest him, and, after a spirited engagement of three-quarters of an hour, completely silenced it and compelled it to leave the field. He then turned his attention to the enemy's rifle batteries and engaged them, until, having exhausted his ammunition, he retired from the field.

Captain Squiers, on reaching his position on the left of Captain Miller's battery, at once opened, with his usual accuracy, upon the enemy's batteries. Unfortunately, after the first fire, one of his guns, having become disabled by the blowing out of the bushing of the vent, was sent from the field. Captain Squiers then placed the remaining section of his battery under command of Lieutenant Owen, and rode to the left to place additional guns (that had been sent forward to his assistance) in position. At this time the enemy's infantry were engaged with the forces on the left of the position occupied by our batteries, and while the enemy retreated in confusion before the charge of our veterans the section under Lieutenant Owen poured a destructive fire into their affrighted ranks. Scores were seen to fall.

Report of Maj. B. W. Frobell, chief of artillery of Hood's division, Longstreet's command, of second battle of Manassas.

CAMP NEAR FREDERICK, MD., September 9, 1862.

* * * * * * *

At 11 a. m. on Friday I was ordered by General Hood to proceed to the right of the turnpike road and report to General Stuart. This I did, with Captain Bachman's battery, Reilly being already in position on the left, and Garden having no long-range pieces. General Stuart had selected a position near the Orange and Alexandria Railroad. The battery was brought up and immediately opened with marked effect on a column of the enemy moving to the right, which at once changed direction, moving rapidly to the left. Fifteen rounds were fired, when, the distance being greatly increased, I ordered Captain Bachman to cease firing. At 1 o'clock p. m. Captain Reilly was ordered to the left of the turnpike and to take position with other batteries on a hill commanding the hills near Groveton House.

Report of Col. E. M. Law, of Hood's division, Longstreet's command, of second battle of Manassas.

HEADQUARTERS THIRD BRIGADE, September 10, 1862.

* * * * * * *

Leaving Thoroughfare Gap at sunrise on the 29th the brigade marched in the direction of Manassas Junction. At Gainesville, on the Warrenton turnpike, the line of march changed abruptly to the left along the turnpike in the direction of Centreville. On arriving about midway between Gainesville and the stone house, which is situated at the junction of the turnpike and the Sudley Ford road, I was ordered by Brigadier-General Hood, commanding the division, to form the brigade in line of battle to the left of the turnpike and almost at right angles with it, the right resting on the road and the left connecting with General Jackson's line.

* * * * * * *

The opposing force of the enemy, as I learned from captured officers, consisted of General King's division of four brigades and a battery of howitzers. One piece was captured and about a hundred prisoners. Among the prisoners were Captain Judson, assistant adjutant-general to General Hatch, and Captain Garish, of the battery.

During the night of the 29th, under orders from General Hood, I resumed the position to the rear of Groveton which I had occupied in the morning.

Report of Brig. Gen. J. B. Hood of operations of his division, Longstreet's command, from Freeman's Ford.

DIVISION HEAQUARTERS, September 27, 1862.

On arriving at Thoroughfare Gap, the enemy were drawn up in line to dispute our passage. After a spirited little engagement with them by Gen. D. R. Jones's troops, on the evening of the 28th instant, our forces were able to bivouac for the night beyond the gap. The next morning, at daylight, the march was again resumed, with this division in the advance, Lieutenant-Colonel Upton, of the Fifth Texas, in command of a party of select Texas riflemen, constituting the advance guard.

Coming up with the rear-guard of the enemy before sunrise, this gallant and distinguished officer drove them before him so rapidly that halts would have to be made for the troops in rear to rest. Early in the day we came up with the main body of the enemy on the plains of Manassas, engaging General Jackson's forces. Disposition of the troops being made, the Texas brigade advanced in line of battle down and on the immediate right of the pike leading to the stone bridge, and Colonel Law's brigade on the left. Arriving on a line with the line of battle established by General Jackson, the division was halted by order of the general commanding.

About 4 o'clock in the afternoon the enemy made a fierce attack upon General Jackson, his noble troops holding their ground with their usual gallantry.

At sunset an order came to me from the commanding general to move forward and attack the enemy. Before, however, this division could come to attention they were attacked, and I instantly ordered the two brigades to move forward and charge the enemy, which they did most gallantly, driving them in confusion in front of them. Colonel Law's brigade, being engaged with a very heavy force of the enemy, captured one piece of artillery, three stand of colors, and one hundred prisoners, and the Texas brigade three stand of colors. It soon became so very dark that it was impossible to pursue the enemy any farther. At 12 o'clock at night orders came to retake our position on the right of General Jackson.

Report of Major-General Stuart of operations immediately preceding and including the battle of Groveton.

HEADQUARTERS STUART'S CAVALRY DIVISION,
ARMY OF NORTHERN VIRGINIA,
February 28, 1863.

* * * * * * *

The next morning, 29th, in pursuance of General Jackson's wishes, I set out again to endeavor to establish communication with Longstreet, from whom he had received a favorable report the night before. Just after leaving the Sudley road my party was fired on from the wood bordering the road, which was in rear of Jackson's lines, and which the enemy had penetrated with a small force, it was afterwards ascertained, and captured some stragglers. They were between General Jackson and his baggage at Sudley.

I immediately sent to Major Patrick, whose six companies of cavalry were near Sudley, to interpose in defense of the baggage, and use all the means at hand for its protection, and order the baggage at once to start for Aldie. General Jackson, also being notified of this movement in his rear, sent back infantry to close the woods. Captain Pelham, always at the right place at the right time, unlimbered his battery, and soon dispersed that portion in the woods. Major Patrick was attacked later, but he repulsed the enemy with considerable loss, though not without loss to us, for the gallant major himself, setting the example to his men, was mortally wounded. He lived long enough to witness the triumph of our arms, and expired thus in the arms of victory. The sacrifice was noble, but the loss to us irreparable.

I met with the head of General Longstreet's column between Hay Market and Gainesville, and there communicated to the commanding general General Jackson's position and the enemy's. I then passed the cavalry through the column, so as to place it on Longstreet's right flank, and advanced directly toward Manassas, while the column kept directly down the pike to join General Jackson's right. I selected a fine position for a battery on the right, and one having been sent to me, I fired a few shots at the enemy's supposed position, which induced him to shift his position. General Robertson, who with his command was sent to reconnoiter farther down the road toward Manassas, reported the enemy in his front. Upon repairing to that front, I found that Rosser's regiment was engaged with the enemy to the left of the road, and Robertson's vedettes had found the enemy approaching from the direction of Bristoe Station toward Sudley.

The prolongation of his line of march would have passed through my position, which was a very fine one for artillery as well as observation, and struck Longstreet in flank. I waited his approach long enough to ascertain that there was at least an army corps, at the same time keeping detachments of cavalry dragging brush down the road from the direction of Gainesville, so as to deceive the enemy (a ruse which Porter's report shows was successful), and notified the commanding general, then opposite me on the turnpike, that Longstreet's flank and rear were seriously threatened and of the importance to us of the ridge I then held. Immediately upon the receipt of that intelligence Jenkins's, Kemper's, and D. R. Jones's brigades and several pieces of artillery were ordered to me by General Longstreet, and, being placed in position fronting Bristoe, awaited the enemy's advance.

After exchanging a few shots with rifle pieces this corps withdrew toward Manassas, leaving artillery and supports to hold the position till night. Brigadier-General Fitz Lee returned to the vicinity of Sudley, after a successful expedition, of which his official report has not been received, and was instructed to co-operate with Jackson's left. Late in the afternoon the artillery on this commanding ridge was, to an important degree, auxiliary to the attack upon the enemy, and Jenkins's brigade repulsed the enemy in handsome style at one volley as they advanced across the corn field. Thus the day ended, our lines having considerably advanced.

General Longstreet, in his report, says:

HEADQUARTERS NEAR WINCHESTER, VA., October 10, 1862.

* * * * * * * *

Early on the 29th (August) the columns were united, and the advance to join General Jackson was resumed. The noise of battle was heard before we reached Gainesville. The march was quickened to the extent of our capacity. The excitement of battle seemed to give new life and strength to our jaded men, and the head of my column soon reached a position in rear of the enemy's left flank and within easy cannon-shot.

On approaching the field some of Brigadier-General Hood's batteries were ordered into position, and his division was deployed on the right and left of the turnpike, at right angles with it, and supported by Brigadier-General Evans's brigade. Before these batteries could open the enemy discovered our movements and withdrew his left. Another battery (Captain Stribling's) was placed upon a commanding position to my right, which played upon the rear of the enemy's left and drove him entirely from that part of the field. He changed his front rapidly, so as to meet the advance of Hood and Evans.

Three brigades, under General Wilcox, were thrown forward to the support of the left, and three others, under General Kemper, to the support of the right of these commands. General D. R. Jones's division was placed upon the Manassas Gap Railroad—

ONLY CAVALRY, BRUSH, AND DUST.

Not on this road [indicating] that Porter was on—upon the Manassas Gap Railroad, to the right and in echelon with regard to the three last brigades. Colonel Walton placed his batteries in a commanding position between my line and that of General Jackson, and engaged the enemy for several hours in a severe and successful artillery duel. At a late hour in the day Major-General Stuart reported the approach of the enemy in heavy columns against my extreme right. I withdrew General Wilcox with his three brigades from the left, and placed his command in position to support Jones in case of an attack against my right. After some few shots the enemy withdrew his forces, moving them around toward his front, and about 4 o'clock in the afternoon began to press forward against General Jackson's position. Wilcox's brigades were moved back to their former position, and Hood's two brigades, supported by Evans, were quickly pressed forward to the attack. At the same time Wilcox's three brigades made a like advance, as also Hunton's brigade, of Kemper's command.

These movements were executed with commendable zeal and ability. Hood, supported by Evans, made a gallant attack, driving the enemy back till 9 o'clock at night. One piece of artillery, several regimental standards, and a number of prisoners were taken. The enemy's entire force was found to be massed directly in my front, and in so strong a position that it was not deemed advisable to move on against his immediate front; so the troops were quietly withdrawn at 1 o'clock the following morning. The wheels of the captured piece were cut down, and it was left on the ground. The enemy seized that opportunity to claim a victory, and the Federal commander was so impudent as to dispatch his Government by telegraph tidings to that effect. After withdrawing from the attack my troops were placed in the line first occupied and in the original order.

I now desire to call attention to the report of General Robert E. Lee of the first day, second Bull Run, August 29, 1862. It is as follows:

The next morning, the 29th, the enemy had taken a position to interpose his army between General Jackson and Alexandria, and about 10 a. m. opened with artillery upon the right of Jackson's line. The troops of the latter were disposed in rear of Groveton, along the line of the unfinished branch of the Manassas Gap Railroad, and extended from a point a short distance west of the turnpike toward Sudley Mill, Jackson's division, under Brigadier-General Starke, being on the right; Ewell's, under General Lawton, in the center, and A. P. Hill on the left. The Federal Army was evidently concentrating upon Jackson, with the design of overwhelming him before the arrival of Longstreet. The latter officer left his position, opposite Warrenton Springs, on the 26th, being relieved by General R. H. Anderson's division, and marched to join Jackson. He crossed at Kinson's (Hinson's) Mill in the afternoon and encamped near Orlean that night. The next day he reached the White Plains, his march being retarded by the want of cavalry to ascertain the meaning of certain movements of the enemy from the direction of Warrenton, who seemed to menace the right of his column.

On the 28th, arriving at Thoroughfare Gap, he found the enemy prepared to dispute his progress. General D. R. Jones's division, being ordered to force the passage of the mountain, quickly dislodged the enemy's sharpshooters from the trees and rocks and advanced into the gorge. The enemy held the eastern extremity of the pass in large force, and directed a heavy fire of artillery upon the road leading through it and upon the sides of the mountain. The ground occupied by Jones afforded no opportunity for the employment of artillery. Hood, with two brigades, and Wilcox, with three, were ordered to turn the enemy's right—the former moving over the mountain by a narrow path to the left of the pass, and the latter farther to the north, by Hopewell Pass.

Before these troops reached their destination the enemy advanced and attacked Jones's left, under Brig. Gen. G. T. Anderson. Being vigorously repulsed he withdrew to his position at the eastern end of the gap, from which he kept up an active fire of artillery until dark and then retreated. Generals Jones and Wilcox bivouacked that night east of the mountain, and on the morning of the 29th the whole command resumed the march, the sound of cannon at Manassas announcing that Jackson was already engaged. Longstreet entered the turnpike near Gainesville, and moving down toward Groveton the head of his column came upon the field in rear of the enemy's left, which had already opened with artillery upon Jackson's right, as previously described. He immediately placed some of his batteries in position, but before he could complete his dispositions to attack the enemy withdrew, not, however, without loss from our artillery.

Longstreet took possession [position?] on the right of Jackson, Hood's two brigades, supported by Evans, being deployed across the turnpike and at right angles to it. These troops were supported on the left by three brigades under General Wilcox and by a like force on the right under General Kemper. D. R. Jones's division formed the extreme right of the line, resting on the Manassas Gap Railroad. The cavalry guarded our right and left flanks, that on the right being under General Stuart in person. After the arrival of Longstreet the enemy changed his position, and began to concentrate opposite Jackson's left, opening a brisk artillery fire, which was responded to with effect by some of General A. P. Hill's batteries.

Colonel Walton placed a part of his artillery upon a commanding position between Generals Jackson and Longstreet, by order of the latter, and engaged the enemy vigorously for several hours. Soon afterward General Stuart reported the approach of a large force from the direction of Bristoe Station, threatening Longstreet's right. The brigades under General Wilcox were sent to reenforce General Jones, but no serious attack was made, and after firing a few shots the enemy withdrew. While this demonstration was being made on our right a large force advanced to assail the left of General Jackson's position, occupied by the division of General A. P. Hill. The attack was received by his troops with their accustomed steadiness, and the battle raged with great fury.

The enemy was repeatedly repulsed, but again pressed on the attack with fresh troops. Once he succeeded in penetrating an interval between General Gregg's brigade, on the extreme left, and that of General Thomas, but was quickly driven back with great slaughter by the Fourteenth South Carolina Regiment, then in reserve, and the Forty-ninth Georgia, of Thomas's brigade. The contest was close and obstinate; the combatants sometimes delivered their fire at ten paces. General Gregg, who was most exposed, was re-enforced by Hays's brigade, under General Forno, and successfully and gallantly resisted the attack of the enemy until, the ammunition of his brigade being exhausted and all its field officers but two killed or wounded, it was relieved, after several hours of severe fighting, by Early's brigade and the Eighth Louisiana Regiment.

General Early drove the enemy back with heavy loss and pursued about two hundred yards beyond the line of battle, when he was recalled to the position on the railroad, where Thomas, Bender, and Archer had firmly held their ground against every attack. While the battle was raging on Jackson's left General Longstreet ordered Hood and Evans to advance, but before the order could be obeyed Hood was himself attacked, and his command became at once warmly engaged. General Wilcox was recalled from the right and ordered to advance on Hood's left, and one of Kemper's brigades, under Colonel Hunton, moved forward on his right. The enemy was repulsed by Hood after a severe contest, and fell back, closely followed by our troops. The battle continued until 9 p. m., the enemy retreating until he had reached a strong position, which he held with a large force. The darkness of the night put a stop to the engagement, and our troops remained in their advanced position until early next morning, when they were withdrawn to their first line. One piece of artillery, several stand of colors, and a number of prisoners were captured. Our loss was severe in this engagement. Brigadier-Generals Field and Trimble and Colonel Forno, commanding Hays's brigade, were severely wounded, and several other valuable officers killed or disabled, whose names are mentioned in the accompanying reports.

FITZ-JOHN PORTER'S TESTIMONY.

Fitz-John Porter himself gave testimony before the court of inquiry on General McDowell in Washington city. He appeared before that board and gave testimony as follows (page 1010, board record):

By General MCDOWELL:

Q. Under what relations as to command did you and General McDowell move from Manassas and continue prior to the receipt of General Pope's joint order?

A. I did not know that General McDowell was going from Manassas, and I have no recollection of any relations whatever nor of any understanding.

Q. Was there nothing said about General McDowell being the senior, and of his commanding the whole by virtue of his rank?

A. Nothing that I know of.

Q. What time did you take up your line of march from Manassas Junction for Gainesville?

A. The hour the head of the column left, I presume, was about 10 o'clock; it may have been earlier. Ammunition had been distributed to the men or was directed to be distributed, and the command to be put in motion immediately.

Q. When you received the joint order, where were you personally and where was your command?

A. I was at the head of my column, and a portion of the command or the head of the column was then forming line in front. One regiment as skirmishers was in advance, and also a small party of cavalry which I had as escort. The remainder of the corps was on the road. The head of my column was on the Manassas road to Gainesville at the first stream, as previously described by me.

Q. Please state the order of your divisions, &c., in the column at that time.

A. First, Morell's; next, Sykes's; the other brigade, Sturgis's or Piatt's, I know nothing of, having left it, in compliance with orders from General Pope, at Warrenton Junction, with orders to rejoin as soon as possible.

Q. Where was King's division?

A. I left King's division getting provisions and ammunition near Manassas Junction. I gave, personally, direction to General Hatch, in command, to move up as quickly as possible. I did not see General King at all.

Q. The witness says he received an order from General McDowell, or what he considered an order, when General McDowell first joined him, which order he did not obey; will witness state why he disobeyed what he considered an order?

A. The order I have said I considered an order in connection with his conversation and his taking King's division from me. I therefore did obey it.

Q. What did you understand to be the effect of General McDowell's conversation? Was it that you were to go no farther in the direction of Gainesville than you then were?

A. The conversation was in connection with moving over to the right, which necessarily would prevent an advance.

Q. You state you did not think General McDowell's order (if it was one) a proper one, and that for that reason you continued your movement as if you had not seen the joint order. Is the witness to be understood that this was in obedience of what he has stated to be General McDowell's order?

A. I did not consider that an order at that time, and have tried to convey that impression, but it was an expression or opinion which I might have construed as an order; but when General McDowell left me he gave no reply to my question; and seeing the enemy in my front, I considered myself free to act according to my own judgment until I received notice of the withdrawal of King.

GENERAL POPE'S TESTIMONY REGARDING THE ORDER.

General Pope testifies in reference to this order on page 14:

Q. Will you state what orders, if any, you gave to General Porter, on the 29th of August, in reference to the movements of himself and his men and the grounds upon which those orders were based?

A. In answer to that question it will perhaps be necessary for me to state, at least partially, the condition of things on the afternoon of the 28th and during the night of the 28th and 29th of August, for the reason that the information from the front, upon which the dispositions of the army were made, varied at different periods of the day and night. And it was not until toward daylight in the morning of the 29th that I became thoroughly satisfied of the position of the enemy, and of the necessary movements of the troops to be made in consequence. The orders that I gave to General Porter on the 29th of August, as I remember them, were four. One of them was dated in the night I think; I do not remember the time.

That order I think required him, in consequence of information we had received of the enemy's forces beyond Centreville, to move upon Centreville. But about daylight in the morning I sent General Porter an order to take his own army corps, which was then at Manassas Junction, and which by my order had been re-enforced by the brigade of General Piatt, which had come up there in the command of General Sturgis, and King's division of McDowell's corps, which had withdrawn to Manassas Junction or to that vicinity during the night of the 28th, and move forward in the direction of Gainesville.

An hour and a half later I received a note from General McDowell, whom I had not been able to find until that hour in the morning, requesting that King's division of his corps be not turned over to General Porter, but that he be allowed to conduct it himself. I then sent a joint order to Generals Porter and McDowell, directed to them at Manassas Junction, specifying in detail the movement that I wished to be made by the troops under their command—the withdrawal of King's division of McDowell's corps, which during the greater part of the night I had understood to be on the Warrenton turnpike and west of the troops under Jackson. Their withdrawal to Manassas Junction, I feared, had left open Jackson's retreat in the direction of Thoroughfare Gap, to which point the main portion of the army of Lee was then tending to re-enforce him. I did not desire to pursue Jackson beyond the town of Gainesville, as we could not have done so on account of the want of supplies—rations for the men and forage for the horses.

My order to Generals Porter and McDowell is, therefore, worded that they shall pursue the route to Gainesville until they effect a junction with the forces that are marching upon Gainesville to Centreville—the forces under Heintzelman, Sigel, and Reno; and that when that junction was formed (as I expected it would have been very near to Gainesville) the whole command should halt, it being, as I stated before, not feasible with my command in the condition it was in, on account of supplies, to pursue Jackson's forces farther. During the whole morning the forces under Sigel and Heintzelman had kept up a skirmishing with the rear of Jackson's forces, they retiring in the direction of Gainesville. They were brought to a stand at the little town of Groveton, about eight miles, I think, from Centreville, and perhaps five or six miles from Gainesville. When I rode onto the field of battle, which was about noon (having been delayed at Centreville), I found that the troops had been sharply engaged, and were still confronting each other.

General Sigel reported to me that he needed re-enforcements in the front; that his line was weak, and that his troops required to be withdrawn from the action. I told him (as I did General Heintzelman, who was present on the ground) that I only wished them to maintain their positions, as the corps of McDowell and Porter were then on the march from Manassas Junction toward the enemy's right flank and ought in a very short time to be in such position as to fall upon that portion of his line. I desired them, therefore, only to maintain the positions they occupied. We waited for the arrival of Generals McDowell and Porter. At 4 o'clock, or some little after that time (perhaps at half past 4 in the afternoon), finding that neither McDowell nor Porter had made their appearance on the field, I sent an order to General Porter informing him generally of the condition of things on the field, and stating to him that I desired him to push forward and attack the enemy in flank, and, if possible, in rear, without any delay. This order was sent to General Porter about half past 4 in the afternoon.

Finding that General Porter did not comply with this order, and receiving a dispatch which he sent to Generals McDowell and King, stating to them that he was about to fall back or was falling back to Manassas Junction, and that he did so because he saw clouds of dust, showing that, in his judgment, the enemy was advancing on the road he was occupying, and stating that it appeared to him from the fire of the battle that he had been listening to that our forces were retreating and the enemy advancing, and he had determined to fall back to Manassas Junction, and recommended Generals McDowell and King to send back their trains also—receiving this note, purporting to be from General Porter to Generals McDowell and King, I sent an order to General Porter directing him, immediately upon the receipt of the order, to march his whole command to the field of battle, and to report to me in person for orders, stating to him that I expected him to comply strictly with that order.

I put it in such form (perhaps not entirely courteous) because I had understood General Porter upon two several occasions to have disobeyed the orders that I had sent him. These are all the orders that I issued on that day and night to General Porter. I will state, in addition to what I have already said, that the first of these orders to which I have referred, being subsequently superseded, is not perhaps referred to here. I will also state that the corps of Sigel, Heintzelman, and Reno were formed in line of battle across the Warrenton turnpike, facing to the west, and near the little town of Groveton, or at it, almost at the point where the road from Manassas Junction to Sudley Springs—the Sudley Springs road I think it is called—crosses Warrenton turnpike a little in advance of that road.

(The judge-advocate stated that the first order, referred to by the witness in his answer to the last interrogatory is not referred to in the specifications, being superseded by a subsequent order.)

Q. Excluding from view the first order given on the morning of the 29th of August, and which directed General Porter to fall back upon Centreville, and which, you say, was superseded by a subsequent order, are or are not the other three orders which you have enumerated in your last answer, given to General Porter on that day, the same which are set forth in the second, third, and fourth specifications of the first charge preferred against him? [Handing witness the charges and specifications.]

A. (After examining them.) They are the same orders.

Q. Do you mean to say that the order set forth in the second specification, addressed to Generals McDowell and Porter, is the one that superseded that first order?

A. No, sir. There was one sent to General Porter previous to that time, giving nearly the same directions, and which is referred to in that joint order as having been given an hour and a half before. I repeated that order in detail, because I was not sure that General Porter had received the order referred to there as having been sent to him an hour and a half before.

Q. At what hour in the morning was this order issued, addressed to Generals McDowell and Porter, and set forth in the second specification of the first charge?

A. I do not remember distinctly. I think it was somewhere between 8 and 9 o'clock in the morning.

Q. Was there any engagement then pending?

A. Fighting was then going on along the turnpike that led from Centreville to Warrenton—fighting was going on quite sharply.

Q. Did the march of General Porter's command, as indicated in that order, lead him toward that battle?

A. Yes, sir; it led him toward the flank of the enemy.

Q. What forces had he under his command that morning when that order was issued?

A. He had, or should have had, at Manassas Junction the whole of his own corps, which, from his report to me at Warrenton Junction, I understood to be between 8,500 and 9,000 men. I had added to his command the troops forming the brigade commanded by General Piatt; they were to belong to the division of General Sturgis, and I think they numbered about 3,500 men. Their exact strength I do not know. That was the impression I got from General Sturgis.

Q. What was his entire command?

A. That was his entire command. I understood him to have had from 12,000 to 12,500 men at Manassas Junction.

Q. What was the distance between Manassas Junction and the scene of this engagement of which you speak?

A. Between five and six miles, I think, though I had not been myself over the road.

Q. Do you know the character of the road? Had you passed over it?

A. I had not passed over it.

Q. Did General Porter obey the order addressed to him and General McDowell?

A. I do not know whether he obeyed it; he did not obey it fully; how far he obeyed it I am not able to say; he certainly did not obey the order fully.

Q. If he had obeyed it, would it not have brought him up with the enemy before half past 4 in the evening?

A. Yes, sir.

Q. On your arriving on the battlefield, where was he reported to you to be?

A. I arrived on the battlefield at 12 o'clock, about noon. At 4.30 p. m. nobody on the field knew where General Porter was at all.

Q. Did or did not General Porter obey the second order to which you refer, issued at four and a half o'clock on the 29th of August, directing him to engage the enemy in flank, and, if possible, in rear?

A. He did not, so far as my knowledge of the fact goes.

Q. You have no knowledge of his having made any attack then?

A. I should have known it if he had attacked.

Q. Will you state to the court and describe the condition of the battlefield at that hour and the importance of his obedience of that order to the success of your troops?

A. Late in the afternoon of the 29th, perhaps toward half past 5 or 6 o'clock—about the time that I hoped that General Porter would be in his position and be assaulting the enemy on the flank, and when General McDowell had himself arrived with his corps on the field of battle—I directed an attack to be made on the left of the enemy's line, which was handsomely done by Heintzelman's corps and Reno's corps. The enemy was driven back in all directions and left a large part of the ground with his dead and wounded upon it in our possession. Had General Porter fallen upon the flank of the enemy, as it was hoped, at any time up to 8 o'clock that night, it is my firm conviction that we should have destroyed the army of Jackson.

Q. You have stated that General McDowell obeyed that order so far as to appear upon the battlefield with his command?

A. Yes, sir. He arrived on the battlefield, I think, about 5 o'clock, and immediately pushed forward his corps to the front; the division of General King having a very sharp engagement with the enemy along the Warrenton turnpike, in advance of the position that we had occupied during the day.

Q. To reach the battlefield, had or had not General McDowell as great a distance to march as General Porter?

A. Yes, sir; I should think fully as great.

Q. I believe you have stated the distance from Manassas Junction to the battlefield as about four or five miles?

A. Five or six miles; I am not quite sure; that is my impression.

Q. Is or is not that about the distance which the command of General Porter would have had to have marched to have obeyed your order?

A. It would have had to march less than that. You refer, I suppose, to the order I issued about half past 4 in the afternoon.

Q. Yes, sir.

A. General Porter was reported to me by the aid-de-camp who delivered him that order to be two miles or more from Manassas Junction, in the direction of the field of battle.

Q. In point of fact, did or did not General McDowell, in obeying that order, pass General Porter and his command on the way?

A. I so understood. General McDowell can tell that better than I can myself.

Q. I will ask you now in regard to the last order, that which purports to be dated on the 29th of August, at 8.50 p. m., and is set forth in the fourth specification of the first charge. I will ask you if General Porter obeyed that order or not?

A. General Porter appeared himself on the field the next morning with a portion of his command. Two brigades, however, were not present with him, but were reported by aid-de-camp to me as being at Centreville.

Q. Do you or not know at what point those brigades were separated from his command?

A. I do not.

Q. What brigades were they?

A. One was General Griffin's brigade; the other was General Piatt's brigade. I would say, however, of the latter brigade, that when they reached Centreville and found there was a battle going on in the advance they marched forward to the field and made their appearance on the ground and took part in the action late in the afternoon of the 30th of August. That is, the brigade of General Piatt. They did so without orders to that effect from anybody.

Q. Do you know what became of General Griffin's brigade or where it was during the battle of the 30th of August?

A. Of my own knowledge I do not know, except what was reported to me by aid-de-camp from Centreville, that the brigade was there.

Q. It took no part in the action?

A. No, sir.

Q. Will you state what effect, if any, was produced, or was liable to be produced, on the fortunes of that battle by the absence of that force?

A. A very great effect. I do not know the strength of General Griffin's brigade; but a brigade of four regiments and a battery of artillery, as I understand it. That was utterly withdrawn from the field; took no part in the action. General Piatt's command got up very late; too late to do anything, except, indeed, to contribute to enable us to maintain our ground until the darkness closed the fight. The presence of the other brigade would undoubtedly have been of immense benefit.

Q. Did or did you not regard the withdrawal of these brigades from General Porter's command, under the circumstances, a clear violation of the order issued to him to report with his command on the battlefield?

(Question objected to by a member of the court.)

The room was cleared, and the court proceeded to deliberate with closed doors. After some time the doors were reopened. Whereupon—

The judge-advocate stated the decision of the court to be that the question should be propounded to the witness.

Q. (Repeated.) Did or did you not regard the withdrawal of those brigades from General Porter's command, under the circumstances, a clear violation of the order issued to him to report with his command on the battlefield?

A. Undoubtedly.

Q. Will you state to the court whether or not you had made known to General Porter the position of the enemy's forces, and your plans and intentions so far and so fully that he knew the critical condition of your army and the importance of rapid movements and prompt and energetic action to secure your supplies and to guarantee success?

A. It has been my habit to talk very freely with all officers having large commands in the army which I commanded. How far I informed General Porter I am not now able to say. But I should presume, from my habitual practice and from conversations that I had with him, that he understood pretty fully the condition of the army and the position of the various corps of the army. What I regarded as a necessity it is altogether possible he might have had a different opinion about. Therefore I can not say that he understood the necessity which I understood.

Major-General PORTER:

GENERAL: Immediately upon receipt of this order, the precise hour of which you will acknowledge, you will march your command to the field of battle of today, and report to me in person for orders. You are to understand that you are expected to comply strictly with this order, and to be present on the field within three hours after its reception, or after daybreak to-morrow morning.

GENERAL M'DOWELL TESTIFIES.

General McDowell, in speaking of the order, says (court-martial record, pages 82, 83, and 84):

That was the only order I received from General Pope that day.

Q. How did you regard that order; as placing General Porter in subordination to you, or as indicating that you were both to act independently of each other and each of you in subordination to General Pope?

A. I can not say that at that time the order occupied my mind in connection with the question of subordination or otherwise. In starting out on this road, as I mentioned before, General Porter had started out ahead of me under the order he had himself received from General Pope to move with his corps and one of my divisions on a certain road, and I think for a certain purpose, though I am not certain as to that. At that time I conceived General Porter to be under me. When the joint order reached us we were doing what that joint order directed us to do. That joint order found the troops in the position in which it directed them to be. That joint order gave a discretion to the effect that if any considerable advantages were to be gained by departing from that order it was not to be strictly construed.

I decided that considerable advantages were to be gained by departing from that order, and I did not construe it or strictly carry it out. That order contemplated a line being formed which was to be joined on to a line that was to come up from the east to the west, and have troops on the Gainesville road to attack the flank and rear of the enemy, as I understood it, in moving along on the Gainesville road. This long line of troops—those who were ahead of me, General Porter's corps—coming to a halt, I moved along and rode by his corps to the head of the column. On the way up to the head of the column I received a note from General Buford, addressed to General Ricketts, and to be forwarded to me. This note was addressed primarily to General Ricketts, and then to myself, for I do not think General Buford knew of General Porter's being there at the time he wrote it. I will read the note:

HEADQUARTERS CAVALRY BRIGADE—9.30 a. m.

GENERAL RICKETTS: Seventeen regiments, one battery, five hundred cavalry passed through Gainesville three-quarters of an hour ago on the Centreville road. I think this division should join our forces now engaged at once.

Please forward this.

JOHN BUFORD, Brigadier-General.

This was addressed to General Ricketts, who commanded a division. I do not know whether it went to General Ricketts direct or came to me direct or came to me from General Ricketts. I infer it had reference to that division. General Buford belonged to General Banks's corps, but had been temporarily under my orders the day before, and had gone up to Thoroughfare Gap with Ricketts's division at the time I expected a force of the enemy to come through that gap; and he had fallen back with Ricketts, and at that time, as I understood, occupied a position to our left and front.

Q. Did you or not communicate to General Porter the contents of the note from General Buford, which you have read?

A. Yes, sir; I did communicate it to him.

Q. Where was General Porter's command at that time?

A. On this road leading from Manassas Junction by way of Bethlehem chapel or church toward Gainesville. The rear of his column had passed by Bethlehem chapel, which is at the junction of the Sudley Springs road with the road from Manassas Junction to Gainesville.

Q. Bethlehem church enables you to identify that position?

A. Yes, sir. It is at the junction, or the crossing rather, a little beyond the crossing of the Sudley Springs, or Gum Spring, or old Carolina road, with the road from Manassas Junction to Gainesville. The rear of General Porter's command was beyond that road, the head of it stretching out here in this direction [indicating on the map].

Q. Can you speak with any confidence as to the hour of the day at which you communicated to General Porter the contents of this note from General Buford?

A. It was somewhere before noon, I think. It is impossible for me to keep the hours of the day in my mind on such occasions. I have tried it several times, but have never succeeded except some important things, such as daylight and darkness. It was communicated a short time after it was received.

Q. Did you or not, upon communicating this note, confer with General Porter in reference to his movements and your own?

A. I did.

Q. Will you state fully what occurred in that conference?

A. On passing the head of General Porter's column, which was on the road I have before mentioned, General Porter was in advance of the head of his column, I think, on a slight eminence or knoll or rise of ground, with some of his staff near him.

I rode up to him [Porter]; I saw that he had the same order as myself in the joint order.

Soon after my attention was directed to some skirmishing, I think some dropping shots in front of us. The country in front of the position where General Porter was when I joined him was open for several hundred yards, and near, as I suppose, by seeing the dust coming up above the trees, the Warrenton turnpike, which was covered from view by the woods. How deep those woods were I do not know. It did not seem at that time to be a great distance to that road—the Warrenton turnpike. I had an impression at the time that those skirmishers where engaged with some of the enemy near that road. I rode with General Porter from the position he occupied, eastward, to the right—that is, the column being somewhat west of north, and I going east, made an angle with the line of troops on the road.

The joint order of General Pope was discussed between us—the point to be held in view, of not going so far that we should not be able to get beyond Bull Run that night; that was one point, the road being blocked with General Porter's troops, from where the head of his column was back to Bethlehem church; the sound of battle, which seemed to be at its height on our right toward Groveton; the note of General Buford, indicating the force that had passed through Gainesville, and, as he said, was moving toward Groveton, where the battle was going on, the dust ascending above the trees, seeming to indicate that force to be not a great distance from the head of General Porter's column.

I am speaking now of that force of the enemy referred to by General Buford as passing down the Warrenton turnpike toward Groveton. I understand this note of General Buford to refer to a force of the enemy. The question with me was how soonest within the limit fixed by General Pope this force of ours could be applied against the enemy. General Porter made a remark to me which showed me that he had no question but that the enemy was in his immediate front. I said to him: "You put your force in here, and I will take mine up the Sudley Springs road on the left of the troops engaged at that point with the enemy," or words to that effect. I left General Porter with the belief and understanding that he would put his force in at that point.

I moved back by the shortest road I could find to the head of my own troops, who were near Bethlehem church, and immediately turned them up north on the Sudley Springs road to join General Reynolds's division, which belonged to my command, and which I had directed to co-operate with General Sigel in the movements he (General Sigel) was making at the time I left him in the morning. After seeing the larger part of my troops on the Sudley Springs road I rode forward to the head of the column. I met a messenger from General Pope. I stopped him, and saw that he had an order addressed to General Porter alone. I do not recollect more than the general purport or tenor of that order. It was to the effect that he should throw his corps upon the right flank or rear of the enemy from the position he then occupied. When I say right flank, I do so merely because of my knowledge of the position of the forces, not from any recollection of what that order contained on that point.

Q. Was or was not the messenger to whom you refer who bore that order a staff officer, Capt. Douglass Pope?

A. I do not recollect; I do not think it was.

Q. You did not meet on the way, or take from the hands of any other staff officer on that day, an order from General Pope to General Porter except this one, did you?

A. No, sir; and I did not take this from his hands in one sense. I examined it, gave it back to him, and he went on his way.

Q. Is Captain Pope personally known to you?

A. Yes, sir; he is. My impression is that it was not Captain Pope, but I will not be confident. I do not remember who it was.

Q. I will read you an order which is set forth in specification 1 of charge 2. (The order was read accordingly.) Do you or not recognize that as the order which you saw and read?

A. I can only say that the order that I saw in passing was of that same import. Whether that was the order or not I can not say.

Q. You have said that the accused made an observation to you which showed that he was satisfied that the enemy was in his immediate front; will you state what that observation was?

A. I do not know that I can repeat it exactly, and I do not know that the accused meant exactly what the remark might seem to imply. The observation was to the effect—putting his hand in the direction of the dust rising above the tops of the trees—"We can not go in there anywhere without getting into a fight."

Q. What reply did you make to that remark?

A. I think to this effect: "That is what we came here for."

Q. Were there any obstacles in the way of the advance on the part of General Porter's command upon the flank of the enemy?

A. That depends upon what you would call obstacles. A wood is an obstacle.

Q. I mean insuperable obstacles, in a military sense.

A. I do not think we so regarded it at that time. I did not.

Q. Was or not the battle raging at that time?

A. The battle was raging on our right; that is, if you regard the line of the road from Bethlehem church to Gainesville to be substantially northwest, the battle was raging to the right and east of that line at Groveton.

Q. At what hour did you arrive upon the battlefield with your command and take part in the engagement?

A. I can not say as to hours.

Q. As nearly as you can?

A. It was in the afternoon. I do not know at what time the sun set. I should not be able to fix the hour. It may have been 4 o'clock or 5 o'clock. One of my divisions, which had been the day before up to Thoroughfare, and the day before that on a long march extending to late in the night, and which had started that day, Friday, and had marched since 1 o'clock in the morning, had its rear-guard some distance behind, and that rear-guard did not get up to Manassas until the next morning, though it got within a couple of miles of that place. That was the rear-guard of the corps, in that instance a brigade.

Q. Did you or not afterward see General Porter during that engagement of the 29th.

A. No, sir; I did not.

Q. Did he or not, with his command, take any part in that battle?

A. I do not know of my own knowledge.

Q. What would probably have been the effect upon the fortunes of that battle if, between 5 and 6 o'clock in the afternoon, General Porter with his whole force had thrown himself upon the right wing of the enemy, as directed in this order of 4.30 p. m. of the 29th of August, which has been read to you?

A. It is a mere opinion that you ask?

Q. Yes, sir.

A. I think it would have been decisive in our favor.

Q. Did any considerable portion of the confederate forces attack General Pope's left on Saturday, passing over the ground that General Porter would have passed over had he attacked the enemy's right on Friday?

A. I can not say. They may have done so. I do not know.

Q. All the localities of which you have spoken in your testimony are in the State of Virginia, are they not?

A. Yes, sir.

Examination by the judge-advocate here closed.

Examination by the ACCUSED:

Q. Will you say whether you found General Porter's corps in the position where you expected to find it when you joined him the first time you saw him on the 29th of August?

A. I did not think anything about it; it was not a question with me.

Q. State if, when you found him at the place where the joint order required him to be, you stated to him, or thought, that you found in his front a different state of affairs than you had expected to find.

A. I do not recollect of such a statement.

Q. Try to recollect if, upon that occasion, you did not say to him, in substance, that he was too far in the front, and that the position in which he was was not a position in which to fight a battle, or anything to that effect?

A. I do not recollect.

Q. Are you sure you did not?

A. I have no recollection of any question about that place not being the one to fight a battle. Something may have been said about not going farther toward Gainesville, with reference to falling behind Bull Run that night.

Q. If anything was said in relation to the facility of getting back to Bull Run that night, do you remember whether it was that the accused was too far in the front, or would be too far in the front if he moved farther on?

A. It was hardly a question of going farther on. It was more a question of turning to the right and going against the enemy than passing down the Warrenton turnpike.

Q. You say that something might have been said by the accused about getting back to Bull Run; are you to be understood as saying from recollection that he was told to keep in view his ability to get back to Bull Run?

A. That was the expression in the joint order.

Q. Was it used by you?

A. We referred to that point.

Q. When did you first see the order of which you have spoken in your testimony in chief, that of 4.30 p. m. of the 29th of August, which directed the accused to turn the right flank and attack the enemy in the rear? You have been understood as saying that that was the effect of the joint order. That is not your meaning, is it?

A. It was the effect of the joint order as modified by me, when I left General Porter, so far as I had the power to modify that order, and so far as the understanding with which I left him at the time.

Q. Are you to be understood as saying that before you saw the order to General Porter of 4.30 p. m. of the 29th of August, you, under the discretion you supposed was reposed in you by the joint order to yourself and General Porter, had directed him to attack the enemy's right flank and rear?

A. To that effect, yes, sir; I knew I had that discretion; I did not suppose it. This is the clause under which I supposed, if you prefer that term, I had that discretion: "If any considerable advantages are to be gained by departing from this order, it will not be strictly carried out." That joint order contemplated General Porter's corps and my own to be employed differently from the way I had arranged when I left General Porter, which arrangement was to separate them, leaving him alone on the Gainesville road, while I went up the Sudley Springs road.

Q. Did you under that joint order suppose that you were authorized to take any part of General Porter's command and place it in such a position that it would not have been in the power of his command to reach Bull Run that night or the following morning?

A. That question, if I understand it, did not come up in my mind. The order itself stated that one thing was to be held in view. I will read that part of the order. "One thing must be held in view, that the troops must occupy a position from which they can reach Bull Run to-night or by morning."

Q. Was it your understanding of that joint order of the 29th of August that you could, under that order, direct General Porter to take his command into a position from which that "one thing" could not be accomplished?

A. Certainly not. The order does not say that I should disobey the order, and that is what the question amounts to.

Q. Have you any recollection that after you left the accused on the 29th, and took with you King's division, the accused sent a message to you requesting that that division should be permitted to stay with his command?

A. I received no such message.

Q. Will you say whether, in consequence of a message or otherwise, you sent a message to the accused with your compliments, telling him that you were going to the right and should take King with you, and that he, the accused, should remain where he was for the present, and if he had to fall back to do so on your left?

A. I do not recollect.

Q. Are you able to say that you are certain that you did not send such a message?

Q. That is my impression, that I did not.

Q. What distance did you march with that portion of your command which you took to the battlefield from the point where you left the accused to the point upon the battlefield that you reached with that portion of your command?

A. Somewhere about four miles.

Q. What road did you travel, or did you travel any route known as a road?

A. The troops went by the Sudley Springs road from Bethlehem church.

Q. When you left the accused where you found him on the 29th of August, were you at that time advised that Longstreet's corps or any other corps of the confederate army was marching on to unite with the right of Jackson?

A. I did not know anything about Longstreet's corps or Jackson's corps. I have mentioned before that I received a note from General Buford that seventeen regiments, a battery, and five hundred cavalry were marching from Gainesville upon Groveton. To whom they belonged or to whom they were going was not a matter of which I was informed.

Q. Do you know now whether the information given by General Buford in the note to which you have just referred was correct?

A. I know nothing more now than I knew then; I believed it then to be correct.

Q. Will you state, if the force to which General Buford referred in his note actually passed through Gainesville at thirty minutes past 9 o'clock on the 29th of August, how long you suppose it would have taken to have joined the force in front, which, as we have supposed, was commanded by Jackson?

A. It would depend upon how fast they marched.

Q. I know that.

A. I do not know how fast they marched, so I can not tell.

Q. How long would it have taken them if they had marched as fast as you think they could have marched?

A. I have formed no estimate as to how fast those troops can march.

Q. If those troops, in fact, marched as fast as you have marched your own troops upon any occasion, how long would it have taken them?

A. To go from Gainesville?

Q. Yes, sir.

A. Without stops, without obstacles, formations, or checks of any kind, simply marching along the road?

Q. The question has reference to the country as it is, a distance of, as you say, about four miles.

A. It was somewhere between four and six miles. Troops march readily from two miles to two miles and a half an hour, if there is nothing to prevent them, if they are not disturbed by stopping up the roads with wagons, getting breakfast, or something of that kind.

Q. From your knowledge of the actual condition of the country over which that force was supposed to be passing, can you tell whether there were any obstacles to their march, and, if there were any, what were they?

A. Not having gone over the road, I do not know anything about the obstacles one way or the other.

Q. Do you know what was the average number of the regiments of the confederates—each regiment, I mean?

A. Do you mean the strength of each regiment?

Q. Yes, sir.

A. They consisted of all the way from two hundred, or even as low as one hundred and fifty, up to one thousand or even twelve hundred. I have taken a great deal of pains at different times in examining deserters, scouts, spies, negroes, and prisoners to ascertain that matter, and I find that nothing varies so much as the strength of the regiments on the other side. I have the impression that they were not very strong; that their average was certainly not greater than our own, if it was as great; but that it varies at different times. Before they had their conscription it was very low; after the conscription their regiments were quite full. I have no personal knowledge of the matter at all. I give the sources from which I obtained this estimate.

Q. Have you a knowledge now of what was the actual force of the enemy under the command of Jackson, or did you know that Jackson was in command of the enemy?

A. I did not know that Jackson was there; I have been told that he was there. I do not know what his force was.

Q. And do you know or not what was the amount of the confederate force that was coming up?

A. Coming up when and where?

Q. As stated in the note from General Buford?

A. Nothing more than he told me in that note.

Q. How long had you left the accused on the 29th of August when you saw the order dated at 4.30 p.m. of that day, which was handed you by some officer?

A. I can not tell; I do not recollect. I rode from the head of his column back to the head of my own column, and as rapidly as I could get my troops into position on the other road, and waited until the larger part of them had entered upon that road. Then, on riding by them to go to the head of my column on the Sudley Springs road, I met this messenger. I can not tell how long all this took. I can not fix the time when I left General Porter, and, of course, can not fix the time when I saw this messenger.

Q. How often during this campaign of General Pope in Virginia, of whom you have spoken, had you seen the accused before you saw him on the 28th of August?

A. I had not seen him during that campaign before I saw him on the 29th of August.

Q. How long were you together during that interview of the 29th of August?

A. I can not fix the exact time. We rode together some distance; perhaps a mile; perhaps it may have been more; I do not recollect now.

Q. Was it five, ten, fifteen, or twenty minutes?

A. Yes, sir.

Q. Which?

A. You may put it at fifteen minutes or at twenty minutes.

Q. During that conversation, that interview, did the accused say anything or do anything from which you inferred disloyalty upon his part, or unwillingness to perform his duty under the command of General Pope?

A. No, sir; what he said was the reverse He professed to have but one feeling, which was [illegible] for the success of his country. This was said, I think, in reference to the embarrassment which I have before alluded to, about General King's division going under him, General Porter. It was not a question with me about loyalty or disloyalty; I never think of such things; what I mean is this: I assume everybody to be loyal; my suspicions do not run that way. The suspicion that persons who hold commissions as general officers in the Army are disloyal does not occur to me.

Q. It is not recollected what you said in relation to the embarrassment you speak of growing out of King's division being under General Porter's command. Will you state what it was that you understood him to refer to?

A. The embarrassment was rather on my side than on his; the embarrassment I refer to was this: I came down to take King's division and bring it up along with my other division, that is, with Reynolds's division, then engaged at Groveton. I found it with an order to go under General Porter in another direction; that was what produced the embarrassment. General Porter had nothing to do with that embarrassment; I may say that we were both embarrassed, I at finding one of my divisions under his command and he at finding himself under my command. I do not know that "embarrassment" is the proper word to use; what I meant was that I found things different from what I expected to find.

When I spoke of one of my divisions going under him, he suggested that I was the senior officer as between himself and myself, and that I could take the command of the whole force—his corps and my own force—and we went forward at first in that way before the joint order reached us. I did not go to that place expecting to find General Porter; I went there to find my own division, and I found General Porter there with an order to take one of my divisions under his command. That was not foreseen by the general-in-chief of that army, who was absent, and the matter was solved in the way I have stated, I commanding General Porter's corps and my own division. We then received the joint order, which directed the very things which we had ourselves done. The order was sent by General Pope upon the receipt of a note from me in reference to this matter of my division.

Q. Do you know from what point King's division had marched on that day, or the day before, in order to get to the point where you found it on the 29th of August?

A. It had marched from some point or some place on the Warrenton turnpike between Gainesville and Groveton, where it had an engagement with the enemy, back to Manassas Junction, having left, as I was informed by General Reynolds, about 1 o'clock on the morning of Friday, the 29th of August. It had been ordered the day before to march from Buckland Mills, which is beyond Gainesville, to Manassas Junction. Before it had reached Bethlehem church it was ordered to move on to Centreville, in compliance with orders from General Pope, and had been sent from the road—or I do not know that it was on any road, but from the position where the order reached it—north to the Warrenton turnpike, and thence to move along that pike to Centreville. It had become engaged with the enemy in the evening, and then, as I have before stated, fell back the next morning, starting at 1 o'clock, as I understood from General Reynolds. These facts I learned on the morning of Friday, the 29th, from General Reynolds, who had been personally with King's division; had ridden over to it the night before.

Q. Do you recollect whether you informed the accused at that interview that General Ricketts had been driven from Thoroughfare Gap and that General King had been driven from Gainesville by the enemy?

A. I do not recollect having used such expressions. I recollect having informed him of the fact that General King's division, as I had learned from General Reynolds, had fallen back that morning, and also that General Ricketts's division had fallen back from Thoroughfare Gap. At the time I saw General Porter I had not got up with either of these divisions. I found them after my interview with him.

Q. Did you then know that Generals Ricketts and King had met with the enemy, the one at Thoroughfare Gap and the other at or near Gainesville, and that they were then falling back in consequence of the enemy?

A. I knew they had met the enemy the night before, but at the time I met General Porter I knew nothing of the details of the engagements which they had had with the enemy, nor do I recollect having said to General Porter, or having known, anything about the motives for General King's falling back to Manassas from this position on the road between Gainesville and Groveton; I have an idea that there was a question of supplies connected with the falling back from that point. General Reynolds had told me that he had told General King that he would be alongside of him in the morning. At the time I saw General Porter the whole subject of the engagements of the evening before, except the mere fact there had been engagements, was unknown to me; I mean the details in regard to those engagements.

Q. You have stated, or have been understood to have stated, that when you were with the accused, on the 29th of August, the battle was going on, and you could hear it. Will you state if you heard any other firing than that of artillery?

A. I do not recollect about that now. The noise was very decided and distant from where we were, I should suppose about four miles.

Q. Do you know when the infantry firing on that day commenced; was it, or not, about 4 o'clock?

A. I think it was much earlier than that; I have only one thing to guide me, and that is General Reynold's report; I can refer to that and find out more particularly if it is desired.

The examination by the accused was here closed.

Thereupon the court adjourned to 11 a. m. to-morrow.

The examination of Maj. Gen. Irvin McDowell was then resumed, as follows:

Examination by the COURT:

Q. Did or did not General Porter put his troops in action at the point indicated by you, at the time he said he could not go in anywhere there without getting into a fight?

A. Of my own knowledge I know nothing of what General Porter did after I left him.

Q. In departing from a strict obedience to the joint order of the 29th of August, did you or not extend that departure beyond your own immediate command; that is, did you change the order with respect to General Porter's corps?

A. General Porter and I started out from Manassas with the understanding that under the articles of war applicable to such cases I had the command of the whole force—his own and my own. We each of us received a joint order from General Pope, our then commander-in-chief, which order, while it did not at the time change the relations between General Porter and myself, seemed to imply that those relations were not to be constant, were not to continue.

I decided, under the latitude allowed in that order, that General Porter should post his troops in to the right of where the head of his column then lay, and that I would take mine away from the road on which our two commands then lay up the Sudley Springs road into the battle, in this way dissolving the joint operations of our two corps, and from the moment I left General Porter I considered he was no longer under my immediate control, or under my immediate command, or my direct orders, but that he came under those of our common commander-in-chief, we not then being on the same immediate ground. The article to which I refer is the sixty-second article of war, which directs that when troops happen to meet, the senior officer commands the whole. I considered that article of war to apply up to the time that I left General Porter and broke my command away from his, after which I conceived that his relations were direct to the commander-in-chief; therefore, in answer to the question, to that extent I did interfere with his corps, by separating mine from it, and also by indicating where I thought his corps ought to be applied against the enemy.

Q. Did you report to General Pope any change you had made in the operations of that joint order?

A. No further than by bringing my troops up, reporting to him that they were there, and receiving his orders. His order to General Porter direct met me on my way to join the main army. I did not know at that time that General Pope was at that particular place.

Q. When you saw the order from General Pope to General Porter, the one subsequent to the joint order, did you give or had you given any order to General Porter which would interfere with his obedience to it?

A. None.

Q. The orders you had given to General Porter were not in opposition, or at least not of a different character from the one that came to him from General Pope?

A. They concurred. The arrangements that I supposed to exist when I left General Porter concurred with the order which I afterward saw from General Pope to General Porter. They were to the same effect, except as to details, which General Pope may have given. I gave no details.

Q. Would or would not the presence of General Pope, an officer superior in command to both yourself and General Porter, render inoperative or inapplicable the article of war to which you have referred?

A. It would depend upon his presence, whether it was immediate or not.

Q. We speak of such presence as existed then.

A. We did not so consider it. General Pope, according to the note we received, was at Centreville, which I suppose was some six miles off, and we were going away from him. I will mention further that the day before nearly a similar case happened, when General Sigel and myself were together at Buckland Mills, and I commanded General Sigel. That was done by a direct order from General Pope, before given. Still, it would have been the same if he had not given that order.

Q. Could the accused have engaged in the battle according to your order and according to the subsequent order of General Pope and still have fallen back to Bull Run within the time named in the joint order to yourself and the accused?

A. Yes, sir.

Q. From your knowledge of the nature of the country between General Porter's column and the forces engaged on the 29th of August, was there anything to have prevented the accused from making an attack upon the enemy's right or rear, as directed by General Pope? If so, state what it was.

A. My knowledge of the country is derived principally, first, from having gone over the railroad from Manassas to Gainesville in a car or in a locomotive, which gave me but little idea of it, as I was engaged while going over with matters which prevented my paying attention to the country; next, in marching from Buckland Mills to Gainesville, and from Gainesville east along the Warrenton turnpike for a mile or two—I do not remember the exact distance—then turning off to the right and south, and going across the country to Bethlehem church, and thence to Manassas; then from the fact that General Reynolds's division, which had the lead on the occasion that I refer to, going from Gainesville toward Groveton, had gone farther on that road than I went myself, had turned to the right and gone toward Bethlehem church; and from the fact that General King's division, which had gone on that same road toward Groveton from Gainesville and had turned down south of that road, had again gone north on to that road, had engaged the enemy at a certain place, had fallen back to Manassas from that place, which place I learned was nearly reached, if not quite, on Friday, the day of the battle, by the troops moving from Groveton west, and from the fact that the enemy's force had moved to the south on Saturday and turned our left on that day. These movements by two divisions of my corps, my own movements, and the movements of the enemy gave me the belief that troops could move through the country comprised between the Warrenton turnpike and the Sudley Springs road and the road from Bethlehem church to Gainesville. I will mention further that that country is a mixture of woods, clear ground, and hills, and that it is easy for troops to march without being seen or seeing the enemy.

Q. Does the country which you have just described include that over which General Porter was required to march in obeying the order of 4.30 p. m. from General Pope to attack the enemy?

A. Yes, sir. I would say that I do not know that order by that hour.

Q. Please state the ground on which you formed the opinion that if the accused had attacked the right wing of the rebels, as he was ordered, the battle would have been decisive in our favor.

A. Because on the evening of that day I thought the result was decidedly in our favor, as it was. But, admitting that it was merely equally balanced, I think, and thought, that if the corps of General Porter, reputed one of the best, if not the best, in the service, consisting of between twenty and thirty regiments and some eight batteries, had been added to the efforts made by the others, the result would have been in our favor very decidedly.

Q. Was there anything besides mere advantage in numbers from which that result would have followed?

A. And position.

Q. What particular advantage in position was there?

A. The position in which that force would have been applied, while the main body was so hotly engaged in front, would have been an additional powerful reason for so supposing.

Q. When the accused said to you that he could not go anywhere there without getting into a fight, did he or not appear to be averse to engaging the enemy?

A. I can not say that it made that impression on me, though in giving my answer I took the view that he did so imply and made the remark; but I did not think he was averse to engaging the enemy. I mean by that that that was not seriously a question with me, for when I left him I thought he was going to engage and would engage the enemy.

Q. Had General Porter taken part in the action of August 29 would you not have been likely to have known it?

A. I heard that he did fire some artillery and I did not hear his fire; so that he might have gone into action without my knowing it at that time, because where I was there was a great deal of noise; and the noise that his engagement might have made might have been in a direction which would have confounded it with other noise.

Q. Up to what hour did the battle continue on that day and how long was your command engaged in it.

A. It continued until after dark, or continued to such an hour in the evening when you could see the flash rather than the smoke. Of my command part of King's division was actively engaged to the front for, I should think, something like an hour, it may have been more, before the battle terminated. I speak of the active collision.

GENERAL B. S. ROBERTS'S TESTIMONY.

This is the testimony of General B. S. Roberts (court-martial record, page 50):

Q. What do you know, if anything, in regard to the order issued by General Pope to General Porter, set forth in the third specification of the first charge, bearing date 4.30 p. m. of the 29th August?

A. About 4.30 p. m. of the 29th of August it was supposed by General Pope that General Porter was near the field of battle. The direction in which the first order required him to move would have brought him, as was supposed, near the field of battle before that hour; and I had noticed, in the direction where I knew General Porter was expected, the flash and the smoke from some pieces of artillery, and I inferred it to be artillery from General Porter, who was expected to attack there about that time. But it very soon ceased, and General Pope then wrote another order to General Porter, which, according to my recollection, stated that the direction of his movements would bring him on the enemy's right flank or rear, and that he wished him to press forward and attack immediately.

Q. Is or is not the order to which you now refer the one set forth in the third specification of the first charge?

A. That is the order to which I refer.

Q. Will you state what you know, if anything, in regard to General Porter's having either obeyed or disobeyed those orders?

A. I know that General Porter did not attack as he was directed to attack in that order. I was on that part of the field several times, and was expecting every moment that the attack would be made, and was watching for it with a great deal of anxiety, but it was not made.

Q. Did you continue upon the field until the engagement closed?

A. I was on the field all day and remained on the field all that night.

Q. What were the results of the battle when the night closed in?

A. General Pope's troops when night closed in occupied quite a portion of the field from which the enemy had been driven, and in my opinion, although the battle was not a decisive one, the advantages of the day were in favor of General Pope's army.

Q. In view of what the army had accomplished during the battle of the day in the absence of General Porter's command, what do you suppose would have been the result upon the fortunes of the battle if General Porter had attacked, as ordered by the order of 4.30 p. m., either on the right flank of or the rear of the enemy?

(The accused objected to the question.

The court was thereupon cleared.

Some time after the court was reopened the judge-advocate announced that the court determined that the question shall be answered.

The question was again propounded to the witness, as follows:)

Q. In view of what the army had accomplished during the battle of the day in the absence of General Porter's command, what do you suppose would have been the results upon the fortunes of the battle if General Porter had attacked, as ordered by the order of 4.30 p. m., either on the right flank or the rear of the enemy?

A. I do not doubt at all that it would have resulted in the defeat, if not in the capture, of the main army of the confederates that were on the field at that time.

GENERAL DANIEL BUTTERFIELD'S TESTIMONY.

General Daniel Butterfield, one of his own commanders, testifies as follows:

Q. State whether the point at which you were directed was on the same side of the Manassas Railroad or on the other side from the one upon which you were at the time.

A. The point at which I was directed was across the railroad.

Q. Which direction from the point from which you were moving?

A. To the right, between Groveton and Gainesville; I understood it to strike between Groveton and Gainesville, keeping the movement toward Gainesville, covering this road that led up to Gainesville—a dirt road; and the leaning, if anything, was to be to the right rather than to the left (road marked on the map). And in pursuance of that order I put my brigade in motion, saw that it started out, and then proceeded in advance myself with my staff to make a personal reconnaissance, to look up a position and see whatever difficulties might be in the way. I understood myself not at liberty to bring on this engagement until the division could be deployed behind, unless I could gain a position, finding affairs that I could handle in front of me.

I went out personally with my staff after seeing the head of my column in motion, leaving it in charge of the senior colonel, Lansing, of the Seventeenth New York. I proceeded until I came up in close proximity to the enemy's skirmishers, when one of my staff officers asked me if I proposed to tackle the enemy alone. I said no, I had troops behind; I turned around, and, to my astonishment, saw that my brigade that I had put in motion, and seen well out over toward this dry branch, were not there—had returned and were out of sight. I returned with great rapidity and considerable temper. I did not understand why my command had left me; I came back and found that my brigade had moved off to the right in these woods; which were very thick. There was a little road running along here, and they were out in front of this and had come to a halt. That is, they were back of Dawkin's Branch, back on the high land, on this side of the railroad—south side of the railroad—in the woods. I asked my senior officer what it meant, his returning without any order from me; he said he had received orders directly to return and not to make the advance.

I was in no very pleasant humor about that method of proceeding. He offered as his excuse that the orders had come direct from a staff officer of General Porter or from General Porter himself. I asked where General Porter was. He said he had gone in this direction, in the woods, with General McDowell. I met one of General Porter's staff officers and entered a complaint against his order withdrawing my troops without the order coming from me when I was in front. I received answer that it was a sudden movement in consequence of something that had occurred between General Porter and General McDowell.

Q. You were informed by the staff officer that that was the reason it was given?

A. That that was the reason the order was given. We then were moved a little farther to the right, then returned to the left; then we went up and took position again under same order over on the same ground, and were withdrawn again. These different movements occupied until dark. Then we went into camp rather with the expectation, as I judged from what came to me from General Morell, of an attack from the enemy upon us.

COL. B. F. SMITH'S TESTIMONY.

Col. B. F. Smith testifies:

By the JUDGE-ADVOCATE:

Q. Will you state your position in the military service of the United States?

A. I am a captain of the Sixth Regular Infantry and colonel of the One hundred and twenty-sixth Regiment of Ohio Volunteers.

Q. Will you state to the court whether you were serving with any part of the Army of Virginia, commanded by Major-General Pope, on the days of the 27th, 28th, 29th, and 30th of August last; and, if so, in what brigade and division?

A. I was serving in Colonel Chapman's brigade, of General Sykes's division.

Q. In what direction did that brigade march on Friday, the 29th of August last?

A. We had marched from Fredericksburg by way of Warrenton Junction, and arrived at Manassas Junction, I think, on the 29th of August, the day before the battle of Bull Run. We arrived exactly at the place where the railroad had been destroyed; the wreck of the train was there, and there we halted. Late in the day, in the morning, we retraced our steps to the branch railroad running, I think, toward Gainesville or Manassas Gap, and followed the direction of that road some few miles. We then halted on some rising ground, where we could see the country beyond, over the woods, the tops of the trees. It was a wooded country. While we were halted there a battery of the rebels opened upon us, but fired some three or four shells only, I think; there may have been a half a dozen. Our brigade then marched into a field and the regiments were placed in order of battle. I recollect that General Morell's division was in our advance, on the lower ground.

Some of our pieces replied to this rebel battery. I received permission from the commanding officer of my regiment to go to a more elevated piece of ground, a few rods distant, and while there I saw our batteries reply. A short time afterward, probably a half an hour, we received orders to retrace our steps and march back in the direction we had come. We then marched back to near Manassas Junction, and camped in the woods alongside this branch railroad I have mentioned. That night I was placed on duty as the field officer of the pickets of Sykes's division. About daybreak the pickets were called in, and we marched toward the battlefield of Bull Run, and were engaged in that battle.

Q. What was the effect of the reply of your guns to this attack of the rebel battery?

A. It seemed to silence that battery, and it withdrew. At least that was the impression I had at the time.

Q. What amount of infantry force, if any, did there seem to be supporting this rebel battery?

A. I did not see them.

Q. Before you received orders to fall back and retrace your steps along this road, had or had not this rebel battery been completely silenced?

A. I think it had been.

Q. Were there not at that time clouds of dust in view showing an advance of the enemy?

A. Clouds of dust were distinctly visible farther over beyond the trees. Whether there were troops advancing or whether they were moving in another direction I could not tell. I could see distinctly the clouds of dust, as if there was a large body of troops moving.

Q. Did you or not see the accused (General Porter) at the head of the column on that day?

A. No, sir; I do not recollect of seeing General Porter at all that day.

TESTIMONY OF SOLOMON THOMAS.

Solomon Thomas, called by the recorder, being duly sworn, testified as follows:

Direct examination:

Q. Where were you on August 29, 1862?

A. With General Fitz-John Porter's corps, Eighteenth Massachusetts, Martindale's brigade, Morell's division.

Q. Do you recollect being at Manassas Junction on that day?

A. I do.

Q. Did you move off on the Gainesville road?

A. We moved up on the line of the railroad. We moved more in a direct line infront, though we were intending to move to the right.

Q. How far upon that road did your regiment go?

A. We went upon that road nearly to a small creek, or what had been originally a small creek; it was dry, or nearly so, at that time.

Q. What did you do there?

A. We then halted, and the Thirteenth New York, or a part of it, which was thrown out as skirmishers—a battery was planted in our front a little to our right—in the fields, and as the skirmishers of the Thirteenth advanced we were deployed to the right into the woods; our right rested in the woods. We halted and lay down. This was probably 10 o'clock in the morning I should say; might have been a little later.

Q. How long did you remain there?

A. We remained in that position—I should say it was half past 4 when we were called to attention and right-about-face, and moved out from that position, left in front, upon the same road that we moved down on in the morning. I don't know the distance, but we had been marching some time.

Q. Back toward Manassas Junction?

A. Yes, toward Manassas Junction; when an officer came riding from the Manassas Junction way, having a dispatch, and rode up to General Porter and handed him the dispatch. Then we were commanded to halt; we did. General Porter dismounted, and sat down by the side of the road and leaned his back against a tree—quite a large tree—and read the dispatch, and went up and remounted and called us to attention and right-about-face. We marched back upon the same road we had come on, moving then right in front, until we came near the position of the road where we had moved into the woods on the right in the morning. We then moved out to the left into an open field. The artillery was brought into the field and parked in our front. We were formed in line, and ordered to stack arms; we did so. Orders were received that there should be no fires made to make any coffee; that we were to remain perfectly quiet. The adjutant received orders that if there were any orders received during the night he should deliver those orders to the commander of each regiment in person, so there should be no loud words spoken; and we were to remain. Me and some of my comrades spread our blankets and were preparing to lie down for the night. As we sat down, before we got ready to lie down, we heard upon our right a shout, which we knew was a charge from the shout; then we heard musketry discharges.

Q. What did you understand at that time?

A. I felt at that time that we were expected to charge on the rear and flank in conjunction with what was going on in front.

Q. About what time of the day, in reference to sunset, was it that you were halted on your way back to Manassas Junction and that an officer came up with a dispatch?

A. I should judge from the position of the sun it must have been somewhere from 5 to half past 5 o'clock.

Q. During the day did you hear any indications of a battle going on; if so, what were they and where were they?

A. In our immediate front we heard an occasional discharge of musketry, and, in fact, there were pieces of railroad iron fired from a rebel battery right over our right and two pieces lodged in the rear of where I lay, probably forty feet in our rear. Some of the boys went and dug them up, and one of them was eighteen inches in length, the other was about fifteen. We thought of bringing them home, but they were rather heavy, so we left them on the field. Then, while we were laying there, beside that we heard, upon our right, distant firing all day, but not continuous; there were intervals that we could hear artillery distinctly.

Q. On the 27th of August where were you?

A. We were moving on the Warrenton road toward Bristoe Station. I should think that we were encamped on that night some six to eight miles from Bristoe Station. We went in before sundown; probably the sun was an hour or an hour and a half high when we halted there.

Q. When did you move from there?

A. I was corporal of the guard that night, and was ordered to wake the men at 1 o'clock, which I did, and we were formed and moved out from our camp immediately after 1 o'clock.

TESTIMONY OF LEWIS B. CARRICO.

Lewis B. Carrico, who resides on the battle-ground, called by Government, testified as follows (board's record, page 982):

Q. Where do you reside?

A. Prince William County, Virginia.

Q. Where did you reside on the 29th of August, 1862?

A. Where I now reside, very near the Manassas Gap Railroad.

Q. Were you there on that day?

A. I was.

Q. Up to what hour in the day did you remain there?

A. I was there until very late Friday evening.

Q. During that day did you see any confederate forces? If so, where?

A. I saw some cavalry scouts during that day, and in the evening there was a battery firing some seventy-five or eighty yards back of my house, just west of my house, and an officer came there and told me I was in danger, and to take my family and go back of the line.

Q. Where did you go then?

A. I went up the road about a mile to a farm owned now by Major Nutt.

Q. Towards Gainesville?

A. Between there and Gainesville.

Q. Did you meet any confederate force on that trip? If so, about where?

A. I saw them a little beyond Hampton Cole's, a very small number. They were sitting down on the side of the railroad, and their battery, that was planted at the back of my house; that opened upon the Federal troops directly after I passed it; and when I got up there against them they got up and took shelter on the embankment of the railroad.

Q. Did you at that time see any troops to the south of the railroad?

A. None at all, except a little picket force that was a little to the south of the railroad, just above there; a small picket force.

Q. Did any confederate force pass to the east of your house during the day? If so, in what direction did they go?

A. I saw none pass to the eastward. I saw some shelling from the back of what is called the Britt farm, and a disabled Federal wagon at the mouth of a lane called Compton's lane.

Q. About what time in the day was that?

A. I could hardly say; 12 or 1 o'clock.

* * * * * * *

Q. What do you mean by the expression "evening?"

A. I mean something like 3 or 4 o'clock; somewhere thereabouts.

Q. How do you fix the time?

A. I fix the time by having to leave home and having to go the small distance I did go.

* * * * * * *

Q. What room did you stay in?

A. I was all over the house; very often upstairs, looking out of the window.

Q. Which way?

A. Toward Dawkin's Branch.

Q. What time was the cannon posted there?

A. Possibly 4 o'clock.

Q. You are positive about that?

A. I am not positive; but according to the best of my judgment it was probably as late as 4.

Q. Was it earlier or later than 4?
A. It was not earlier, I do not think; not earlier than 3, I am very sure.
* * * * * * *
Q. Were there any soldiers of any description about your house except the battery?
A. On Friday there was a Federal force in Mr. Lewis's field, to the east of my house.
Q. Where was Lewis's field?
A. Within three hundred or four hundred yards to the east of my house.
Q. Were there any about your house?
A. Yes; there were some of the Federal forces; two men that I had had some acquaintance with, who were in my house when this wagon was disabled at the end of Compton's lane.
* * * * * * *
Q. About where is the place where you carried your family?
A. Immediately at the Manassas Railroad, one mile past Hampton Cole's.
Q. You say you did not meet any considerable body of the confederate force on your way there?
A. Yes, I do say it; and I saw no considerable body there, as I stated to you and General Porter, if he was with you, until I got home next morning, about sunup. They came there to my house and destroyed a great deal.

B. S. WHITE'S TESTIMONY.

B. S. White, on August 27, 1862, held the position of major in the assistant inspector-general's department of the confederate Maj. Gen. J. E. B. Stuart's staff (board's record, page 983):

Q. That morning, after Major Patrick had those orders to charge, what did you do?
A. The enemy were driven away.
Q. Then what was the next event that transpired?
A. We moved off across the country to find out what had become of Longstreet's corps. We moved off in this way toward Thoroughfare Gap.
Q. Did you find General Longstreet's column or corps advancing?
A. We did, between Hay Market and Gainesville.
Q. What did General Stuart then do?
A. General Stuart then threw his command on Longstreet's right and moved down with his right flank in the direction of Bristoe to Manassas Junction.
Q. What did you then observe?
A. We took the road leading directly down the Manassas Gap Railroad; there is a road running parallel with it.
Q. How far down did you go?
A. General Stuart threw his command on the right of Longstreet, and passed down the Manassas Gap Railroad to about that point [west of Hampton Cole's; point marked "W"].
Q. Then what did you do?
A. We discovered a column in our front—discovered a force in our front coming from the direction of Manassas Junction to Bristoe.
Q. What sort of a point was that where you discovered this column coming, so far as observation is concerned?
A. It was a good point for observation; a high position, elevated ground. We could see Thoroughfare Gap and Gainesville and all the sorrounding country.
* * * * * * *
Q. When you got back to General Stuart, where was he?
A. Where I left him, on that hill.
Q. At that time where was General Longstreet's command?
A. They had come down and were forming here. [Witness indicates a point back westerly of Pageland lane.]
Q. About what time of day was it that this affair occured at Sudley Springs; before you and General Stuart started to cross the country toward Thoroughfare Gap?
A. Early in the morning.
Q. At what would you fix the time?
A. I suppose 8 or 9 o'clock in the morning.
Q. Did you remain at this point with General Stuart after you got back on this hill?
A. I did.
Q. What became of this column of troops that you saw advancing?
A. I don't know what became of them; they disappeared from our front.
Q. Do you know of any other position being taken up by General Longstreet's command during the day in advance of the position that you have indicated? If so, when and where? You indicated a position back of Pageland lane.
A. I do not.
Q. How long were you down in the neighborhood of this hill which you have marked with a cross during that day; up to what time?
A. We were down there the greater part of the day; we were on the extreme right all the time afterward. The cavalry remained on the extreme right until the morning of the 30th.
Q. What time do you think you met General Longstreet between Hay Market and Gainesville?
A. It was about 11 o'clock.
Q. Was General Longstreet at the head of his column?
A. He was near the head of the column.
Q. Were there many troops in front of his command?
A. Not many.
Q. Were they advancing?
A. They were.
Q. Rapidly?
A. They were marching at an ordinary pace.
Q. State the style of march; how many front?
A. They were marching in column.
Q. How many front?
A. Marching in column of regiments, perhaps four abreast.
Q. Were they in close order?
A. Yes, sir.
Q. Would you swear it was 11 o'clock?
A. It was about 11 o'clock.
Q. You are confident that none of Longstreet's forces had passed through Gainesville before 11 o'clock?
A. I don't think they had.
Q. How did they appear to you; to be on top of a hill, or in a depression, or in woods, or by woods, or in an open field?
A. The position we occupied was a commanding one, of course. They were in a depressed situation from the position we occupied. We were on this hill and there were here. [Witness indicates.]
Q. In column, marching along the Manassas Gap Railroad?
A. Yes, sir.
Q. Did you see the Manassas Gap Railroad right in their vicinity?
A. The road they were marching on was parallel to the Manassas Gap Railroad.
Q. When you came back to that position did you see any Federal troops anywhere?
A. Yes. There were Federal troops off here [Indicating the lines of the regiments.]
Q. When you came back did you see Longstreet's command?
A. I saw Longstreet's command on my way back from General Stuart; they came and formed in here. [Pageland lane.]
Q. Did you remain in that position all day?
A. We were there most all day. Do you mean me individually?
Q. Yes.
A. No. I was backward and forward several times during the day. I went with messages from Stuart to Lee and Longstreet and to Jackson.
Q. Then during that whole day you were in the vicinity of Longstreet's troops and knew of their position?
A. Yes; we were on his right.
Q. What time do you put it that you came back from General Jackson after being sent over by General Stuart?
A. Half past 2 or 3 o'clock.
Q. Do you know of any action that occurred along the Warrenton pike—infantry?
A. I heard firing.
Q. What time was that?
A. In the evening.
Q. About what time?
A. General Jackson's command was engaged all the time.
Q. Was Hood's command engaged at all?
A. That evening they were.
Q. What time that evening?
A. I suppose about 3 o'clock in the evening they were engaged; 2.30 to 3 o'clock.
Q. Were they engaged vigorously?
A. Quite a severe fight.
Q. Describe the action so far as you observed it?
A. I was not present. I didn't see it. I heard the firing; it lasted, I suppose, half to three-quarters of an hour.
Q. Was it very vigorous?
A. It was a very sharp fight.
Q. Was that the only occasion in which Hood's command was engaged that day to your knowledge?
A. To my knowledge that is the only one until next morning.
Q. You say it was 3 o'clock?
A. Between 2 and 3 o'clock. It may have been after 3. It was after he had got in position.
Q. How long after he got in position?
A. He got in position, I suppose, about 12 or 1 o'clock. This engagement took place about 2.30, or maybe 3 or 3.30.
Q. Was it as late as 5?
A. I can't recollect. I don't think it was.
Q. What is your recollection about the time that that engagement took place upon the Warrenton turnpike by Hood's troops?
A. I was away on the right. Of course there was fighting on the line. I don't know what troops were engaged, but I know that Hood's troops had a fight there that evening. I don't know whether it was 3 or 3.30; it may have been 5 o'clock. I know they had a sharp fight there, and I heard it.
* * * * * * *
Q. Assuming Hood's division to be in the place you have indicated by W^2, and suppose there had been a battery placed on this rise of ground marked C, would that have fulfilled what you understood was the position of a battery firing off in the direction of "W^3?"
A. Yes. Just beyond a small branch there was a hill, a very fine position for artillery, and it was firing off in the direction of "W^3." The highest ground of that hill is where that battery was placed, or rather a park of artillery; nineteen or twenty of our guns were in that position.
Q. Suppose that the column of troops that you saw on that morning, or on the noon of Friday, August 29, had been coming up the dirt road from Manassas Junction to Gainesville and was in the neighborhood of Dawkin's Run, would that have been the position of the column that you saw according to the map?
(Objected to as leading.)
A. The troops we saw approaching came more from the direction of Bristoe than from Manassas.
Q. Therefore what road indicated on this map best fulfills the direction from which you saw those troops coming?
(Objected to as leading.)
A. They were approaching more in the direction from Bristoe than from Manassas.
Q. Therefore what road best of the roads you see on this map shows the direction from which you saw those troops coming? [Map explained to the witness.] Now, where were the Federal troops?
A. I remarked a while ago that the column that was advancing advanced more from the direction of Bristoe than Manassas.
Q. Here is Bristoe and there is Manassas. Now, where do you put it, what direction? Make a line indicating the direction.
A. They must have come in here or in here.
Q. Then you are not positive that you saw them on the Manassas Gap Railroad?
A. I never said I saw the Manassas Gap Railroad. I said I saw them on the road running parallel with the Manassas Gap Railroad. They were not marching on the railroad. They were marching on a road that I supposed, from the position I occupied, was a line parallel with the Manassas Gap Railroad; they may have been on this road [from Gainesville to Stuart's Hill] and took position there [at 4.] From that position we saw the columns coming up, but they were not on the railroad.
* * * * * * *
Q. Did you see the railroad in conjunction with seeing them, or at the same time in connection with seeing them?
A. I could not say. I was not looking for railroads. I was looking for troops. I don't recollect now whether I saw the railroad or not, because my attention was directed to more important matters.
Q. Would you swear that those troops, Bristoe being here and Manassas there—that those troops were not on this road to Milford?
A. No; they were not in that direction at all. They were off here [witness indicates in the direction of the Manassas and Gainesville dirt road].
Q. Had you been to Bristoe that day?
A. No, sir; we had been there the day before.
Q. How do you know where Bristoe was?
A. Because I have been there a thousand times since.
Q. Could you see it from that position?
A. I don't know that you could see the station, but I knew the general direction and had been all over that country time and again.
Q. Did you see any of the shot fired fall near that column?
A. Yes, sir.
Q. What did the column do?
A. The column seemed to retire.
Q. Did you see them retire?
A. Yes; I saw them give back.
Q. How did they retire?
A. You know how troops retire. They gave back into a piece of woods; and just at that time I went off with a message, as I stated before—went off with a message to General Jackson from General Stuart.

By Mr. MALTBY:

Q. You say that the artillery were stationed on the right of Jackson at the highest point on the ridge. Now, did Longstreet's line bend back from the line of Jackson, or did they make an angle more nearly approaching right angles?

A. I had nothing to do with Longstreet's position.

Q. But you saw it?

A. I passed in his rear several times.

Q. Take a pencil and mark Longstreet's line.

A. There was an angle formed between Jackson and Longstreet's line; Jackson's line ran along here. [Witness indicates.]

Q. Draw it in pencil. There is the Independent line of the Manassas Gap Railroad. [Indicated to the witness.]

A. Jackson's artillery was posted on this stony ridge.

Q. Draw a line where the nineteen or twenty guns were posted.

A. I had no connection with Longstreet's command or Jackson's. I passed in the rear of both lines several times with messages. I did not inspect their lines. I just speak from general recollection of their lines.

Q. Then you do not recollect precisely where any one line was?

A. I do; yes. I have indicated there is Jackson's line; his artillery was posted on this range of hills; General Longstreet formed here. [Witness indicates the different positions.] Their lines did not join; there was an angle there, an opening, and there is where the battery of artillery was.

Q. Draw Jackson's line and the cannon of Longstreet.

A. I have indicated it. [Witness indicates the line of the Independent line of the Manassas Gap Railroad.] His line did not go down that far [indicating Sudley church]; it went to about there.

Q. Where do you run Jackson's line?

A. Jackson's line ran about in this direction. [Marked with a pencil.] That is about the direction of Jackson's line.

(The line indicated by the witness by means of a pencil is followed in ink by the recorder.)

Q. Where were these eighteen or twenty guns of Jackson's?

A. That did not have reference to Jackson's command; Jackson's artillery was posted on this range of hills back of his line of battle. This park of artillery is where W^5 is and W^6.

Q. You still say that Hood occupied that position, and that his right was where + and + + are?

A. There is where Hood was; right there.

REV. JOHN LANDSTREET'S EVIDENCE.

The evidence of Rev. John Landstreet (board's record, 996). He was a minister, called in both armies a chaplain; he was a chaplain in the confederate service belonging to this cavalry command. His residence is in Baltimore County, Maryland:

Q. What did you do or see there which has impressed itself upon your attention?

A. There was considerable dust in this direction [witness indicates] indicating a body of troops; there was considerable down in this direction somewhere. At any rate, General Stuart ordered some of the Fifth Cavalry to go out and cut brush and drag it along the road.

Q. (By Mr. MALTBY.) Did you hear the order?

A. Yes; to drag the brush along the Gainesville road, so as to serve as a feint and to convey the impression that there was a force coming down the Gainesville road. It was given, I distinctly recollect, to a member of the Fifth Virginia Cavalry.

Q. Who was the colonel of that regiment?

A. T. L. Rosser. We frequently after that conversed about it.

Q. What was done after that while you were in the neighborhood of Hampton Cole's?

A. There was some firing from this position [+²] in the direction of this approaching force; and from my recollection of it the force was a considerable distance down. If three inches indicate a mile here, and if it was a life and death case, I would say that it was inside of a mile that they were off.

Q. You should say it was a distance of about a mile?

A. I should say it was inside of a mile. It was not beyond a mile, certainly. [Witness indicates from Hampton Cole's.] There were several shots fired from this point in the direction down there.

Q. In what direction?

A. That depends entirely upon where the man was standing at the time and what he was looking at. I did not charge my mind much with this Manassas Gap Railroad, though I knew it very well. But I would not say whether it was here or there [whether right or left]. It was pretty much in line with this railroad [Manassas Gap Railroad].

Q. What became of this column of troops upon those shots being fired?

A. I did not see them.

Q. They disappeared from your sight?

A. Yes, sir.

Q. Did they remain in the position they were in when they were fired upon?

A. No, sir. When my attention was directed to them they were where I could see the column, or a considerable portion of it; and they were marching in good order, close column.

Q. Do you recollect how many shots were fired at them?

A. I do not; but I am positive I didn't hear half a dozen; I know I did not.

Q. How long did you remain in that position in the neighborhood of Hampton Cole's that day?

A. I was sent off after that to hunt up the First Virginia Cavalry, not very far from there at that time; and I paid very little attention, indeed, from that time. When Longstreet came and formed there, General Jackson being in position, I came out from the command, and I was not in any of the fight at all except in the cavalry movements—skirmishing.

Q. Where did General Longstreet form his command?

A. It seems to me I struck a portion of Hood's command on General Longstreet's left before I got anywhere in the direction of Longstreet's right. They seemed to come in a good ways in the direction of General Longstreet's left, if they were not immediately on his flank.

Q. About where would you put them, north of the pike, across the pike, or south of the pike?

A. Which?

Q. Hood's division of that command?

A. From my recollection there was a portion of Longstreet's command that crossed the Manassas Gap Railroad [the witness marks a point with a pen]; crossed it, am sure, some distance, but how far I don't know. I do not think it was far. It extended, I think, up in this way. Hood's was in front of it; part of it in the body of the woods. My impression is that Hood came in a little in advance of Longstreet's left. I am certain that I came to Hood before I came to Longstreet's force in position. [Marked "Longstreet" and "Hood."]

Q. What time of day was that that they were all in position? * * *

A. It is my recollection that it was somewhere between 2 and 3 o'clock.

Q. Do you know whether or not either Hood or the remainder of Longstreet's command were in advance to the east of Pageland lane at any time that day?

A. I do not.

Q. Was your position such that you could see the location of Hood and Longstreet during the afternoon?

A. Oh, yes; I could go where I pleased.

Q. How long did this action of that day continue?

A. The firing, to my recollection, continued up to about dark. It was near dusk. At times it was heavier than at others, and at times severer than I ever heard it in any engagement.

Q. What were your opportunities during that day of knowing the fact, provided General Hood had advanced east of Pageland lane? [Points of compass upon the map explained to the witness.]

A. My answer is, that if I had a desire to know it, I could have known it very easily; but I didn't think about it at all. It was not in my mind. I was well acquainted with Hood and his command, and that made the impression upon me in coming to this point. I came from the direction where Jackson's command was, and passed this heavy battery at the time, though I think there were a few more guns there than I have heard stated to-day.

Q. In which direction, as you stood at Hampton Cole's facing the enemy, was Longstreet's command from you, with reference to your own person—to the left, right, front, or rear?

A. Looking down in the direction from which the enemy were coming, a portion of it was in my rear and a portion of it was not.

Q. At the time you arrived there at Hampton Cole's?

A. No, sir. They did not get in this position at the time I arrived at Hampton Cole's. I arrived at Hampton Cole's about 10 or 11 in the morning.

Q. Where were the guns stationed in reference to Hampton Cole's?

A. The guns were pointed down a little to the left of the railroad.

Q. How near were you to the guns?

A. Right up by them.

Q. How much of that column did you see?

A. I could not say how many regiments there were. The column indicated that it was the head of a considerable body of men.

Q. What was that indication?

A. They were marching in close column.

Q. Would not a regiment march in close column?

A. Might not in as close column as that, and in good order. My judgment in the matter was that it was the advance of a large army.

Q. Did you see a quarter of a mile of that column?

A. No, sir.

Q. An eighth of a mile?

A. That is somewhere near it.

Q. Was it marching upon a plain?

A. I can not tell you that. It did not appear to me as if they were coming up a hill nor as if they were coming down a hill.

Q. As if they were marching upon a plain?

A. It looked pretty much as if they were on a level.

Q. Can you state whether any bushes were to their right or left or trees?

A. No; I could not. My impression is that the country was pretty well open left and right of where I first saw them.

Q. Did you see them in flank at all?

A. No, sir.

Q. I don't know whether it is a military expression or not.

A. Do you mean did I see the rear of the enemy?

Q. No, sir; I mean the side of the column as it advanced.

A. No, sir; it was the shortest space of time before the firing commenced here at Hampton Cole's before I saw them no more.

Q. Was this column to your right or left?

A. From the position I was in, it was almost directly in my front. I think if I had advanced in a straight line I would have come up face to face with them. I was a little to the right of Hampton Cole's and looking right straight down.

Q. Did you see troops in the neighborhood of the Leachman house?

A. I knew there were troops there, but how I knew it I am not now prepared to say.

Q. How did they appear? Did they march out of sight in the rear or did they retire in the bushes?

A. If you will let me use an illustration: It was a very common thing for a column of cavalry to advance, and one shot into a column of cavalry would make them disappear in the woods and that was the end of it. I never saw a column that got out of sight quicker than this column did.

Q. How long did you remain at Hampton Cole's?

A. I suppose I staid there until—well, it was just after the brush expedition; shortly after that; and I went in the direction of Gainesville from there. I don't know but what I went right across to Gainesville; I think I did.

Q. How did you go?

A. I struck out on this Gainesville road that I had traveled hundreds of times towards Gainesville; pretty much along the line of the railroad.

Q. How long did you say that it was that you were at Hampton Cole's?

A. I said I was there until after 12 o'clock.

Q. Were you there about an hour in all?

A. I was there more than an hour; I was there fully an hour and a half.

Q. You passed along the Manassas Gap Railroad?

A. I passed along the Gainesville turnpike.

Q. What did you see on your route in the shape of troops?

A. I met some of, I think, Longstreet's forces on the Warrenton pike.

Q. Did you see any of Longstreet's troops?

A. I have no recollection of seeing them.

Q. Were there any troops marching on that turnpike?

A. There may have been. I did not pay any attention to it.

Q. How long did you stay away in the direction of Gainesville?

A. I staid away until about 3 or half past 3 o'clock, I think.

Q. Then what did you do?

A. Then I returned to the First Regiment of Virginia Cavalry.

Q. Where was that?

A. If my recollection serves, it was between Hampton Cole's and Sudley.

Q. Was that the detachment that had been sent off to drag brush there that day?

A. No, sir. That was the Fifth Virginia Cavalry, commanded by Colonel Rosser.

Q. When did you first see the place where Longstreet's line was formed after you went off towards Gainesville?

A. I saw it for the first time a little after 3 o'clock.

Q. Was it then formed?

A. Yes; it was then formed in good order.

Q. All along the whole line?

A. Well, I did not ride along the whole line.

Q. Where were you?

A. I could not tell you how it was along the whole line. I rode in along here and I passed on out here. I passed around on Longstreet's left, and I found Hood's division in front of Longstreet, and rather extending beyond his left. [Witness indicates near Pageland lane.]

Q. Then what did you strike?

A. I didn't know what the name of the road was. I made for Sudley neighborhood, and there I met a portion of the First Virginia.

Q. On Hood's left or Longstreet's left did you find artillery?

A. Yes, sir.

Q. Did Hood's line extend quite up to the artillery?

A. No, sir; it did not. There was a gap.

Q. How much of a gap?

A. I don't recollect how much it was, but it was a considerable gap.

Q. Half a mile?
A. I don't know whether it was that much, but it was a considerable gap, a considerable elevation.
Q. Do you know where that artillery was in reference to the Browner or Douglas house?
A. No, sir; I know nothing about houses there.
Q. Were the batteries in advance of Hood's line?
A. Well, rather.
Q. Much?
A. No, sir; they were rather a little in advance of his left.
Q. Was the distance between Hood's left and the right of the artillery as great as the gap?
A. According to my recollection, the battery was pretty nearly in the center of the gap.
Q. Did the line of the battery run in the same direction that Hood's line ran or did Hood's line form an angle with the battery?
A. It was at an angle.
Q. Was the right of the battery much in advance of Hood's left?
A. No, sir; it was not much in advance, but still it was in advance.
Q. Was it a half mile in advance?
A. Oh, no.
Q. Was it a quarter of a mile?
A. No, sir; I don't think it was that.
Q. Or an eighth?
A. I don't think it was that. It was a very short distance in advance. I would not say positively that it was in advance at all.

* * * * * * *

Q. About what time of day did you first see Longstreet's troops in position after that?
A. I saw them in position, I think, somewhere about 3 o'clock, or a little after 3, or a little before 3.

GENERAL ROBERT C. SCHENCK'S TESTIMONY.

Robert C. Schenck, called by the recorder, and examined in the city of Baltimore, October 22, 1878 (present, the recorder, and Mr. Maltby, of counsel for the petitioner), being duly sworn, testified as follows:

Q. Where do you reside?
A. Dayton, Ohio; temporarily residing in Washington, D. C.
Q. What rank and command did you hold in the military service of the United States on the 29th August, 1862?
A. Brigadier-general of volunteers, commanding the First Division, Sigel's corps.
Q. Finally you left the service with what rank?
A. Major-general. I was promoted, to take effect August 30, 1862.
Q. In moving up to this position, did you have, in the morning of the 29th August, any enemy in front of you?
A. None that we felt. Throwing forward skirmishers and supposing the enemy was present somewhere, pretty early in the day a force of the enemy was developed upon this ridge where there were a number of batteries placed to our right; that would be to the north of the turnpike road.
Q. Do you recollect passing that lane, Lewis lane No. 1?
A. I have a very indistinct impression of it. I have a remembrance floating in my mind having crossed some road which was not the turnpike, but I don't recall it distinctly.
Q. At what time of the day did you reach your farthest point in advance?
A. I think it must have been somewhere about the middle of the day; perhaps a little earlier than the middle of the day.
Q. Did you see General Reynolds's divisions during that day?
A. No; but I understood he was off on my left.
Q. Did you see General Reynolds himself during the morning or afternoon?
A. No; I think not. I don't recollect.
Q. How far did you get beyond the Gibbon wood, in which the wounded of the night before were?
A. I don't know that we got beyond the Gibbon wood. My remembrance is that the farthest point we reached was somewhere about the west edge of the Gibbon wood—that is, the wood in which Gibbon's troops were engaged the night before. We found there his wounded and the evidence of the battle that had taken place.
Q. Was anything done with these wounded that you found there?
A. I ordered all the men in that and the piece of woods this side of that, where there were, I think, a few scattered, to be sent to the rear and taken care of. I don't know that that is the Gibbon wood; I mean the wood farthest in advance that I reached was the wood in which the engagement took place. My impression is we did not at any period go farther in that direction than to perhaps the west edge of that wood.
Q. Look at the map. Which piece of timber is it that you consider to be the Gibbon wood?
A. This I suppose to be the wood. [In which the word "Warrenton" ends: marked "S" on the Landstreet map.] That, I suppose, is intended for the wood in which Gibbon's engagement took place.
Q. How long did your division remain in that wood?
A. We must have been in that wood, altogether, two or three hours.
Q. Did you see any battery of the enemy while you were in that position? If so, where was it?
A. There was a battery off to our right somewhere which I recollect all the more distinctly because it seemed to me to be detached from the general line of the enemy, and conceived the purpose of attempting to capture it, and sent one of my staff ove to reconnoiter with a view to see how it might be approached. But about that time Milroy, who was engaged with the enemy off to my right, communicated with me, or General Sigel for him—I think the message came from Milroy himself—begging assistance, and I detached Stahel's brigade to support Milroy northeast of the pike, and then gave up the idea of attempting to capture that battery.
Q. That battery was in the neighborhood of where?
A. It was on a hill on my right; to the right of the wood where Gibbon's fight had taken place. It was upon elevated ground, and seemed to be the spur of a hill. I thought we might by a sudden and decisive movement upon it capture it.
Q. While you were up in this position McLean's brigade, I understand, was on the left. What was the position of Reynolds's division of Pennsylvania Reserves as reported to you at that time in reference to your own position?
A. I did not see them, but they were reported to me as being upon our left, and I may add that it was reported to me that they had stationed a battery somewhere in advance of Gibbon's wood, I think Cooper's battery.
Q. In which direction was that battery operating?
A. I did not see the battery.
Q. At what time did you quit with your division this Gibbon wood?
A. I should think, to the best of my recollection, somewhere between 1 and 3 o'clock. I don't think I can be more positive than that. My recollection is that it was some time after noon.
Q. To what point did you go then with your division?
A. In consequence of reports made to me in reference to the movements of General Reynolds I thought it best for me to fall back, and I came into a strip of woods which I supposed to be these [south of the syllable "ville" in "Gainesville"]. I formed in line of battle near the west edge of that woods. There we lay most of the afternoon.
Q. Up to what time?
A. I can scarcely tell you. I should think at least until the middle of the afternoon, perhaps later. I recollect withdrawing from that point from wood to wood as we had advanced. We found it quite late in the afternoon, or quite sunset, by the time I reached my original position. The whole distance, I should think, was about two miles from the point where we started in the morning to the farthest point to which we advanced.
Q. While you were in the Gibbon wood, what enemy, if any, did you see in your immediate front?
A. I can not say that I saw any enemy in our immediate front. There were skirmishers in that direction, and as my skirmishers were thrown forward we would have an occasional shot, but there seemed to me at that time to be no enemy in my front, in my immediate front. The first intimation that I had that the enemy in considerable force were upon our left was through Colonel McLean, the commander of my second brigade, who told me that a messenger, or staff officer, or orderly, or some one from Reynolds, apparently with authority, had come to him, as he was in command of a brigade, and communicated the fact that the enemy were upon our left, and I think was coupled with the information that Reynolds intended to fall back. I tried to communicate with Reynolds again, but did not succeed, but I thought there was no occasion for immediately falling back; but not finding any response from General Reynolds, I concluded to withdraw slowly to at least a short distance and then come across an open space into the next wood (into a little strip marked S^2), where I rested the troops in line.
Q. While you were holding position in that little strip of woods do you know whether or not the enemy obtained the possession of the Gibbon wood?
A. I am satisfied that they were not there in any force; they had their skirmishers thrown forward as I had men toward the Gibbon wood, and there were occasional shots fired with or without good cause for them, but there was no movement in force, nor was there indicated to me any presence of an enemy in force.
Q. Can you fix with any degree of relative certainty the time in the afternoon when you quit the little fringe of woods marked "S^2"; whether it was 2, or 3, or 4, or 5, or 6 o'clock?
A. The days in August are pretty long. I should say it was at least the middle of the afternoon or probably later. I reached my conclusion from measuring it by the movement forward and the gradual withdrawal of the troops. I should think it was after the middle of the afternoon.

TESTIMONY OF GENERAL S. D. STURGIS.

General S. D. Sturgis testifies that he moved on the Gainesville road August 29, 1862, with his command. (Board record, page 711.)

Q. You say you went a mile and a half beyond Bethlehem church toward Gainesville?
A. That is my recollection.
Q. What did you then do?
A. I reported to General Porter. I rode in advance of my brigade. I found troops occupying the road, and I got up as near as I could get and then halted my command, and then rode forward to tell General Porter that they were there. He said, "For the present let them lie there."
Q. What did you do then individually?
A. Well, I simply looked about to see what I could see. I was a stranger to the lay of the land, and the troops, and all that; so without getting off my horse I rode about from place to place watching the skirmishers, and among other things I took a glass and looked in the direction of the woods; about a mile beyond which seemed to be the object of attention—beyond the skirmishers; there I saw a glint of light on a gun; and I remarked to General Porter that I thought they were probably putting a battery in position at that place, for I thought I had seen a gun.
Q. State what the conversation was.
A. I reported this fact of what I had seen to the general; he thought I was mistaken about it, but I was not mistaken, because it opened in a moment—at least a few shots were fired from that place—four, as I recollect.
Q. What force of the enemy did you see in that direction at that time?
A. I didn't see any of the enemy at all.
Q. Then what did you do?
A. Then when they had fired, as near as I can recollect, about four shots from this piece, General Porter beckoned to me; I rode up to him, and he directed me to take my command to Manassas Junction and take up a defensive position, inasmuch as the firing seemed to be receding on our right.
Q. What firing do you mean?
A. I mean the cannonading that had been going on for some time on our right, probably in the direction of Groveton.
Q. How long had you heard that cannonading?
A. I don't recollect exactly when I heard it first. My impression has been that I heard it all along the march from Manasses to General Porter's position. I do not recollect distinctly that I did hear it, but I know I heard it all the time after I arrived there until I left.
Q. What time of day was this that you received the order to move back with your command to Manassas Junction?
A. I have no way of fixing the time of day. I have carried in my mind the impression that it was more about the middle of the day—about 1 o'clock.
Q. What did you do when you received that order?
A. I sent word to General Piatt to move back to Manassas Junction, and that I would join him there.
Q. Do you know whether your order was obeyed?
A. Yes; it was obeyed.

EVIDENCE OF MARK J. BUNNELL.

Mark J. Bunnell, on page 678 of the board record, says:

I called to an orderly and stated to him what I wanted. He called Colonel Marshall, and they came down within a few paces of where I was, and Colonel Marshall then received his orders to deploy his regiment as skirmishers in front.
Q. Did you hear the order?
A. I stood right there so I could hear.
Q. What were the orders that General Porter gave Colonel Marshall.
A. I could not hear all the conversation, but to deploy his regiment as skirmishers, as we were about ready to move out; not to bring on a general engagement, but the idea was that we had to do duty only as skirmishers.

CAPT. A. P. MARTIN'S TESTIMONY.

Capt. A. P. Martin, commanding the artillery of Morell's division on the 29th of August, swears as follows:

Examination by the COURT:

Q. Do you know of any order having been given by General Porter to make an attack upon the enemy during that day?
A. I did not. I received orders from him to put the batteries in position.
Q. How long did the artillery firing continue?
A. The firing of the first section of the enemy's battery that opened from the woods in front continued perhaps twenty minutes; they fired very slowly. An hour later, perhaps, there was a battery opened farther to our right, and they were engaged by Hazlett's battery of Morell's division.

Q. At what distance from each other were these batteries that were engaged?

A. I should think not over a thousand yards; it might have been a thousand or one thousand two hundred yards.

Q. Do you know whether any effect was produced on either side by this artillery fire?

A. They were in the woods, and we could not see, except that the first battery that was opened was silenced, I should think, in about twenty minutes or half an hour.

Q. Was there any loss on our side?

A. Yes, sir; one man was killed by the first shot that the enemy fired. I saw him fall.

Q. On which side of the Manassas Gap Railroad, north or south, were the enemy's batteries that you were then engaging?

A. They were on the side toward us—the south side, I suppose.

The examination of this witness was here closed.

J. J. COPPINGER SWORN.

J. J. Coppinger, called by the recorder, being duly sworn, testifies as follows:

Direct examination:

Q. State your rank and station.

A. Captain, Twenty-third Infantry, and brevet colonel.

Q. What rank did you hold in the month of August, 1862?

A. Captain, Fourteenth Infantry.

Q. In whose brigade, division, and corps were you during that month?

A. The first regular brigade, Sykes's division, Porter's corps.

Q. Do you recollect being at Fredericksburg in that month?

A. Yes; at or near Fredericksburg.

Q. Where did you move to from there?

A. We moved in a general direction toward Bealeton, on the line of the railroad, from Rappahannock Junction to Alexandria.

Q. What sort of a march did you make in going up there to that point?

A. The first afternoon we made a long march; we made good time. I could not give the distance in miles. The next morning we marched early a few miles, and to the best of my recollection countermarched, and were placed in line of battle at a short distance from the camp which we had left. After that our marches seemed rather spasmodic until we got to the railroad.

Q. Near what point or at what point?

A. Until we got near Bealeton, on the railroad. I do not recollect whether we actually struck the track at Bealeton or Warrenton Junction, but we were near the railroad at Bealeton, and on it to Warrenton Junction.

Q. Were you in Warreton Junction on the 27th of August, 1862?

A. On or about, but I can not swear to the date.

Q. Then you left there to go to what point?

A. March along the line of the railroad toward Manassas Junction.

Q. Do you recollect at what time of day you left Warrenton Junction to go in the direction of Manassas Junction?

A. I cannot. My watch, I think, was broken, and I was very badly wounded a few hours after; so I do not recollect. I cannot give you the hours.

Q. You came to a halt for the night at what place?

A. Near Bristoe Station.

Q. At what time of day did you arrive at Bristoe Station?

A. Early in the day; I cannot give the hour. The reason I say early in the day is that I recollect passing a good part of the evening with Smead, of the artillery, who was killed a few hours after.

Q. The next morning you marched for what place?

A. Manassas Junction.

Q. From there what direction did you take?

A. Toward Gainesville.

Q. Do you recollect a place named Bethlehem church?

A. I have an indistinct recollection of a small church on the left of the road.

Q. You went out on that road. Do you recall any incident connected with that march out on the road toward Gainesville?

A. Do you mean the passage of other troops?

Q. You went out on that road. When did you receive a command to halt?

A. When, I think, about two shots close to the edge of a wood—two shots, I think, were fired; just about that moment our command halted.

Q. From what direction?

A. Front and right.

Q. Then what did your regiment and brigade do?

A. Halted, and were ordered to face about.

Q. Then what?

A. We were marched to the rear in column of fours.

Q. To what point?

A. I can not give you the point; but the next point I recollect is being on a side road which leads off toward the battlefield of Bull Run. Perhaps it would be better if I were to say that my memory of that battlefield—I was left on the field between the lines senseless until the next day, and my memory of both those days is somewhat spasmodic. Some things I see as clearly as anybody I see in this room; and there are intervals of which I have a very poor recollection. Now, between the time of our being marched here and our being halted I don't recollect. [Witness indicates points on the map.]

Q. As to this point of fact—these shots being fired, and you countermarched to the rear—how soon after the shots were fired was the order for you to move to the rear?

A. I think almost immediately.

Q. Do you recall with any certainty how long or how far you marched to the rear?

A. We marched quite a distance to the rear; I think from one to two miles, if not more; but I am almost certain that the command was "Halt, about-face;" and within three minutes I think, and perhaps a shorter time, we were in motion to the rear.

Q. During that day did you move to the front again; if so, when?

A. We were moved on a cross-road, which led us the next day to the battlefield. [Witness indicates in the direction of the Sudley Springs road.]

Q. When did you say you made that move at the cross-road?

A. I can not give the time.

Q. Some time that day?

A. In the afternoon.

Q. Did you encamp there or did you go back again?

A. We passed the night there; stacked arms, and I think lay down by our arms.

Cross-examination by Mr. BULLITT:

Q. You were then a captain?

A. Yes.

Q. Of what company?

A. Company A, second battalion, Fourteenth Infantry.

Q. Who was the commander of your regiment?

A. General Stone was the colonel. Our battalion was that day commanded by Captain McKibbon, who was wounded the next day. The senior officer on the ground was Captain O'Connor, who was also wounded the next day.

Q. What brigade?

A. The first regular brigade, temporarily commanded by Colonel Buchanan.

The examination of this witness was here closed.

TESTIMONY OF CAPTAIN GECKE.

Captain Gecke testified as follows (board's record, page 668):

Right before me was a piece of wood and an open corn field between me and the woods. I remained and deployed my skirmish line outside of the ditch there. At the same time when I came there I saw skirmishers, dismounted cavalry, marching before me in that corn field. My men fired at them and they fired over to us. Then they went back into the woods and I gave the command to cease firing. Then the adjutant of the regiment came up between 4 and 5 o'clock with an order to the commanding officer of the skirmish line. I stepped up, and he said I should find out immediately what was going on in the corner of the woods; so I took a sergeant and a file of men and went up there; and the sergeant went ahead and looked in that direction, and then we came down and reported to the adjutant that the enemy has been marching out of the woods, and that they were moving cannon and ammunition-wagons to form their proper companies, and turning to the left. A little while after this I heard a few shots fired over in that direction.

* * * * * * *

Q. When you went out with the skirmishers and deployed your men, what orders did you have?

A, I had no special order except to see what was going on. I saw no line formed on the left; no line formed on the right.

Q. When did you first observe the enemy coming down on your front?

A. That was about 4 o'clock.

Q. Up to that time what indications were there of an enemy in your front?

A. I should say I saw a few of a skirmish line moving through the corn field into the other side of the wood.

Q. During that day did you see any artillery firing?

A. I heard artillery firing.

Q. In what direction did you hear it?

A. The fire of artillery that forenoon I heard on the front of us; in the afternoon on our right.

Q. What was the character of that artillery firing that you heard?

A. It commenced at 5 o'clock in the morning; then it was in the far distance. Then about 11 or 12 o'clock we heard it better; we heard heavier firing. Then between 1 and 2 o'clock there was no firing whatever. Then from about 3 o'clock and afterward there was heavy artillery firing and musket firing up to most 9 o'clock at night and yelling by the enemy and cheering by the Union men. We heard that off on our right.

Q. Did you at any time during that afternoon undertake to feel the enemy and find out what their strength was?

A. No; I only carried out the order I had.

Q. About what time in the day would you say you moved across Dawkin's Branch to go forward with your skirmishers?

A. About 3 o'clock.

Q. Did you know the position of the enemy after you got up on the skirmish line?

A. No; I didn't see no other part of the troops except this dismounted cavalry.

* * * * * * *

Q. This yelling and cheering that you heard by the enemy and the Union troops, was that before or after you moved your skirmish line across Dawkin's Branch?

A. Afterward.

Q. How long after?

A. That commenced about 5 o'clock or half past 5, and kept on until darkness.

Q. The yelling and cheering that you heard was between 5 o'clock and sundown?

The confederate General R. E. Lee's official report of that action says that the battle continued until 9 o'clock at night (board's record, page 520).

A. Up to 9 o'clock at night.

Q. Did you make any report of that to anybody?

A. No.

Q. Do you mean to say that you did not send any message to Colonel Marshall at all that day?

A. No; except this one, because I was not so far off from them. They could hear all these things going on themselves.

Q. Then you could hear and he could hear?

A. He could hear the firing. It took me about ten minutes, more or less, to get there from my position back.

SERGT. FERDINAND MOHLE'S TESTIMONY.

Sergt. Ferdinand Mohle, Thirteenth New York Volunteers (board's record, page 676), a Government witness, has stated as follows as to his position to the front:

A. I think we staid as skirmishers up toward night, and then we were withdrawn onto a hill. It is kind of rolling country here. I think it was hollow along that way and then it raised again.

Q. What did you see while you were on the skirmish line so far as the enemy was concerned?

A. Saw a couple of rebel pickets in front of us.

Q. Infantry or cavalry?

A. I could not say exactly; I guess it was dismounted cavalry.

Q. What other indications of an enemy did you see during the day; what enemy did you see in front of you?

A. I saw no enemy where I stood. I have just said it was a kind of hollow place where we went through, and we could not see many of the enemy except a line of pickets; they were not very active. We exchanged a couple of shots, and I recollect a couple of cannon shots flew right over our line and came, I guess, from our rear—our own men—two or three shots.

Q. Was there any cannonading going on then?

A. There was.

Q. Where was that?

A. That was to our right.

Q. What was the character of it?

A. It was heavier toward evening than the time we went up there. We heard the noise more in the evening—the noise of artillery and cheering—than when we first came up there. But still firing was going on.

Q. When did the enemy come down in force on your front that day where you were?

A. What do you mean by the enemy; the line of pickets?

Q. Yes, or heavy force. Did you see any heavier force in front of you?

A. I could not see any heavy force; I could hear more. I could hear moving. I did not know whether it was artillery or cavalry, but I heard some words, some commands.

Q. How late in the day was that?

A. It was in the evening; toward night, I guess.

Q. When you went out there on that line did you hear those commands and movements?
A. I can not remember. I did not hear any command at that time; but there was a couple of shots exchanged between the pickets; and finally, I think, the rebel pickets went back a little, and word was brought to cease firing.
Q. Could you hear any musketry firing in the afternoon where you were and infantry firing?
A. Yes, I could hear that.
Q. How long in the afternoon did you hear infantry firing.
A. I can not tell exactly when it commenced, but I could hear cannon firing when we were marching up there.
Q. After you got up there was there any cannon firing?
A. There was cannon firing at intervals; it ceased sometimes, and toward night it went on pretty heavy.
Q. Any musketry firing in the afternoon to your front or right?
A. I think there was musketry firing, but we could not hear it so plain as in the evening.
Q. About what time did you hear this cheering which you speak of?
A. About sunset.

CAPT. JOHN S. HATCH'S TESTIMONY.

Capt. John S. Hatch, First Michigan Volunteers, Martindale's brigade, Morell's division, a witness for the Government, testifies as follows (board record, page 600) as to what transpired at the front, near Dawkin's Branch, on the 29th August:

Q. Tell what you saw when you got there at that point.
A. When we turned off into the woods we were preparing to go into action, as I supposed. I think the pieces were loaded. Caps were let off the guns, and cartridges examined and cartridge-boxes, and some such things as that. We remained in the woods a little time, and then we moved off to an eminence where we could look off into the depression or ravine; and then the Thirteenth New York was thrown out as skirmishers.
Q. How long had this been after you had arrived at that point before the Thirteenth was thrown in?
A. It is my impression that we were loading pieces and preparing, as we supposed, to go into action. I recollect we were talking of it together; that it was about noon. I do not recollect looking at a watch. It was about 12 o'clock, I should say; not far from that any way.
Q. That the Thirteenth were thrown out?
A. Yes, sir.
Q. You remained there during the day?
A. Remained there all that day.
Q. After the Thirteenth were thrown out what did you see?
A. We came out of these woods, I guess, almost entirely, so that we could see the Thirteenth New York maneuver, and see the ravine and woods on beyond. I think our arms were stacked—our brigade. We lay there and saw the Thirteenth New York moving; they kept moving on until they met with some little check on the other side; there were some shots fired; then, some time after that, a solid shot came over. General Porter was there with his staff. I do not know whether there were any other generals there or not. There was a little scattering there and a little commotion all around, until pretty soon another one came over, and there was a piece run out of the woods where the Thirteenth New York had met with some opposition from the infantry; there was another shot fired soon after that, and we supposed the work was commencing. There were three shots, I think, or four shots fired. We supposed that they were firing at General Porter and his staff, because they were mounted and conspicuous.
Q. Then what was done?
A. There was nothing done by us during that afternoon. We were lying there at ease until early in the evening, when our brigade, a portion of it—my regiment at least—was thrown out, you might say, as skirmishers. We were thrown out to guard against a surprise that night—thrown out to the right of where the New York Thirteenth went down.
Q. How long did you remain there?
A. Two hours; about that.
Q. What indications, if any, did you observe of the presence of the enemy during the day?
A. We saw fighting going on on our right and front.
Q. What kind of a contest was it?
A. There was heavy artillery firing.
Q. How long did that continue?
A. From the time we came out onto that eminence, out of the woods; there was firing all the afternoon, but not continuous; there was at times heavy firing, rapid firing.
Q. From the character of the firing what were the indications?
A. It was heavy artillery fire.
Q. I understand you to say that you could see the action going on?
A. I could not see the troops that I recollect. I do not think I could, but the smoke and the bursting of the shells could be seen, and we could hear the sound of the artillery and see the lines of smoke; towards evening we heard musketry firing.
Q. How long was it after the Thirteenth New York went out before you saw that gun run out that you speak of?
A. They had time to get down three-quarters of a mile or more—perhaps half an hour.
Q. During the day what enemy did you see in your front besides what you have mentioned at that time?
A. Saw a line of dust on the left making toward Jackson, who we understood was opposing our forces.
Q. At the time?
A. At the time.
Q. Did you see any enemy directly in your front?
A. These woods were there; nothing more than artillery. There were infantry opposed to the Thirteenth New York.
Q. How long did they remain there, artillery and infantry?
A. I do not know that; they did not remain all the afternoon.
Q. Had no more artillery firing from them?
A. The artillery; three or four shots was all that bothered us.

Cross-examination by Mr. BULLITT:

Q. What time was it, in the afternoon or toward evening, that you heard that musketry firing?
A. The day was well advanced.
Q. Five or 6 o'clock in the evening?
A. I should judge so; before sundown some time.
Q. What you had heard, prior to that time, was all artillery firing?
A. I do not recollect any musketry firing until toward sundown; perhaps the sun was an hour or two high.
Q. What time was it that you were sent on that picket-line?
A. The Thirteenth New York was sent out, and I was in the same brigade with them. As I say, we were preparing for action in the woods about 12 o'clock, I should think.

MAJ. GEN. ROBERT C. BUCHANAN'S TESTIMONY.

The late Bvt. Maj. Gen. Robert C. Buchanan, United States Army, retired, called by petitioner (board record, page 215), testifies as to the movements of the brigade he commanded in Brigadier-General Sykes's division after they left Manasses Junction, on the 29th, as follows:

Q. Which way did you move then?
A. We had been moving by the right flank; we then moved by the left flank; we moved down by the road which takes us near a church, which I have since heard called Bethlehem church, in the direction of Gainesville.
Q. Where did you halt then?
A. Near that church and in advance of it.
Q. In what position were your troops then?
A. At that time directly on the road.
Q. How were you formed when you halted there?
A. We were formed in line of battle immediately after we halted.
Q. How long did you remain in that position?
A. I can not tell you.
Q. During the balance of the day, I mean.
A. We did not leave that ground that day except under various instructions that we got to countermarch; from time to time we countermarched, of course on the same ground.
Q. You did not leave that ground?
A. No; except toward night we changed our direction, I think onto a little road that led us off to the turnpike.
Q. Practically, you remained in that position during that day?
A. During that day.
Q. Do you recollect any stacking of arms?
A. Yes; they stacked arms from time to time.
Q. When you did that what position was your line in; still in line of battle?
A. Always; always ready.

EDMUND SCHRIVER'S TESTIMONY.

Edmund Schriver, called by the recorder, being duly sworn, testified as follows:

Direct examination:

Q. State your rank in the Army.
A. Inspector-general and brevet major-general.
Q. What position did you hold on the 29th of August, 1862?
A. I was then on General McDowell's staff, when he commanded the Third Corps of the Army of Virginia.
Q. Do you recollect being with him, on the 29th of August, at the head of General Porter's column, in the neighborhood of Dawkin's Branch?
A. I do.
Q. Where did you go then?
A. Went out to the right with the generals, whose object was, I believe, to make some observations, and then returned to the place whence we started.
Q. Where did General McDowell leave you, or did he not leave you?
A. He left somewhere to the east or to his right looking out toward the railroad, my recollection is.
Q. Which direction did he take when he left?
A. I think he went in a southerly direction, off to where his divisions were.
Q. Did you go with him?
A. No.
Q. Which direction did you take?
A. I came a little to the left and went by General Porter's headquarters, and then came down, if I recollect rightly, the road General McDowell went, through the woods; I did not go with him.
Q. You went down the Gainesville road then?
A. Yes, sir.
Q. Did you go back with General Porter or did you follow him?
A. I really can not recollect that: I know we met again.
Q. What transpired at that time when you met him there?
A. I had a little conversation; I can not exactly recollect what it was, except the general said or expressed the belief that he might become engaged with the enemy and that he had no cavalrymen; he either then proposed or I proposed, or at any rate the arrangement was made, that he should have half of General McDowell's escort that was with me; it was turned over, and I left. He wanted them to send messages.
Q. At that time where were the enemy?
A. I am sure I do not know.

COL. JOHN S. MOSBY'S TESTIMONY.

John S. Mosby, formerly colonel of Maj. Gen. J. E. B. Stuart's staff, testified as follows (board record, page 887):

Q. When did that battle begin on the 29th; what time of day?
A. Pretty early on the morning of the 29th there was heavy fighting.
Q. How long did that continue?
A. My recollection is that there was heavy fighting during most of the day. Early in the morning I suppose I was about the rear of the center of Jackson's line, and I suppose about 8, or 9, or 10 o'clock there came a report that our left flank had been turned, over in the direction of Sudley; I went over there with the First Virginia Cavalry, according to my recollection, for the purpose of checking that, and we were there the whole of the day.
Q. What of the action could you see and hear? Describe all that you recall of that action.
A. We could not see the fighting. I was with this cavalry, and I suppose we were half a mile, or part of the time within a mile of it. In the morning this regiment that I got with I suppose was not half a mile in the rear of Jackson's line; but when the report came that the Federal cavalry was over on Jackson's left, and there was danger of their capturing his wagons and ambulances that were in the rear of Sudley church, this cavalry was sent over there to protect Jackson's left, and I went with it.
* * * * * * *
Q. Do you know what the losses of Jackson were in that action?
A. No, sir.
Q. From 12 o'clock noon up to 3 o'clock in the afternoon, do you recollect the character of the fighting as far as you could judge from the sound?
A. My general recollection of it is that most of the day there was heavy fighting. I cannot particularize.
Q. Musketry and artillery?
A. Musketry and artillery.

LIEUT. COL. THOMAS C. H. SMITH'S TESTIMONY.

Attention is also called to evidence of Lieut. Col. T. C. H. Smith, afterward brigadier-general, as follows:

By the JUDGE-ADVOCATE:

Q. Will you state in what capacity you were serving in the Army of Virginia in its late campaign under General Pope in August last?
A. I was aid-de-camp on the staff of General Pope.
Q. Did you, or not, on the 28th or 29th of August, carry any orders from Major-General Pope to Major-General Porter which concerned his movements on those days?

A. I did not.

Q. Did you, or not, see General Porter during either of the days of the 27th, 28th, and 29th of August?

A. I saw General Porter on the afternoon of the 28th.

Q. At what place and under what circumstances did you see him?

A. I had been sent back to the ammunition on the train at Bristoe and charged with its distribution. General Porter wished over four hundred thousand rounds; General Hooker something over ninety thousand rounds. About 2 or 3 o'clock I had sent forward to General Porter some three hundred and twenty thousand rounds and had seized wagons to forward the balance, and left Captain Piatt in charge. The business being then sufficiently forward, I went on to find General Pope. On getting to the point where I had left General Pope in the morning I found he had moved on, and, to inquire the road he had taken, I went to General Porter's headquarters, near the Manassas water station. I found General Porter in his tent, and asked him which road General Pope had taken, and he informed me. I had some ten minutes' conversation with him. One of his staff was present; I forget his name.

Q. Will you state that conversation?

A. After asking him about the road, I told General Porter the amount of ammunition that I had sent forward to him, and also that the balance would come immediately forward. I asked him if he had received it, or made some remark; I can not remember the exact expression. General Porter said that he had not; that was the substance of his reply—either that he had received hardly any of it, or none of it, if I remember aright. I expressed some surprise, and said that it had been sent forward to the front as ordered; and, either in reply to some question of mine or to some remark or of himself, he said that he had no officers to take charge of it and distribute it or to look it up, or something of that kind. I remarked that he could hardly expect us at headquarters to be able to send officers to distribute it in his corps; that it had been sent forward on the road in the direction where his corps was. He replied that it was gone where it belonged; that it was on the road to Alexandria, where we were all going. I do not know as it is evidence to give the spirit in which this was said—the way it impressed me. Those remarks were made in a sneering manner, and appeared to me to express a great indifference. There was then a pause for a moment. General Porter then spoke in regard to the removal of the sick and wounded from the field of Kettle Run. He said it would hurt Pope, leaving the wounded behind. I told him that they were not to be left behind; that I knew that a positive order—an imperative order—had been given to General Banks to bring all the wounded with him, and for that purpose to throw property out of the wagons if necessary. To this General Porter made no reply in words; but his manner to me expressed the same feeling that I had noticed before. This conversation, from General Porter's manner and look, made a strong impression on my mind. I left him, as I have said, after an interview of about ten minutes, and rode on, arriving at our headquarters on Bull Run just as we entered them and pitched our tents for the night. After my tent was pitched, and I had had something to eat, I went over to General Pope and reported to him briefly what I had done in regard to the ammunition. I then said to him, "General, I saw General Porter on my way here." Said he, "Well, sir?" I said, "General, he will fail you." "Fail me?" said he; "what do you mean? What did he say?" Said I, "It is not so much what he said, though he said enough; he is going to fail you." These expressions I repeat. I think I remember them with exactness, for I was excited at the time from the impression that had been made upon me. Said General Pope, "How can he fail me? He will fight where I put him; he will fight where I put him;" or, "He must fight where I put him; he must fight where I put him"—one of those expressions. This General Pope said with a great deal of feeling and impetuously, and perhaps overbearingly, and in an excited manner. I replied in the same way, saying that I was certain that Fitz-John Porter was a traitor; that I would shoot him that night, so far as any crime before God was concerned, if the law would allow me to do it. I speak of this to show the conviction that I received from General Porter's manner and expressions in that interview. I have only to add that my prepossessions of him were favorable, as it was at headquarters up to that time. I never had entertained any impressions against him until that conversation. I knew nothing with regard to his orders to move up to Kettle Run. I knew nothing of any failure on his part to comply with any orders.

Q. State more distinctly the point where you saw General Porter on the 28th of August?

A. He was encamped at the Manassas water station, between Bristoe and the junction. The water station was a short distance from his headquarters. [The witness indicated upon the map before the court where he thought the place to be.] I do not think the water station is more than one-third the distance from Bristoe to Manassas Junction. That is my impression; I can not speak positively about it.

Q. In the conversation to which you refer, did or did not General Porter manifest any anxiety to get possession of, and have distributed in his corps, the ammunition of which you speak?

A. No, sir; I thought he showed an utter indifference upon the subject; showed it very plainly.

Q. At what hour of the day did this conversation between you and General Porter take place?

A. I think it must have been about 4 o'clock in the afternoon; half past 3 or 4 o'clock.

Q. In anything that was said in that conversation, or in the manner of General Porter, was there evidenced any desire or any willingness on his part to support General Pope in the military operations in which he was then engaged?

A. Quite the contrary to that.

Q. Can you state whether the disinclination to support General Pope, which you thought he manifested, was the result of disgust with the immediate service in which he was then engaged or of hostility to the commanding general, or upon what did it seem to rest?

A. It seemed to me to rest on hostility. But I do not know that I could analyze the impression that was made upon me. I conveyed it to General Pope in the words that I have stated. I had one of those clear convictions that a man has a few times perhaps in his life as to the character and purposes of a person whom he sees for the first time. No man can express altogether how such an impression is gained from looks and manner, but it is clear.

Q. Had you passed over the road between Bristoe Station and Warrenton Junction on that day or on the previous day?

A. On the previous day, the 27th, I came over it after General Pope.

Q. At what hour of the day did you pass over it?

A. I should say that I left our headquarters, about a mile from Warrenton Junction, about half past 4 or 5 o'clock in the afternoon. I should say it was past the middle of the afternoon.

Q. What was the condition of the roads then?

A. For the first mile and a half, until you got to Cedar Run, the road was bordered on either side by open fields or open woods, over which troops could march easily, in great part without going on the road. Indeed, I doubt whether there is any regular road a good part of the way up. The troops marched through the fields to Bristoe Station.

Q. Were you or not present at the battle of the 29th of August?

A. Yes, sir; I was present.

Q. Throughout the engagement?

A. I left with General Pope when he rode onto the field, but on the way out he sent me with an order off the road, so that I did not get on the field for two or three hours after that.

Q. At what time did you regard the battle as commencing?

A. The smoke was rising over a considerable portion of ground, I should say a mile, plainly in view, when we were at Centreville; and there was some heavy cannonading. I should say it was about 10 or 11 o'clock when I first came to Centreville, and it was about 11 or 12 o'clock when I saw the appearance of which I speak—the sign of a heavy action, from the smoke rising. It was very plainly in view from Centreville; you looked right down upon it, and you could hear the sound of the guns. I did not ride up to the town at first, but finding that General Pope had not ridden on, as I had supposed, I rode back to Centreville, and then it was I saw the appearance I speak of, about 11 or 12 o'clock. I should mention, too, in order that it may be clearly understood in regard to the action, that at the time I was sent off from the road, while General Pope was riding on the field, there was a cessation of cannon-firing for a considerable time, I should say for certainly a half an hour.

Q. Was or was not the battle raging at 5 p. m. on that day?

A. Yes, sir; severely.

WILLIAM L. FAXON TESTIFIES.

William L. Faxon testifies as follows (board record, page 844):

Q. State your occupation?

A. Superintendent National Sailors' Home, Quincy, Mass.

Q. Were you in the military service of the United States on the 29th of August, 1862; if so, in what capacity?

A. I was assistant surgeon of the Thirty-second Massachusetts from the 2d of June, 1862, until along in August, 1863.

* * * * * * *

Q. Where were you on the night of the 27th?

A. In camp at Warrenton Junction.

Q. In whose brigade and division?

A. I was in the second brigade, first division, Fifth Corps, Morell commanding division, and General Griffin commanding the brigade.

Q. At what time did you leave Warrenton Junction, and what direction did your regiment take?

A. The bugle sounded for an early start, and it was quite dark. We got out just before daylight, and my brigade lay outside of the wood in which we camped until the sun was pretty high.

Q. What direction did you take from there?

A. We marched off a little to the left of the wood and crossed a little run, and went up to Catlett's, and from there to Bristoe; followed the general direction of the Orange and Alexandria Railroad.

Q. At what time did you arrive at Bristoe Station with your regiment?

A. I judge about the middle of the afternoon.

Q. During that time did you see General Porter?

A. I saw General Porter only as I crossed the run at Bristoe.

Q. Where was he at that time?

A. He was at a little house on the left hand of where I crossed; that is, on the side toward Washington. He and his staff were at a little house; I think it was a kind of peach orchard; I think most of them were sitting down.

Q. Describe what you saw and heard, so far as General Porter was concerned.

A. As I crossed the run I heard General Porter make this remark: "Go tell Morell to halt his division;" and he added, "I don't care a damn if we don't get there." I am very particular about those words, because I recollect them and I have spoken of them.

Q. On the next morning where were you?

A. I marched with the regiment, and I think we went up about as far as Manassas Junction, where we halted a short time; then the regiment turned off to the left, I believe, and crossed the road and came off on a road not exactly parallel, but curving off and following the general direction of the Manassas Gap Railroad, I think.

Q. Do you know the place where you halted?

A. We halted on a small knoll; part of it overlooked quite a large valley; quite a large part of it was cleared, and on the right I saw the line of the Manassas Gap Railroad.

Q. This point that I have indicated on the map as Dawkin's Branch?

A. I should take the branch to be a little farther away. I should take the branch to be about a mile away from the place where we halted; there might have been a dry run at the foot of this knoll, but I think not.

Q. What did you do after you came to a halt there?

A. I went down on the railroad. I went around generally in the woods and looked at the situation generally; saw firing was going on along the right of us, over toward Thoroughfare Gap.

Q. Did you see any indications of an enemy immediately in your front?

A. I did not see any for a mile or more; I looked along through the field close. General Porter came up and borrowed a glass of me; he asked me what I had seen. I told him I thought there was a battery coming in about a mile from us on the Washington side of the road. Not very far from it I think there was a small house, and I saw something that led me to suppose that there were men going in there.

Q. Do you recollect what reply he made?

A. I do not know that he made any reply to me.

Q. Did that battery open upon you?

A. It opened shortly afterward; of course I can not tell you how many minutes, because I did not keep any note of the time. I had no intention of making any memorandum. It opened and fired before the troops were withdrawn; I think not exceeding three, might have been four, possibly but two, shots.

Q. Where did those shots strike?

A. One of the shots struck a man in the front rank of the First Michigan Infantry and passed through his abdomen, and struck the first man in the rear rank in the thigh.

Q. You were there at the time?

A. I was at the place and saw the men. They were sitting or lying just a little lower down on the slope of the hill in front of me.

Q. Then what was done?

A. Shortly after that we withdrew.

Q. What indications, if any, did you see of an enemy in your front or to your right and front or to your right?

A. To the right and front.

Mr. CHOATE. I do not know that an assistant surgeon is a military expert.

The RECORDER. I asked him what he saw.

Mr. CHOATE. I have no objection to what he saw.

A. [Continued.] Beyond this general clearing to quite a large extent there was a smaller clearing, only a part of which could be seen; there was a small opening in the woods; across that opening there came a small body of men; they halted in the opening, where there was evidently a depression, but their heads and shoulders could be plainly seen.

Q. About how many men?

A. I should judge not over twenty.

Q. What else did you see of an enemy in your front, or to your right and front, or to your right?

A. Nothing.

Q. Could you see anything that would indicate the march of troops; if so, what?

A. I could see a large cloud of dust on the Warrenton turnpike moving towards Centreville.

Q. After that where did you go?

A. I went into camp with troops at night, after they withdrew.
Q. Did they remain in this advanced position during the day?
A. They were withdrawn in the afternoon; the sun was declining in the heavens.
Q. How far were they withdrawn?
A. I should judge inside of a mile.
Q. More than half a mile or less?
A. That I could not tell you; I could go to the spot, to the place where they came, because we withdrew on the same road, and then came back and went into camp again after dusk.

CAPT. DOUGLASS POPE SWORN.

Capt. Douglass Pope was then called by the Government, and sworn and examined, as follows:

By the JUDGE-ADVOCATE:

Q. Will you state what is your rank in the military service?
A. I am captain and additional aid-de-camp.
Q. Were you with the Army of Virginia in its late campaign under Major-General Pope?
A. I was.
Q. In what capacity?
A. As additional aid-de-camp to General Pope.
Q. Were you or not on the field of the battle of Manassas on Friday, the 29th of August?
A. I was.
Q. Did you or not on that day bear any order from General Pope to General Porter; and, if so, what was its character, and at what hour did you bear and deliver it?
A. I received an order from General Pope, to be delivered to General Porter, at half past 4 o'clock. The purport of the order I did not know at the time. I went directly to General Porter with that order, and it reached him by 5 o'clock.
Q. Was or was not that the only order which on that day you had to General Porter from General Pope?
A. It was.
Q. Where did you find General Porter with his command?
A. I found him at the forks of the road leading from Manassas to Gainesville and Groveton, on the railroad.
Q. What distance was that from Manassas Junction?
A. I do not know, of my own knowledge; but I have heard that it was between two and three miles.
Q. What distance from the battlefield where the engagement was then pending?
A. When I received the order I was to the right of the battlefield, and I suppose it was a distance of about three miles from General Porter.

Porter was not with the head of his column, but back within two miles of Manassas Junction.

Q. Did you or not, on delivering the order, learn its character?
A. I did not.
Q. What statements, if any, did General Porter make to you in regard to the movements which the order contemplated he should make?
A. In a conversation which I had with General Porter, after his reading the order, he explained to me on the map where the enemy had come down in force to attack him and had established a battery. I understood him to say that the enemy had opened upon him; but what he had done I do not now remember.
Q. How long did you remain with General Porter?
A. About fifteen minutes, I suppose.
Q. While you were there, or at any time before you left, did you observe any orders given or any indication of preparation for a movement in the direction of the batttlefield?
A. I did not.
Q. In what condition were the troops there at that time?
A. I saw only a portion of them; the portion that I saw I believed belonged to General Sykes's division. They were on the road between the forks of the road and Manassas—what small portion of the troops I saw that belonged to General Porter's corps. It was my impression they were halted there; I saw the arms of some of them stacked.
Q. They had their arms stacked?
A. Yes, sir.
Q. Was not the sound of the artillery of the battle then pending distinctly audible at that point?
A. It was.
Q. And was the sound of the small-arms distinctly audible at that point?
A. In regard to the small-arms I do not remember; but I could hear the artillery very plainly, very distinctly.
Q. Was it continuous, indicating a continued action?
A. It was.
Q. Did or did not General Porter make any inquiry of you at all as to the condition of the forces then engaged in battle?
A. There were inquiries made of me by an officer—one of General Porter's aids-de-camp, I think. I do not think that General Porter said anything to me about it.

Page 58, G. C. M.:

Q. As you have passed over the road and know the distance, will you state within what time General Porter and his command could have reached the battlefield after the delivery of that order?
A. To have reached where I had received the order would have taken him two or three hours, I suppose—that is, to the extreme right of our army.
Q. Within what time would it have required him to reach the right flank of the enemy?
A. I could not state, because I do not know where the right flank of the enemy then was. My impression, though, from what General Porter said, was that the enemy were nearly in his front. I supposed them about a mile from him. That was merely my impression from the conversation I had with General Porter.
Q. Did you or not have another interview with General Porter after that time?
A. I did not. After receiving a written reply to the order I had delivered to General Porter I started on my way back, and I suppose I had got a mile or a mile and a half from where General Porter was when I was overtaken by an orderly, who said General Porter wished to see me. I got part way back when I met an officer, I supposed an aid-de-camp of General Porter, who said that General Porter wished to see me. I went back, and this aid-de-camp told me I better wait a few minutes. I did not see General Porter then.
Q. Had you, or not, seen this officer whom you supposed to be an aid-de-camp during your first interview with General Porter?
A. I had, and had had a conversation with him.
Q. In the presence of General Porter?
A. While General Porter was writing the reply to the order I had delivered to him.
Q. What seemed to be his rank?
A. He was a first lieutenant, I think.
Q. Did he, or not, perform any act or make any remark in the presence of General Porter which induced you to believe that he was an aid-de-camp? If so, state what that remark and what that act was.
A. I do not remember his making any remark to General Porter or General Porter saying anything to him. My impression is that he told me that he was an aid-de-camp. I firmly believed at the time that he was General Porter's aid-de-camp. I did not see any act indicating that, excepting that he was associated with General Porter; he was very close to General Porter at the time I had the conversation with him; within hearing of General Porter if he had listened to it.
Q. Do you, or not, suppose that his statement to you, that he was an aid-de-camp of General Porter, could have been heard by General Porter if he had been listening to your conversation?
A. It could.
Q. Do I not understand you, then, to say that that conversation occurred in fact in the presence of General Porter?
A. In the presence of General Porter; yes, sir.
Q. Were you not charged by that officer with a message to General Pope that a scout had come in reporting that the enemy were retreating through Thoroughfare Gap?
A. I was.
Q. Did you regard that message as given to you seriously or jestingly?
A. Seriously.
Q. How long a time had elapsed from the time of your interview with General Porter until your return to General Porter's encampment?
A. About three-quarters of an hour, I suppose; between that and an hour.
Q. On your return to his encampment, did you or not observe any preparation on the part of his officers or of the troops for an advance upon the enemy?
A. I did not.

* * * * * * * *

Q. What was the dress of this officer whom you supposed to be an aid-de-camp?
A. I do not remember. I do not know whether he had a staff officer's shoulder-straps on or a line officer's. I do not remember now which it was. He was in uniform.

The examination by the judge-advocate here closed.

Examination by the ACCUSED:

Q. How does the witness fix the hour of the day when he left General Pope to bear the order?
A. From the date of the order, which was dated at 4.30 p. m.
Q. Was the road which you took to bear the order from General Pope to General Porter direct or circuitous?
A. My impression is that it was a direct road.
Q. Did you pass through Manassas Junction?
A. I did not; that is, in conveying the order to General Porter, I did not.
Q. Did you go up the railroad toward General Porter?
A. I did not; I met him right on the railroad.
Q. You have stated how you fix the time when you received the order; how do you fix the time of its delivery?
A. By the distance and the rate at which I carried the order.
Q. And so fixing it, you determine the order to have been delivered at 5 o'clock?
A. Not precisely at 5 o'clock; by 5 o'clock.
Q. You mean as early as 5 o'clock?
A. As early as 5 o'clock. It may have been three or four minutes after 5 o'clock.
Q. We understand you to say that you make this judgment as to the time from the distance which you had to pass over and the rate you went?
A. Yes, sir.
Q. When you first started to go back from General Porter to General Pope, did you take the same road back by which you had come to General Porter?
A. I did.

TESTIMONY OF GENERAL GEORGE SYKES.

On the original trial Brig. Gen. George Sykes swore, after saying that he was with the petitioner when an officer brought him the order from General Pope, as follows (G. C. M. record, pages 177, 178):

By JUDGE-ADVOCATE:

Q. Did General Porter make known to you the character of that order?
A. He did not.
Q. Did he read it in your presence?
A. Not that I know of.

* * * * * * * *

Q. How long did you remain with General Porter on that occasion, after the receipt of this order?
A. I continued with him from that time all night.

* * * * * * * *

Q. You had then, as I understand you to say, no knowledge that a positive order had been given by General Pope on that afternoon for General Porter to attack the enemy on their right flank?
A. I had no such knowledge.

The evidence of General Sykes leads directly to the conclusion that the petitioner had no intention or desire to attack or he would have told his division commander then and there.

Look at it in any light, there was no effort then, or at any time afterward on that day, to put Sykes's division into position to support or participate in an assault.

CAPT. GEORGE M. RANDALL'S TESTIMONY.

Capt. George M. Randall, Twenty-third United States Infantry, a Government witness (board record, page 725), testified as follows:

Direct examination:

Q. On the 29th of August, 1862, where were you, and what rank did you hold in the service?
A. Second lieutenant, Fourth Infantry, attached to Sykes's division.
Q. Where were you on that morning?
A. We were at Bristoe Station.
Q. Moved up from there to Manassas Junction?
A. Yes, sir; from Manassas Junction we took position on the Gainesville road beyond Bethlehem church.
Q. When you were at Manassas Junction were there any indications of an action? If so, what were they?
A. Yes, I think so. I heard very distinctly heavy firing; as near as I can recollect, it was about half past 9 or 9 o'clock in the morning.
Q. How long did you continue to hear that?
A. I do not recollect; I heard artillery firing during the day several times, and I think along about 3 or quarter to 4 o'clock in the afternoon I heard it again; quite a brisk firing at that time.
Q. How far did you get upon the Manassas and Gainesville road?
A. I think we moved about three miles, probably four miles, beyond the church.

Q. Did you go up to the front?
A. Very near it; sufficiently far that I could see the opening between our lines and where the rebels were supposed to be; at that time we were in a belt of timber; the head of the column, as near as I can recollect, halted at the edge of it.
Q. What indications were there of an enemy in front of you?
A. I heard several shots exchanged, and also some few shots from the skirmish line.
Q. Anything more?
A. That is all.
Q. Did you see any enemy?
A. I did not.
Q. What did your brigade then do?
A. I think some time in the afternoon we countermarched, probably about two and a half miles, and then halted and bivouacked for the night.

Cross-examination by Mr. BULLITT:

Q. About what time did your company get up into the front?
A. I think about 11 o'clock.
Q. How near to the front were you?
A. I suppose we were three-quarters of a mile from the front; sufficiently near so that we could see the open space.

* * * * * * *

Q. Did you change your position that day at all to the right or left?
A. I think not. I think we moved to the rear.
Q. You have no recollection of being moved back into the woods?
A. I think we halted in the woods.
Q. The only move you made was to march back about two miles?
A. Yes; that is all I recollect.

* * * * * * *

Q. How far back in the woods were you?
A. We went back about two and a half miles or two miles, but the exact point it is impossible for me to mark; we may have moved up here [in the woods] and taken a zigzag.

* * * * * * *

Q. Then you took your position in the woods, and then you subsequently countermarched toward Bethlehem church. Now, I want to know whether you made any other movement after you had passed Bethlehem church and got up toward Dawkin's Branch except first to march to the point where you first halted; then you got into the woods, and afterward countermarched about two miles back to Bethlehem church. Did you make any other movement during that day?
A. No, sir.

* * * * * * *

Q. Will you explain what you mean by countermarching in that particular instance?
A. We marched to the front, and then faced the column about and went to the rear.
Q. Did you countermarch by brigade?
A. By regiments and brigades, as near as I can recollect.
Q. By which; regiments or brigades?
A. By brigades, I think.
Q. You were in the leading brigade as you went forward?
A. I was in the leading brigade, Sykes's division.
Q. When you countermarched and marched to the rear where were the other two brigades of the division?
A. I think they were going to the rear.
Q. You did not pass them?
A. No, sir; I think not.
Q. Did you march in the road going back?
A. Yes, as near as I can recollect.

CHARLES DUFFEE SWORN.

Charles Duffee (page 609, board record), called on behalf of the Government, being duly sworn, testified as follows:

Direct examination by the RECORDER:

Q. Where do you reside?
A. Washington Court House, Ohio.
Q. On the original trial in 1863 of the petitioner here you were called as a witness for the Government, were you not?
A. Yes, sir.
Q. And testified as to the direction you took in delivering a certain order, commonly known as the "4.30 p. m. order?"
A. Yes, sir.
Q. Where were General Pope's headquarters on Friday afternoon, August 29, 1862, about 4 o'clock?
A. He was at the right-hand side of the stone house on the hill.
Q. Do you know what that hill is called?
A. I don't recollect now. I recollect the place very well.
Q. Where were you at the time that Captain Pope received the 4.30 order?
A. I was at General Pope's headquarters, not over three or four rods from his headquarters, in the edge of the woods.
Q. What were you doing there?
A. Awaiting orders.
Q. What then transpired?
A. Captain Pope called for his horse and mine and I fetched them up; Mr. Ruggles, I believe, gave him the order. He was giving him the directions of Porter's headquarters when I came up. I spoke up and told him I knew the road; I had been through there before.
Q. How soon after that did you start?
A. We immediately started. I think I was mounted when he was speaking about the road, if I recollect right.
Q. Have you since been over the route that you took at that time?
A. Yes, sir.
Q. Recently?
A. Last Tuesday.
Q. Under my instructions?
A. Yes, sir.
Q. In this conversation with Mr. Collins, when you pointed out the route on that map, did you not state that the route which you took was an old road, not used by wagons, but wagons could have traveled it?
A. Yes; part of the road was.
Q. I asked you what you said to him.
A. I don't know whether I told him the whole road was so or not.
Q. I only asked you what you told Collins. Did you tell him that it was an old road not used by wagons, but wagons could have traveled over it.
A. Do you mean to say the whole distance?
Q. I ask you what you said to him.
A. I didn't tell him the whole road; a part of the road.
Q. You told him a part of the road?
A. Yes, sir.
Q. Did you tell him that neither Captain Pope nor any other officer went with you, but that five or seven men went with you?
A. I did. I didn't want him to know that Captain Pope was with me. I didn't care much about answering his questions. I was not under oath.
Q. You were not under oath, and therefore you did not feel bound to tell him the truth?
A. That is it exactly. I found out when he got to that point what he wanted, and I evaded the question.
Q. You did tell him Captain Pope was not with you?
A. I did, as soon as I mistrusted what his object was.
Q. Did you tell him that you were ordered to leave three of the men with you at General Porter's if there were five, or four if there were seven, with you?
A. I don't recollect about the number.
Q. Do you recollect telling him that you were ordered to leave any men with General Porter?
A. I told him that was the direction; I don't know whether I told him I was so directed.
Q. Do you recollect saying to him that you traveled slowly, for both you and your horse were worn out, and, besides, that you did not know but you might run into the enemy at any time?
A. Not going; coming back.
Q. I ask you what you said to him. Did you tell him that you traveled slowly, for both you and your horse were worn out?
A. I told him we traveled slowly coming back.
Q. Did you use the words, "We traveled slowly, for both I and my horse were worn out?"
A. Coming back.
Q. Did you say coming back?
A. Yes; I did.
Q. And did you say to him, "and, besides, I did not know but what we might run into the enemy at any time?"
A. Yes; coming back.
Q. You said coming back?
A. Yes; that was the only time I suggested running into the enemy, coming back?
Q. Did you say, "I walked my horse a good deal of the way; after I got on the main road at 'E,' I soon found it full of General Porter's troops, and they prevented my getting along very fast?"
A. I supposed it was Porter's troops. [Witness looks at the map.] This is too far down. I did not see any "E" on the map when I was talking to him.
Q. You did not say to him, "After getting on the main road at 'E' I soon found it full of General Porter's troops?"
A. Not at "E." I supposed them to be Porter's troops; but it was farther up this way; not as far down as that was.
Q. It was nearer to the railroad than the letter E on the Collins map?
A. Yes, sir.
Q. Did you tell him it was about 6 p. m. when you delivered to General Porter the order?
A. No, sir. He wanted me to say so, but I wouldn't do it. Then he wanted me to say it was half past 6, and I wouldn't do it.
Q. You did not want to deceive him, then?
A. I had an object in not letting him know about Captain Pope. I didn't want to be summoned.
Q. Your object in not telling him that Pope was with you was in order not to be summoned here?
A. No; I didn't want to be summoned.
Q. That was the reason you deceived him in reference to Captain Pope being with you?
A. That was one reason.
Q. You did not say that it was not earlier than that, but may have been a little later?
A. How is that? Earlier than what?
Q. "I think it was about 6 p. m. when I delivered the order to General Porter. It was not earlier than that, and may have been a little later."
A. No, sir; I did not say that, because I knew it was not so. I knew it did not take me any hour and a half to ride four and a half or five miles.

* * * * * * *

By the RECORDER:

Q. Who commanded the battalion of your regiment at the headquarters of General Pope?
A. I don't know as I can tell. I was not with the company much; I was at headquarters all the time; but I think Captain Jones, who was a lieutenant at that time.
Q. Who was the lieutenant-colonel of your regiment?
A. T. C. H. Smith, who was then at Pope's headquarters, and I believe Menken had command of a squadron, but I don't recollect whether it was so or not.
Q. Where did you first see this map called the "Collins map?"
A. I do not know. I saw one map at Columbus. Whether that is the same one or not I do not know. I have no marks by which I can tell.
Q. Who had it there?
A. Francis Collins.
Q. Have you seen him since that time?
A. I saw him here in the court-room; met him at the door on Friday.
Q. Did you make these marks on that map? [Red marks.]
A. No, sir.
Q. Are you familiar with maps of that kind?
A. No, sir.
Q. What is your occupation?
A. I am now in the grocery business; my regular business is boots and shoes.
Q. Were you acquainted with Mr. Collins before this interview that you had with him in Columbus?
A. I saw him once before that, but I was never acquainted with him.
Q. Was that the first interview that you ever had with him in reference to this case?
A. I had another interview with him, but he did not tell me at that first interview what his object was, only that he wanted to see me.
Q. How long ago is that?
A. I do not know as I can recollect just what year it was in. It was about eighteen months or maybe two years after the first trial.
Q. What was the occasion of your going to Columbus from your home at Washington Court House?
A. Do you mean the second time?
Q. Yes.
A. I received a letter from Mr. Collins requesting me to come to Columbus; that he wanted a private interview with me. He stated it would be at his expense if I came. I did not know what he wanted. I supposed it was the Porter case, and I dropped him a few lines and told him if he would send me $10 I would go, and gave him reference in Columbus that I would perform my part of the contract. In a few days the $10 came, and I went.
Q. What did Mr. Collins say he wanted with you?
A. He told me when I first went into his office that it was in regard to the Porter trial. We talked a few minutes, and he then invited me over to his house.
Q. What did he ask you?
A. It was in regard to the time when we left General Pope's headquarters with that 4.30 order, the road that we traveled, and the time that we got there.

Q. Go on and describe, as near as you can, what questions he asked you.
A. He asked me the road, asked me the point where General Porter's headquarter's were, and what time I thought it took me to travel the distance, what time I started, and the time I got there. Says he, "Can you recollect whether it was as late as half past 6?" I told him no. Then he wanted to know if it was as late as 6. I told him it was not.

WILLIAM B. LORD TESTIFIES.

William B. Lord testifies as follows (board record, marginal page 969):

Q. Will you state substantially what that interview was and what General Porter said?
A. I had been directed by the judge-advocate of the court to proceed to the rooms of General Porter, and to look for some telegrams that had been introduced in evidence that day and that had been mislaid in some way. While there looking over some papers General Porter made the remark, "I was not loyal to Pope; there is no denying that."
Q. Do you recall anything else that he said in that connection?
A. I can not say that I do, and I doubt if I should recall that now but for the peculiarity of the circumstance, and the fact that I made a record of it myself a few days afterward; otherwise I think likely I should have forgotten it.
Q. That was during the progress of his trial before a general court-martial?
A. It was.
The PRESIDENT OF THE BOARD. The decision is that the letter is admissible for the purpose stated by counsel, namely, not to prove the fact, but to test the credibility of the witness.

By the RECORDER:

Q. You have stated in your cross-examination that the feelings which had actuated you you expressed at the time you wrote that letter to your wife. It was not called for by the counsel for the petitioner; I will call for it. Please let me know what you stated on the subject, if you have that letter here.
A. [Witness produces a book.] Shall I read?
Q. Just that part and no more.
The witness read as follows:
"I have been a little bothered about General Fitz-John Porter. I had to go to his room on Monday to get some papers that belonged to the court that he had had to copy. One of the reporters of the New York Times was along with me. While in the room, after some conversation, General Porter made the remark, 'Well, I wasn't loyal to Pope; there is no denying that.' Now, that is really the charge against him before the court-martial—that he did not do his duty as an officer before the enemy, and that he did not act rightly toward General Pope, his commanding officer. General Porter said what he did in the privacy of his own room, without thinking of the effect of his words. After thinking it over I have concluded it better not to say anything about it now, though I would not promise as much for that newspaper correspondent."
Q. That is your letter-press copy of your letter to your wife?
A. It is.
Q. Do you retain usually letter-press copies of your letters to your wife?
A. All of my correspondence.
Q. Do you know whether or not some one may not have heard the same language at some other time or an affidavit made on the subject and communicated to Senator Chandler?
A. I know nothing about that.

WATERMAN L. ORMSBY CALLED.

Waterman L. Ormsby (board record, page 638), called by the recorder, being duly sworn, was examined, and testified as follows:

Direct examination:

Q. Where do you reside?
A. Two hundred and forty-seven Putnam avenue, Brooklyn.
Q. Do you know the petitioner?
A. By reputation.
Q. I mean do you know him when you see him?
A. I should not have known him to-day if he had not been pointed out to me.
Q. Do you recollect having seen him at any time during the month of December, 1862?
A. I do.
Q. Where was it?
A. In his room in the city of Washington, at his residence.
Q. About what time in the month was it?
A. I can't recollect.
Q. In reference to the beginning or end of the month?
A. I have no recollection.
Q. At the time you saw him there were you accompanied by anybody? If so, by whom?
A. By Mr. Lord, the official stenographer of the court-martial.
Q. What is his first name?
A. I think William Blair Lord is his name.
Q. Do you recall the purpose for which you went to General Porter's room?
A. Yes.
Q. Please state it.
A. I went in company with Mr. Lord for the purpose of procuring some documents which had been offered in evidence that day and which Mr. Lord desired for the official record, and which I desired to be used in my report for the New York Times, which I then represented.
Q. At that time do I understand that General Porter's trial was in progress?
A. It was then in progress.
Q. Do you recollect the conversation?
A. Only a small part of it.
Q. Do you recollect any remarks made by General Porter?
A. I do. One made a strong impression upon me at the time.
Q. What had it relation to?
A. It had relation to his feeling toward General Pope and General McClellan.
Q. What was the remark which he made?
A. "I wasn't loyal to Pope; I was loyal to McClellan."
Q. What did you at the time understand that the remark had reference to?
Mr. CHOATE. That I object to. His understanding of the matter is unimportant.
The RECORDER. On the contrary, if he knows what the conversation is about.
Mr. CHOATE. He should certainly be permitted to give all the conversation that he recollects, but anything outside of that certainly cannot be drawn from the witness.
The PRESIDENT OF THE BOARD. Perhaps the recorder can change the form of the question so as to elicit the facts without its being subject to objection.
The RECORDER. I will take the ruling of the board upon the question.
Mr. CHOATE. We suppose that it is the board's understanding of anything that General Porter may have been proved to have said and not the witness's understanding.
The PRESIDENT OF THE BOARD. I suggest to the recorder that it might be better to ascertain what transpired to produce an understanding on the part of the witness.
The RECORDER. Then the question is overruled?
The PRESIDENT OF THE BOARD. For the present.
Q. When that remark was made what was the conversation?
A. It would be impossible for me to state another word of that conversation positively. My recollection is that it referred to the testimony which had been given that day and concerning which General Porter seemed to be considerably excited.

EVIDENCE OF GENERAL GRIFFIN.

Then take the evidence of General Griffin. General Griffin commanded one of the brigades of Morell's division. Griffin retired with his brigade to Centreville. He said:

In the evening, a little after dark, there were some very heavy volleys of musketry, the enemy evidently driving our troops right before them. That musketry was to our right and front, I should say two miles; maybe not so far, maybe farther. I should have stated, when I stated that I heard no other firing but artillery, that in marching we had some skirmish firing.
Q. You spoke of having returned from the movement you made to the right in consequence of obstacles that you encountered. What was the character of those obstacles and what efforts did you make to overcome them?
A. I led off my column. We ran up into some little thick pine bushes. We halted there. The next order I got was to move back again. Some one reported that we could not get through. I made no reconnaissance whatever myself.
Q. You say that you had failed to get through to the right during the day of the 29th of August. Will you state what efforts were made by you or by General Porter to get through on the right during that day?
A. I merely obeyed orders.

He does not say that he made any effort, but "I merely obeyed orders."

My position was at the head of my brigade. What efforts General Porter made I am not aware of.

GENERAL MORELL'S TESTIMONY.

General Morell, division commander of Porter, says:

Colonel Marshall reports that two batteries have come down in the woods on our right toward the railroad and two regiments of infantry on the road. If this be so, it will be hot here in the morning.
Q. Was that returned with this indorsement of General Porter: "Move the infantry and everything behind the crest and conceal the guns. We must hold that place and make it too hot for them. Come the same game over them that they do over us, and get your men out of sight?"
A. Yes, that was the next one.
Q. When that was received by you, directing you to move your infantry and everything behind the crest and conceal the guns, where were your infantry and the other troops?
A. At that time they were deployed in line, mostly two brigades, along the crest that leads to the descent towards Dawkin's Branch.
Q. It was from there that you were directed to move?
A. From there I was directed to put the men under cover. On this left-hand side of the road as we advanced it was all open ground; on the right-hand side bushes. One of my batteries, supported by a brigade, was on the right-hand side of the road, just on the crest of the ridge; the other battery on this side. When General Porter sent me that order I put them back into the pine bushes; and the other two batteries on this side of the road were on a slight depression; I supposed the ridge in front would conceal them from the enemy. I had three batteries, and one was in position all the time.

General Morell continues, on page 423, board record:

Q. Why is it that on No. 30, the communication from General Porter to yourself, and on those that follow, there is no memorandum of the hour and minute of the receipt?
A. It was always my practice to note the hour of the receipt. Two days previous to that, on the march from Kelly's Ford to the junction, I injured my watch, and then I had to guess at the time.
Q. And you did not put on the guess?
A. I did not put on the guess.
Q. Will you state whether the indorsement of General Porter on No. 31 was received by you as appears upon it?
A. Yes, sir.
Q. Your communication to him is this:
"GENERAL PORTER: I can move everything out of sight except Hazlett's battery. Griffin is supporting it, and is on its right, principally in the pine bushes. The other batteries are retired out of sight. Is this what you mean by everything?
"GEO. W. MORELL, Major-General."
A. Yes, sir.
The indorsement was read, as follows:
"I think you can move Hazlett's, or the most of it, and post him in the bushes with the others, so as to deceive. I would get everything, if possible, in ambuscade. All goes well with the other troops."
The WITNESS. Yes, everything was out of sight except Hazlett's battery. That was exposed all day long.
Q. Then, on the receipt of No. 31 from General Porter, you did not succeed in getting Hazlett's battery under cover?
A. No, I didn't attempt to. I wanted to keep one battery in position. That was in front of the bushes, with a brigade immediately behind it. The other two brigades were massed in the rear of that.
"GENERAL MORELL: Tell me what is passing quickly. If the enemy is coming, hold to him, and I will come up. Post your men to repulse him.
"F. J. PORTER, Major-General."
Q. What next?
A. Then, I think, 35; which is a note from me to General Porter:
"GENERAL PORTER: Colonel Marshall reports a movement in front of his left. I think we had better retire. No infantry in sight, and I am continuing the movement. Stay where you are, to aid me if necessary.
"MORELL."
"Colonel Marshall reports a movement in front of his left. I think we had better retire."

What does Porter say?

"GENERAL MORELL: I have all within reach of you. I wish you to give the enemy a good shelling without wasting ammunition, and push at the same time a party over to see what is going on. We can not retire while McDowell holds his own.
"F. J. P."

I desire in this connection to call the attention of the Senate to the following facts. General Morell, in his testimony, says:

Q. Did the putting of those that were foremost under cover cause any movement of those behind them?

A. I think not. I think those immediately behind Hazlett's battery remained where they were, and the others went to the rear.

* * * * * * *

Q. Will you look at the communication from General Porter to Generals McDowell and King, on that day, which is printed on page 243 of the original record?

"GENERALS MCDOWELL AND KING: I found it impossible to communicate by crossing the woods to Groveton. The enemy are in great force on this road, and as they appear to have driven our forces back, the force of the enemy having advanced and ours retired, I have determined to withdraw to Manassas. I have attempted to communicate with McDowell and Sigel, but my messengers have run into the enemy."

Q. What I want to ask is, whether you had any knowledge of that communication being made that day?

A. I don't remember it.

Q. Did you receive or know of any order indicating a withdrawal to Manassas?

A. No, sir; nothing of the kind.

Q. Or any movement in that direction?

A. Nothing of the kind.

Q. Will you look at a copy of a communication from General Warren to General Sykes, dated 5.45 p. m., August 29, 1862, which has been put in evidence? [Paper shown witness.] In this General Warren uses these words. I will read the whole of it:

"GENERAL SYKES: I received an order from Mr. Cutting to advance to the support of Morell; I faced about and did so. I soon met Griffin's brigade withdrawing, by order of General Morell, who was not pushed out, but retiring. I faced about and marched back two hundred yards or so; I met then an orderly from General Porter to General Morell, saying he must push on and press the enemy; that all was going well for us and he was retiring. Griffin then faced about, and I am following him to support General Morell, as ordered. None of the batteries are closed up to me.

"Respectfully, "G. K. WARREN."

Q. Do you know anything of that allusion to yourself in it?

A. No, sir; I never gave General Griffin any order of that kind.

Q. What kind?

A. That he should retire or retreat. There was no order to leave the front, except to get under cover of those bushes.

Q. State whether during the whole of the 29th you had your whole division in command ready to meet any attack that might be made by the enemy.

A. Yes; I did.

Q. Although they were under cover, as you have described?

A. Within reach, at any rate, of the batteries just at the other side of the road; within a few minutes' call.

Q. Were your advanced regiments and skirmishers in such position in the neighborhood of Dawkin's Branch that if any movement toward attacking you had been made by the enemy you would have known it in time to receive it with the whole of your division?

A. I think so.

Q. Will you state what action you took in obedience to No. 37, which directed you to push up two regiments supported by two others preceded by skirmishers, the regiments at intervals of two hundred yards, and attack the section of artillery opposed to you—what you did with the four regiments indicated, and what you did with the rest of your division in connection with what you did or what you ordered?

* * * * * * *

A. When I received that order—the latter part says "the battle works well on our right"—

* * * * * * * *

"the battle works well on our right; the enemy said to be retiring up the pike"—I said immediately to the person who brought it that the order was given under a misapprehension. We knew the enemy were not retiring; and I believe I sent that message to General Porter. I immediately gave orders to move the whole of my division to the front to be in readiness to support the four regiments. While that was going on I received a verbal order from Colonel Locke to make an attack. When I received this order it was quite late in the afternoon, just before sunset; the sun was almost touching the tops of the trees. And soon after that an order in writing, which is No. 38, "to put the men in position and remain during the night."

General Morell's attention was here called to Colonel Locke's statement on court-martial trial, and then this follows:

"He (that is, the messenger from General Pope) handed the general a note, which I afterward ascertained was an order for him to attack the enemy at once. He very soon afterward ordered me to ride up to General Morell and direct him to move forward and attack the enemy immediately, and to say that he would be up himself right after me."

Then on page 223:

"Toward the close of the day, when I was sent by General Porter to General Morell with the order for him to move forward his division and attack the enemy, on my way up to General Morell I passed Colonel (now General) Warren."

Is that, as you now understand it, the verbal order which General Locke finally brought to you to attack after you had received and were proceeding to execute No. 37?

A. I think now that it is, from conversations that I had had with Major Earle. At the time I knew nothing about this 4.30 order.

Q. You merely received this written and verbal order directing an attack in succession?

A. Yes; and when Colonel Locke came to me with that order I was engaged in getting my men up to the front, and I supposed it was rather supplementary to the written order, and perhaps to expedite the movement. After this investigation was begun I tried very hard to recollect who brought me that written order to attack with four regiments, and until I conversed with Major Earle and saw the letter of his I could not fix it. But upon talking with him I am very well satisfied now that he did bring the order, and that Colonel Locke's order referred to the 4.30 p. m. order.

Q. Colonel Locke's order that he describes as being for you to attack with your division?

A. As Colonel Locke states in his testimony, on page 223. I can not speak positively, but, from conversation with Major Earle and my recollection, I have no doubt that it is so.

There is the evidence of his own staff officer showing that he saw him receive the order, and that he immediately sent an order to Morell to attack, and so soon as he gave the order for Morell to attack then he dispatched a written order to Morell directing him not to attack, but to remain in statu quo all night.

Dispatches that passed between Porter and General Morell on the 29th of August, 1862, while Morell occupied the position mentioned by him in his testimony, and while Porter was two and one-half miles back at Bethlehem chapel:

DISPATCHES BETWEEN PORTER AND MORELL.

AUGUST 29, 1862.

GENERAL MORELL: Push over to the aid of Sigel and strike in his rear. If you reach a road up which King is moving and he has got ahead of you, let him pass, but see if you can not give help to Sigel. If you find him retiring, move back toward Manassas, and should necessity require it, and you do not hear from me, push to Centreville. If you find the direct road filled, take the one via Union Mills, which is to the right as you return.

F. J. PORTER, Major-General.

Look to the points of the compass for Manassas.

GENERAL MORELL: Hold on, if you can, to your present place. What is passing?

F. J. PORTER.

GENERAL: Colonel Marshall reports that two batteries have come down in the woods on our right toward the railroad and two regiments of infantry on the road. If this be so, it will be hot here in the morning.

GEO. W. MORELL, Major-General.

Indorsed as follows:

Move the infantry and everything behind the crest and conceal the guns. We must hold that place and make it too hot for them. Come the same game over them they do over us, and get your men out of sight.

F. J. PORTER.

GENERAL PORTER: I can move everything out of sight except Hazlett's battery. Griffin is supporting it, and is on its right, principally in the pine bushes. The other batteries and brigades are retired out of sight. Is this what you mean by everything?

GEO. W. MORELL, Major-General.

Indorsed as follows:

GENERAL MORELL: I think you can move Hazlett's, or the most of it, and post him in the bushes with the others, so as to deceive. I would get everything if possible in ambuscade. All goes well with the other troops.

F. J. P.

GENERAL MORELL: Tell me what is passing quickly. If the enemy is coming, hold to him, and I will come up. Post your men to repulse him.

F. J. PORTER, Major-General.

GENERAL PORTER: Colonel Marshall reports a movement in front of his left. I think we had better retire. No infantry in sight, and I am continuing the movement. Stay where you are, to aid me if necessary.

MORELL.

GENERAL MORELL: I have all within reach of you. I wish you to give the enemy a good shelling without wasting ammunition, and push at the same time a party over to see what is going on. We can not retire while McDowell holds his own.

F. J. P.

AUGUST 29.

GENERAL MORELL: I wish you to push up two regiments supported by two others, preceded by skirmishers, the regiments at intervals of two hundred yards, and attack the section of artillery opposed to you. The battle works well on our right, and the enemy are said to be retiring up the pike. Give the enemy a good shelling as our troops advance.

F. J. PORTER,
Major-General Commanding.

GENERAL MORELL: Put your men in position to remain during the night and have out your pickets. Put them so that they will be in a position to resist anything. I am about a mile from you. McDowell says all goes well, and we are getting the best of the fight. I wish you would send me a dozen men from the cavalry. Keep me informed. Troops are passing up to Gainesville, pushing the enemy. Ricketts has gone; also King.

F. J. PORTER, Major-General.

WARREN'S NOTE TO GENERAL SYKES.

5 h. 45 m. P. M., Aug. 29, '62.

GENERAL SYKES: I received an order from Mr. Cutting to advance and support Morell. I faced about and did so. I soon met Griffin's brigade, withdrawing, by order of General Morell, who was not pushed out, but returning. I faced about and marched back two hundred yards or so. I met then an orderly from General Porter to General Morell, saying he must push on and press the enemy; that all was going well for us, and he was returning. Griffin then faced about; and I am following him to support General Morell, as ordered. None of the batteries are closed up to me.

Respectfully, G. K. WARREN.

It was denied that General Sturgis was under Porter's orders; here is the evidence:

GENERAL STURGIS: Please put your command in motion to follow Sykes as soon as he starts. If you know of any other troops who are to join me, I wish you to send them notice to follow you.

We march as soon as we can see.

F. J. PORTER, Major-General.

PORTER'S DISPATCHES TO M'DOWELL AND KING.

General MCDOWELL or KING:

I have been wandering over the woods, and failed to get a communication to you. Tell how matters go with you. The enemy is in strong force in front of me, and I wish to know your design for to-night. If left to me, I shall have to retire for food and water, which I can not get here. How goes the battle? It seems to go to our rear. The enemy are getting to our left.

F. J. PORTER,
Major-General Volunteers.

GENERAL MCDOWELL: Failed in getting Morell over to you. After wandering about the woods for a time I withdrew him, and while doing so artillery opened upon us. The fire of the enemy having advanced and ours retired, I have determined to withdraw to Manassas. I have attempted to communicate with McDowell and Sigel, but my messengers have run into the enemy. They have gathered artillery and cavalry and infantry, and the advancing masses of dust show the enemy coming in force. I am now going to the head of the column to see what is passing and how affairs are going, and I will communicate with you. Had you not better send your train back?

F. J. PORTER, Major-General.

AUGUST 29, 1862.

GENERALS MCDOWELL AND KING: I found it impossible to communicate by crossing the woods to Groveton. The enemy are in strong force on this road, and as they appear to have driven our forces back, the firing of the enemy having advanced and ours retired, I have determined to withdraw to Manassas. I have attempted to communicate with McDowell and Sigel, but my messengers have run into the enemy. They have gathered artillery and cavalry and infantry, and the advancing masses of dust show the enemy coming in force.

I am now going to the head of the column to see what is passing and how affairs are going. Had you not better send your train back? I will communicate with you.

F. J. PORTER, Major-General.

I desire to call attention to the fact that none of the communications to Morell, McDowell, and King, or any other officer, by Porter, has the time of sending or receiving the same marked on that day—a very unusual and unmilitary proceeding.

DISPATCH OF GENERAL BUFORD TO GENERAL RICKETTS

HEADQUARTERS CAVALRY BRIGADE—9.30 a. m.

GENERAL RICKETTS: Seventeen regiments, one battery, and five hundred cavalry passed through Gainesville three-quarters of an hour ago on the Centreville road. I think this division should join our forces now engaged at once. Please forward this.

JOHN BUFORD, Brigadier-General.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment made as in Committee of the Whole was concurred in.

Mr. MILLER, of California. Before voting on this bill I should like to have it read.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill as amended will be read.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

That the President be, and he is hereby, authorized to nominate and, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, to appoint Fitz-John Porter, late a major-general of the United States volunteers and a brevet brigadier-general and colonel of the Army, to the position of colonel in the Army of the United States, of the same grade and rank held by him at the time of his dismissal from the Army by sentence of court-martial promulgated January 27, 1863, and, in his discretion, to place him on the retired-list of the Army as of that grade, the retired-list being thereby increased in number to that extent; and all laws and parts of laws in conflict herewith are suspended for this purpose only: Provided, That said Fitz-John Porter shall receive no pay, compensation, or allowance whatsoever prior to his appointment under this act.

Mr. MILLER, of California. Mr. President, I move to amend by striking out the words "in his discretion," in the twelfth line.

Mr. EDMUNDS. That is not in order now. That is to amend an amendment which has been agreed to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. FRYE in the chair). The Clerk informs the Chair that these words are in the original bill and are not in the amendment as agreed to by the Senate.

Mr. MILLER, of California. Are they not in the bill as it stands?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. They are not in the bill as it stands now, the Chair is informed.

Mr. CONGER. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Clerk now informs the Chair that the words mentioned by the Senator from California are in the amendment adopted by the Senate, but as the amendment has been agreed to it is not now open to amendment.

Mr. SEWELL. Let the Secretary read the bill again. The bill as reported by the committee is the exact bill of last year verbatim.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator desire to have the bill read again?

Mr. SEWELL. Not unless there is doubt about it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill is open to amendment. If there be no amendment, the question is on ordering the amendment to be engrossed and the bill to be read the third time.

Mr. CONGER. Mr. President, I move, in the twelfth and thirteenth lines, to strike out the words "on the" and insert "a," and in the thirteenth line to strike out the word "the" and insert "an additional."

Mr. EDMUNDS. The amendment adopted as a substitute has been agreed to, and therefore it can not now be amended except by addition.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is a point of order made against the amendment?

Mr. CONGER. It now reads "and place him on the retired-list of the Army as of that grade." My proposition is "an additional retired-list being hereby provided for that purpose."

Mr. SEWELL. I make the point of order that the amendment can not be amended now, it having been adopted by the Senate.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair holds that the amendment reported by the Committee of the Whole to the Senate as a substitute having been adopted by the Senate is not now the subject of amendment.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Except by addition.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Except by addition.

Mr. CONGER. The object of my amendment was that we might not bring disgrace upon the honorable retired-list of the Army, but make a separate one for this class of cases.

Mr. RIDDLEBERGER. Mr. President, if I knew nothing more about this matter than what I have heard on this floor, I should possibly feel with the Senator from Michigan [Mr. CONGER].

I do not deem it necessary to make any apology for the vote I shall cast. I was one of those who participated in what is known in one section of this country as the second battle of Manassas. I went through it all. I do know that on what is called in the history of the war and best known as "the railroad fight," the troops of Fitz-John Porter were on one side of that railroad and the troops of him whom we yet call Stonewall Jackson were on the other. I do know that in that fight there were times when less than ten paces marked the distance between the banners of one army and the banners of the other. I do know, sir, that men who were shot on one side of that railroad rolled down its banks on that side, and men who were shot on the other side rolled down its banks on that. I do know, sir, as I say, that Fitz-John Porter's troops fought on one side and Stonewall Jackson's on the other. That battle was after this so-called disobedience of orders; and whatever may have been the disobedience, if you choose so to call it, of Fitz-John Porter on the 29th, it seems to me that every man who feels that he ought to do justice to him will estimate his patriotism and fidelity by what he did on the 30th. It was Butterfield's division that confronted ours in that contest, and Butterfield's division was in Fitz-John Porter's corps. There could have been no treason in the heart of a man who commanded at that time the Federal troops against the then confederate troops.

I say, therefore, that in my judgment Fitz-John Porter ought to be restored. If he disobeyed an order and simply disobeyed it in the exercise of what he thought was a proper discretion, God knows he has suffered enough. I can recall an instance almost similar to it when General Jackson told Garnett that he must go to the rear of his command and suffer under arrest at Harrisonburg for withdrawing the Second Infantry from the stone fence at Kernstown, but yet within a year Garnett was restored, and he attested his fidelity to what he believed to be right by the sacrifice of his life at the battle of Antietam.

I hope, sir, that when we restore Fitz-John Porter we shall restore him wholly, and that we shall do to him that justice which in my judgment belongs to him and ought to have been done for him some years ago.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the engrossment of the amendment and the third reading of the bill.

The amendment was ordered to be engrossed and the bill to be read a third time.

The bill was read the third time.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question now is on the passage of the bill.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Let us have the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered; and the Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. BECK (when his name was called). I am paired on this matter with the Senator from Maine [Mr HALE], who is necessarily absent. If he were present, I would vote "yea" and he would vote "nay."

Mr. BOWEN (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from Florida [Mr. JONES]. I should vote "nay" if he were here and he would vote "yea."

Mr. BUTLER (when his name was called). I am paired generally with the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. CAMERON]. I understand he is in favor of this bill, and I shall therefore vote, and will announce while I am up that I understand the Senator from Pennsylvania is paired with the Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. ANTHONY] on this question.

Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin (when his name was called). Upon this question and on all questions connected with this bill I am paired with the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. GEORGE]. If I were not paired with him, I should vote "nay."

Mr. MILLER, of New York (when his name was called). On this question I am paired with the Senator from West Virginia [Mr. CAMDEN]. If he were here, he would vote "yea" and I should vote "nay."

Mr. PLUMB (when his name was called). On this question I am paired with the Senator from Missouri [Mr. VEST]. If he were present, I should vote "nay."

Mr. SAWYER (when his name was called). I am paired on this question with the Senator from West Virginia [Mr. KENNA]. If he were here, I should vote "nay" and he would vote "yea."

The roll-call was concluded.

Mr. BOWEN. The Senator from Florida [Mr. JONES] having returned, I vote "nay."

The result was announced—yeas 36, nays 25; as follows:

YEAS—36.

Bayard,	Garland,	Jones of Florida,	Riddleberger,
Brown,	Gibson,	Jones of Nevada,	Sabin,
Butler,	Gorman,	Lamar,	Saulsbury,
Call,	Groome,	McPherson,	Sewell,
Cockrell,	Hampton,	Maxey,	Slater,
Coke,	Harris,	Morgan,	Vance,
Colquitt,	Hoar,	Pendleton,	Voorhees,
Fair,	Jackson,	Pike,	Walker,
Farley,	Jonas,	Pugh,	Williams.

NAYS—25.

Aldrich,	Dolph,	Logan,	Platt,
Allison,	Edmunds,	McMillan,	Sherman,
Blair,	Frye,	Manderson,	Van Wyck,
Bowen,	Harrison,	Miller of Cal.,	Wilson.
Conger,	Hawley,	Mitchell,
Cullom,	Hill,	Morrill,
Dawes,	Ingalls,	Palmer,

ABSENT—15.

Anthony,	Cameron of Wis.,	Lapham,	Ransom,
Beck,	George,	Mahone,	Sawyer,
Camden,	Hale,	Miller of N. Y.,	Vest.
Cameron of Pa.,	Kenna,	Plumb,

So the bill was passed.

Mr. HAWLEY. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The doors will be closed and the galleries cleared.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Mr. JACKSON. While the doors are being closed I desire leave to introduce a bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. If there be no objection the Chair will receive the bill.

Mr. JACKSON introduced a bill (S. 1839) for the erection of a public building at Chattanooga, Tenn.; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds.

Mr. COCKRELL introduced a bill (S. 1840) granting a pension to S. A. Riggs; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. HOAR. While the doors are being closed I ask leave to present a petition.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair will receive it, unless objection be made.

Mr. HOAR presented the petition of John Fletcher, stepfather of Michael Fletcher, late private Company I, Twenty-second Regiment Massachusetts Volunteers, praying to be granted a pension; which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

WITHDRAWAL OF PAPERS.

On motion of Mr. HAMPTON, it was Ordered, That the pension papers relating to Tenedore Ten Eyck be withdrawn from the files of the Senate to be returned to the Pension Bureau.

On motion of Mr. HARRIS, it was Ordered, That the attorney for Perez Dickerson be permitted to withdraw the papers in his case from the files of the Senate.

FITZ-JOHN PORTER.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair, while having the Fitz-John Porter bill in hand, knew nothing about the preamble, and no question was put about the preamble. The bill contains a preamble on which the question has not yet been put.

Mr. CONGER. Then of course the bill is not disposed of. Let it come up in regular session where it belongs. Neither the preamble nor the title has been acted on.

Mr. SEWELL. I move that the doors be opened for the purpose of acting on the preamble.

Mr. CONGER. I should like to have that come before the Senate another day. I think the notoriety given will be useful to the country.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from New Jersey moves that the doors be now opened.

Mr. MILLER, of New York. I move that the Senate adjourn.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from New York moves that the Senate do now adjourn.

Mr. CONGER. I call for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered; and being taken, resulted—yeas 19, nays 37; as follows:

YEAS—19.

Allison,	Cullom,	Ingalls,	Morrill,
Blair,	Dawes.	McMillan,	Platt,
Bowen,	Edmunds,	Miller of Cal.,	Plumb,
Cameron of Wis.,	Frye,	Miller of N. Y.,	Van Wyck.
Conger,	Hill,	Mitchell,

NAYS—37.

Bayard,	Garland,	Jonas,	Sabin,
Beck,	Gibson,	Lamar,	Saulsbury,
Brown,	Gorman,	McPherson,	Sewell,
Butler,	Groome,	Manderson,	Sherman.
Call,	Hampton,	Maxey,	Vance,
Cockrell,	Harris,	Morgan,	Voorhees,
Coke,	Harrison,	Pendleton,	Williams.
Colquitt,	Hawley,	Pike,
Fair,	Hoar,	Pugh,
Farley,	Jackson,	Riddleberger,

ABSENT—20.

Aldrich,	George,	Lapham,	Sawyer,
Anthony,	Hale,	Logan,	Slater,
Camden,	Jones of Florida,	Mahone,	Vest,
Cameron of Pa.,	Jones of Nevada,	Palmer,	Walker,
Dolph,	Kenna,	Ransom,	Wilson.

So the Senate refused to adjourn.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from New Jersey [Mr. SEWELL] moves that the preamble be agreed to.

Mr. EDMUNDS. What has become of the order of the Senate to proceed to the consideration of executive business?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It has not yet been reported to the Chair that the doors were closed.

Mr. INGALLS. The Senate ordered the doors to be closed.

Mr. EDMUNDS. The Senate agreed that it would proceed to the consideration of executive business. Every door is closed. That was the order. True some routine business was received before the order was executed; but before a motion to open the doors can be made the order must be executed.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The motion to open the doors has not been considered and is not being entertained by the Chair. The motion to adjourn of course the Chair was compelled to entertain. The doorkeeper has not yet notified the Chair that the doors are closed.

Mr. EDMUNDS. The Chair can entertain no motion and lay no business before the Senate until the order to close the doors is executed.

Mr. SEWELL. I move that the doors be declared open.

Mr. EDMUNDS. You can not make such a motion now until the order is executed.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It has been usual to receive business while the doors are being closed. The Chair now directs the full execution of the order.

The Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business, and after two minutes spent therein the doors were reopened.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The doors are now open.

Mr. CONGER. I do not see the doors open.

The PRESIDING OEFICER. The Chair is informed that they are open.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Let the preamble of the pending bill be read.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from New Jersey [Mr. SEWELL] moves that the preamble be agreed to and the Senator from Vermont [Mr. EDMUNDS] asks that the preamble be read.

Mr. CONGER. Mr. President, I rise to a point of order.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Michigan will state his point of order.

Mr. CONGER. At the point where we are now with this bill again brought to the consideration of the Senate what is our condition? The galleries were crowded with people when it was under consideration before, the reporters were here, the public were present before the Senate; but just at the time when you were approaching the most objectionable part of it, and as to the disposition of which the public desired to be informed, and which some Senators desired to speak upon in the presence of that public, there was a motion to go into executive session, and the American people were put ignominiously out of this Chamber lest they should hear what should be said on this subject.

The reporters are here now. The reporters will take down and make statement of this fact that the doors were closed and the public driven from this Hall before the consideration of the preamble was entered upon.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Will the Senator from Michigan state his point of order? [Laughter.]

Mr. CONGER. My point of order is that the doors leading into these galleries are not yet opened and were not opened when I commenced my remarks, not one of them.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The doors are all open.

Mr. HARRIS. The galleries are filling up.

Mr. CONGER. I have at least detained the Senate long enough to have the doors opened.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The preamble will be read.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

Whereas the board of Army officers convened by the President of the United States by special orders numbered 78, headquarters of the Army, April 12, 1878, to examine into and report upon the case of Fitz-John Porter, late a major-general of the United States volunteers and a brevet brigadier-general and colonel of the Army, having by their report of March 19, 1879, stated that, in their opinion, "justice required at his (the President's) hands such action as may be necessary to annul and set aside the findings and sentence of the court-martial in the case of Maj. Gen. Fitz-John Porter, and to restore him to the positions of which the sentence deprived him, such restoration to take effect from the date of dismissal from the service;" and

Whereas the President, on the 4th day of May, 1882, remitted so much of the sentence of said court-martial remaining unexecuted as "forever disqualified the said Fitz-John Porter from holding any office of trust or profit under the Government of the United States:" Therefore, that justice may be done the said Fitz-John Porter, and to carry into effect the recommendation of said board—,

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the preamble.

Mr. SEWELL. This preamble is the preamble passed by the Senate last year.

Mr. CONGER called for the yeas and nays, and they were ordered.

Mr. HAWLEY. I suppose there is no use in making any appeal, but I should be very glad if the majority would excuse us from the preamble, confine the bill to reappointing General Porter, and not compel us to vote to annul the judgment of a court-martial, as lawful a court as the Supreme Court of the United States. That is all my speech.

Mr. CONGER. I desire to say that this preamble was prepared for another bill and makes recitations which are not at all applicable to the bill which has been passed as amended. Now, sir, it is disgrace enough to have been a member of the body which passed the bill, if that be any disgrace, or honor enough if that be any honor; but to be compelled to see adopted a preamble of this kind should not be imposed on gentlemen who desire to be excused from the responsibility of passing the bill or adopting the preamble.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The yeas and nays have been ordered on the adoption of the preamble.

The Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. BECK (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from Maine [Mr. HALE].

Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin (when his name was called). I was paired with the Senator from West Virginia [Mr. KENNA], but I have transferred that pair to the Senator from Illinois [Mr. LOGAN], who is absent from the Chamber for the time, and I vote "nay."

Mr. FARLEY. The Senator from Illinois is paired.

Mr. VANCE. The Senator from Illinois is paired with my colleague [Mr. RANSOM].

Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin. I transfer my pair anyhow.

Mr. LAMAR (when Mr. GEORGE'S name was called). On this question the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. CAMERON] is paired with my colleague [Mr. GEORGE].

Mr. HILL (when his name was called). I am paired on this question with the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. WALKER].

Mr. MILLER, of New York, (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from West Virginia [Mr. CAMDEN]. I should like to transfer my pair to some other Republican that is absent, as I desire very much to vote against the preamble.

Mr. VANCE (when Mr. RANSOM'S name was called). I desire to say, in justice to my colleague [Mr. RANSOM], that I understand he had a general pair with the Senator from Illinois [Mr. LOGAN], and that impression was confirmed by the Senator from Illinois himself; but whether there was any exception of this case I am not able to say.

The roll-call was concluded.

Mr. MILLER, of New York. Has the Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. ALDRICH] voted or has a pair been announced for him?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair is informed that he did not vote and no pair has been announced for him.

Mr. MILLER, of New York. I take the liberty, then, of transferring my pair with the Senator from West Virginia [Mr. CAMDEN] to the Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. ALDRICH], and I vote "nay."

Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin. My colleague [Mr. SAWYER] and I have got into some confusion about our pairs. He is paired with the Senator from West Virginia [Mr. KENNA]. I was originally paired with the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. GEORGE]. I have transferred that pair to the Senator from Illinois [Mr. LOGAN], so that the Senator from Illinois and the Senator from Mississippi are paired on this vote.

Mr. DOLPH (after having voted in the negative). My colleague [Mr. SLATER] was absent when I voted. I am paired with him on all political questions. As the other side of the House are voting as an entirety for the preamble, I withdraw my vote.

The result was announced—yeas 33, nays 22; as follows:

YEAS—33.

Bayard,	Garland,	Jones of Florida,	Sabin,
Brown,	Gibson,	Lamar,	Saulsbury,
Butler,	Gorman,	McPherson,	Sewell,
Call,	Groome,	Maxey,	Vance,
Cockrell,	Hampton,	Morgan,	Voorhees,
Coke,	Harris,	Pendleton,	Williams.
Colquitt,	Hoar,	Pike,
Fair,	Jackson,	Pugh,
Farley,	Jonas,	Riddleberger,

NAYS—22.

Allison,	Dawes,	Ingalls,	Palmer,
Blair,	Dolph,	McMillan,	Platt,
Bowen,	Edmunds,	Manderson,	Van Wyck,
Cameron of Wis.,	Frye,	Miller of Cal.,	Wilson.
Conger,	Harrison,	Miller of N. Y.,
Cullom,	Hawley,	Morrill,

ABSENT—21.

Aldrich,	Hale,	Mahone,	Slater,
Anthony,	Hill,	Mitchell,	Vest,
Beck,	Jones of Nevada,	Plumb,	Walker.
Camden,	Kenna,	Ransom,
Cameron of Pa.,	Lapham,	Sawyer,
George,	Logan,	Sherman,

So the preamble was agreed to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The title will stand as reported, unless objection be made.

Mr. SEWELL. I move that the Senate adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and (at 4 o'clock and 58 minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

THURSDAY, March 13, 1884.

The House met at 12 o'clock m. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. JOHN S. LINDSAY, D. D.

The Journal of yesterday's proceedings was read and approved.

PRIVATE LAND CLAIM—FREDERICK WILLIAMS.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of the Interior, transmitting the report of the Acting Commissioner of the General Land Office upon the private land claim of the representatives of Frederick Williams, of Natchitoches, La., with the accompanying papers; which was referred to the Committee on Private Land Claims.

CONTINGENT EXPENSES GENERAL LAND OFFICE.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of the Interior, asking an immediate appropriation of $20,000 to supply deficiencies in the appropriations for the contingent expenses of the Land Office for the fiscal year 1884; which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

By unanimous consent, leave of absence was granted to Mr. PEELLE, of Indiana, for one week, on account of important business.

WITHDRAWAL OF PAPERS.

By unanimous consent, leave to withdraw papers was granted in the following cases:

To Mr. ROGERS, of Arkansas, papers relating to the claim of Watt. Grayson, a Creek Indian, for depredations upon his property in the Indian country, there being no adverse report; and

To Mr. RAYMOND, to withdraw from the files of the House papers accompanying House bill 1690.

LEAVE TO PRINT.

By unanimous consent, leave was granted to Mr. KLEINER to print some remarks and statistics on the bill to pension soldiers of the Mexican war. [See Appendix.]

CORRECTION OF A REFERENCE.

The SPEAKER. The Chair wishes to correct a reference of a memorial made on the 11th instant, for relief in connection with the floods in the Arkansas River, presented by the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. BRECKINRIDGE]. This was improperly referred to the Committee on Appropriations. It should have been referred to the Committee on Rivers and Harbors.

If there be no objection, the change of reference will be made.

There was no objection, and it was ordered accordingly.

AUTHORITY OF SUBCOMMITTEES TO ADMINISTER OATHS.

Mr. HAMMOND. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to discharge the House Calendar from the further consideration of the bill (H. R. 4411) to amend section 101 of the Revised Statutes of the United States so as to allow the chairman of a subcommittee of a committee of either House of Congress to administer oaths and put the same upon its passage.

The SPEAKER. The bill will be read, subject to objection.

The bill was read. It is as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That section 101 of the Revised Statutes of the United States be amended by adding, after the word "Congress," the words "or of any subcommittee of any committee of either House of Congress;" so that the section will read:

SEC. 101. The President of the Senate, the Speaker of the House of Representatives, or a chairman of a Committee of the Whole, or any committee of either House of Congress, or of any subcommittee of any committee of either House of Congress, is empowered to administer oaths to witnesses in any case under their examination.

Mr. HAMMOND. This is the unanimous report of the Committee on the Judiciary.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There was no objection.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. HAMMOND moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

MANUFACTURE AND SALE OF OLEOMARGARINE, ETC.

Mr. PARKER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to take from the House Calendar resolutions authorizing the Committee on Agriculture to make an investigation as to the manufacture and sale of oleomargarine and other imitation, artificial, or adulterated butters. I do not wish to debate the subject, but merely to ask that the authority be given to the Committee on Agriculture to make the investigation.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. FIEDLER (from his seat). I object.

Mr. PARKER. I make the point of order that no member has risen to object.

The SPEAKER. The point of order is well taken. The Clerk will report the resolution, after which the Chair will ask for objection to the request of the gentleman from New York.

The Clerk read as follows:

Whereas it is alleged that the interests of the American agriculturists and dairymen are greatly and unjustly injured by the manufacture, sale, and use of oleomargarine, butterine, suine, and imitation, artificial, and adulterated butters of different kinds, and of adulterated and imitation compounds and mixtures sold and consumed as dairy products; and

Whereas it is alleged that fat and oils of hogs and cattle and of other animals, and also that vegetable oils are used in the making and compounding of suine, oleomargarine butter, butterine, and adulterated and imitation dairy products, and also that such fats and oils are used and are imported and are exported to be used for the making and compounding of such artificial, adulterated, and imitation dairy products, and that such adulterated imitation compounds are surreptitiously sold in this country and elsewhere in competition with genuine dairy products, greatly to the injury of the agriculturists and dairymen of the United States; and

Whereas it is alleged that the manufacture, sale, and exportation and disposition of said compounds, materials, and commodities is so conducted as to avoid general publicity and to prevent the obtaining of accurate or desirable statistics in relation thereto, and to mislead and deceive the consumer as to the actual character, composition, and ingredients, thereof: Therefore,

Resolved, That the Committee on Agriculture be, and hereby is, instructed to inquire into and investigate the said allegations and ascertain the facts relating thereto, and the facts and statistics of the adulterated and imitation compounds and mixtures of dairy products, and of the materials composing the same.

The amendment recommended by the committee was to add to the resolution the following:

And to this end the said committee is hereby empowered to send for persons and papers.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. FIEDLER. I object.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. I demand the regular order.

Mr. COBB. I hope the gentleman from Illinois will not insist upon the regular order, but allow me to present a report from the Committee on Public Lands with reference to the investigation of a very important subject committed to that committee.

Mr. STEELE. I demand the regular order.

Mr. KEIFER rose.

Mr. COBB. This is a privileged report.

CONFERENCE ON MILITARY ACADEMY APPROPRIATION BILL.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Ohio has risen (as the Chairman is informed) to submit a report from the Committee on Appropriations.

Mr. KEIFER. I move to take from the Speaker's table the bill (H. R. 4971) making appropriations for the support of the Military Academy for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1885, and for other purposes; that the House insist upon its non-concurrence in the admendments of the Senate thereto and agree to the conference asked by the Senate on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses.

The motion was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will name the conferees during the course of the day.

LANDS GRANTED TO MICHIGAN.

Mr. COBB. I rise to present a privileged report from the Committee on Public Lands. I am instructed to report back with an amendment the resolution which I send to the desk.

The resolution was read, as follows:

Whereas by act approved March 3, 1865, Congress granted 200,000 acres of land to the State of Michigan to aid in the construction of a breakwater, harbor, and ship-canal to connect Lake Superior and Portage Lake, on Keweenaw Point, in said State of Michigan, and afterward, by act approved July 3, 1866, made an additional grant of 200,000 acres more to said State for the same purpose; and

Whereas said State of Michigan conferred said lands on the Portage Lake and Lake Superior Ship-Canal Company for the purpose of constructing said breakwater, harbor, and ship-canal; and

Whereas said acts required the lands granted thereby to be selected from the alternate and odd-numbered sections (except 50,000 acres, which were to be selected from the even-numbered sections) of the public lands nearest to said harbor and canal; and

Whereas it is charged and alleged that said lands were not selected as required by said acts, but that large quantities of very valuable lands were selected all over the Upper Peninsula of said State, in violation of said acts, and said canal company now claims to own said lands so selected, though large quantities of them were not liable to be used to satisfy said grants; and

Whereas it appears from reports of Government engineers that said canal company never completed said breakwater, harbor, and ship-canal as contemplated and required by said granting act; and

Whereas said canal company failed to complete said breakwater, harbor, and ship-canal within the time limited by the acts of Congress extending the time for the completion of the same; and

Whereas it was provided in said granting acts that in case of the failure of the said canal company to complete said harbor and canal within the time so limited the lands so granted should revert to the United States: Therefore,

Be it resolved, That the Committee on Public Lands be, and is hereby, instructed to investigate all of said charges and allegations, together with all matters pertaining to said grants, and whether said grants, or any portion thereof, are now liable to forfeiture, with power to send for persons and papers, to administer oaths, and report to this House by bill or otherwise.

The amendment reported by the committee was read, as follows:

Add, after the last words in the resolution, these words:

"And said committee is hereby authorized to employ a stenographer, if it deems the service of one necessary."

Mr. BELFORD. Mr. Speaker, I do not intend to interpose any objection——

The SPEAKER. The Chair has not decided yet that this is a privileged report.

Mr. COBB. It is a resolution, as I understand, which the rule requires to be reported back within six days after reference.

The SPEAKER. The resolutions which are required by the rule to be reported back within six days are resolutions of inquiry addressed to heads of Departments. Under the resolution offered by the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN] some time ago and adopted by the House, bills may be reported at any time by the Committee on Public Lands in relation to the forfeiture of certain land grants. Such reports are privileged. But this is not a resolution addressed to the head of a Department and is not a bill relating to a forfeiture of land grants.

Mr. COBB. It is a resolution giving the Committee on the Public Lands power to inquire into the facts as to the land granted to a certain corporation. If it is not privileged, I ask unanimous consent that it be considered at this time. It is important that the committee should be empowered to investigate this matter. There are 400,000 acres of land involved, and it is averred before the committee with great earnestness that not an acre of this land has been earned.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks this is not a privileged report. The gentleman from Indiana [Mr. COBB] asks unanimous consent to have the resolution considered at this time. Is there objection?

Mr. BELFORD. I do not object, but I should like to make a remark or two on this subject.

The SPEAKER. The Chair hears no objection.

Mr. BELFORD. I ask the gentleman from Indiana to yield to me five minutes.

Mr. WHITE, of Kentucky. I rise to a question of order. Some moments ago the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. STEELE] demanded the regular order. I insist we shall have the regular order.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Indiana [Mr. STEELE] demanded the regular order, after which the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. COBB] said he rose to make a privileged report, which would be of course the regular order. The Chair, however, decided the report submitted was not a privileged one, and thereupon the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. COBB] asked unanimous consent to make the report for present consideration, and no objection was made.

Mr. WHITE, of Kentucky. But I make the point of order that, the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. STEELE] having demanded the regular order, the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. COBB] can not ask unanimous consent.

Mr. COBB. I hope the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. STEELE] will not insist upon the regular order.

The SPEAKER. The Chair understood the demand for the regular was not insisted upon, because the Chair asked for objections and no objection was made.

Mr. WHITE, of Kentucky. The point of order I make is that the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. STEELE] demanded the regular order and has not withdrawn the demand.

The SPEAKER. But the Chair expressly asked whether or not there was objection to the consideration of this report, and no objection was made; so that the report came properly before the House.

Mr. WHITE, of Kentucky. The point is this, that when a member rises and demands the regular order, then the regular order should be had unless the demand be withdrawn.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks so, too. But the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. COBB] secured the floor upon the statement, which he of course supposed was correct, that he was making a privileged report.

Mr. WHITE, of Kentucky. And it is to correct such wrongful securing of the floor that I rise to make the point of order. If nobody else demands the regular order, I demand it.

The SPEAKER. The regular order is the consideration of the report presented by the gentleman from Indiana, although it came before the House somewhat irregularly.

Mr. REED. I should like to make a suggestion to the Chair. It seems to me that when the regular order is demanded the demand ought to be considered by the Chair as subsisting, unless it is withdrawn. It appears to me we are gradually drifting into a practice which renders it necessary that a man who demands the regular order should continue insisting upon it. It seems to me that such a thing ought not to occur. I make that suggestion to the Chair.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks the suggestion a very good one, and the Chair endeavors to follow the course suggested. But in this instance the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. COBB] secured the floor on the statement that he desired to make a privileged report. After the resolution was read and the Chair decided it was not privileged under the rule, the gentleman from Indiana asked unanimous consent to have it considered; and the Chair asked for objections and none were made, which the Chair considered to be a withdrawal or waiver of the demand for the regular order.

Mr. REED. But the gentleman from Indiana had not the floor for the purpose of asking unanimous consent.

Mr. COX, of New York. I do not like to hear the Speaker lectured in this way.

The SPEAKER. The Chair does not understand that he has been lectured.

Mr. BELFORD. I want to know whether in this council of the nation that represents thirty-eight States one man or three hundred and twenty-five men control it?

The SPEAKER. The Chair will state to the gentleman from Colorado that any member on the floor has a right to demand the regular order and any member has the right to object to a request for unanimous consent. That is a right which belongs to any one man on the floor, and the Chair has no control over it. The question is on the adoption of the amendment reported by the Committee on the Public Lands.

Mr. BELFORD. The Chair is not to blame, but your rules are to blame.

The amendment was adopted.

The resolution as amended was adopted.

Mr. COBB moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was adopted; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

The SPEAKER. The regular order has been called for, which is the call of committees for reports.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. I move that the morning hour for the call of committees for reports be dispensed with.

The SPEAKER. That will require a two-thirds vote.

The question was taken; and upon a division there were—ayes 102, noes 9.

So (no further count being called for) the morning hour was dispensed with—two-thirds voting in favor thereof.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. I now move that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole for the purpose of further considering the Post-Office appropriation bill.

The motion was agreed to.

The House accordingly resolved itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, Mr. BLOUNT in the chair.

POST-OFFICE APPROPRIATION BILL.

The CHAIRMAN. The House is now in Committee of the Whole, and resumes the consideration of the bill (H. R. 5459) making appropriations for the service of the Post-Office Department for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1885, and for other purposes.

The pending paragraph was the one appropriating $3,600,000 for payment to letter-carriers, &c.

The pending amendment was the one by Mr. SKINNER, of New York, to strike out "$3,600,000" and insert in lieu thereof "$4,000,000."

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York [Mr. SKINNER] is entitled to the floor.

Mr. SKINNER, of New York. I will yield to the gentleman representing on this bill the Committee on Appropriations on this side of the House, the gentleman from Michigan.

Mr. HORR. The amendment which I proposed, or which was proposed by the gentleman from New York [Mr. SKINNER], but which was my amendment and read by mistake by the Clerk, is a proposition to increase the amount appropriated to letter-carriers to $4,000,000. In the outset I wish to read for the information of the House a short extract from a letter on this item of appropriation addressed by the Postmaster-General, dated February 12, 1884, to the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations of this House. In that letter he says:

I find on referring to my annual report for 1883, page 59, that in stating the amount which will be required for the free-delivery service for the fiscal year beginning July 1, 1884, two important items were omitted, namely: $180,000 for additional letter-carriers in cities where the service is now in operation, and $20,000 for additional incidental expenses, making $200,000. I therefore advise that the estimate for this service for the next fiscal year be increased from $3,800,000 to $4,000,000.

Mr. FINDLAY. Will the gentleman yield to me for a moment? I would like to have read in this connection a letter from the postmaster at Baltimore, showing the necessity for this increase of the appropriation.

Mr. HORR. I would like to have the letter read if it is pertinent.

Mr. FINDLAY. It is pertinent, and shows the necessity of this increased appropriation.

Mr. HORR. If it will not be taken out of my time I will yield.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Michigan [Mr. HORR] will understand that it must come out of his time.

Mr. HORR. I am anxious that the letter should be read and will yield what time is necessary.

Mr. FINDLAY. I will endeavor to make a fair exchange with the gentleman when the opportunity presents itself.

The Clerk read as follows:

BALTIMORE POST-OFFICE, Baltimore, March 11, 1884.

DEAR SIR: I am informed that a strong effort will be made to reduce the Post-Office appropriation for the coming year very far below the figure reported by the Postmaster-General as necessary for the proper maintenance of the service and that it will be urged on the score of economy.

In consideration of the great public interests involved in this question, and of the fact that the postal service is more intimately connected than any other with the community at large, I earnestly request you to use every legitimate effort, by vote and influence, to defeat a measure which experience has shown me can not possibly be really economical in any sense. On the contrary, if this proposed reduction is determined on, it will most surely result in seriously crippling the free-delivery service of this city, and render futile my continual efforts for its increased usefulness.

In this connection it may not be out of place to say that in September last, with a view of obtaining an increase of our carrier force, I collected certain information to prove its necessity, and wrote the Postmaster-General on the subject.

By weighing mail matter collected and delivered by our carriers for three days of that month it was found to amount to a total of 15,379 pounds, or over 7½ tons monthly.

I had at that time 105 carriers, and calculation proved that the number of linear miles traveled daily by these men was 1,680, making an average of 16 miles daily for each carrier. This service, it was pointed out, benefited directly a population, including the Belt (which is within its limits), of fully 475,000.

In addition to these facts it was shown that the increase of buildings erected in the city during 1883 was considerably more than the average of the erections for the two preceding years.

I regret to say that the smallness of the appropriation was the only bar to my obtaining the additional force requested.

Continuing, however, I may remark then when in addition to all this we consider that our city is progressive; that its area must inevitably grow larger, and that its population is steadily and rapidly increasing, is it reasonable to suppose that an efficient service can be maintained without a corresponding increase of expenditure? Any idea that a sum barely sufficient for the present year could be largely and safely curtailed for the service of the coming year will not, I think, bear investigation.

If it is argued that the reduction is intended to operate only in the cutting of salaries, I have to say that as far as this office is concerned the force is now working at as low rates as could well be expected, and I know that if from unavoidable cause any part of it is obliged to suspend work for a few days, necessitating the employment of substitutes, the loss of pay entailed thereby is a frequent source of embarrassment.

In conclusion, I trust this question may be divested of all approach to partisanship, and that it may be viewed as a measure that closely concerns the best interests of all. The community is even now clamorous for extended mail facilities, and the passage of any bill which would in effect reduce those they already enjoy would not meet with any degree of favor.

Very truly,

HARRISON ADREON, Postmaster.

Hon. JOHN V. L. FINDLAY,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

During the reading of the letter the hammer fell, and Mr. FINDLAY obtained the floor. At the conclusion of the reading of the letter,

Mr. FINDLAY said: I will yield my time to the gentleman from Michigan.

Mr. HORR. The House will understand that in the year 1882 we passed a law which graded the pay of letter-carriers. That law was presented, I think—at all events its passage was advocated very strenuously—by the gentleman from New York [Mr. COX]. That was in the earlier days, I will not say the better days, of his service. It was at a time when his mind was not agitated and exhausted by the mental efforts he now makes in his contest with my friend from Colorado [Mr. BELFORD] for mental superiority. [Laughter.]

At that time the gentleman devoted a great deal of effort to securing the passage of that law. It was a just law and under it we fixed the compensation of letter-carriers. Not only that, but we provided for their promotion, so that after having served a certain length of time they obtained a higher grade, by process of law, and consequently got higher pay.

I hold in my hand a letter from the Assistant Postmaster-General, who states that there are to-day, under that law, 1,985 carriers who receive $1,000 each per year, 891 who receive $850 each, 367 who receive $800 each, and $645 who receive $600 each per year.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. FINDLAY. I will take the floor and yield my time to the gentleman.

Mr. HORR (to Mr. FINDLAY). Move to strike out the last word.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. I would like to inquire how many times the gentleman from Maryland [Mr. FINDLAY] can take the floor.

Mr. HORR. I yielded my time to the gentleman.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. For the benefit of your side.

Mr. FINDLAY. I do not recognize any sides on this question.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will recognize the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. HORR] to proceed. It is not strictly enforcing the rule, but the Chair is following the practice of the Committee of the Whole and will continue to do so unless the committee objects.

Mr. HORR. To pay these 3,888 letter-carriers requires $3,422,950. Under the operation of the law to which I have referred there will be promotions of carriers on account of length of service during the next year sufficient to require in addition the sum of $220,000; making necessary for this branch of the service for the next fiscal year, according to the laws of the land, $3,642,950.

This bill therefore in this particular lacks $42,950 of carrying enough money to pay the carriers now in the service what compensation the law fixes for them.

Mr. DAVIS, of Illinois. And of the amount appropriated by the bill $45,000 is for the establishment of the free-delivery system in cities where it does not now exist.

Mr. HORR. I understand that; so that there will be on this one item a shortage of $85,000 in spite of all you can do. The Department tells us that there will be needed three hundred additional carriers and $20,000 more than the first estimate for incidental expenses, which includes pouches, boxes, and various other items, for which there was expended last year a little over $116,000.

So that, in order to extend this service at all, you must increase the appropriation in this bill. New York city needs to-day forty more carriers simply to do her excess of business. There is not a large city in the United States that is not needing additional provision in this respect. Smaller cities are in the same condition. The town in which I reside needs three additional carriers. The service is not extended to two of the wards of our town because the carriers can not possibly do the work, and in that town they walk from fourteen to twenty-two miles every day that they are on duty.

This is a question that affects the efficiency of this service. Unless you appropriate this money the service is at once crippled. I do not believe there is in any district represented on this floor a town large enough to be entitled to this service at all that does not need an increase of carriers. We are unfortunate in the fact that my friend from Illinois, who has charge of this bill, lives in a district where there is no such service; but I hope he will not on that account undertake to cut down the appropriation for this service to $42,000 less than enough to pay the men now engaged in this work.

This is an important service. The cities where it exists need to have it made still more efficient. And what is the fact? The one hundred and fifty-nine cities now blessed with this free-delivery system furnish one-half of all the revenues obtained by this Government from the postal service. These cities pay one-half of all the postal bills of the United States. I say then we do not ask too much in insisting that this service shall be treated generously or at least fairly. This bill does not do that. My amendment will not give one dollar in excess of what the service needs.

Mr. HOLMAN. Mr. Chairman, I trust that the Committee of the Whole will listen to a very brief statement of the condition of the appropriations for this service; and gentlemen who have had occasion to examine the history of this service in former years will, I believe, sustain my statement.

It is admitted that the service is a valuable one in the greater cities of the country. It ought not only to be perpetuated, it ought to be steadily enlarged in all growing cities. But it is very clear that in this branch of the public service, as everywhere else, the tendency is to unwarranted expenditure. For the last fiscal year the expenditures for this branch of the service were $3,173,306. The appropriation recommended in this bill for the next fiscal year is $426,306 more than the expenditures of last year—nearly half a million dollars more—and $100,000 more than the appropriation for the present fiscal year. Thus it will be seen that on the basis of the expenditures of last year and the appropriations for the present year there is for this particular branch of the service a very liberal enlargement of the appropriation—sufficient to maintain in complete vigor this service in all the great cities and to provide for its reasonable enlargement.

At the present time, as stated I believe by the gentleman from Michigan, there are 1,985 letter-carriers receiving a salary of $1,000 each——

Mr. HORR. As fixed by law.

Mr. HOLMAN. As regulated by the Post-Office Department.

Mr. HORR. I beg the gentleman's pardon—fixed by law.

Mr. HOLMAN. And in conformity with law. There are 891 carriers receiving $850 each, 367 receiving $800 each, and 645 receiving $600 each. The total amount of the salaries provided for under existing law and on the present basis is $3,422,950. So that even on this basis there is a liberal provision for the enlargement of the service. Now, what I insist on is this——

Mr. HORR. Will not the promotions next year take more than that amount right out? That is all I ask.

Mr. HOLMAN. I have occasion to answer that.

Mr. HORR. But you have not done so.

Mr. HOLMAN. I have occasion to answer that. I say that the additional sum here appropriated provides sufficiently for the enlargement of the system.

Now, I object especially to a valuable branch of the public service—one that ought to be encouraged and maintained—being seized upon for the purpose of laying the foundation of lavish expenditure, not only there but everywhere else. For gentlemen will observe that under our system of appropriations, if you seize upon some desirable and valuable branch of the public service for an increase, the same principle prevails all the way through, and if you are to have moderate economy in the administration of this Government—and I have never felt authorized in late years to plead for anything else—you must display it in every branch of your Government. While I am in favor of encouraging this branch of the postal service, I do ask that its advancement shall be moderate and reasonable, not such as to encourage general extravagance in expenditures.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. CALKINS. Mr. Chairman, I move to amend the amendment by striking out the last word. As I understand, the number and pay of letter-carriers are fixed by law, and the amount of their aggregate compensation is a mere matter of mathematical calculation. There should therefore be no deficiency in the amount appropriated. If the sum proposed in this item falls below the amount required to meet the expenditure as fixed by law, this Committee of the Whole ought at once to make the necessary increase.

It has been alleged by the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. HORR], upon the authority of a letter of the Second Assistant Postmaster-General, that the appropriation named in this bill falls $42,000 below the amount required by law. If this statement be correct, it seems to me the necessary increase should in fairness be at once inserted. Wherever the amount of any expenditure is fixed by law, it can be easily ascertained when attention is called to it; and the appropriation should be made accordingly.

I desire to say a single word upon another point. There is no other class of men in the public service whose work is so hard as that of these letter-carriers. Their course is up and down stairs to the fourth and fifth stories of buildings. They are always on the go, the average number of miles they travel being from fourteen to twenty-two. There is no class of employés in the Government service who is worked so hard as these letter-carriers and no class who are paid so small wages.

I yield now the balance of my time to the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. HORR].

Mr. HORR. And I will yield it to the gentleman from Maine [Mr. REED].

Mr. REED. Mr. Chairman, I confess to feeling a good deal of interest in the result of the debate on this item. In my own city I know we have not carriers enough to perform the public duties which are actually needed. I know that in order to make the system what it ought to be in my city it is absolutely necessary to have three more carriers. I know in addition to that of my own personal knowledge that there is no employé in the service of the Government who works half as hard as the letter-carriers of the city where I live. It is such physical exertion resulting from a walk which aggregates twenty-five miles every day, it is no wonder the supply of officials is hardly equal to the demand. It is very difficult indeed for the postmaster to obtain men who are willing to take the place and who at the same time are physically fitted for it.

I submit to the House that the argument of the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN] shows, on the facts which he has stated, it is the plain duty of this House to give the necessary increase of this item. There is such a recognition of their service on the part of merchants and men interested there are oftentimes contributions gotten up in order to keep them in the service.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. The claim for the extension of the free-delivery system and the argument made in favor of more liberal appropriation for letter-carriers at the free-delivery offices are based, so far as I have heard in this debate, upon the ground that it is a service which brings profit to the Treasury. There is but one other ground upon which it could be based, and that is public convenience. These are the only two grounds upon which it can be based. As I have said, the only ground heretofore urged in this debate is that this is a profitable service, and we are told time and again that several of this system of free-delivery offices defray the expenses of the general postal service in the country, in my own district as well as in other rural districts.

I will first address myself to the first ground upon which they base this claim, that is, that it brings profit to the Treasury. The Postmaster-General in his report informs us there are but fourteen cities in this Union in which the local postage defrays the expense of the free-delivery system. In no other cities in the Union, of the one hundred and fifty-four free-delivery offices, is there one that is self-sustaining.

Mr. BINGHAM and Mr. DAVIS, of Illinois, rose.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. Do not interrupt me.

Mr. BINGHAM. I will get my own time.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. You did address the House fully on the subject, and I do not wish to be interrupted in my five minutes of reply to the speeches made on the other side. They have had fifty-five minutes on that side, while on this side we have only had five minutes.

Mr. HOLMAN. I hope the gentleman from Illinois will repeat what he has already stated, as the House did not hear it before on account of interruption.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. I wish, Mr. Chairman, I could get the ear of the House, for this is another step in the direction of extravagance, and in my judgment it ought to be stopped right here and now. I repeat—and I hold in my hand the report of the Postmaster-General, which sustains every word I say by the facts which he spreads upon the public record—I repeat, sir, that out of the one hundred and fifty-four letter-carrier offices in this country but fourteen of them are self-sustaining. There are but ten States in this Union which maintain a self-sustaining free-delivery office. Many do not have a single self-sustaining free-delivery office—not one, sir. Vermont has not one; neither has Rhode Island; nor, indeed, as I have already stated, have many other cities. But I have not time to particularize. Iowa has not a self-sustaining office, neither has Nebraska. Indiana has not a self-sustaining free-delivery office. There are but ten States in the Union that have self-sustaining free-delivery offices. Let me read the language of the Postmaster-General, and I love to quote from him, because he is an honest and a fair man. I differ from him at times in regard to political questions, but I am willing to grant he desires as an honest man to discharge his public duties fairly and completely. What does he say on this question?

> The free-delivery system was established on the 1st of July, 1863, leaving the drop-letter rate uniform at 1 cent at all offices. This rate was maintained until the act of June 8, 1872, increased it at carrier offices to 2 cents, in order to defray the cost of the carrier service. That cost had theretofore largely exceeded the receipts from local postage, though the system was confined to fifty-two of the principal cities. For the year ended June 30, 1872, the amount of postage collected on local matter was $907,351.93, and the expenditure of carrier service $1,385,965.76. If the charge for drop-letters is made uniform at all offices, without regard to this service at a portion of them only, the cities and towns not accommodated by carriers will not long remain quiet under the discrimination. It is true that, at the offices where the carrier service is in operation, the total postage on local matter exceeds the total cost of the service; but to claim the entire receipts from local matter as due to the carrier system is manifestly unfair. At the close of the last fiscal year that system was in operation at one hundred and fifty-four post-offices. The postage collected on local matter at these offices during the year amounted to $4,195,230.52, and the total cost of the service was $3,173,336.51, an excess of postage of $1,021,894.01.
> At fourteen offices only did the local postage exceed the cost of the service, as shown in the following table:

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. HOLMAN. I will take the floor and yield my five minutes to the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. I thank the gentleman. I hold in my hand here, Mr. Chairman, a statement which I prepared this morning, having the reports of the Postmaster-General and the Assistant Postmaster-General before me, showing how these free-delivery offices are conducted in different portions of the country.

I will call attention to these figures to show what this service costs in some of these cities as compared with the receipts. The city represented by my friend from Maine [Mr. REED] leads upon this list from that State. Portland costs the Government $8,995.22 a year, and the receipts from that service amount to only $6,030.53. Is that self-sustaining? Now, what is the situation? The gentleman from Maine at his breakfast table in Portland is receiving his letters through the letter-carrier system at the expense of my constituents and the constituents of every other member on this floor, all of whom are taxed to make up the delinquency created there in his city by the operation of this service.

Let us look further, though, at Maine.

Mr. HORR. How about Illinois?

Mr. TOWNSHEND. I will come to Illinois. I have some figures also from Michigan to which I will presently call the gentleman's attention.

Augusta, Me., the home of Blaine——

Mr. HORR. What did he do to you? [Laughter.]

Mr. TOWNSHEND. Augusta costs $3,419.80, and the receipts are only $949.25. Mr. Blaine gets his letters at his breakfast table by the hand of a carrier at a cost to the people of this country of $2,740 more than the service produces.

Mr. RYAN. Would you strike down the service for that reason?

Mr. TOWNSHEND. Don't interrupt me now.

Lewiston, Me., costs for this service $2,887.63, and they only pay $350.10 toward it; and yet gentlemen upon the other side claim that the service is self-sustaining!

Mr. CALKINS. Let us have some figures from Illinois, now.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. I will come to Illinois presently, but will address myself first to my friend from Indiana. His State, Mr. Chairman, has not a self-sustaining free-delivery post-office within its borders. And now let us look at the city which is, I believe, the home of my friend who makes such an appeal for an increase of this service. He can get his letters delivered at his house, without wetting his feet on a rainy day, at a cost to the Government of $2,375.18, while the Government receives from the service but $647.25.

Mr. CALKINS. The gentleman is a little off, there.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. Now, Mr. Chairman, I call your attention to Massachusetts, the center of intelligence; the State that it is said contains the "hub of the universe" within its borders.

Mr. LONG. Give Boston first.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. Gloucester, Mass.—the cost of the service is $346.08 per annum, and the receipts are—how much do you imagine? They are $79.97. What further in Massachusetts? But as my time is limited I will give but a hurried glance at it, and print this table with my remarks.

Mr. LONG. Don't forget to give us the figures from Boston.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. Well, that is the only city in Massachusetts where the free-delivery service is self-sustaining. It is the only city in the New England States, except, I believe, Hartford, Conn., that is self-sustaining.

Mr. LYMAN. Give us the figures from Boston.

Mr. CHACE. And from Rhode Island.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. There is not a single self-sustaining free-delivery post-office in Rhode Island.

Mr. CHACE. Oh, yes; Providence.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. No; not one.

Mr. CHACE. I think you are mistaken. Let us have the figures from Providence.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. There is not one, sir, according to the report of the Postmaster-General.

But now, Mr. Chairman, I am coming to Michigan. Where is your home in Michigan?

Mr. HORR. East Saginaw. [Laughter.]

Mr. TOWNSHEND. That is on my list; let me see what it says. East Saginaw: The cost of the free-delivery system, by which the gentleman can get his letters every morning at his breakfast table without wetting his feet on a rainy day, is $3,008.49, and you only pay $1,669.05; and yet he stands here day after day prating about self-sustaining free-delivery post-offices.

Mr. HORR. How about Shawneetown? [Laughter.]

Mr. TOWNSHEND. Next I come to New York. What town does my friend from New York represent; Binghamton, isn't it?

Mr. SKINNER, of New York. Watertown.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. I will give the figures.

Mr. REED. Let us hear from Shawneetown first.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. I will say to the gentleman from Maine that Shawneetown does not tax this country one single mill for the free-delivery service. My people go to the post-office to get the mails themselves.

Mr. HORR. And it don't begin to pay its own mail service at that. [Laughter.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Illinois has expired

Mr. TOWNSHEND. I hope, as the greater part of my time has been taken up with interruptions, that some gentleman will yield the floor to me.

Mr. DORSHEIMER obtained the floor and yielded to Mr. TOWNSHEND.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. I am very much obliged to the gentleman from New York.

Listen now to these figures. Here is the evidence of it, Mr. Chairman, that I hold in my hand. What does Watertown do? My friend gets his letters delivered at his own house in Watertown at a cost of $1,080.29, and what does he pay? Mark the figures—$286.52!

Is there another city in the State that you desire to hear from? They all run in the same direction.

Mr. DAVIS, of Illinois. Let us hear from Illinois.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. The city of Chicago, a Democratic city——

Mr. DAVIS, of Illinois. Not much. It has not a single Democratic Representative on this floor.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. Chicago is the only city in Illinois that has a free-delivery system which is self-sustaining.

Several members addressed the Chair.

Mr. DUNN. I rise to a point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. DUNN. I am very sorry that nobody on that side has any manners except those who do not say anything. It is impossible to hear this debate. [Laughter.]

The CHAIRMAN. Gentlemen will be seated and not interrupt the gentleman who is entitled to the floor.

Mr. BINGHAM. The gentleman should not extend a service to which he makes so much opposition.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. I am not talking about Pennsylvania now. I am talking of my own State. I repeat that outside of Chicago there is no other city in the State which has a self-sustaining free-delivery office. Noble and grand as she is, as grand as any State in this Union, paying as she does more internal revenue into the Treasury than any other State in the Union, she has but one free-delivery office which is self-sustaining.

But let me call your attention again to New York. The truth is that New York, a Democratic city, is sustaining free-delivery offices in the Republican States of Michigan, of Minnesota, of Iowa, of New Hampshire, of Nebraska, of Vermont, of Maine, and of Rhode Island.

Look at the figures from Democratic New York. New York, sir, cost the Government for its free-delivery service $522,889.80, and its local free-delivery system paid into the Treasury $1,475,533.38; nearly three times as much as the cost of the service is to the Government.

Now, then, a word or two in conclusion upon this question. Mr. Chairman, the reason why the free-delivery service is not self-sustaining is doubtless because from political pressure, from a desire to have drill-sergeants for the party in power in towns where there is no necessity for free delivery service, you have extended that service; you have placed it in towns where the whole business of the town is concentrated upon one main street, where no man has to go over half a mile or three-quarters of a mile to get his mail except those occupying a few scattering residences on the suburbs of the town. I want to quote again from the report of the Postmaster-General. I can not at this moment put my finger upon the passage in the report, but the Postmaster-General states the purpose for which the rate of postage on drop letters was placed at 2 cents was to make the free-delivery offices self-sustaining. That was the object. It was not self-sustaining anywhere in the country at its original establishment.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. DAVIS, of Illinois. Without occupying any time in remarking upon the statement of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. TOWNSHEND] when he spoke of Chicago being a Democratic city, the fact being that Chicago has no Democratic Representative upon this floor elected as such, I want to show how unfair, as I understand it, is the argument presented by that gentleman. He claims that because the 2 cents postage that is paid on local matter in a city does not pay for the service, therefore it is not self-sustaining. When we first introduced the carriers into Chicago we showed a deficit, a great deficit, from the 2-cent postage.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. DAVIS, of Illinois. Yes, sir.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. Do I understand the gentleman to say that Illinois has but one Democratic Representative?

Mr. DAVIS, of Illinois. No, sir; I said that Chicago has no Democratic Representative upon this floor elected as such. The service, as I was stating, was not at first self-sustaining. But the two hundred carriers in Chicago last year earned, in addition to their salaries, $135,000.

The free-delivery system of this country is self-sustaining, and no one pays for it except those parties that receive their letters. And I do not distinguish the difference whether we shall have a carrier in Chicago go to the North Side, four or five miles, or whether we shall have a railway train running from Shawneetown to Chicago to deliver the letters. These carriers perform the same service as railroads.

We desire more deliveries; we pay for those deliveries; and I know of no reason why this Congress should limit the Postmaster-General in hiring the carriers except by the amount which they themselves earn.

I desire to state a fact to the credit of the Chicago letter-carriers, that during the past year in Chicago they delivered 100,000 more pieces per carrier per mile than those of any other city, and at an expense of only 1 mill and six-tenths of a mill per piece; and they not only delivered the local letters but every letter that came from Shawneetown and that came from all over the country, and which should bear part of the expense. I shall append to my remarks statements as to the work of the letter-carriers.

I wish now to call attention, Mr. Chairman, to this one point: This bill provides for the reduction of the carrier service of this country by more than 100. The deficit is $87,950. If you confine it to 1,000 carriers it requires the Postmaster-General to discharge on the 1st of July, 1884, 87 carriers. If you take the $850 men it will require the discharge of 100 carriers. Unless this appropriation is increased the Post-Office Department, instead of being able to extend this service in a manner commensurate with the increase of this country, will have to cut down the carriers by 100.

I yield the remainder of my time to the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. HORR].

The following are the statements referred to by Mr. DAVIS, of Illinois, in his remarks:

[From Postmaster-General's report, December, 1883.]

Number of letters, postal cards, and newspapers received and delivered at the following-named post-offices, the number per carrier, and the cost per piece, in mills, during the year.

Post-offices.	Pieces handled.	Per carrier.	Cost per piece.
	Number.	Number.	Mills.
New York	258,890,064	442,258	2.0
Chicago	136,886,386	547,545	1.6
Philadelphia	160,043,909	431,116	2.2
Boston	93,587,018	383,553	2.4
Saint Louis	46,765,499	338,880	2.9
Baltimore	39,212,496	373,452	2.4
Cincinnati	29,756,300	297,563	3.1
San Francisco	24,724,771	343,441	2.6
Washington	15,231,674	220,749	4.0
	805,098,117	375,431	2.58

With Washington, not a commercial city, omitted, the average per carrier for the eight cities would be 394,766, and the cost of handling 2.4 mills per piece.

The total number of pieces of mail matter handled in the 154 free-delivery offices was 1,324,637,701; the average per carrier was 359,955; and the average cost per piece was 2.4 mills.

Number of carriers now employed, and amounts required by existing law to pay their salaries.

1,985 carriers, at $1,000	$1,985,000
891 carriers, at $850	757,350
367 carriers, at $800	293,600
645 carriers, at $600	387,000
For additional compensation to those who will be entitled to promotion by virtue of existing law during the year	220,000
Making a total of	3,642,950

to continue the present force, or $87,950 more than is provided for in this bill.

It gives no increase demanded by increase of business, but actually reduces the present force nearly one hundred.

Mr. HORR. I am astounded that my friend from Illinois [Mr. TOWNSHEND] should have claimed before this House, the members of which are supposed to know the multiplication table, that because the drop-letters in a city do not pay the expense of the free-delivery system, therefore that city does not provide money to pay it with.

Mr. CHACE. That is the point.

Mr. HORR. There is not a free-delivery city in the United States that does not pay a surplus of $20,000, and that goes to help carry the mails in the district where the gentleman from Illinois lives. I do not complain that his people are not up to the standard so that they do not write letters enough to pay for carrying their mail. I do not complain of that.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. I will say to the gentleman that my district pays more than his district does.

Mr. HORR. It is because your district is older and has more roads than mine. That part of the State of Illinois to-day does not begin to pay for the delivery of its mails, and the gentleman knows it. I doubt whether you pay the expense within $100,000. A sparsely populated district can not do it.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. TOWNSHEND. I move that the committee rise.

Mr. HORR. If the gentleman will wait a minute perhaps we can agree as to limiting debate.

Mr. BINGHAM. I want five minutes.

Mr. CALKINS. We can have an agreement, I think, without rising.

Mr. HORR. We are willing to consent that debate on this paragraph shall close with three speeches on each side.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. I say twenty minutes.

Mr. HORR. I do not want to be captious, but I think the gentleman should agree to thirty minutes.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. I will agree to three speeches on a side. Let the understanding be clear that at the close of thirty minutes we are to have a vote on the paragraph and all amendments without further debate.

Mr. HORR. We are content with that.

Mr. MONEY. The statement which the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. TOWNSHEND] has made about his calculations while in bed this morning I have no doubt is correct, although generally I am not disposed to give much credit to calculations made in bed. However, we will take it for granted that the statement is true.

If that is a correct argument, then we will wipe out the entire post-office service in twenty-three of the States of this Union. My State does not pay one-half of the expenses of its postal service. There are only fifteen States in the Union that do pay their postal expenses.

It is a mistaken idea that the cities which are now enjoying the free-delivery system are the sole beneficiaries of that service. The people of the country correspond with the people of the city, and it is just as important that the letters from the people of the country should be promptly delivered by letter-carriers to those in the city to whom they are addressed as it is that the letters written by those in the city to others in the city should be promptly delivered to their correspondents in the city. It is therefore a system which in its benefits ramifies throughout the whole country.

It is not worth while for any man to argue to the general intelligence of this House that the benefit of this free-delivery system is confined to the cities enjoying that service. There is not in my State a solitary free-delivery office, and there will not be so long as the service is crippled by deficient appropriations. The amount recommended for this service by the Committee on Appropriations is barely sufficient to continue it as it now is; perhaps it is reasonable to believe that there will be a deficit. The pay of letter-carriers is fixed by law. They receive so much per annum, according to their grade and length of service. If a sufficient amount is not appropriated for that purpose, of course there must be a deficit. And in addition to that let me say that under the operation of law as it now stands we are constantly increasing the number of free-delivery cities. We have already increased them this year by five, having now one hundred and fifty-nine free-delivery cities.

Our whole postal system is a healthy outgrowth of a progressive movement in the service. We have borrowed this free-delivery system, as we have every other important feature, from the foreign service. We have taken nearly all our great improvements from the British postal system, and this free-delivery service is one of the latest and the best. It was not with us a matter of experiment. We have had the advantage of the experience of the system as it has prevailed in other countries.

I understand it is the purpose of the Department to extend the free-delivery system gradually. There is now a law upon the statute-books which permits the Postmaster-General to introduce the letter-carrier system into every city of 20,000 inhabitants or cities that have a gross revenue of $20,000 per annum. He has not extended the service to the limit allowed by law.

Since this House has been in session, time and again I have had gentlemen come to me and urge me to prepare and recommend to this House some measure that would still further extend the operation of this system, in despite of the fact that the Postmaster-General is not to-day going to the limits permitted by the law, by reason of insufficient appropriations for the service.

Does the House want to maintain the free-delivery system at its present standpoint, or is it willing that it shall be extended gradually, cautiously, and wisely? In other words, is the House prepared to go backward, for that would be the effect of the policy which seems to have been pursued in preparing this bill? The question is whether you will support this system by sufficient appropriations, or whether you will give it a backset by refusing the requisite amount of money?

I can not be accused of having any sort of personal or local interest in this matter, for as I have said there is not a free-delivery post-office in the State of Mississippi. But looking at the fact that when we legislate for the post-office we legislate for a system embracing not only the millions in this country but all who live in every country embraced in the postal union, I hold that we can not consider the matter item by item and be governed solely by the fact whether it pays here or there; but we should govern our action by the fact whether the general results of the system are such that the receipts are in excess of the expenditures.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. JOHN S. WISE. I had proposed to offer an amendment to the amendment of the gentleman from New York [Mr. SKINNER] so as to increase this item of appropriation to $4,300,000. I shall, however, content myself with abiding by his amendment.

I wish to say to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. TOWNSHEND] that from a political standpoint I could not for my part ask him to do anything more agreeable than to curtail and cut down this free-delivery system, because, although it has been in operation but a comparatively short time, there is nothing in the whole administration of this Government more cherished by the people of this country as a great convenience than the free-delivery system. And no party can survive a blow at it, no matter under what pretext it is made.

I wish moreover to express my surprise that the gentleman from Illinois has been lying in his bed making his calculations about what were the paying offices and what were not paying offices. If he had been a little wider awake he would have discovered that if we confine this free-delivery system to the paying offices his Democratic friends in the South would not have a "pea in the dish."

I stand here to-day in behalf of this letter-carrier system, asking that it be spared, that it be sustained, that enough money be appropriated out of the public Treasury to make it a decent, well-administered, fairly paid, thoroughly organized, and fully sustained department of the public service.

There is no more meritorious class of public servants in the Union than these letter-carriers. There has been introduced in this House a bill proposing very properly to give these employés of the Government a reasonable furlough every year. To pass this bill curtailing the appropriation is to defeat that in advance. They are to-day worked almost to death. Within my own knowledge I have seen men of this class worked down like street-car horses, because they are so badly paid and so excessively worked.

I want to see this system administered so that a letter-carrier under the United States Government will be treated at least like a human being, and have time enough, by way of furlough, to recuperate from the very severe labor that active service exacts. He should at least have as much consideration as a policeman, for he does ten times as much work, does not wear half so good-looking a uniform, and is not so well paid.

All over the world, wherever men are employed in active daily labor of this sort, some period of relaxation and recuperation is allowed them every year. But such is not the case with letter-carriers, nor can it be if the appropriation is reduced as proposed.

This system by every estimate requires to maintain and extend it properly an appropriation of $4,000,000. It is as a whole self-sustaining.

The records show that the local postage in the cities where this system exists is more than $1,000,000 in excess of the cost of administering the system. It is idle to sit here swapping two shirt-buttons for a coat-button in the calculation as to which office pays and which does not pay. The general system is self-sustaining; and the report might be made that if Augusta, Me., is not self-sustaining Augusta, Ga., is also not self-sustaining. I want to know why you should draw a comparison of the cost in any two cities. Why does the gentleman on the other side take Boston and New York, one Democratic city and one Republican?

Mr. TOWNSHEND. Both Democratic.

Mr. JOHN S. WISE. What has such a comparison to do with the general proposition that the system is self-sustaining and the people demand it?

I do not care what party it may be, Republican or Democratic, that strikes a blow at this system of free letter delivery, that party will be held responsible for it. I do not believe that the charge of hostility to the system can be laid at the door of the Democratic party as a party, because in the course of this debate I have time and again heard Democrats who were wide awake and fully aware of the consequences of pursuing this parsimonious policy say that they will sustain an increase of this appropriation.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. HOLMAN. Mr. Chairman, the discussion of the proposition that the free-delivery system should be confined to cities where the system is self-sustaining does not appear to be a very profitable one. The whole postal system is maintained upon the principle that the general intelligence of a State is supposed to be a matter of public concern. In other words, the diffusion of intelligence is a matter of common interest to the whole people, and should therefore be contributed to by all. But there is a consideration that can not be overlooked, and to which the attention of the Committee of the Whole has been called by the gentleman from Illinois. In but fourteen of these cities is the system self-sustaining; in all the others the burden of its maintenance must fall not only upon the whole people but upon people who in the main do not receive their mail as frequently as once a day, who in general do not receive mail matter more than three times a week.

Now, take the city of New York; for it is admitted that in such a city the system is of great value and must inevitably be maintained in its utmost efficiency for manifest public reasons. In that city the number of daily deliveries is nine, ten, or eleven—I am not at this moment prepared to say exactly how many. In all of these free-delivery cities there are deliveries several times daily. Now, think for a moment of the palpable injustice of delivering mail matter by carriers in comparatively small cities three or four times daily while millions and millions of our people have to be content with receiving their mails three times a week and are exceedingly gratified when their letters and newspapers come to them once each day of the week.

I concede that where a city is of sufficient magnitude and business to sustain the free-delivery system it is eminently proper to maintain the system there. But I call upon gentlemen to inquire of their consciences whether it is right that in cities where the system has to be sustained by the general industry of the country the citizens should enjoy extraordinary advantages, beyond what their business and population demand, at the expense of the rest of their fellow-citizens.

I do not believe this is just; and while I am in favor of enlarging the system with moderation and keeping it in its full vigor, I do insist that considerations of local interest and local benefit should not override the larger consideration of the common interest of our people. My friend from Mississippi [Mr. MONEY] rises to an altitude which I am not able to reach. I can not forget my own people, of whom the more favored class obtain their mails only once a day; one-half of whom do not receive their mails three times a week. The greater number of the people even in a populous region such as I have the honor to represent receive their mails only once a week; and such a system is not deemed very oppressive. Yet my friend from Mississippi, without a single free-delivery office in his district, is perfectly willing that his State, to the extent of this burden, shall assist in maintaining three or four daily mail deliveries in cities where the population and business do not make it very inconvenient for the citizens to go to the post-office for their mails. While I am in favor of maintaining the system in its efficiency and moderately enlarging it, I object to the whole country being oppressed for the benefit of certain favored localities.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. BINGHAM. In answer to the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN] who has just taken his seat, and the gentleman from Illinois who has charge of this bill, and in reply to their proposition that this service should not be extended because as to a large number of the free-delivery offices the system does not pay its own expenses, I call attention to the fact that this bill comes into the House with no legislation attached to it curtailing this service, but, on the contrary, providing that $45,000 of the $100,000 increase appropriated to this service shall be devoted to the establishment of new offices. In every part of the country where the letter-carrier service will pay it is already established; and although the argument of gentlemen on the other side would require them to curtail the service because it does not pay in many parts of the country, I repeat that this bill appropriates $45,000 for the extension of this service. So much for that.

One thing more. The appropriation for clerk-hire reaches almost the condition of meanness. You gave for the next fiscal year what the committee has given for this year, but what do you do in this case? Under the law you are compelled to pay the salaries of the men who are now in the service. What do you do? You give $100,000 increase in the present appropriation, yet the law itself gives these men $220,000 more; so that you do not keep faith with the law.

Again, if there is any division or branch of the postal service where, speaking from another standpoint—if you ignore the convenience and the business wants of the people—if from no other standpoint, you look at it merely from the standpoint of a commercial proposition, from that standpoint what do we witness? What was the appropriation last year? The appropriation last year was $3,200,000. What was the result? One million and forty-nine thousand dollars clear profit. What was it this year? The appropriation was $3,500,000. The best estimates of the Department tell you that will bring forth a profit of $1,300,000. Give us this appropriation for the healthy use of this service for the next year, and as a commercial proposition an appropriation of $4,000,000 will bring in as clear profit $2,000,000.

I yield the remainder of my time to the gentleman from New York [Mr. COX].

Mr. COX, of New York. I do not know how much time the gentleman has remaining.

The CHAIRMAN. Two and a half minutes.

Mr. COX, of New York. I believe it can be shown clearly to the American people that the free-delivery system is a success; not merely because there is a surplus of $800,000 in your city of Philadelphia, not because there is a surplus of $1,400,000 in New York city, but it is a success because it brings intelligence home to the people in many senses. It will pay in the aggregate. It does pay. That is not disputed.

Now, I am in favor when a law has been made of making appropriations conform to that law. We had enough trouble to bring up the salaries of the letter-carriers in this House. I see gentlemen around me who had considerable fighting on one side or the other. At last we got the law. And now all we demand is that the committee shall conform to the law. If the law says so many letter-carriers shall be paid so much, let the appropriation conform thereto, otherwise not. I am told the gentlemen around me have indicated this appropriation bill does not conform to the present law. Why should it not? They make points of order on us when we make motions here in amendment because we do not conform to the law. And now let the Appropriation Committee conform to the law and we will give them our trust and confidence.

I know something of this letter-carrier system. I know how they work. They have no respite. In the winter snow, in the spring mud, under the hot summer sun, upstairs and downstairs, busy as bees when the buckwheat blows, they are coming and going with these missives between our people——

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. TOWNSHEND. Mr. Chairman, the figures which I have presented from the statistics of the Post-Office Department seem to have driven the gentlemen on the other side of the House from their first and only position, as I understand them, which was that this system was self-sustaining. Lest, however, there might be a lingering doubt in the minds of some gentlemen on that side as to whether it is self-sustaining or not, I will give a few more offices of the country to show just exactly what is the condition there in this regard. I wish to call the attention of my friend from New York [Mr. COX] who has just spoken to the fact that while it is true the Democratic city of New York is more than self-sustaining—three times more than self-sustaining—yet there are other cities in his State which fall far short of being self-sustaining. Take the city of Oswego. There the expenditure for this service is $9,075.02, while the income is only $4,017.11.

Mr. LONG. From what does that income come?

Mr. TOWNSHEND. From what the Postmaster-General says was originally intended to supply the expenses of the free-delivery system.

Mr. LONG. Is it not from drop or local letters?

Mr. TOWNSHEND. Certainly; that is what it ought to come from.

Mr. LONG. Well, the expense covered not merely the drop or local letters but the general mail.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. I have given you what you asked for. You have been comparing large receipts from some fourteen cities in the Union, and claiming from the aggregate of receipts from free-delivery offices the system is self-sustaining.

Mr. CHACE. Let me ask the gentleman a question.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. I can not yield for an interruption now. I have but a very short time remaining.

The city of Troy, N. Y.—look at that city, Mr. Chairman. It costs the Government $118,999.18 to carry on this free-delivery system, and yet the income from that office is but $12,270.95. It costs, therefore, nearly $107,000 more than it produces. My friend here from New York on my left thinks this must be a mistake and that the figures must be at fault. But, Mr. Chairman, I read from the report of the Postmaster-General, which gives the figures, and I am satisfied on examination that they are correct. I will publish the whole table with my remarks, and refer only briefly now to a few of these cities. I know that in this case it is startling that there should be such a difference and that it should cost nearly ten times as much as it produces, but it is nevertheless true; and yet the gentleman from New York [Mr. SKINNER] in his speech the other day was claiming that this free-delivery service is self-sustaining.

Mr. SKINNER, of New York. For the purpose for which it was established——

Mr. BINGHAM. Why, then, do you extend the service by your bill?

Mr. TOWNSHEND. Take Utica next, the home of Conkling. That costs the Government $10,597.48——

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. HOLMAN took the floor, and yielded his time to Mr. TOWNSHEND.

Mr. HORR. Will the gentleman from Illinois now permit me to interrupt him, as I yielded to him for a question?

Mr. TOWNSHEND. Yes, but don't make it long.

Mr. HORR. All that I want to ask is, do you claim that the free-delivery service does not do any other work but deliver the drop-letters?

Mr. TOWNSHEND. I claim that the object, that the purpose, as the Postmaster-General himself declares, in establishing these free-delivery offices was to make them self-sustaining from the delivery of drop-letters.

Mr. HORR. Yes, but do they not also deliver all of the other mail as well?

Mr. TOWNSHEND. Of course they do.

Mr. HORR. Very well then; should not that enter in as a part of the cost of the service? Does the gentleman state the argument fairly when he does not include it?

Mr. TOWNSHEND. I am simply now meeting the other argument which has been made on this floor as to these offices being self-sustaining.

Mr. HORR. Then you should meet it fairly.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. I am doing so.

Now take Utica, to which I was about referring; this costs the Government in round numbers $10,500 and the receipts amount to $4,908. Why is it, sir? I have no doubt that the influence of prominent gentlemen has had much to do with the establishment of the service in some of these places. Perhaps Mr. Conkling had something to do with its establishment in Utica. Mr. Blaine, of Maine, had something to do with making Augusta a free-delivery office. The Postmaster-General charges bluntly that these things are done by means of pressure and influence. He says in his report:

> Postmasters, backed as many of them are by influential friends, have in some cases been unreasonable in their demands for allowances, and it is not surprising that some of them have received more than their share of the appropriation, while others have received less.

Mr. BINGHAM. That is with reference to clerk-hire.

Mr. HORR. That has no reference whatever to the free-delivery system.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. But the same argument I say applies with reference to the establishment of free-delivery offices.

Mr. HORR. But the gentleman must see that the language was not used with reference to the establishment of this service.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. I do not yield to the gentleman from Michigan.

Mr. HORR. Then I repeat the gentleman should state the argument with fairness.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. I am perfectly fair in my statement. I repeat the language of the Postmaster-General and apply it to the free-delivery offices, and I say that they are established upon the same principle as clerks are allotted to post-offices.

Mr. BINGHAM. By no means. It is an entirely different condition.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. Now, Mr. Chairman, there is Mr. CAMERON, of Pensylvania. That gentleman of powerful influence in his own party gets his letters much cheaper than the man who has to walk for his daily mail. And see what it costs the Government to deliver them. Take Harrisburg, Pa., the capital of the State. In Harrisburg the cost to the Government is over $6,000, while the receipts from the office are a little over $3,000—less than half of the cost.

Another very powerful and leading Republican politician of this country, a recent convert to that party, has illustrated his influence in the establishment of these free-delivery offices. I allude to that powerful and influential gentleman, lionized by the Republican party, who sprang up lately among them, General MAHONE, of Virginia. How does he provide for his own State? Here is Petersburg on this list; I believe it is his home. The free-delivery system in that city costs the Government over $5,000 a year, while the receipts derived from it amount to $1,482.08.

But I will append the remainder of this table to my remarks. It is as follows:

The CHAIRMAN. The time allowed for debate upon this proposition has expired. The question will be taken upon the amendment of the gentleman from New York [Mr. SKINNER], which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

In lines 29 and 30 strike out "$3,600,000" and insert "$4,000,000."

The question being taken, there were—ayes 91, noes 55.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. I call for tellers.

Mr. HOLMAN. A quorum did not vote.

The CHAIRMAN. A quorum not having voted the Chair will order tellers, and appoints the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. TOWNSHEND] and the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. HORR].

The committee again divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 122, noes 55.

So the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. I give notice that I will call for the yeas and nays in the House on this amendment.

Mr. HEWITT, of New York. I offer the amendment which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Add at the close of the pending paragraph the following:
"Provided, That periodical publications other than daily newspapers when delivered within the city where they are published shall be charged with the same postage as is now imposed by law upon such publications when delivered elsewhere than in the city of publication."

Mr. HORR. I make the point of order that that amendment changes existing law. But I should like to hear an explanation by the gentleman from New York, reserving the point of order.

Mr. HOLMAN. I ask that the amendment be again reported. It was not distinctly heard.

The proposed amendment was again read.

Mr. HEWITT, of New York. Mr. Chairman——

The CHAIRMAN. Debate is not in order except on the point of order.

Mr. HORR. I should like to hear a statement from the gentleman, reserving the point of order.

Mr. HEWITT, of New York. I am very sorry that I can not make a statement in a tone of voice that will enable me to be heard.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair desires to state that the committee have concluded debate on the paragraph and amendments thereto. The Chair, however, is willing to hear the gentleman on the point of order.

Mr. HEWITT, of New York. So I understand, and I understand that the point of order is reserved that I may by unanimous consent make a very brief statement.

There is an anomaly in the law which requires that the postage upon monthly periodicals shall be paid on the piece, so to speak, in cities where they are published; but if they are sent into cities from outside, then the postage is charged by weight. The fact of this provision is that parties desiring to evade the law make the place of publication at some neighboring point; for example, in New York they go to Brooklyn or to Jersey City; in Boston they go to Cambridge or Brookline. And in this way the Government is compelled to transport all this mail matter an additional distance; whereas if the rule were that the postage should be the same, as it ought to be, whether the delivery is in the city of publication or outside the city of publication, the Government would save money and the individual would have his convenience promoted.

Mr. HORR. As I understand this does not apply to daily newspapers?

Mr. HEWITT, of New York. Daily newspapers are expressly excepted in the amendment. Weeklies are already provided for by law. The amendment applies only to monthly periodicals.

Mr. HORR. I withdraw the point of order, for I think the proposition is right.

Mr. MONEY. I would like to have the amendment read again.

The amendment was again read.

Mr. DINGLEY. That is right. The amendment ought to be adopted.

The CHAIRMAN. Debate is not in order. The point of order having been withdrawn, the Chair will submit the question on the amendment.

Mr. KASSON. I desire to move an amendment to the amendment, to which I think there will be no objection. The language is, "as is now imposed by law." I think it ought to be, "as is now or may be imposed by law."

Mr. HEWITT, of New York. I accept the suggestion, and will modify my amendment accordingly.

Mr. CALKINS. Is not this the same provision in substance as was passed by the last House?

Mr. BINGHAM. It is.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment of the gentleman from New York as modified by the addition of the words suggested by the gentleman from Iowa.

The amendment as modified was agreed to.

The Clerk read the following paragraph:

For rent, light, and fuel, $450,000.

Mr. HORR. I move to amend by striking out "$450,000" and inserting "$480,000," so as to make the amount correspond to what the Department asks. I do not desire to talk on the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN proceeded to put the question on the amendment.

Mr. HISCOCK. I desire to ask the gentleman——

Mr. TOWNSHEND. I make the point of order that the committee is dividing and that debate is not in order.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair sustains the point of order if insisted on.

The question being taken on agreeing to the amendment, there were—ayes 60, noes 79.

So (further count not being called for) the amendment was not agreed to.

Mr. SKINNER, of New York. I offer the amendment which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Add after line 42 the following paragraph:
"For allowances to post-offices of the third class for rent, $430,000."

Mr. TOWNSHEND. I make the point of order on that amendment.

Mr. HOLMAN. It is not authorized by any law.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois will state what is his point of order.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. I make the point of order that the amendment changes existing law and increases expenditure.

Mr. SKINNER, of New York. Is the gentleman from Illinois willing to waive the point of order for a moment?

Mr. TOWNSHEND. I think not.

Mr. SKINNER, of New York. I confess the amendment changes existing law and increases the appropriation, and if gentlemen insist on their point of order it can not be entertained. I think nevertheless it is right.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair sustains the point of order.

The Clerk read the following paragraph:

For office furniture, $30,000.

Mr. MOREY. I offer the amendment which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Strike out "$30,000" and insert "$40,000."

Mr. MOREY. The Department has recommended an appropriation of $40,000. It is for a purpose which concerns not only the convenience of the public, but the safety of the public funds. Under a law passed during the last Congress the Post-Office Department has adjusted claims resulting from burglary and other causes amounting to about $40,000. The First Assistant Postmaster-General in his report of this year calls attention to the fact that postmasters have already paid for safes which were ordered by the Department $5,722, and without this appropriation the Department will be unable to make payment for these safes.

In my own city of Hamilton, where the gross revenue from the postal service is $17,445, the total expense of conducting the post-office there only $6,087, and the net revenue of the office $11,358, the Government of the United States does not own a fire-proof safe for the purpose of preserving its funds, and our postmaster is compelled out of his own means to provide a place for the safe-keeping of the large revenues which pass through his hands.

I submit that the estimate of the Postmaster-General for this item is reasonable. The Government ought in all such offices as this to provide the means for the safe-keeping of the public funds. I hope the Committee of the Whole will restore the amount estimated for by the Postmaster-General. He tells you in his report that the Department has purchased safes and placed them in post-offices for which the Department has no money to pay, the appropriation having been found inadequate, and the postmasters, relying upon the faith of the Government and expecting that they would be reimbursed, have advanced the amounts necessary to pay for these safes, as did the postmaster in my city, in all amounting to $5,722. I ask, therefore, that the Committee of the Whole will restore the amount recommended by the Postmaster-General and adopt the amendment which I have offered.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. Some of the gentlemen on the other side, and I think some on this side, of the House seem to have the impression that Congress has nothing to do with fixing the amounts of appropriations, but that we ought to concede the estimates of the Departments. If that is true, then it is useless for Congress to attempt to exercise any power over appropriations. That, however, was not the opinion of the last Congress. The Republican Congress, I notice, questioned these estimates as readily as the Committee on Appropriations of this House has done. It is our duty to look over these items and see if the estimates are fair and reasonable.

The Committee on Appropriations of this House has investigated this matter, and there is a difference of opinion between the Post-Office Department and ourselves in regard to this as well as other items. I may say that the same difference of opinion existed at the last session of Congress. When the Postmaster-General said last year that he wanted $30,000 for this purpose, the Republican Committee on Appropriations and the Republican Congress did not hesitate a moment in saying that the estimate was too high, and they cut it down to $25,000. That was all that the Republican Congress said was needed for this purpose.

The Committee on Appropriations of this House has shown more liberality than was shown by the last Congress, and it has raised the appropriation for this purpose $5,000 above that made last year, making it $30,000. We have given all that was thought necessary for last year by the Republican Congress, and yet gentlemen ask for more. I am aware that the Department has this year estimated for $40,000 for this purpose. And next year it may estimate for $50,000, and the year after for $100,000. I submit that having given $5,000 more than was given last year for this purpose, and no reason having been shown in any of the reports for even that much increase, this House ought not to sit here and allow extravagant appropriations to be made without stronger reasons urged for them than has been urged by the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. MOREY].

It may be that in some little country post-office, such as he speaks of, there may be a scarcity of furniture. But what has become of the furniture which has been purchased from year to year? Twenty-five thousand dollars was given last year for that purpose and $25,000 was given the previous year. Now, it is proposed by the Committee on Appropriations to give $30,000 more. I insist that this item of the bill should not be disturbed. We have given $5,000 more than was given last year and $10,000 more than was spent last year for this purpose. We give for this item $10,000 more than it is shown was expended for this purpose for the year ending June 30, 1883. Yet gentlemen rise here and ask us to give $20,000 more than the Department expended up to last June.

The amendment of Mr. MOREY was not agreed to.

The Clerk resumed the reading of the bill, and read the following:

For miscellaneous and incidental expenses of post-offices, including repairs, gas-fixtures, and telegrams, $80,000.

Mr. MONEY. I ask the gentleman in charge of this bill to accept the amendment which I have here.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. Let it be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Insert after the paragraph just read the following:

"And the Postmaster-General is authorized to designate postmasters at money-order post-offices as disbursing officers for the payment of salaries of officers and employés of the postal service and for such other payments as the postmasters are now authorized to make from postal revenues."

Mr. HORR. I hope that amendment will be adopted.

Mr. MONEY. Does the gentleman accept that amendment?

Mr. TOWNSHEND. I do not know that I have any objection to it. I will say that when the gentleman showed it to me a while ago it struck me that it should be a little more guarded.

Mr. MONEY. That is a matter of regulation by the Department.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. So far as I am individually concerned I have no objection to it.

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

The Postmaster-General is hereby authorized and directed to readjust the compensation to be paid from and after the 1st day of July, 1884, for transportation of mails on railroad routes, by reducing the compensation to all railroad companies for the transportation of mails 5 per cent. per annum from the rates for the transportation of mails, on the basis of the average weight fixed and allowed by the first section of an act entitled "An act making appropriations for the service of the Post-Office Department for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1879, and for other purposes," approved June 17, 1878. The foregoing provision, and all of the general provisions of law touching the rate of compensation of railroad companies for the transportation of the mails, shall apply to all railroad companies whose railroads were constructed in whole or in part by subsidies in bonds and public lands granted by the United States under the provisions of an act entitled "An act to aid in the construction of a railroad and telegraph line from the Missouri River to the Pacific Ocean, and to secure to the Government the use of the same for postal, military, and other purposes," approved July 1, 1862, and all acts and parts of acts amendatory thereof; and the said act, and the sixth section thereof, and all acts amendatory of said act, are hereby altered, amended, and modified in conformity with and to conform to the foregoing provision for the readjustment of the compensation to be paid to railroad companies for the transportation of the mails. But nothing in this provision shall be construed in any wise to affect or impair the right of Congress at any time hereafter further to alter or amend the said act approved July 1, 1862, and the act and acts amendatory thereof before referred to; and the foregoing provision shall be subject to alteration or amendment as in the opinion of Congress justice or the public welfare may require; and nothing herein shall impair any right now existing in favor of the United States; and the foregoing provision touching the rates of compensation to railroads constructed under the provisions of said act of July 1, 1862, and amendment thereof, for the transportation of the mails, shall be held as in alteration and amendment of said act and of the act amendatory thereof and of both of said acts: Provided, however, That all railroad companies whose railroads were constructed in whole or in part by a land grant made by Congress on the condition that the mails should be transported over their roads, respectively, at such price as Congress should by law direct, or on the condition that such railroad should be subject to such regulations as Congress might impose restricting the charges of Government transportation, shall receive only 50 per cent. of the compensation authorized by this act to the other railroad companies for corresponding service.

Mr. HORR. I move to amend by striking out in the paragraph just read the proviso beginning in line 119 and extending to the end of the paragraph.

The Clerk read the language proposed to be struck out, as follows:

Provided, however, That all railroad companies whose railroads were constructed in whole or in part by a land grant made by Congress on the condition that the mails should be transported over their roads, respectively, at such price as Congress should by law direct, or on the condition that such railroad should be subject to such regulations as Congress might impose restricting the charges of Government transportation, shall receive only 50 per cent. of the compensation authorized by this act to the other railroad companies for corresponding service.

Mr. HORR. Mr. Chairman, I make this motion because I consider that this proviso as it now stands is unjust toward the railroad companies which received land grants. Some of the lawyers of this House who are more skilled in legal questions than I am can debate whether the provisions of existing law will permit Congress to adopt so high-handed a measure against these railroad companies. A large number of these roads—I have a list here, about fifty in number, covering about 12,000 miles—were built by means of donations of lands which were given by the United States Government to the different States to aid in the construction of railroads. Those States made such contracts as they saw fit with the companies, carrying out at the same time the trust of the General Government.

I claim that when the Government retained the right to fix the amount that should be paid for carrying the mails on these roads it simply reserved the right to fix a just and equitable compensation for the work; and when this compensation has been fixed for other railroads of the country you have no right, legal or moral, to say that these land-grant railroad companies shall receive only 50 per cent. of what you have fixed as a fair rate for doing the work.

Understand me, these lands were not given to these railroad companies for the purpose of getting our mails carried cheaply. There is no such provision in the charters, there is no such reservation in the grants. Such an idea never crept into the debates. These lands were given to enable railroad companies to build roads in sparsely populated and undeveloped portions of the country where otherwise no money would have been invested and no road built.

If you take this list and go through it, you will find that this bill as now drawn, without my amendment, takes off 50 per cent. of the compensation for carrying the mails from more than fifty roads, not over ten of which are to-day paying one cent of the money which was put into them when they were built. This bill does not touch the Union Pacific Railroad, the Central Pacific Railroad, or any of its branches. Now, I ask any gentleman to tell me what right we have to single out two little railroad companies in Florida—the Florida Transit Railroad Company and the Jacksonville, Pensacola and Mobile Railroad Company—and say that we will first fix a rate of compensation for all the railroads in the country, and will then require these two roads to accept only half of what we give to the others.

The land grant that those two roads received was made up of swamp lands in that State, and was designed to enable those companies to build roads which never could have been built without such aid. And since those roads have been built, as an examination will show, they have never earned one shilling of profit for the men who built them. You take the New York Central road, which makes its millions of dollars every year, and you fix the price for which it shall carry the mails, fixing it fairly with reference to what the service is worth; and then you turn to these little Florida roads and say, "We have fixed the compensation for other railroads according to what the service is worth, and you shall take one-half of that rate." Why? Because these companies, in order to induce them to develop a country where the land was not worth anything, received some swamp lands. You do not propose to apply any such rule to the New York Central Railroad, whose franchise is worth $20, yes, $200 per mile where the franchise of either of these two roads is worth $1. I say it is not just toward these roads to adopt such a proposition here in the American Congress.

Mr. SHAW. In answer to the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. HORR] I wish to say that he is quite mistaken in supposing that Congress did not intend to retain any right of supervision over the railroad companies which were endowed with Government grants. The gentleman assumes that we have no right to fix their compensation for mail service at one-half what we pay roads which have not received public donations. Regarding all railroads as public carriers, we have a right to have United States mails and troops conveyed over them at a reasonable price. This right belongs to the Government with respect to all roads which are public carriers. But in regard to railroad companies which we have subsidized, to which we have given a great domain, an empire of land, we wisely reserved the right to require them to carry the mails at such reasonable price as we may fix, and we have the right to say to such railroad companies, "You shall not receive more than one-half what we pay as a reasonable price to roads that received no grants."

The gentleman says that these roads were built through a country having no value. I undertake to say that a man with only 50 cents in his pocket could have taken those grants and built the roads without any additional capital. When these companies ask the Congress of the United States to grant them lands, those lands are represented as being sterile, unproductive, and of no value. But when the road is built then you find the country flooded with pictorial cards and with other railroad documents describing it as a Garden of Eden, the center of civilization, and the perfection of fertility. [Laughter.]

I regard this measure as proper and just and what I hold the people have a right to demand, and that is that these great lines of transportation should carry the United States mail at a reasonable price, to be fixed below that paid to those roads which have not been subsidized either with land or money.

Mr. REED. Mr. Chairman, I entirely agree with what the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. SHAW] has said about the right of Congress to fix a reasonable rate for the transportation of mail by railroads whether subsidized or otherwise. I believe that the railroads are bound to carry our freight for a reasonable rate, but it does seem to me that our power is confined to a reasonable rate whether we have the right to make a lower one or not.

Leaving that question for a moment out of consideration, if we are going to settle the question of what our railroads are to receive we are bound to adopt a reasonable rate of recompense even if we have the right to adopt any we please. It then becomes on our part the exercise of what may be called a quasi-judicial discretion. It ought to be founded on reason and sense, and not upon prejudice. Because we have the strength of a giant we have no right to use it like a giant. We have then fixed on a certain sum as a reasonable compensation for the New York Central, and yet under this bill we purpose to say to every road that had a land grant, no matter whether it was a profitable land grant or not, that they shall take 50 per cent. of what we have declared to be reasonable in regard to the New York Central. My friend from Illinois can not disagree with me in my statement that that position can not possibly be right.

Mr. SHAW. Then why should Congress provide they should have any control over the price at all?

Mr. REED. Simply because Congress re-enacted what was its natural right, as a legislature very often does in a bill. Very often some member of the legislature gets up and says, "Under this bill unless we put this in we shall not have power," and the men who know you would have power without it have no objection to the reiteration of that power, and there can be no objection to it. But I say to the gentleman, even if he is right we are bound as honest men to fix reasonable compensation. Even if he is right in his proposition that we may take into account the fact we have given them a land grant, even then we are bound to take each road and consider the value of its land grant. We ought not to make a rule which covers a road in Florida, which got nothing out of it——

Mr. SHAW. Allow me to say, if we consider the value of the land grants we would not give them a dollar.

Mr. REED. That may be, but that can not be the case in regard to the Florida road, because nobody in debate has thus far questioned the fact those land grants were not valuable except as these men built these roads. I think the history of many land-grant roads would be that it was years and years before their projectors reaped any advantage from them.

We are bound then, Mr. Chairman, to be just in whatever we do, whether the legal position as to the right of Congress taken by the gentleman from Michigan be correct or not. Even on the basis of my venerable friend from Illinois [Mr. SHAW], who was here long years ago when this matter was originally brought up—I think even if you take his ground the amendment which is proposed can not be just in its operations. We ought not to go on about this business without giving the reasons in each particular case why such a thing is just.

If we are going to take the land grant into account, my friend from Illinois thinks the land grants were so great that a man with 50 cents in his pockets might have built some of these roads. Yet the actual history is of one of them that a man with many million dollars in his pocket actually went on to bankruptcy before he reached one-quarter of the way across the continent, and another man supposed to be worth ten or a dozen million dollars bit the dust at the time the last spike was driven.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. DUNN. Will the gentleman from Maine allow me a question?

Mr. REED. With pleasure.

Mr. DUNN. I wish to know——

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Maine has expired.

Mr. HOLMAN rose.

Mr. DUNN. Then I move to strike out the last word.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Indiana is entitled to the floor.

Mr. HOLMAN. I will yield temporarily to the gentleman from Arkansas.

Mr. DUNN. If I am recognized I will yield a part of the time to the gentleman from Maine for an answer to a question with reference to one of the provisions of this bill. I wish to get his opinion as a lawyer upon this point. Is it your opinion that by the operation of this bill the bond-subsidy roads, the Pacific railroads, will have their compensation reduced for the transportation of the mails 50 per cent. of what other roads are allowed that are not subsidized? That is to say, does the 5 per cent. reduction and the 50 per cent. provision of this bill apply at all to the bond-subsidized roads?

Mr. BINGHAM. It does, clearly.

Mr. REED. I have not particularly examined the matter or made a personal study of that subject. I can only take the terms of the bill as they appear.

Mr. RYAN. Let me interrupt the gentleman to say that the 50 per cent. provision does not apply to the Union Pacific Railway system at all. The general reduction of 5 per cent. applies to it.

Mr. DUNN. Then I understand that it was not the intention of the committee to apply the 50 per cent. provision to the Pacific Railroads.

Mr. RYAN. Your understanding is correct.

Mr. DUNN. That it was not intended to so apply?

Mr. RYAN. It was not so intended.

Mr. DUNN. Then I would like to ask why that exception was made, and I will be glad if some member of the Committee on Appropriations would explain it. I suppose they had an object in view and understood what they were doing.

Mr. HOLMAN. Mr. Chairman, I was very anxious the other day to explain the action of the Committee on Appropriations with reference to this very proposition, and I took occasion then to state that up to this time the Union Pacific Railroads claimed the right to charge for the transportation of the mails whatever they might think proper and that they were claiming nearly twice the amount paid by the Government to other railroad corporations. Further, that it was not deemed advisable to extend to the Union Pacific corporations any other than the 5 per cent. clause and to bring them under the general provisions of the law touching the transportation of the mails by railways. It was not deemed advisable to do so for this reason (and if the reason is not a sufficient one I shall not object to any gentleman making proper recommendations by way of amendment to this bill); but the reason was that that property is our own, and it must be protected by the United States in order to protect ourselves from heavy losses in the future. It is believed that this can be done through the instrumentality of the sinking-fund act, properly amended, better than by attempting to derive revenue to the Post-Office Department from the operations of the roads; and for that reason the Union Pacific system was left out of this provision.

Mr. DUNN. Will the gentleman yield to me now to reply to that?

Mr. HOLMAN. No; I will yield to the gentleman for a question.

Do not misunderstand me. Any gentleman who believes that through other instrumentality than through the operation of the sinking-fund act we can better save the Government from heavy losses in the future will have my cordial co-operation in support of any measure that will accomplish that result. But, as I have said, it was thought better to bring the operation of the Union Pacific system under the provisions of the general law touching the transportation of the mails and subject them to the 5 per cent. reduction provided for in the law, being a 20 per cent. reduction in all since the passage of the act of March 3, 1873, than to seek to accomplish that result in any other way.

That was the impression entertained by members of the Committee on Appropriations, hoping that the Committee on Pacific Railroads, having a day set already for the consideration of their business, would present a bill on this subject, which would be the first from their committee to be considered in the House; and that through the operation of the sinking-fund act the Government might be able to find some mode of averting the losses impending. And I apprehend for myself that the only effect of our attempting to embrace them in the 50 per cent. clause would be to embarrass the operation of that act. It was thought better, therefore, by the committee to adopt this method in dealing with these roads——

Mr. DUNN. Will the gentleman permit me to ask him to state the compensation which is allowed to the bond-subsidized roads for carrying the mails under existing law?

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Indiana has expired.

Mr. TOWNSHEND was recognized and yielded the floor to Mr. HOLMAN.

Mr. HOLMAN. I am very unfortunate, it seems, Mr. Chairman, in making myself clearly understood on this matter. There is no law, I will say in answer to the gentleman from Arkansas, except the sixth section of the act of 1862——

Mr. DUNN. Is not their compensation reduced to 70 or 80 per cent. under the existing law?

Mr. HOLMAN. No; their charges are twice as much, as I have just stated, as the charges of other roads for the same service.

Mr. DUNN. I am referring to land-subsidized roads.

Mr. HOLMAN. You said the bond-subsidized roads.

Mr. DUNN. I meant the land-grant roads.

Mr. HOLMAN. Then you have confused me by your question. I understood you to refer to bond-subsidized roads.

Mr. DUNN. What I wish to inquire is, what is the compensation allowed to the land-grant roads for carrying the mails?

Mr. HOLMAN. They stand on exactly the same footing up to this time with the other roads for transporting the mails, except that they suffer a reduction of 20 per cent. from the rates paid to the other roads.

The proposition now is to increase the reduction 30 per cent. further, making a total reduction from their compensation, in view of the land grants which they hold and by which their roads were built, of 50 per cent.

Mr. RYAN. I think the gentleman was mistaken in saying that the only difference is the 20 per cent. reduction for carrying the mails, because in addition——

Mr. HOLMAN. I am talking now of the transportation of the mails alone. I am not talking of the provision for transporting supplies and troops of the Government or anything else.

Mr. BELFORD. I rise to a point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. BELFORD. It is utterly impossible to hear what is going on in the Hall.

The CHAIRMAN. The point of order is well taken.

The gentleman from Indiana will proceed.

Mr. HOLMAN. Now, I hope my friend will observe the fact that every one of the land-grant roads, except the Northern Pacific Railroad, received its grant subject to the conditions that the said road should be and remain a public highway for the use of the Government of the United States in the transportation of troops and supplies free of tolls or other charges.

Under that we are now paying, strangely enough, under judicial decisions of the Supreme Court, 50 per cent. of the amount paid to the other roads. The other clause is as follows:

> That the United States mail shall at all times be transported on said roads, under the direction of the Post-Office Department, at such prices as Congress may by law direct.

Now, every grant that is made that is affected by this provision, except the Northern Pacific grant, is subject to these two conditions: first that the railroads shall transport our troops and supplies; that they shall be a public highway for the transportation of our troops and supplies free of toll or other charge. But under that we pay 50 per cent. of the price paid to other roads. It is now proposed to put the cost of transportation of mails on exactly the same basis and pay the roads 50 per cent., which is a much larger amount than gentlemen who have not examined the subject would suppose.

There are some 14,000 miles of these roads built by your bounty.

Mr. BELFORD. Can you state the number of acres?

Mr. HOLMAN. The number of acres likely to be patented runs up to 100,000,000, a body of land far more than necessary to construct the system—far beyond it on any reasonable basis of value of the lands. You have built these roads. You pay them 50 per cent., after having built them, for the transportation of your troops, under this ambiguous law, by decision of the Supreme Court. And now all you ask is that they shall transport your mails, in view of the grants made to them, at fair and reasonable rates; that is to say, 50 per cent. of the amount paid to other corporations.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. CANNON. I shall be glad to have the attention of the committee for the few minutes that I occupy in talking upon this amendment. I shall confine myself to the discussion of the amendment.

Without turning to the acts making the grant of lands to these roads, I will say in general terms that the right to fix the pay for carrying the mails was reserved; also the other right that these roads should be public highways for the use of the Government for the transportation of troops and supplies, as the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. SHAW] stated a few moments ago. I want to say further that while this power exists to fix the mail pay of these land-grant railways, I heartily concur in what the gentleman from Maine said, that it was contemplated then and should be the policy now that whatever rate is fixed should be a reasonable rate.

Mr. SHAW. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. CANNON. Certainly; but my time is limited.

Mr. SHAW. Has the Government a right to make a discrimination between those roads that have been subsidized and those that have not?

Mr. CANNON. Oh! The Government has this power touching the land-grant railroads proper, and of course has the power to make a discrimination. Now, I undertake to say it is not equitable to fix the pay of these land-grant railroads at one-half of what the other railroads receive. There are 12,000 miles of these land-grant railroads, in round numbers. The pay they now get on the average per mile per annum is $97; that is, for each mile of railroad that these mails are carried the pay per year is $97 only.

Now, mind you, these roads have the trips to make; they have their track to keep up; they have their rolling-stock to keep in repair; they have to deliver the mails in the eighty-rod limit. In the main they travel through a new country where they have not the passenger and freight traffic or the mail traffic either that the roads in the older country have. But while they receive the $97 per annum for carrying the mail, go to the New York Central for example and see what it receives. From $1,000 to $1,600 per mile per annum—sixteen times as much as these new roads in the new country receive. Take the Pensylvania Central. It receives from $1,200 to $1,800 per mile per annum.

Mr. SHAW. Will the gentleman permit me to ask him——

Mr. CANNON. I have but five minutes and can not yield. Now, then, I beg gentlemen to reflect that there is great difference in the business of roads in a new country and a well-settled country. With the land-grant railroads in the new country space is not the important thing in running a train. It is the trip, the train-men, the cars, the locomotive, the track—everything has to be furnished; not one-fourth part of the space in the cars is utilized.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. CANNON. I should like to have a few minutes longer.

Mr. HENDERSON, of Illinois, was recognized, and yielded his time to Mr. CANNON.

Mr. CANNON. In the older settled countries everything is run full—freight trains loaded down, passenger trains filled with passengers, there is no dead space comparatively speaking. The rate for transportation for passengers, if you please, in the old settled parts of the country is much lower than it is in the new settled parts. Why? Because all their space is utilized.

Now, gentlemen, I want to talk to the members of this committee as business men for a moment. I ask you to keep in mind what are the factors in this proposition. Who is it that supports the land-grant railroad down in Florida, for instance? Who is it that pays for it? So you may say as to every other land-grant railroad and every other railroad in the country. The men who ship the freight on the railroad, the men who travel on the road as passsengers, the people who live along the railroad, if you please, support these roads. Now, then, if you cut down the pay, I say to my friend from Illinois [Mr. SHAW], rich in years and experience, if you take away one-half of the little morsel of pay they receive it only imposes an additional burden upon their customers.

It is charged over upon the other business the railroad does. The poor men who are struggling for the necessities of life in a new country pay it in addition to the other burdens they bear, for they furnish the business that supports these roads. And yet statesmen like my friend from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN] and my friend from Illinois [Mr. SHAW] get up here and pose as the guardians of the common people, when what they are doing is to take from him that hath not and give to him that hath.

This is but a mere hint at what I could say upon this bill, for I have not time to amplify. Under the five-minute rule I can do nothing more than to call the attention of the committee to the matter and to ask the Committee of the Whole to see to it that when the cry is raised here against land-grant railroads and monopolies, the rights of the poor men of the country who support these roads are not in the main sacrificed by those who profess to serve them.

A long time ago, in the French revolution, when that magnificent woman fell a martyr who will be recollected through all the ages, just before the ax of the guillotine dropped she exclaimed—"Oh, Liberty, what crimes are committed in thy name!" I might well say here, Oh, people, what injustice is done ostensibly for your benefit, but in fact to rivet an additional chain about your necks by your self-constituted champions!

Mr. HOLMAN. Will my friend permit me to ask him a question?

Mr. CANNON. Certainly; with pleasure.

Mr. HOLMAN. Do these land-grant railroads, including the great Illinois Central, built by the Government, and now owned by capitalists on the other side of the water——

Mr. CANNON. I hope the gentleman will hasten.

Mr. HOLMAN. Do they make their charges any lower on account of their land grants for transporting the poor men of your country?

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. CANNON. If I can be allowed time I will answer the question of the gentleman.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON] has expired.

Mr. MILLS. I will take the floor, and yield time enough to the gentleman to answer the question.

Mr. CANNON. I will say to the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN] that the business of railroading in this country is just like any other business. If the managers of railroads transact their business for nothing, the companies must soon break. If they do business for half price for six months of the year, they will charge double price for the other six months.

The law governing demand and supply operates between railroads and their customers just as it does between individuals and their customers in cases where railroads are not involved; and when you cut down the compensation of railroads for one kind of service, as the years roll around they must add the amount so cut down to the other business which they do; and any man with sense enough to set a hen can not fail to comprehend that proposition.

Mr. HOLMAN. Will not the gentleman answer my question? He has time enough.

Mr. CANNON. What is it?

Mr. HOLMAN. Has the Illinois Railroad reduced its rates of transportation of passengers to the basis of other railroads in view of the fact of the land grant made to it?

Mr. CANNON. Did it reduce its rates?

Mr. HOLMAN. To the rates of other railroads?

Mr. CANNON. Oh, the Illinois Railroad was the pioneer railroad in Illinois.

Mr. HOLMAN. Will not the gentleman answer my question?

Mr. CANNON. Certainly, if the gentleman will allow me to do so in my own way. The Illinois Railroad was built under that system, magnificent as it was when it was inaugurated, under the lead of the Little Giant of Illinois, Stephen A. Douglas.

Mr. HOLMAN. The gentleman is consuming the time of the gentleman from Texas [Mr. MILLS].

Mr. CANNON. Do not stop me midway in my answer.

Mr. HOLMAN. If the gentleman will not answer my question, I will yield the floor to the gentleman from Texas.

Mr. CANNON. I will answer it to the gentleman's heart's content.

Mr. HOLMAN. Why not answer it directly?

Mr. CANNON. Let me answer it in my own way, and I will satisfy even you before I get through.

The Illinois Central Railroad was built through a then wilderness, where no accommodations were furnished to the people in the way of freight and transportation. It was the pioneer road, and the building of that road has led to the building up of kindred roads and the establishment of other enterprises in that State, until to-day the State of Illinois stands the first in agriculture, the fourth in manufactures, and higher than any other State in tax-paying power under the internal-revenue law.

Mr. HOLMAN. Can not the gentleman answer a very pertinent question? He has time enough to answer it.

Mr. CANNON. I did not agree to furnish the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN] the necessary power of comprehending a legitimate answer to his question. It is not a question of what any railroad has charged heretofore, but the question is is the rate proposed to be fixed an equitable one?

Mr. HOLMAN. Well, will not the gentleman answer the question?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Texas [Mr. MILLS] has two minutes.

Mr. MILLS. I move to amend by striking out, in line 70, the word "five" and inserting "ten," so as to provide that the reduction of the compensation of railroad companies for transporting the mails shall be 10 per cent. instead of 5 per cent.

When the present rates of compensation for carrying the mails were established the freights which those companies were charging to private individuals were 100 per cent. above what they are now. The compensation allowed for carrying the Government freight was certainly fixed with some sort of reference to the charges of the railroad companies to private individuals for similar service. I am perfectly willing to pay these companies a reasonable compensation for doing the work of the Government, but the law as it now exists pays them a compensation which I can not characterize by any other epithet than enormous.

If members of the House will take Poor's Railroad Manual and turn to the reports of the railroad companies themselves of their charges for carrying the freight of private persons, they will see that the charges now paid average about one cent per ton per mile, taking the whole country.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. MILLS. I hope I shall be allowed a little more time. I gave all my time to other gentlemen.

Mr. HOLMAN. The gentleman, I think, was entitled to five minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. He was; but the time was consumed largely by other gentlemen.

Mr. HOLMAN. But it was understood I think that the time was not to be taken from the gentleman from Texas. I hope he will be allowed his five minutes.

Mr. CANNON. I hope the gentleman from Texas will have his time extended.

Mr. HOLMAN. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON] took all his time.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will recognize the gentleman from Illinois as taking the floor and yielding to the gentleman from Texas.

Mr. MILLS. If we examine the statement made by the Post-Office Department when a bill of this same character was before the House some two years ago we shall see what the Government is paying these railroad companies per ton per mile for carrying the mails. It pays the Baltimore and Ohio Railroad Company 12 cents per ton per mile, while that company carries freight along its lines for the people of Maryland, Virginia, and Ohio for 1 cent per ton per mile. The Government pays the New York Central and Hudson River Railroad Company 8 cents per ton per mile for transportation of the mails, while that company carries the freight of private individuals for less than 1 cent per ton per mile. Now when we come to those favored corporations the Union Pacific Railroad Company and its branches we find that the Government pays for this service on the Union Pacific $1.71 per ton per mile; on another branch $2.03 per ton per mile; on others 79 cents, 48 cents, and 37 cents; and the compensation runs down in some cases to 3 cents per ton per mile. The New Orleans, Saint Louis and Chicago Railroad Company receives 3.37 cents per ton per mile. Now, if it is reasonable and right to pay the Union Pacific Railroad Company $2 per ton per mile, it can not be right to pay the New Orleans, Saint Louis and Chicago Company a little more than 3 cents per ton per mile.

What makes this great difference in the rates of compensation? I ask the House, and especially gentlemen who have charge of this measure, to examine this question. It seems to me that the compensation we are paying these roads is vastly in excess of what we ought to pay. This bill proposes a reduction of 5 per cent. on the present compensation; my amendment will make a reduction of 10 per cent. I think the reduction might reasonably be 50 per cent. When I presented this question two years ago it received but little consideration from the House. My friend from Illinois [Mr. CANNON] pooh-poohed my proposition, and said that I was mistaken when I presented a table furnished to me by the Post-Office Department showing what was being paid. We are paying these companies for carrying our mails 1,000 per cent. more in some instances than private individuals are paying for transportation service. The little road to which I have referred, the New Orleans, Saint Louis and Chicago Railroad, receives from the Government 200 per cent. more than it charges to private individuals for transportation of freight; yet its compensation from the Government is only 3 cents per ton per mile, while the compensation in some other instances is as high as $2 per ton per mile.

This bill proposes still to pay exorbitant prices for this service. I am told that some of these railroad companies, from the compensation which they receive for carrying the mails of the Government, pay their entire running expenses. I have heard that statement made—whether it is true or not I do not know. I do know that the Government is paying to these companies for mail-service rates vastly in excess of what it should pay.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. BELFORD. Mr. Chairman, I listened to the impassioned speech made by my distinguished friend from Illinois [Mr. CANNON]. Probably if he knew as much about Western railroad interests as I do he would be less enthusiastic on the subject. We built the Union Pacific road; we built the Central Pacific road.

Mr. CANNON. This bill does not apply to them.

Mr. BELFORD. They are land-grant roads.

Mr. CANNON. It does not apply to them at all.

Mr. BELFORD. Did we not make a land grant to the Union Pacific Railroad Company?

Mr. CANNON. But this bill does not affect that road at all.

Mr. HORR. It does not touch the Pacific railroad companies.

Mr. BELFORD. Well, aside from all that, I say that it is the duty of this House, whether this bill applies or not to the Union Pacific and the Central Pacific Railroads, which we did practically construct by indorsing their bonds if we did not give them land grants—I always understood that we did give them land grants, and consequently I spoke of them as land-grant roads——

Mr. HORR. This bill purposely excepts those two roads, the Union Pacific and the Central Pacific.

Mr. BELFORD. It does not except them in this provision.

Mr. HORR. It does, because it applies to roads which have certain conditions in their charters, and these roads have a different charter entirely.

Mr. BELFORD. I would like the gentleman to show me the language where the exception is made.

Mr. HORR. I will do so:

Provided, however, That all railroad companies——

Mr. BELFORD. I will read it:

Provided, however, That all railroad companies whose railroads were constructed in whole or in part by a land grant made by Congress—

Mr. HORR. Now, observe the language that follows—

on the condition that the mails should be transported over their roads, respectively, at such price as Congress should by law direct, or on the condition that such railroad should be subject to such regulations as Congress might impose restricting the charges of Government transportation—

Now, neither of those restrictions is in the charter of the Union Pacific or the Central Pacific.

Mr. BELFORD. Mr. Chairman——

Mr. HORR. Wait a moment—

shall receive only 50 per cent. of the compensation authorized by this act to the other railroad companies for corresponding service.

These two railroad companies have been omitted purposely.

Mr. BELFORD. They used to have a school of philosophers in Greece who were called esoteric and another who were called exoteric. The latter were public and general, while the former were specialists. They had knowledge peculiar and special. Now, these gentlemen belong to that esoteric school of philosophers, and they possess a knowledge that is special to them and which the rest of us do not have. I say that no man can read that provision and come to the conclusion announced by the gentleman.

Mr. HORR. The gentleman does not know what he is talking about.

Mr. BELFORD. You will see whether I do—I mean the gentleman from Michigan. What is the fact? I introduced a bill in this House the other day reducing the rates of freight 50 per cent. because we built the roads. Jay Gould never put a dollar into their construction, and yet he has received $900,000 income a year from them. And he was ready to dominate and direct the fortunes of political parties with them. I say that this Government built them, and the time is coming when members of both political parties should assert the power of this nation to control these transcontinental lines; and any party that has not the courage or manliness or vigor to assert and execute that power will find itself in the vocative with the voting people of this Republic within two years.

Whether I am right or wrong about some exception in that provision which the gentleman says is mantled and covered up and blanketed over, I do not know but it does contain one great substantive assertion, and that is the power of this Congress to regulate these corporations.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. DUNN. Mr. Chairman, I desire to call attention to the reason given by the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN] why the Pacific roads were not included in this provision by which the compensation of the land-grant roads is to be reduced to 50 per cent. of that allowed to other roads. He says the reason is that they are indebted to the Government; that the Thurman act is to be so amended as to increase their sinking fund; and in order to increase their ability to repay to the Government what they owe they are not to be placed on the same footing of compensation as other land-grant roads, but are to receive double the pay for carrying the mails that other land-grant roads receive.

Mr. HOLMAN. Not quite that.

Mr. DUNN. That is the substance of it.

Mr. HOLMAN. Not quite the substance of it.

Mr. DUNN. That is taking money out of one pocket of the Government to put it into another.

Several MEMBERS. That is it.

Mr. HOLMAN. Will my friend allow me——

Mr. DUNN. It is absolutely a gift to these roads to enable them to pay what they owe. It is an additional subsidy in money never to be repaid.

Mr. HOLMAN. Will my friend allow me?

Mr. DUNN. I regret that I have not time, and I know my time will not be extended.

The fact is, Mr. Chairman, that the Pacific roads are land-grant roads, not subject to the same conditions expressed in the statute making the grants that other land-grant roads are, but they are subject to the same powers of the Government, "to regulate the postal service," derived from the Constitution. They have received a greater consideration in lands as well as in bonds, and they are correspondingly under greater obligations to the Government. If they owe the Government a sum of borrowed money, they should be required to pay that out of their own legitimate and honest earnings and not out of the pocket of the Government.

But I have never yet heard a reason given on this floor which has satisfied my mind why those roads should not be placed on the same footing as other land-grant roads. I moved the amendments to the appropriation bills in the last Congress to fix their compensation for transporting mails, troops, and Government property at the same rates other land-grant roads were compelled to accept. These amendments passed the House, but failed in the Senate, and were lost in conference.

They owe the Government a debt, and the Government has taken its own method to collect that debt. On that score they are under no obligations to carry property cheaper for the Government than other roads. And when it comes to taxing the land-grant roads, the weak land-grant roads, by a forfeiture of one-half of their compensation for carrying the mail and taking nothing from these powerful corporations, and those, too, shown by the table read by the gentleman from Texas [Mr. MILLS] to be receiving larger compensation per ton per mile than any other land-grant roads in the country, I say there is no reason for that discrimination. The only amendment which ought to be made to the bill is to place all the land-grant roads on an equal footing, allowing them the same compensation for like services, and compelling the Pacific roads to pay their honest debts out of their own honest earnings, and not out of a roundabout additional subsidy granted to them by the Government under the false pretenses of this act. I regret that the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN] and I regret that the Committee on Appropriations have taken that method. It has always been my rule to sustain the Committee on Appropriations when they are legislating in the line of economy; but in an act of manifest injustice of this character, for which no just reason can be given, I can not support them, and I regret it.

I will vote for any amendment to the existing law which places these land-subsidy roads upon an equal footing. They have shared the Government's bounty—not equally indeed, but certainly very liberally and in common. What I complain of is that those that got the lion's share of land are under this bill to receive the lion's share of compensation for services also. The rich are to be made richer and the poor poorer. There is neither law nor equity in the proposition. Our common sense of justice revolts against it.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. CANNON was recognized, and yielded to Mr. DUNN.

Mr. DUNN. Now, Mr. Chairman, the Pacific roads are exempted from the operation of the statute which requires the other land-grant railroads to carry the troops and property of the Government at 50 per cent. of what other roads of the country are allowed to charge for similar service. The Pacific roads, these petted children of fortune, who have received from the Government a domain from its public lands large enough for an empire, are exempted on this plea of poverty and a large debt to pay.

If these roads came into court with clean hands, if they had been just in their dealings with the Government, or had made an honest effort to deal fairly with the Government, there would be an argument in their behalf based upon the merit of honest purpose and effort. But they have resisted every requirement of duty imposed upon them by the law of their creation which emanated from Congress; they have evaded every condition on which they received and accepted the land grants and the bonds; they have avoided the payment of their just debts to the Government, resisting it through the courts, exhausting all the law's delays, and the Commissioner of Railroads in his last report shows that these roads after getting a decision of the First Comptroller adopted by the Secretary of the Treasury to the effect that their leased lines of roads should not be subjected to the operation of the Thurman sinking-fund act, are making the leased roads do all the business and make all the earnings, and they are robbing the trunk roads, that are subject to the conditions of that act, of all profits, so as to reduce the sinking fund to a minimum.

That part of their characteristic knavery is best told in the Commissioner's own language, which is as follows; I read from his last report (page 14):

> The purposes of Congress in granting the liberal aid extended to these companies, so forcibly expressed by Justice Davis, were held to be important elements in arriving at the true construction of their charters, and are not now to be overlooked in considering their present relations to the Government. All these purposes have been much more than realized, and it has been frequently and officially stated that the actual saving, year by year, to the Government greatly exceeds the whole annual interest paid.
> I am the more convinced that immediate action should be taken by Congress in this matter for the reason that each year demonstrates more clearly the fact that the present sinking-fund method is a practical failure, and I invite particular attention to the detailed report on the Central Pacific Railroad Company, from which it will be seen that the earnings on the subsidized portion of the road diminished in greater proportion during the year 1882 than on the non-aided and leased lines. The average decrease on the entire system was $462 per mile; but on the aided portion it was at the rate of $553 per mile, as against $227 on the non-aided portion.
>
> But whether this falling off of earnings on the subsidized portion of the road is due to the natural changes in traffic incident to the opening of new and competing lines, or has been purposely diverted from one line to another, it works equally to the same result in reducing the gross earnings of the roads out of which the 25 per cent. of the net earnings required to be paid under the act of May 7, 1878, is to be derived. But from whatever causes the fact arises, it is not perceived how the Government can interpose to change the direction of transportation of either passengers or freights. Such inquiry would be environed with almost insurmountable difficulties of both law and fact.
> The gross receipts of the Union Pacific also decreased, but the diminution of operating expenses left the 25 per cent. of net earnings slightly increased.
> Under the decision of the First Comptroller, affirmed and adopted by the Secretary of the Treasury in his circular of June 27, 1883, the Government is liable to pay in cash for all services rendered by the bonded Pacific Railroads over any portions of their road, owned, leased, or operated, which have not been subsidized in bonds. The total service for the Government rendered by the Union Pacific for the year 1882, over all its lines, was $1,139,709.38, of which $932,975.41 was upon the subsidized portion, leaving the sum of $206,733.97 as due the company in cash. The Central Pacific rendered service during the same period amounting to $1,051,862.46, of which $403,754.26 was upon the subsidized line, leaving $648,108.20 as due the company in cash. The services of the Sioux City and Pacific amounted to $30,888.22, of which $10,231.05 was upon the subsidized portion, leaving $20,657.17 as due the company in cash. The Central Branch Union Pacific performed services amounting to $35,287.42, of which $12,533.58 was on the subsidized portion, leaving $22,748.84 as due the company in cash.
> It is clear that under this decision, which is in accord with the decision of the Court of Claims in Union Pacific Railway Company vs. United States (16 Ct. Cls., 353), the companies have a manifest interest in diverting traffic from the subsidized portions of the road. But if they accept the provisions of a bill which funds the indebtedness in long payments and directs that all moneys for services over the aided lines, or upon any lines owned, leased, or operated by them, be credited upon the books of the Treasury until the bond of redemption next to mature shall have been fully paid, the entire transportation of the Government over all these roads would be pledged and applied to the liquidation of the debt as it matures and insure its absolute payment within the limited time.
> Should the decrease in the earnings of the aided lines continue to even an approximate proportion to the decrease of the last year, it will be readily perceived that the 25 per cent. of net earnings to which the Government is entitled would be so reduced as to render this increasingly inadequate as related to the vast magnitude of the debt.
> At the rate provided for in the Thurman act it would require a century or more to accumulate a fund sufficient to discharge this debt, and with strong probability that by this method it can not be done.

They are robbing, actually robbing, those portions of their systems that the Government has a hold upon, and smuggling their earnings over to the leased roads that the Comptroller strangely concludes are exempt from the operations of the law. The Comptroller reaches the remarkable conclusion that it is not the corporations, the companies, that owe these debts, but that it is only certain parts of their road-beds, tracks, and rolling-stock that owe it. They have always steadily resisted all the just demands of the Government, and if we are at last forced to sequester both the roads and their earnings, we will be taking a hive that has been already robbed of its honey and whose value has already been destroyed.

That, Mr. Chairman, is their manifest policy and intention. The facts are as I have stated. They are open to the observation of any who will examine them. Shall we then exempt them from conditions and burdens that we put upon weaker roads which are less able to endure them, roads which have received from us no such considerations, and roads that have faithfully performed the obligations imposed upon them as a consideration for their land grants, whatever else may be said of them, while these swollen and haughty corporations, which have received more than $60,000,000 in money and a veritable empire in lands, have never willingly performed a single duty or obligation that they owe as a consideration for the bounty of the Government.

Their minions and hirelings have infested these lobbies until they have grown gray in this wicked work. Members of Congress retire from the public service to the service of these potentates on larger salaries than the Government can give them, and they usually leave here laden with spoils for their masters, already fabulously rich.

We have heard here, and shall doubtless hear again, much said about private property and vested rights and shall be told that Congress has no power. Mr. Justice Davis, in delivering the opinion of the court in United States vs. Union Pacific Railroad (91 United States Reports, 79), said:

> The project of building the road was not conceived for private ends, and the prevalent opinion was that it could not be worked out by private capital alone. It was a national work, originating in national necessities, and requiring national assistance.
> The primary object of the Government was to advance its own interests, and it endeavored to engage individual co-operation as a means to an end—the securing a road which could be used for its own purposes.

The Constitution confers power on Congress to regulate commerce and the postal service. The Thurman act was an amendment of the charter of these roads, and its validity and constitutionality have been fully sustained by the Supreme Court.

I have never doubted our power to control the charges that they are to be allowed to make, but because we have the power I would not be unjust either to them or to others, and under no circumstances would I discriminate in their favor and against the weaker roads.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. TOWNSHEND. I really do not think there is any issue between the gentleman from Arkansas and myself. The reason why the 50 per cent. reduction was not applied to the Union Pacific system was because of a difference of opinion existing between the members of the committee as to whether we had the power to do that. I believe the majority of the committee were willing to subject the roads of that system to the same rate of reduction; but owing to the peculiar language of the charters of these roads and the decisions that have heretofore been made many of us doubted the power of Congress to subject them to the 50 per cent. reduction. If the gentleman from Arkansas, at the proper time, will offer an amendment bringing those roads down to the same basis as purely land-grant roads, I will support it if he will show that the law warrants it.

I want to address myself now solely to the proposition presented by the only pending amendment as I understand it, the amendment of the gentleman from Michigan. The amendment he makes is to strike out that provision of the bill which reduces the compensation of the land-grant roads purely and simply. Now, upon that proposition, what is the situation? The land-grant railroads have received from the Government in consideration of a clause in their charters conferring upon Congress the power to fix the rates of mail transportation at such a sum as Congress shall deem fitting—in consideration of conferring upon Congress the full, ample, and absolute power to fix their mail compensation at just such a sum as Congress may deem proper—in consideration of that clause in their charters the land-grant railroads have received from Congress 133,324,730 acres of the homesteads of the American people. That is the consideration we pay for it.

Take the Northern Pacific for instance. The grant to that road embraces 48,000,000 acres of land, some of the lands being the finest the sun of heaven ever shone upon.

Mr. MAGINNIS. And is not this Congress taking those lands away?

Mr. TOWNSHEND. Do not interrupt me. Some of those lands, I understand, run up as high in value as $20 an acre. That road has received a donation of the homes of the people of 48,000,000 acres. When they were about to receive the donation Congress required of that company that they should contract and agree that they would convey upon their lines, that they would simply haul upon their regular passenger trains, one or more mail cars sufficient to carry the mail. No exclusively mail trains; not an additional dollar of cost was demanded of them to carry the mail. The simple privilege only was demanded that for carrying a mail-car, one or more, on their regular passenger trips they should give Congress the power to fix their rates of mail transportation at such terms as Congress may deem proper. They accepted the grant on that condition.

Now the American Congress is called upon to exercise their judgment as to how much that road shall receive for carrying the mail. They got a donation from this Government which, if not forfeited, is estimated to be worth $150,000,000. Now, what does the committee say? That in consideration of the great and immense donations to these roads, the princely fortunes with which these roads are endowed, we simply demand that you shall carry the mails at one-half what we are paying roads that never received a dollar of help from the Government, that never received a dollar of bounty from the Government. Is that not fair if we give away the homes of the people to those roads?

A further fact stares us in the face, that the donation made by Congress if the grant is not forfeited on that line will pay for the building of the road and make it a free gift to the railroad company.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Illinois has expired.

Mr. REAGAN obtained the floor and yielded his time to Mr. TOWNSHEND.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. Now, I know exactly what is in the mind of some of the advocates of these land-grant roads. They say to us, "You propose to forfeit their grants." If we do, this provision applies only to that portion of the road which has already received its grant.

One gentleman said this Northern Pacific road had wrecked the fortunes of Villard and Jay Cooke. Why did it wreck their fortunes? Simply because they watered the stock and the bonds of that road. It was by means of trickery and robbery of the investing public that they wrecked their own fortunes as well as the fortunes of others.

My colleague from Illinois speaks of the French revolution. He did not tell us the cause of the French revolution. He dared not tell us. The cause of the French revolution was of the same nature as that which to-day impels the American people to rise up and demand that Congress shall not throw away their homesteads, shall not give away their public lands. It was legislation like that which endowed these Pacific railroads with these immense land-grants that caused the French revolution. It was robbery of the people. It was the favoritism of the crown. It was special legislation and the use of the powers of the executive to enrich the few at the expense of the many that aroused the masses and resulted in the bloodshed of the French revolution; and if you go on pauperizing the people, robbing them of their homes, driving them into poverty by unjust and iniquitous taxation, the time may come when the grand mass of the American people will rise up and overthrow their rulers just as the French did in their revolution.

My friend speaks of the Illinois Central Railroad and gives praise to the "Little Giant of Illinois." What did he do? When Congress gave that princely endowment to the Illinois Central Railroad did Mr. Douglas leave it on the same basis that we left the Northern Pacific and other land-grant roads on? No, sir; Mr. Douglas wrote a provision in that charter which required the Illinois Central to pay 7 per cent. of its gross earnings into the treasury of the State of Illinois. The grant was made to the State of Illinois, and it was exacted of that road and it was compelled to pay and does pay to-day into the treasury of the State of Illinois 7 per cent. of its gross earnings. That was the kind of land grant that was made by a Democratic Congress.

Mr. DUNN. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. TOWNSHEND. I have not time. The Illinois Central has sold enough of its land grants to realize three and one-quarter millions of dollars. I submit, in God's name, that, having received three and one-quarter millions of dollars from the Government, we certainly ought to compel the road to convey our mails at the rate of 50 per cent. of what we pay roads that never received a dollar of bounty from the Government, and even then the road will receive enormous compensation. It will be found upon examination that these railroads charge the people in some instances fifty times as much for carrying the mails as they charge for carrying ordinary freight. And when the Illinois Central shall receive from 20 to 25 per cent. for carrying the mails, even after this reduction, more than it receives for ordinary freight, it seems to me it will not be unjust to reduce the compensation paid that road for this service.

Mr. RYAN. We have been told, and correctly, that the Union Pacific Railroad was constructed almost exclusively by means of aid from the Government. We have been told that to that system of railroads we made a grant of 37,000,000 acres of the public domain. We have been told that to those roads we loaned the credit of the Government, by its bonds, to the amount of over $60,000,000. We have also been told that the original holders of the stock in that system of railroads never paid one dollar for it. Yet the Committee on Appropriations of this House proposes to pay this class of roads the original charter rates, that is, "a reasonable compensation, not exceeding the highest price paid individuals for like services." That committee undertakes here to make the 5 per cent. reduction apply to that road. If we have, under the law, the right to make the 5 per cent. reduction apply, if we have the right to amend the charter of these roads to that extent, pray tell why we have not the right to make the 50 per cent. reduction apply to them? The same power which enables them to do the one will enable them to do the other.

To what roads do they make the 50 per cent. reduction apply? To that class of roads which have been aided by comparatively small land grants; roads which, with the exception of one, have not received a land grant exceeding two and a half million of acres in any instance.

There were originally upward of seventy roads of this class, but they have been somewhat reduced in number by consolidations. With the exception of one road, the Northern Pacific, not one of them has received a land grant exceeding two and a half millions of acres. Fifty-two of these roads received each a grant of less than a million of acres; thirty of them grants each of less than a half a million acres; twenty-two of them grants each of less than 300,000 acres; seventeen of them grants each of less than 200,000 acres, and nine of them grants each of less than 100,000 acres.

It is proposed to make these roads which are carrying the mails for 20 per cent. less than the roads constructed exclusively by Government aid, which are transporting all your troops and your Government property for 50 per cent. of the usual rates, suffer a further reduction of 30 per cent., while you allow the other roads, constructed wholly by Government aid, to receive full rates. Why? Is it because you have not the power under their charters to reduce their compensation?

Mr. TOWNSHEND. Have you that power?

Mr. RYAN. That has been answered by the proposition to enact legislation here to amend their charters so as to reduce their rates 5 per cent.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. Will you vote to reduce the compensation of those roads 50 per cent.?

Mr. RYAN. The proposition to reduce the compensation of those roads 50 per cent. came from the Committee on Appropriations at the last session of the last Congress, and was advocated here, I think, by every member of that committee except Mr. Caswell, and I was one of its members. When it came in here for discussion, it was finally determined by the House to be reasonable, to reduce the compensation of these roads 20 per cent. and put them on the same terms as the other land-grant roads, and that reduction passed the House.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. I move that the committee rise for the purpose of limiting debate on this paragraph.

Mr. KEIFER. Do not do that now.

Mr. ANDERSON. I rise to a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. ANDERSON. It is whether, when the amendment offered by the gentleman from Michigan has been voted upon, that will preclude the offering of an amendment at a prior point in the paragraph?

The CHAIRMAN. It will not.

Mr. ANDERSON. I desire to offer a substantial amendment.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. I move that the committee now rise for the purpose of limiting debate.

Mr. KEIFER. Do not do that now; some of us want further time for debate.

The question was taken on the motion that the committee rise; and upon a division there were—ayes 80, noes 48.

So (no further count being called for) the motion was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. BLOUNT reported that the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union had had under consideration the bill (H. R. 5459) making appropriations for the service of the Post-Office Department for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1885, and for other purposes, and had come to no resolution thereon.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. I move that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the Post-Office appropriation bill; and pending that motion I move that all debate upon the pending paragraph and amendments thereto be closed in one hour.

Mr. HORR. I trust the gentleman will not insist upon that. I will say to him that this one item occupied at the last session by permission of the House two whole days. It is a matter that affects every part of the United States. I am willing to consent to anything reasonable; but I submit that he should not try to cut off debate in this way. I should be willing to agree to an hour and a half on each side. I think that is not excessive.

Mr. KEIFER. If the gentleman from Illinois will allow me, I suggest that he make his motion to limit debate upon the pending amendment, not on the whole paragraph.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. On the whole paragraph.

Mr. KEIFER. Not on the whole paragraph; for I know gentlemen on both sides who have very important amendments to offer to other portions of the paragraph.

Mr. HORR. I hope the gentleman from Illinois is not seeking to prevent amendments to the balance of the paragraph. Several amendments are yet to be offered.

Mr. HOLMAN. I suggest that the time be extended till 5 o'clock. That will be ample.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. At the suggestion of my colleague on the committee [Mr. HOLMAN], I modify my motion so as to provide that debate terminate at 5 o'clock.

Mr. KEIFER. Do you mean on the pending amendment?

Mr. TOWNSHEND. On the paragraph and all amendments.

Mr. HORR. I am willing to consent to that limitation of time if the gentleman will apply it to the pending amendment only. He ought not to seek to cut off other amendments.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. I certainly think we have been very fair. We have allowed the debate to run an hour and a half already, and I am willing that it shall continue for an hour and a half more, making three hours upon a single paragraph of the bill. I certainly think that gentlemen on the other side of the House ought not to demand further time. I insist on my motion and move the previous question upon it.

Mr. KEIFER. I think the gentleman will save time by assenting to the arrangement suggested on this side.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. TOWNSHEND] demands the previous question upon his motion.

Mr. HORR. I move to amend—and my proposition is not unreasonable——

The SPEAKER. No amendment is in order. The gentleman from Illinois has demanded the previous question.

On ordering the previous question there were, upon a division—ayes 72, noes 60.

Mr. HORR. I demand the yeas and nays. I want to know whether we are to be cut off in this way.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. The gentleman is wasting his own time.

The yeas and nays were ordered, there being 37 in favor thereof—more than one-fifth of the last vote.

The SPEAKER. The question is on ordering the previous question upon the motion of the gentleman from Illinois that all debate in Committee of the Whole on the pending paragraph of the Post-Office appropriation bill and all amendments hereto be closed at 5 o'clock to-day.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. Upon the paragraph and all amendments thereto.

The SPEAKER. The Chair has so stated the motion.

Mr. CANNON. I rise to a parliamentary inquiry. I want to see whether I understand this matter. The motion of the gentleman from Illinois, as I understand, is to close debate at 5 o'clock to-day on the whole paragraph.

The SPEAKER. On the pending amendment and on the paragraph under consideration.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the affirmative—yeas 141, nays 25, not voting 154; as follows:

Mr. COVINGTON. Not to break a quorum.
The SPEAKER. So it is with all of them.
Mr. MAYBURY with Mr. STEPHENSON, for to-day.
Mr. CARLETON with Mr. LAWRENCE, till March 23.
Mr. SNYDER with Mr. GOFF, till March 23.
Mr. CLARDY with Mr. BAYNE, till March 23.
Mr. MORGAN with Mr. MORRILL, till March 23.
Mr. PAIGE with Mr. HATCH, of Michigan, till March 23.
Mr. GRAVES with Mr. HAYNES, till March 23.
Mr. STOCKSLAGER with Mr. PEELLE, of Indiana, till March 23.
Mr. TOWNSHEND with Mr. WASHBURN, till March 14.
Mr. HEMPHILL with Mr. RUSSELL, till March 14.
Mr. HUTCHINS with Mr. KETCHAM, till March 14.
Mr. BEACH with Mr. BURLEIGH, till March 14.
Mr. JORDAN with Mr. STRUBLE, till March 14.
Mr. ELLIS with Mr. KELLOGG, till March 14.
Mr. SKINNER, of New York, with Mr. SKINNER, of North Carolina, till March 30.
Mr. SPRINGER with Mr. HENDERSON, of Illinois, till March 14.
Mr. HERBERT with Mr. MCKINLEY, till further notice.
The vote was then announced as above recorded.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. I desire to withdraw my vote. I am paired with the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. WASHBURN], upon condition, however, that my vote should not be given except it was necessary to make a quorum.

Mr. WAIT. I move to reconsider the vote just taken; and I also move to lay that motion on the table.

Mr. HORR. I move that the House do now adjourn.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. I notify gentlemen that they are wasting the time that was proposed to be allowed for debate.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Michigan moves that the House do now adjourn.

Mr. HORR. And upon that motion I demand the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 61, nays 156, not voting 103; as follows:

So the House refused to adjourn.

On motion of Mr. HAMMOND, by unanimous consent, the reading of the names was dispensed with.

The following additional pair was announced: Mr. HARDY with Mr. HOLTON, for this day.

The result of the vote was then announced as above recorded.

The SPEAKER. The question now recurs on the motion of the gentleman from Connecticut to lay the motion to reconsider on the table.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. I rise to a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. What side did the gentleman from Connecticut vote upon?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman voted in the affirmative—with the majority.

Mr. WAIT. I call for the yeas and nays on that motion.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. Let the question be fairly stated.

Mr. ELDREDGE. Is the motion of the gentleman from Connecticut to reconsider the motion by which the House refused to adjourn?

The SPEAKER. No; that motion would not be in order under the rules of the House. There is no such motion.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. Let the question be stated.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from Connecticut to lay the motion to reconsider on the table. The House by a vote ordered the previous question upon the motion of the gentleman from Illinois. The gentleman from Connecticut moves to reconsider that vote, and to lay that motion on the table. On the latter motion the yeas and nays have been ordered.

Mr. WILLIS. I rise to a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. WILLIS. I wish to know if a vote in the affirmative on this motion does not mean that we will get through this matter to-night?

The SPEAKER. The Chair does not think that is a parliamentary inquiry.

The Clerk will call the roll.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 145, nays 13, not voting 162; as follows:

After the second call of the roll,

Mr. LORE asked unanimous consent that the reading of the names of members voting be dispensed with.

Mr. REED and Mr. EVANS, of Pennsylvania, objected.

Mr. BLANCHARD. I should like to vote.

The SPEAKER. Was the gentleman in his seat listening for his name to be called?

Mr. BLANCHARD. I was in my committee-room at work, under leave of the House.

The SPEAKER. The Chair can not upon that ground submit the gentleman's request.

The following additional pair was announced:

Mr. CLAY with Mr. MILLER, of Pennsylvania, for this day.

The SPEAKER. Upon the question of laying on the table the motion to reconsider the vote by which the previous question was ordered the yeas are 145 and the noes are 13. The Chair is bound to take notice of the fact that no quorum has voted, as shown by the record.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. As the time I had offered for debate in my motion has expired it is useless to continue the proceedings any further to-day. I move that the House do now adjourn.

Mr. DUNN. I ask the gentleman to yield to me, that my proposed amendment may be printed in the RECORD.

Several members called for the regular order.

The question being taken on Mr. TOWNSHEND'S motion, it was agreed to.

And accordingly (at 5 o'clock and 5 minutes p. m.) the House adjourned.

PETITIONS, ETC.

The following petitions and papers were laid on the Clerk's desk, under the rule, and referred as follows:

SENATE.

FRIDAY, March 14, 1884.

Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. E. D. HUNTLEY, D. D.

The Journal of yesterday's proceedings was read and approved.

ADJOURNMENT TO MONDAY.

On motion of Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin, it was Ordered, That when the Senate adjourns to-day it be to meet on Monday next.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATIONS.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate a communication from the Secretary of the Interior, transmitting, in answer to a resolution of the 25th ultimo, a report of the Commissioner of the General Land Office regarding indemnity lands certified, patented, or donated to or claimed by railroad corporations in the State of Iowa; which, with the accompanying papers, was referred to the Committee on Public Lands, and ordered to be printed.

He also laid before the Senate a communication from the Secretary of the Interior, transmitting, in answer to a resolution of the 25th ultimo, a report of the Commissioner of the General Land Office on the subject of the Arredondo grant, in Columbia County, Florida, and the lands claimed thereunder; which, on motion of Mr. CALL, was, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Private Land Claims, and ordered to be printed.

HOUSE BILL REFERRED.

The bill (H. R. 4411) to amend section 101 of the Revised Statutes of the United States so as to allow the chairman of a subcommittee of a committee of either House of Congress to administer oaths was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS

Mr. SEWELL presented resolutions adopted at a meeting of citizens of Elizabeth, N. J., in opposition to the bill authorizing the construction of a bridge over the Kill von Kull; which were referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. JACKSON. I present a petition of the national banks of Nashville, Tenn., praying that the tax on national-bank circulation be taken off. The petition is addressed to me personally, but is evidently intended for the Senate. I ask that it be received and referred to the Committee on Finance.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If there be no objection, the paper will be received and referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. CALL. I present the petition of I. G. Harville and numerous other citizens of Hernando County, Florida, praying for the forfeiture of the land grant in the State of Florida for the construction of the Florida Railroad from Amelia Island to Tampa Bay. The petition states that these lands have been forfeited by reason of non-compliance with the requirements of the charter of the road, and prays that the same may be declared forfeited and subject to sale and entry. I move that the petition be referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. BLAIR. I present a petition of old soldiers residing in the Soldiers' Home, in this District, two hundred and twenty-six of them, in which, "as citizens of the United States, feeling and deeply deploring the curse of the liquor traffic in the United States," they "respectfully petition your honorable bodies to enact a law prohibiting the manufacture and sale of all alcoholic beverages in the District of Columbia." The petition is accompanied by a note from the Woman's Christian Temperance Union of this city requesting me to present the petition at my earliest convenience, in which they state that over half the inmates of the Soldiers' Home have signed it. They state the number of signers at one hundred and fifty, but I see that the number of signatures on the petition is two hundred and twenty-six, from which I infer that the letter was written some time before the signatures were completed.

I ask the attention of the committee on the affairs of the District of Columbia to this petition. It is well known, I may add, that the soldiers at the Soldiers' Home are especially sufferers from the traffic in intoxicating liquors in this District. I move the reference of the petition to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. VEST presented a resolution of Mills Creek Grange, No. 1966, of Ralls County, Missouri, in favor of the passage of an act making the Bureau of Agriculture a department of the Government; which was referred to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry.

Mr. PUGH. I present a memorial of the Board of Trade of the city of Mobile, concurred in also by the Mobile Cotton Exchange, setting forth facts in connection with the supply of cheap coal from the Warrior coal basin, in Alabama, to the Gulf of Mexico. I move that the memorial be referred to the Committee on Commerce.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. COCKRELL. I present certain additional evidence to accompany the bill (S. 947) granting a pension to Powhattan B. Short, consisting of sundry affidavits and some records from the War Department. I move that the papers be referred to the Committee on Pensions.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. McMILLAN presented the petition of a large number of officers of steam vessels, in favor of the passage of H. R. 4691, appropriating all moneys now remaining in the Treasury of the United States to the credit of the inspection service for the purchase of suitable lands for two snug-harbors, under the direction of the Secretary of the Treasury; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. HOAR. I present the petition of Henry Lee, of Boston, and sundry other well-known and eminent citizens of that city, praying for the passage of a bill repealing the act of May 15, 1820, which is now embodied in certain sections of the Revised Statutes of the United States which fix the term of certain administrative officers to four years. I move that the petition be referred to the Committee on Civil Service and Retrenchment.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. HOAR presented the petition of George Brown, a citizen of the District of Columbia, formerly of Fauquier County, Virginia, praying compensation for certain property taken and used by United States troops under Generals Burnside and McClellan in 1862; which was referred to the Committee on Claims.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. SEWELL, from the Committee on Military Affairs, to whom was referred the joint resolution (S. R. 39) correcting the military record of Wickliffe Cooper, deceased, late major Seventh Cavalry, brevet colonel, United States Army, reported it without amendment, and submitted a report thereon.

Mr. MAXEY, from the Committee on Post Offices and Post-Roads, to whom was referred the joint resolution (S. R. 13) to reappropriate and apply the amount appropriated by the act of Congress approved March 3, 1877, to pay certain Southern mail contractors, reported it with amendments.

Mr. SLATER. The Committee on Public Lands, to whom was referred the bill (S. 428) to forfeit certain public lands granted to the Oregon Central Railroad Company, in the State of Oregon and the Territory of Washington, direct me to report it with an amendment. I reserve the right to file a written report hereafter.

PRINTING OF DOCUMENTS.

Mr. ANTHONY. I am instructed by the Committee on Printing, to which was referred a resolution for the printing of extra copies of the bill reported by the select committee of the Senate appointed to inquire into the condition of the Indians in Montana and Dakota, to report it without amendment. I ask for its present consideration.

By unanimous consent, the resolution was considered, and agreed to, as follows:

Resolved, That there be printed for the use of the Senate 1,000 copies of the bill reported by the select committee of the Senate appointed to inquire into the condition of the Indians in Montana and Dakota, together with the report of the committee and accompanying documents.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Mr. MILLER, of New York, introduced a bill (S. 1841) providing additional pay for officers honorably mustered out under the act of July 15, 1870; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

He also introduced a bill (S. 1842) for the erection of a public building at Hudson, N. Y.; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds.

Mr. BOWEN introduced a bill (S. 1843) to reduce postage on mailable matter of the second class; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads.

Mr. PENDLETON (by request) introduced a bill (S. 1844) to require the Secretary of the Interior to place the name of Rolen T. May on the pension-list; which was read twice by its title, and, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. MILLER, of California, introduced a bill (S. 1845) authorizing the Secretary of War to set apart certain lands of Fort Bidwell military reservation for cemetery purposes; which was read twice by its title, and, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. HOAR introduced a bill (S. 1846) granting a pension to Hattie L. Goss; which was read twice by its title, and, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Pensions.

He also introduced a bill (S. 1847) to authorize the issuing of a register to John S. McQuin and J. Warren Wonson for the schooner Druid; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. SAWYER introduced a bill (S. 1848) for the relief of James W. Harvey, as assignee of Joseph Parkins; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. ALDRICH introduced a bill (S. 1849) establishing life-saving stations on the sea and lake coasts of the United States; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Commerce.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. CLARK, its Clerk, announced that the House insisted upon its disagreement to the amendments of the Senate numbered 1, 3, 4, 5, 6, and 8, to the bill (H. R. 4971) making appropriations for the support of the Military Academy for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1885, and for other purposes, agreed to the conference asked by the Senate on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and had appointed Mr. J. W. KEIFER of Ohio, Mr. W. H. FORNEY of Alabama, and Mr. E. J. ELLIS of Louisiana managers at the conference on its part.

CATTLE DISEASE.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If there be no "concurrent or other resolutions," the Calendar, under the eighth rule, is in order.

Mr. PLUMB. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the joint resolution (S. R. 75) making an appropriation to eradicate the foot-and-mouth disease, which I introduced yesterday, and which was reported back from the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry.

Mr. SHERMAN. Has the joint resolution been printed?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It is in print. The question is on agreeing to the motion to proceed to its consideration.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the joint resolution (S. R. 75) making an appropriation to eradicate the foot-and-mouth disease.

Mr. PLUMB. I have a dispatch, which I ask may be read, which conveys the latest information on the subject. I will state, however, that the papers from the West, including those of Chicago and Saint Louis, are full of accounts about the spread of this disease. There is no doubt about its alarming character. A dispatch this morning informs us that the governor of Illinois is contemplating a quarantine against the cattle of that section of country to prevent the introduction of the disease into that State. It is a time of the year when the cattle are being sent to market, and if they are to go at all, and go with safety to the sections of country through which they move, there must be some immediate and very stringent measures adopted to wipe out and eradicate this disease.

It is not a question affecting the State of Kansas except from the accidental fact that it has broken out there, because it is a disease which can be carried with great rapidity, and is certain to be carried, into all sections in which cattle in the natural course of business go. I will ask that the dispatch be read.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. HARRIS in the chair). The Senator from Kansas asks that a telegram from the governor of the State of Kansas be read. If there be no objection it will be read.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

TOPEKA, KANS., March 13, 1884.

Hon. P. B. PLUMB,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.:

The disease is spreading, and in short time will be beyond control. Reports not exaggerated; two best surgeons on the ground, both in United States service. It will cost $50,000 and prompt action to stamp out the disease. When cattle go on grass its eradication will be impossible, and means the destruction of the cattle of Kansas, Colorado, and Texas. This is the judgment of the veterinary surgeon and others.

G. W. GLICK,
Governor of Kansas.
WM. SIMS,
Secretary State Board Agriculture.

Mr. SHERMAN. I move to strike out, in lines 6 and 7, the words "and in co-operation with the proper authorities of the State of Kansas." My object will be apparent when the Secretary will report the amendment striking out the words.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will report the amendment proposed by the Senator from Ohio.

The CHIEF CLERK. In lines 6 and 7 it is proposed to strike out the words "and in co-operation with the proper authorities of the State of Kansas;" so as to read:

That the sum of $25,000, or so much thereof as is necessary, be, and hereby is, appropriated, to be used under the direction of the Commissioner of Agriculture in eradicating a contagious disease popularly known as the foot-and-mouth disease.

Mr. SHERMAN. As a matter of course, without these words the Commissioner of Agriculture will co-operate with the proper authorities of any State; but if the disease exists in the United States at all it is liable to break out in any State, and consequently as this is a remedy which will extend during the whole of the present session of Congress and probably the next, it ought to be applied to all the States.

The truth is that this disease is scarcely known now by any medical authority. It has different names. The disease prevails as well among sheep and swine as among beef cattle. There has been a good deal written about it, I know, and a good deal of information ought to be communicated to the Senate by the debate on the subject.

I desire, if this provision is to pass, that it shall be so broad that it may be applied in any State where this disease may occur. It exists in Canada, it exists in nearly every nation in Europe now, and is in danger of crossing at any time to Ohio, to Illinois, and across the whole country. The people of Illinois are becoming very much alarmed about it. All I desire is that this appropriation shall not be localized in Kansas, but shall be made available wherever the disease may appear to exist at the time.

Mr. CULLOM. As the Senator from Ohio has referred to my State, I desire to say that I have no information in reference to the condition of affairs there except from the press, but I am satisfied that there ought to be something done. My judgment is that not only should the amendment of the Senator from Ohio be adopted, so that this matter can be looked to in all the States, but that the amount should be increased.

Mr. PLUMB. I propose to increase it.

Mr. CULLOM. The joint resolution appropriates $25,000. I think the sum ought to be made at least $50,000, and I hope that such an amendment will be made. The Senator from Kansas says he proposes to amend it in that direction, and I hope he will make it at least that sum, and that it will be passed at once.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Will the Senator from Kansas allow me to simply make a suggestion to him? We have before us a general bill that covers not only the foot-and-mouth disease but other diseases. It was under discussion day before yesterday, and the Senate considered it a while. I suggest to the Senator from Kansas, might it not possibly be best to take up that bill and dispose of it instead of this joint resolution? For the bill which has been before the Senate as it passed the House covers not only this disease but all other contagious diseases of a violent and destructive character. I think we can pass the general bill as soon as we can pass this resolution, and the bill will certainly receive more support, for it covers everybody's interest, than this measure, which is purely local. I make the suggestion; I am not moving an amendment.

Mr. PLUMB. The argument in favor of the general bill is undoubtedly re-enforced very largely by the condition of things now established to exist in the State of Kansas and elsewhere, but this is an emergency which will not permit of waiting upon the uncertain progress of a bill through this body and the other House as well. Notice was served the other day by two Senators on the opposite sides of the Chamber that the bill would not go through without exhaustive and protracted debate. I presume that will be the case, and not only that, but I have no desire that it should be otherwise. Whatever is done should be done with consideration, and for the purpose of preventing any attempt or suggestion of an attempt to put through the general bill in response to the existence of a particular emergency. I thought it was better, because of the lack of time and for other reasons, that this joint resolution should go through providing for this emergency, leaving Congress to deliberate then upon the other measure at its comparative leisure.

When I spoke of this question a day or two since I referred to the fact that this disease existed in the State of Maine now, and that local efforts had been made there to eradicate it and that it also existed in the State of New York. I am advised through the public prints and by dispatches which I have received that it is supposed to have been conveyed into Kansas through a herd of polled Angus cattle taken to that part of the country during the last season. That class of cattle has been largely introduced all over the West—in Illinois, Missouri, Kansas, and Colorado. The investigation which the resolution provides for will throw a great deal of light upon the general subject, which we shall discuss when we come to the general bill.

I am not opposed to the motion of the Senator from Ohio, which will enlarge the purpose and scope of the resolution. When I drew it it was suggested that I should draw it covering a wider scope, but I preferred to leave that, in order that others who are interested in the matter might make the suggestion themselves which has now been made. So far as I am concerned I have no objection to striking out the language the Senator from Ohio proposes to strike out.

Mr. CULLOM. Will the Senator also offer an amendment increasing the appropriation?

Mr. PLUMB. I shall do so at the proper time.

Mr. COKE. Mr. President, the adoption of the amendment of the Senator from Ohio would empower the Commissioner of Agriculture to go into any State and adopt such means as may to him seem proper for the suppression of the disease named in the joint resolution without reference to and in defiance of the exclusive rights of the States to exercise the police powers for the preservation of the health of their own cattle.

Without saying how I shall vote on the joint resolution, I propose an amendment which will put it in a less objectionable shape, at least to me, if it should be passed. I call the attention of the Senator from Ohio to it. If in order I propose to amend his amendment by striking out the words "the State of Kansas," in lines 6 and 7, and insert "the States in which it is used;" and also to insert the words "by the consent of" after "agriculture," in line 5; so as to read:

That the sum of $25.000. or so much thereof as is necessary, be. and hereby is, appropriated, to be used under the direction of the Commissioner of Agriculture by the consent of and in co-operation with the proper authorities of the State in which it is used.

This amendment will leave to the State in which the Commissioner of Agriculture operates with this fund the discretion to accept or not to accept it as the State may see fit. The authorities of the States in which it is proposed to be used may have views of their own. They may be pursuing their own methods. They may prefer to exercise the police powers reserved to them by the Constitution rather than to have the aid of the National Government. If they do prefer it, I hold that they clearly have the right to exercise their jurisdiction to the exclusion of that of the General Government. The amendment which I propose to the amendment of the Senator from Ohio will simply call upon the States to say whether or not they desire the proffered aid.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chief Clerk will report the amendment proposed by the Senator from Texas.

Mr. COKE. I will put it in writing.

Mr. HAWLEY. Mr. President, I should be very sorry to seem to be captious about a matter of this description. It is not the sum of money involved that concerns me. We have here got into the habit of looking upon $25,000 and trifles of that sort as not worth a moment's consideration, and they are small in comparison with the resources of the country and with the interests at stake, I suppose. But I am troubled by some old-fashioned notions on this subject, and I say now that I regret the disposition all over the country to appeal in case of almost any trouble directly to an exhaustless Treasury and an omnipotent nation.

This is not the theory upon which the Government was founded, and the theory in my opinion was a just one, a wise one, the safest for the permanent conduct of this Government. The States did withhold to themselves with extraordinary jealousy, not only by the terms of the Constitution but by all contemporaneous expressions and subsequent legislation, the full control over a vast range of what are commonly called minor matters, but matters that come right into the daily life and substance of the people.

I should resist and protest against Federal boards coming into the State of Connecticut to condemn cattle, and butcher cattle, and pay for cattle. We for many years have had our State board of agriculture. We have large herds of exceedingly valuable cattle; comparatively large; I do not speak in comparison with the Texas herds; but I speak of wealthy men, farmers and others, who have devoted themselves for scientific reasons, for curiosity, and for profit to the raising of some of the most valuable breeds of cattle in the world. We have our State board to look out for these very matters, and the moment it is announced by the press or by the telegraph that any dangerous disease prevails, even to the extent of a single instance, the diligent chairman or other official of that board goes to the spot, and the State has its own machinery for examination, for condemnation, and for whatever of compensation there may need to be in the case. I think that a proposition to run to Washington if we heard that a disease prevailed would be received with a smile, I will not say with contempt, in the State of Connecticut.

I think that is the better way to manage these things. I do not say what sort of appeal might be made to our pity and generosity in the case of an extraordinary calamity that should in its magnitude approach the recent great floods; but I am sure that in any ordinary case a State ought not to come here. I doubt our power to do anything whatever in the matter. I very greatly doubt it. I agree to and I assert the right of the Federal Government to regulate all intercourse between the States upon this and other matters, and I assert the duty of the Federal Government to protect us against importations from foreign countries and to regulate our intercourse with foreign countries in all this question; but in a matter purely within our own boundaries, that belongs to the States, that was jealously claimed and retained by them, I regret, I say again, to see the tendency to come here to save a few dollars, or as if there were not sufficient wisdom within the States to meet the occasion.

So I am inclined to vote against these propositions in general and to vote against anything in the general bill that is before us which takes us within a State to regulate a matter entirely within its own limits and perfectly within its own jurisdiction, I may say chiefly for the purpose of getting the Federal Government to pay the dollars that the process may require.

I need not eulogize the public spirit or enterprise or magnify the wealth of the State of Kansas. I simply say that so far as I know, so far as there is any information before us this morning, she is abundantly able and more than able to take care of all these things for herself. If she is in danger from the irruption of disease from other States, and some regulation of interstate commerce shall be thought necessary, I will meet the gentleman very cordially; but I am inclined to vote at once against all these purely local matters, unless I am driven by impulses of generosity and benevolence to disregard States and figures, as in the case of large floods and overwhelming general calamities.

Mr. COKE. I send to the desk the amendment that I proposed, which I have prepared.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment proposed by the Senator from Texas to the amendment of the Senator from Ohio will be read.

The CHIEF CLERK. It is proposed to strike out, in lines 6 and 7, the words "State of Kansas" and insert "in the States in which it may be used;" and also to insert, after the word "agriculture," in line 5, the words "with the consent of."

Mr. COKE. Now let it be read as amended.

The CHIEF CLERK. As proposed to be amended it will read:

That the sum of $25,000, or so much thereof as is necessary, be, and hereby is, appropriated, to be used under the direction of the Commissioner of Agriculture, with the consent of and in co-operation with the proper authorities of the States in which it may be used, in eradicating a contagious disease popularly known as the foot-and-mouth disease, now prevailing to an alarming extent, &c.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair calls the attention of the Senator from Texas to the reference to the cattle disease existing "to an alarming extent among the cattle of that State." As his amendment applies to all States, the words "that State" should be stricken out.

Mr. PLUMB. I shall not quarrel with the terms of any amendment which accomplishes the purpose I have in view that the Senate may think a better disposition of the subject-matter. It is one of those emergencies in which there is no time, as I think, to quibble about words or about the question of authority.

The Senator from Connecticut [Mr. HAWLEY] was generous enough to insinuate that the State of Kansas wanted this because it was too niggardly to pay for this service out of its own purse. I thank him for the compliment, and will return it when the time comes, as I have no doubt I shall have abundant opportunity to do, before many years shall elapse at all events. I will say, Mr. President, that the State of Kansas is not only able, but willing, to bear up any burden that may be imposed upon it by any contingency which refers alone to its interest and the interest of its people. This is not, unhappily, one of that kind. The cattle of Kansas are marketed in almost all the principal markets of the world. They are going there every day in the progress of a business useful and beneficent. I read this morning of an account of the sale of a large amount of cattle in Chicago, and of the inquiries which arose from the fact that they were from Kansas, and the suggestion that grew out of that fact as to the danger that was liable to be incurred by the cattle of Illinois and the cattle of all the other States of the Union in that great market. In the first place, nothing that the State of Kansas will do, whatever it may do in regard to the eradication of the disease, will be effective in settling the question in the public mind as to the non-existence of the disease among the cattle of that State.

In the next place, this is a disease which peculiarly, almost more than any other disease, is communicable by ordinary methods, inevitable methods. The running of wild animals across the range where these cattle are grazing or in the fields where they are fed, the transport of the cattle themselves, the transit of individuals from place to place, from places where this disease exists to other places where its does not exist, is sufficient to carry it. I have a dispatch on my desk from the agent of the Agricultural Bureau in Chicago, saying that in his opinion it was carried into Kansas by polled Angus cattle that went in there, and that is in accordance with the general diagnosis laying down the general character of the disease and the means of its communication recognized everywhere.

It is therefore not a local question in any sense in which that term can be applied. It is not the sum of $25,000 that the State of Kansas wants. It wants the prompt, the energetic, the thorough, the competent exercise of the authority of the General Government not only to reach it there but to reach it wherever it may be carried from there, and in such a way that when once it shall have been exterminated, if it shall be, that fact shall be known everywhere, so as to give security to all the persons who deal not only in the cattle of that State but in the cattle of the great ranges west and south and southwest who on their way of necessity pass through that State in their transit to market.

Mr. BUTLER. Mr. President, I find in this morning's papers the following dispatch which I commend to the Senator from Kansas in reference to his own State:

THE FOOT-AND-MOUTH DISEASE.

CHICAGO, March 13.

Rumors have been published of the appearance of the foot-and-mouth disease in Effingham County, Illinois, but one or two isolated herds, which were supposed to be affected, when visited failed to show symptoms of the real contagion, and no alarm is yet felt. Governor Hamilton, of this State, has been urged by the Wyoming Stock-Growers' Association to quarantine the cattle in this State against the infected cattle in Kansas, and he declares that he will issue a proclamation to that effect within one or two days.

I should like to ask the Senator why it is that the governor of Kansas can not do the same thing.

Mr. PLUMB. So he can; but who is to determine that question in that way? Perhaps the governor of Kansas can quarantine against the cattle of Texas and the cattle of Colorado and the cattle of New Mexico and the cattle of Missouri and of the other States and Territories in that neighborhood. I do not say as to that; but what kind of a spectacle would it be, the governor of a State assuming to interfere with interstate commerce, with the commerce of all this country, and settling for himself and for his own locality questions which affect not only that locality but which affect the interests of all the people of the United States.

Mr. BUTLER. I state to the Senator that the governor of a State has a perfect right to defend his State from the introduction of disease from another State by quarantine.

Mr. PLUMB. I do not say he has not the power, but I was speaking of the wisdom of the exercise of that power by the authorities of a State when the United States authorities can exercise it in such a way as to hold the balance evenly and prevent the unnecessary interruption of trade.

Besides that, it is not a question of quarantine now against the cattle from outside the State, and therefore the governor of Kansas has no need to quarantine. It is a question about quarantining cattle from Kansas, and of course that means not only the cattle that belong in that State but the cattle which in the course of trade are brought through that State, and I think at least one-half of all the cattle shipped to market from Texas are shipped through that State; and a quarantine of that kind as a matter of course must operate against them. We are to have this whole question determined then on the basis of the local feeling in Kansas, the local belief there, without any means of determining from a larger standpoint and by means more widely at hand than can locally be used what the interest not only of that State but of all the States may be in this great question.

I have a dispatch in regard to the same subject-matter which the Senator has called attention to in his reading from the dispatches in the morning papers which I will read:

CHICAGO, ILL., March 13, 1884.

Hon. GEORGE B. LORING,
Commissioner of Agriculture, Washington, D. C.:

Our papers report foot-and-mouth disease at Effingham, Ill. We urge that you send Dr. Detmars to at once proceed investigate and report. Dr. Detmars is here and ready to go, if ordered. Answer.

JESSE SPALDING,
Collector Customs.

There will grow out of that undoubtedly a great deal of apprehension that is unnecessary. I have no doubt that in some places the foot-and-mouth disease will be supposed to be in existence when it is not. Other diseases will be imputed to that, and it will contribute to a panic, to a feeling of insecurity, and to great loss unless we proceed systematically and thoroughly and by means of the national authority to settle definitely and finally all this question, and it will not be settled by referring it simply to the local authorities, the authorities of a county or of a State, but the great buying public of New York, Chicago, Cincinnati, Saint Louis, and elsewhere wherever these cattle are marketed, have themselves some assurance on the subject which will enable them to deal in them with satisfaction, just as when we come to establish means of inspection, if we ever do, in regard to meats to go abroad, it will not need the seal merely of the State of New York; it will not need the action of any State authority, or at least that action will not be sufficient for the purpose, but it will need the action of the General Government, the seal of some officer of that Government in order to carry that guarantee of soundness which is necessary to give our meats currency abroad. And so at home we want not isolated local action; we want general action; we want something that is competent in its jurisdiction to meet the case in all its magnitude and wherever it may be, not only in Kansas but in Illinois and in all the other States wherever it may appear, and for the purpose of investigating in the process of eradication in such a way that the existence or the non-existence of this disease may be definitely determined elsewhere as well.

Mr. BUTLER. I should be very glad to co-operate with the Senator from Kansas in any reasonable way to prevent the spread of this disease, but the Senator can not have forgotten that a very few years ago a disease broke out among the horses known as the epizootic, by which the omnibuses and street-car lines and all the modes of transportation in all the cities were almost entirely suspended, not only in one section of the country but all over it. A few years ago another disease broke out among horses known as pink-eye, which was transmitted from one part of the country to another. It would be just as reasonable, and I think more reasonable, that some particular locality should come to Congress and ask twenty-five, fifty, or one hundred, or two hundred thousand dollars to stamp out that disease as is the measure demanded by the exigency in Kansas. That disease may prevail there I have no doubt, but my own opinion is that the alarm and injury to the cattle interest has been intensified immensely, and has cost this country millions and millions of dollars by this agitation of the question and these constant appeals to Congress to make appropriations to stamp out the disease. The hog-cholera and numbers of other diseases among animals are prevailing constantly in almost all the States, but I have never known until now an application to be made to Congress for an appropriation to get rid of a disease in a State when it has not appeared that it could not be got rid of by proper remedies there.

Mr. PLUMB. Will the Senator advise me where in the United States this disease could break out if it did not break out in some State?

Mr. BUTLER. Of course it would break out in a State; and I think it very doubtful whether the United States Government has a right at any time in a case of that kind to appropriate money for the purpose of preventing a contagious disease among animals when the States themselves have the ability, if they have the will, to do it. That is my objection to all such measures as this.

Mr. CULLOM. Mr. President, I only desire to say a word. My own State has been referred to several times by Senators on the floor, the references being based upon a dispatch from Chicago in relation to the disease that seems to have broken out in Effingham County. I have no information in reference to it except what has been read to the Senate. But in regard to my own State, I am not here now asking anything of the General Government for the State. Our State has a law on this subject which was passed three years ago, and while I happened to have the honor of occupying the position of governor of that State it was enforced, and enforced at very considerable expense to our people. I am not here now asking the adoption of this resolution on account of anything pertaining to the condition of affairs in Illinois; but I am satisfied that this disease, which is now prevailing to some extent in this District and in Pennsylvania and Maryland and New York and other portions of this country and which is likely to spread all over, ought to be attended to and stamped out, if it can possibly be done, and that at as early a period as possible.

The Senator from South Carolina refers to the horse disease that we had prevailing in this country a few years ago. I believe that if the Congress of the United States, when that disease first appeared in the East, had at once made an appropriation and taken steps to stop its career west by perhaps an appropriation of fifty or one hundred thousand dollars, millions of dollars might have been saved to the people of this country which they sustained the loss of by the death of horses all over the land.

I am not asking for an appropriation for Kansas or Illinois, but in my judgment this great interest of the people of this country must be looked after. We have to-day forty million head of cattle in the United States, an interest that is superior to almost any other, and in my judgment the Congress of the United States ought not to hesitate a moment in making such an appropriation as will give our people information in reference to what ought to be done in protecting the cattle of this country from this disease which is liable to spread over every State in the Union.

This question is not simply a question of an appropriation to apply to Kansas or Illinois or Ohio, but the purpose is to get information which will enable us to at least pass such laws as will protect the interests of the people by protecting the cattle of this country. It involves largely the question of interstate commerce, because everybody knows that the cattle of the country are being shipped from one portion of the nation to another, that great car-loads of them start from Texas or from the Territories and pass through Kansas, pass through Illinois, pass through Ohio, and so on to the seaboard in the East, and that sort of transportation can justly and properly be regulated only under the provisions of a law pertinent to interstate commerce.

Mr. BUTLER. Will the Senator allow me a word?

Mr. CULLOM. Certainly.

Mr. BUTLER. I would call the Senator's attention to the provisions of this joint resolution. It provides that the sum of $25,000, or so much thereof as is necessary, shall be appropriated for the purpose of "eradicating a contagious disease," not for the purpose of procuring information. I go as far as any Senator on this floor in appropriating the necessary amount to procure all the information on the subject we can get; but this assumes that a certain disease exists in advance of the information to which the Senator from Illinois refers as so desirable to be procured by Congress. I will join in an appropriation to procure the information; but this goes further.

Mr. CULLOM. I understand that the resolution provides that money shall be expended in part perhaps for the purpose of eradicating the disease, but we must find out the facts in relation to the disease before we can do very much in the direction of eradicating it. In my judgment the great benefit to ensue from the passage of this resolution is to enable the Commissioner of Agriculture to ascertain what the condition of affairs is in this country, so that finally when the bill comes before Congress which has been reported by the chairman of the Committee on Agriculture we shall know best what to do with it.

Mr. SHERMAN. Mr. President, I would greatly prefer, if the Senator from Kansas saw his way clear, to let this subject stand until the bill reported from the Committee on Agriculture is brought before the Senate, so that we may deal with this very grave and important question with the patience and gravity that it demands.

Senators who look upon this as a mere local matter affecting a flock of cattle in Kansas underrate it enormously. About eighteen years ago pleuro-pneumonia, as it is called, a disease among cattle, first appeared in the United States. It had spread havoc and destruction in France, in Germany, and in Great Britain, and caused a loss of many millions of dollars, and it appeared probable that it would come into this country. Congress passed a law prohibiting the importation into this country of any cattle, and made such importation subject to Treasury regulations. I think it was about 1866. Under that law the United States has been able to prevent the spread of this disease across the Alleghany chain and confined it to the border States on the coast. So, fortunately for this country, pleuro-pneumonia has never appeared west of the Alleghany Mountains. That was the result of the act of Congress of 1866 and the acts amendatory thereof. I have no doubt that if pleuro-pneumonia had crossed the mountains and appeared on the plains of Kansas or Illinois or in the West the amount of property that would have been destroyed would have extended to hundreds of millions of dollars. The wisdom of that policy has been demonstrated. Now a disease infinitely more contagious, more general, because it extends to all kinds of animals, is threatening our country by importation from Europe—the foot-and-mouth disease. I believe the technical name of it is aphthous fever, and it is now prevailing in several of the European states, and it has appeared several times in our country by importation. I will read a letter from a very distinguished gentleman in Ohio which I think will give you in a few words the danger of this disease and the nature of it. This gentleman is connected with our agricultural department in Ohio, and is a very good lawyer as well as a very good farmer and stock-raiser. He says:

> In view of the alarming outbreak of aphthous fever, or foot-and-mouth disease, in Kansas, it is my opinion that all importation of live-stock should be stopped for the present. Sheep and swine are subject to this disease as well as cattle. It is more dangerous than the pleuro, because more infectious, infecting premises, ships, railway cars, litter, fodder, &c., while the pleuro, as the English veterinary department of privy council holds, can only be communicated by actual contact with the living diseased animal. The disease has several times appeared in Canada, once imported in a lot of sheep. The traders have denied its existence and opposed all restrictive measures. A short time ago, as you may have learned, a lot of Hereford cattle infected with foot-and-mouth passed through Portland to Canada. Stock of all sorts is passing that way to all parts of the West, often all the way in Dominion cars. This should be stopped until the alarming danger indicated by this outbreak in Kansas is past. It will be no hardship or injustice, as we are not allowed to send cattle to Canada.

It seems to me the same measures should be adopted to prevent the importation of this disease into the West that were adopted in regard to pleuro-pneumonia. If this disease has broken out in Kansas, it is the most unfortunate event that has happened to the people of the United States in ten years, and will be the most destructive. I doubt somewhat whether the disease known as the foot-and-mouth disease, the aphthous fever, has broken out in Kansas, whether it has broken out in Illinois; but if that be the fact, and this is the fatal disease that has exterminated so many cattle and hogs and sheep in Europe, it is a fatal fact that ought to be dealt with with severity, promptness, and decision. No State-right barriers ought to intervene in a question of that kind. The power of the United States ought at once to be exercised to stamp out that disease, cost what it will, because, let me tell my friend from Texas, if either the pleuro-pneumonia or this new disease, entirely different in character from pleuro-pneumonia, should break out in Texas, Texas would call aloud for help from the United States, and we would heed their cry. This ought to be dealt with as a national question, and not a State question. It is a national question.

The Senator from Connecticut endeavored to make a constitutional argument about dealing with a local disease. If this was a mere local disease, confined to Kansas, or Connecticut, or even Ohio, I would not seek the aid of the General Government; but this is the importation of a foreign disease and must be dealt with as a national question. This disease, if it is here, has been introduced from foreign countries in some way, either by contact with animals or by clothing. It was said in one case it was introduced by the clothing of a Scotch herdsman. It is said that it has been introduced by clothes, forage, rags, blankets, and also by contact with infected cattle. At all events it is a foreign importation, and must be dealt with as the result of commercial intercourse with foreign nations.

All I have to say in regard to this measure of the Senator from Kansas, who is very desirous to pass it, is that if it is to be passed I want it made general, extending to all parts of the United States. I wish to follow the amendment I offered with another amendment which will strike out another clause limiting the effect of this appropriation to Kansas and make it general. But my own advice would be and I would ask the Senator from Kansas to adopt it, and I think he would expedite matters if he would allow this resolution to pass over and take up the pleuro-pneumonia bill, the general bill reported from the Committee on Agriculture, and ingraft on that some other provisions which ought to be added to it, so as to deal with this question as a great and important question ought to be dealt with.

I am afraid now that if this resolution is passed by the Senate and goes to the House, with the crowd of business that is pressing there on the House, the appropriation bills being pending, it will not be taken up and will not be promptly acted on, and thus the Senate will have dealt with the question in an imperfect way at one time in one bill and the House have dealt with it on another bill in another way after a long debate. It is better for us to take up the principal question, the House bill, and deal with it there, where not only this subject but other kindred subjects can be embraced.

Mr. MILLER, of California. The practical question raised here, it seems to me, is as to the Department which should have charge of this matter. This resolution provides that it shall be the Agricultural Department. The Treasury Department is dealing with this subject particularly in respect to pleuro-pneumonia.

Mr. SHERMAN. I think myself it ought to go to the Treasury Department.

Mr. MILLER, of California. The foot-and-mouth disease has appeared at Portland, Me., and it was imported from England, the cattle having been brought there by an English ship. The disease has spread somewhat, and the Treasury Department has taken measures to extirpate it there by quarantining those animals and doing all it can to stamp it out. Now the question arises whether there will not be two Departments of this Government operating against this disease at the same time, and whether there will not be a conflict and extra expense. The question is which ought to have charge of it. I submit these suggestions to the Senators who have the care of this measure, that we may be informed on the subject.

Mr. MILLER, of New York. Mr. President, I think the Senator from California, when he considers this matter with full knowledge of the present condition of it, will see that what is proposed to be done by this resolution should not be committed to the keeping of the Treasury Department. Under a law now on the statute-book the Secretary of the Treasury quarantines all cattle imported to our country from foreign lands. That is done at the port of importation, and he has his officers in connection with the custom-houses for doing that. The quarantining of cattle at our ports is entirely under the control of the Secretary of the Treasury through the customs collectors; but when we come to deal with a native disease, a disease which is certainly so far from our ports as to be found in Kansas, and perhaps in Illinois, the Treasury Department has no machinery whatever at present organized for dealing with it.

It may be said that the Agricultural Department has not sufficient complete machinery; but we propose to give it that by the bill which is pending before the Senate. The Agricultural Department, however, has correspondence with agents in nearly every county in every State in the United States, parties with whom the department is in constant correspondence. I have here a copy of a letter which came to the Agricultural Department the other day from Portland, Me., from the correspondent of the department there, showing the condition of the foot-and-mouth disease in the State of Maine and how it was spreading there. It has correspondents all over this country. I think I am correct in saying that the Agricultural Department has a correspondent in every county in every State, and it receives from these correspondents or agents early information in regard to any disease that may break out, and it is able at once to operate with its correspondents. The Commissioner of Agriculture, on the application of the governor of the State of Kansas, has already sent his veterinary surgeon belonging to the department, a very skilled officer, to Kansas to investigate this disease. The Treasury Department has no such officer; it has no power to employ any such officer; and is not at all able to reach this question.

Mr. MILLER, of California. Will the Senator yield to me for a moment?

Mr. MILLER, of New York. Certainly.

Mr. MILLER, of California. I was informed yesterday by one of the chief officers of the Treasury Department that that Department had sent a surgeon out to Kansas to investigate this foot-and-mouth disease.

Mr. MILLER, of New York. If so it is entirely without authority of law. There is no law authorizing the Secretary of the Treasury to do anything of the kind. Under the law authorizing the Cattle Commission which exists in the Treasury he is authorized to quarantine, and is compelled to quarantine, cattle coming into this country; but I submit that there is no law for any operation on this question by the Secretary of the Treasury as the statutes now stand.

Mr. MILLER, of California. One or the other Department ought to have charge of it.

Mr. MILLER, of New York. We propose to put it fully under the control of the Agricultural Department if the Senate shall concur in passing the bill which has already passed the House.

Mr. MILLER, of California. Except in regard to importation.

Mr. MILLER, of New York. Except in regard to foreign animals imported. That question is to be left with the Secretary of the Treasury, where it now is; and as all the machinery in regard to the exports and imports of this country is in the hands of the Secretary of the Treasury it is undoubtedly much more economical that the matter of quarantining animals brought in from foreign ports should be left in the hands of the Secretary of the Treasury, where it can be attended to by the collectors of customs and their subordinates without any great additional expense. But when we come to the question of interstate commerce in cattle and the question of diseases in the Western States, I submit that it is in no way proper that it should be turned over to the Secretary of the Treasury. In fact I think that Department is already overburdened, as some other Departments are, and rather than increase their duties there ought to be new departments organized and some of these important duties transferred to them.

As to the question raised by the Senator from Ohio [Mr. SHERMAN], I submit that if the foot-and-mouth disease of which he speaks is so dangerous and alarming in its character as he says it is—and I think he is correct about that—there is all the more need of the passage of this preliminary joint resolution, as I will call it, for he will see that if we were to take up the pleuro-pneumonia bill this afternoon, as I hope we shall at 2 o'clock, and succeed in passing it through the Senate to-day and sending it back to the House with some amendments; or if we were to pass it simply as it came from the House, so that it would require no concurrence by the House in our amendments, it would be impossible to meet the exigency of the occasion under that bill alone, for, in the first place, the bill provides that the Commissioner of Agriculture shall prepare rules and regulations in regard to the suppression of these dangerous diseases, and these rules and regulations are then to be submitted to the various State authorities, and they are to be called upon through their legislative bodies to pass legislation which shall enable the States to co-operate with the Federal authorities in the suppression of these diseases. It would be impossible in the ordinary course of legislation that any such co-operative action from the various States could be had within several months. In nearly all the Western States the Legislatures are not in session this winter. They have biennial sessions, and they would be compelled before the bill went into operation fully to call extra sessions of the Legislatures and pass acts and appoint commissioners to act in co-operation with the Federal authorities. Here comes an emergency. The disease has undoubtedly broken out in Kansas. We do not yet fully know how it was carried there, but the time is rapidly approaching when the cattle of Kansas and of all the Western States will go upon the ranges and go out to graze, and when that is done there will be no possibility of the Federal Government and of the State governments co-operating to prevent its spread, and its most dangerous spread, over the entire West.

At the present time these cattle, of course, are herded together, and are in herds where they can be controlled. It needs prompt and immediate action. While I know that under the rules I can not speak of what the other branch of Congress may do or may have done, yet I state unofficially that I understand one of the committees of that body has agreed upon and will report to-day a measure, similar to this, for an immediate appropriation of money for this purpose, notwithstanding they have already passed the pleuro-pneumonia bill. I state this upon authority which I believe to be correct.

Mr. VEST. I should like to ask the Senator a question, if he will grant permission.

Mr. MILLER, of New York. Certainly.

Mr. VEST. Does the Senator say that he believes the House of Representatives will pass a resolution like this to enable the Commissioner of Agriculture to go into a State and extirpate a disease supposed to exist among cattle, after the vote already taken there, following an elaborate debate in the House on that question?

Mr. MILLER, of New York. It is not necessary that I should express an opinion as to what can be done or can not be done in the other House. My private opinion is that such a resolution should be passed and will be passed, for the vote upon the question referred to by the Senator shows that the majority against it was very small.

But that is neither here nor there. Under this resolution, if it shall pass, there is no probability that the power given to the Commissioner of Agriculture under its general provisions would enable him to go into a State and to do acts which the State officers or private citizens might protest against. I think his action will necessarily be very much like the action of the Senate frequently, that is, by unanimous consent. If a State should resist, I have no doubt the courts, under the resolution as it stands, might be called upon to enjoin him if he were doing anything it did not approve of. I have no idea that any such action as is apprehended will take place; I have no fear that there is any danger in that direction.

Mr. VEST. I should like to vote for this resolution if it would accomplish the extirpation of this disease, because my State is very intimately associated with Kansas; but I understand the resolution to give the power to the Commissioner of Agriculture to go into any State, into the State of Kansas specifically, and extirpate, by any means he may think proper to adopt, this disease. The amendment of the Senator from Texas makes it necessary that the State should consent and co-operate. If I am in error in regard to that, I want to be informed upon it.

Mr. MILLER, of New York. The Senator will permit me to read the joint resolution:

That the sum of $25,000, or so much thereof as is necessary, be, and hereby is, appropriated, to be used under the direction of the Commissioner of Agriculture and in co-operation with the proper authorities of the State of Kansas.

Mr. VEST. Suppose the authorities of Kansas do not co-operate?

Mr. MILLER, of New York. Then undoubtedly the entire operations of the Commissioner in that State will fail, and you will have to wait until the pleuro-pneumonia bill is passed. The governor of Kansas has already called upon the Commissioner of Agriculture to send a veterinary surgeon and other officers to make the examination, and there is no doubt whatever of the co-operation of the State authorities of Kansas. But under this resolution I submit there is no such danger as the Senator suggests; and if there were any I should not favor it at this time, because that question is an important question, and it should not be disposed of in so summary a manner as the joint resolution proposes. But I submit that the resolution is so well guarded that there is no danger that the Commissioner of Agriculture will do anything whatever under it except by consent of the authorities of the State wherever he may operate.

Mr. VEST. There can be no objection, then, to the amendment of the Senator from Texas. All I desire is that I shall not be committed to the fifth section of the pleuro-pneumonia bill, to which I can never give my consent in any shape or form. If this resolution is passed to be operative only with the consent of the authorities of the State of Kansas, then it is not so objectionable; but I do not choose to be committed in advance to the fifth section of the pleuro-pneumonia bill now before the Senate.

Mr. MILLER, of New York. There is no intention on my part or on the part of the Senator from Kansas to commit any one to the provisions of the pleuro-pneumonia bill; nor do I wish to have any one committed against it. Let that be settled when the bill comes up.

I submit that any candid examination of this resolution will show that it is not subject to the objection which has been raised. The Commissioner of Agriculture has no absolute power under it. He can expend this money only in co-operation with the State authorities of the State in which he may operate; and if the State shall decline to co-operate, or shall fail even to ask the Commissioner of Agriculture for his assistance, under this joint resolution nothing can be done. It simply meets this one emergency. The governor of Kansas has called for help, and it seems that the emergency is so great that we ought to pass this joint resolution at once and send it to the House; for, as I have already stated, if we wait for the pleuro-pneumonia bill to pass, and wait to have it fully put into operation by the co-operation of the various State Legislatures, it will be one, two, three, and perhaps in some cases more than six months before any co-operation can be had by the various State Legislatures, and then the damage will have been done.

Mr. BUTLER. Why not adopt the suggestion of the Senator from Ohio that this joint resolution go over until after the consideration of the pleuro-pneumonia bill now before the Senate? The very identical question is there involved.

Mr. BLAIR. I should like to remind the Senator from South Carolina that at 2 o'clock the bill to aid in the establishment and temporary support of common schools in the country is the special order.

Mr. BUTLER. I was not aware of that fact, but I understood that the friends of the pleuro-pneumonia bill would press its consideration to-day, and therefore I supposed it would be taken up. But it will be impossible to accomplish what has been stated as so desirable by the Senator from New York by this mere local resolution. The practical effect of this resolution will be to give the State of Kansas $25,000. That is all. If the State of Kansas wants $25,000, I am quite willing perhaps to vote it; but it will fail to accomplish what is thought to be so desirable in reference to this disease among the cattle. I therefore suggest that this resolution go over until after we have had time to consider deliberately and fully discuss what is known as the pleuro-pneumonia bill, involving the very same questions and the very same principles.

Mr. MILLER, of New York. I think the Senator from South Carolina could not have listened to what I said in reply to the Senator from Ohio on that same proposition, in which I attempted to make it plain to the Senate that the provisions of the pleuro-pneumonia bill would require the co-operation of the State Legislatures, the making of new laws in nearly all the States of the Union, perhaps, in fact, in all of them. It may be necessary that there should be legislation in every State of the Union before that bill can go fully into operation.

Now, the case as I understand it is simply this: There has broken out in one county in Kansas, perhaps in only one, two, or three herds—I do not know the exact number—a very dangerous and contagious disease known as the foot-and-mouth disease. The cattle are now corralled or are in herds. The State of Kansas has no legislation whatever upon the subject, and the Legislature is not in session. The governor of the State has appealed to Congress, through the Senators from that State, and to the Commissioner of Agriculture for help. It is believed by those competent to judge that if the Federal Government shall appropriate instantly from $25,000 to $50,000, and shall authorize the Commissioner of Agriculture to use that money in co-operative action with the governor of the State of Kansas, this most dangerous disease may be stamped out at once, it costing only twenty-five or fifty thousand dollars to do it. If it gets out upon the ranges in the spring the loss, as stated by the Senator from Ohio, will amount to millions upon millions of dollars. I submit that if we are to wait until the pleuro-pneumonia bill passes, all the dangers which we desire to avoid and seek to avoid by this resolution may come upon us in their full force.

There is nothing in this resolution which commits the Senate or the two Houses of Congress or any Senator to any proposition which can be at all objectionable, in my judgment. It avoids the constitutional objection of the Federal Government coming in without the authority of the States. That is avoided by the language of the resolution. It is simply a question whether we shall put our money under the control of the Commissioner of Agriculture for this purpose at this time, and doubtless avoid great loss and danger to the entire Western portion of our country.

Mr. GARLAND. I was out of the Chamber when thisresolution was called up——

Mr. HAWLEY. Will the Senator from Arkansas kindly yield to me for a moment for what I may call an explanation?

Mr. GARLAND. Certainly.

Mr. HAWLEY. I dislike very much to be misapprehended, and I am sure the Senator from Kansas did, to a certain extent, misapprehend me. I used no such expression in regard to Kansas as "niggardly," nor did I imply that Kansas is not sufficiently enterprising, generous, and public-spirited to do her whole duty; indeed I think I intimated something to that effect; but I did reflect somewhat upon a tendency throughout the United States, which I think everybody understands, to come too frequently to the Federal Government and to be willing to overlook the proper constitutional restrictions if there only be some money connected with the legislation sought. That I applied to all parts, to my own State as well as to the rest. I think it is a mistaken national tendency.

A word more. Nor am I liable to the criticism made by the Senator from Ohio. I am willing to do all that the Federal Government should do in this matter with power and with generosity, provided we act with some respect to constitutional powers. If we act under the clause with regard to commerce with foreign nations and between the States, I will agree to every imaginable reasonable restriction as to the transportation of cattle between the States and as to the importation of cattle. In short—the Senate knows what I mean—I will exercise every power under that constitutional qualification; but I have an inclination to object, as the Senator from Missouri I see has, to this tendency to go within a State and assume to the Federal Government what the people ought to do themselves. I will co-operate, under constitutional regulations, with as much generosity as anybody.

Mr. GARLAND. Mr. President, as I stated a moment ago, I was out of the Chamber when this resolution was called up, and I am not aware precisely how it was reached. I suppose, though, it is up now for consideration, and I think probably the Senate might as well consider it as anything else, for it opens up a very great question, greater than the resolution itself apparently imports; and then it has drawn to itself to a considerable degree the discussion of the bill called the pleuropneumonia bill. If it is the purpose of the Senate to consider it and get through with it, I wish now to say upon it what I have been thinking of for some time in reference to this and kindred subjects.

Mr. PLUMB. Before the Senator proceeds, will he state whether he is advised of the amendment which the Senator from Texas has proposed and which is not objected to.

Mr. GARLAND. Yes, sir. I am in favor of the resolution without the amendment of the Senator from Texas, and it is on that general subject raised by that amendment that I desire to be heard now, having lost the opportunity some time ago when the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. RANSOM] withdrew his resolution for an appropriation for the afflicted people in North Carolina, South Carolina, Alabama, and Georgia, suffering from the recent cyclone. I intended then to make the remarks which I will make, now that this resolution is before the Senate.

In view, Mr. President, of the constantly recurring demand, as indicated by the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. HAWLEY], to the Congress of the United States for legislation of the kind here proposed, it is quite important that we should have some general understanding about it; it is quite necessary that something should be done indicating the views of Congress upon this question on its merits, and not leave it to mere caprice or to mere sympathy or to mere condolence, as the case may be, upon each application that is made.

Now, what is the case before us? As I understand it, the Senator from Kansas [Mr. PLUMB], acting on the responsibility devolved upon him as a Senator from that State, has introduced a resolution, founded upon information communicated to him that there is a great emergency affecting one of the material if not the most material of the industries of that State, threatening in its aspect also to overtake and afflict like industries of other States. In view of that presentation of the facts, the matter not being local at all, not being merely domestic to the State of Kansas, but, as indicated by the Senator from Ohio [Mr. SHERMAN] in his clear manner of putting everything, if not stopped now it is likely to produce one of the greatest afflictions this country has seen for ten years, this information being communicated to the Senator from Kansas and he communicating it to the Senate, a committee of this body has reported back the resolution of the Senator from Kansas and it is now before the Senate.

Whenever an affliction overtakes the people of this country that defies and overreaches, so to speak, the power of the local authorities and goes beyond their means of relief, their capacity for remedy, my judgment is that Congress has the power, and having the power is the judge of the time to exercise that power, to relieve that particular calamity or affliction. This is one of those cases, if I understand the Senator from Kansas and the communications he has made. This being so, I shall now undertake to show that upon a fair interpretation of the Constitution it is within the power of Congress, and upon a fair and reasonable interpretation of the precedents of Congress it is beyond any question within the capacity of Congress, to grant the relief. I think it can be shown, too, that it is not within the power of the States in the aspect in which it is presented here to interfere with this matter.

It may not be very interesting, but it may be somewhat important for us to get down to the principle at the bottom of this proceeding. I may be a little tedious to the Senate in laying before it what I consider to be the basis on which this proposition rests, but I think it should be presented.

In the first volume of Story on the Constitution, sectional page 978, commenting on the clause of the Constitution which provides for levying taxes, imposts, &c., to pay the debts and provide for the general welfare, we find that eminent judge quoting with approbation the report of Mr. Hamilton on manufactures in 1791. He says:

> The terms "general welfare" were doubtless intended to signify more than was expressed or imported in those which preceded—> otherwise numerous exigencies incident to the affairs of the nation would have been left without a provision. The phrase is as comprehensive as any that could have been used; because it was not fit that the constitutional authority of the Union to appropriate its revenues should have been restricted within narrower limits than the general welfare, and because this necessarily embraces a vast variety of particulars which are susceptible neither of specification nor of definition. It is therefore of necessity left to the discretion of the National Legislature to pronounce upon the objects which concern the general welfare, and for which, under that description, an appropriation of money is requisite and proper.

That is, to levy taxes for the purpose of paying the debts &c.—

Then, in section 979, Judge Story says:

> But the most thorough and elaborate view which perhaps has ever been taken of the subject will be found in the exposition of President Monroe which accompanied his message respecting the bill for the repairs of the Cumberland road (4th of May, 1822). The following passage contains what is most direct to the present purposes:

President Monroe, as quoted in sections 984 and 985, said:

> SEC. 984. I have dwelt thus long on this part of the subject from an earnest desire to fix, in a clear and satisfactory manner, the import of the second part of this grant, well knowing, from the generality of the terms used, their tendency to lead into error. I indulge a strong hope that the view herein presented will not be without effect, but will tend to satisfy the unprejudiced and impartial that nothing more was granted by that part than a power to appropriate the public money raised under the other part. To what extent that power may be carried will be the next object of inquiry.
> SEC. 985. It is contended on the one side that, as the National Government is a government of limited powers, it has no right to expend money except in the performance of acts authorized by the other specific grants according to a strict construction of their powers; that this grant in neither of its branches gives to Congress a discretionary power of any kind, but is a mere instrument in its hands to carry into effect the powers contained in the other grants. To this construction I was inclined in the more early stage of our Government; but on further reflection and observation my mind has undergone a change, for reasons which I will frankly unfold.

Again in section 987 Monroe says:

> Had it been intended that Congress should be restricted in the appropriation of the public money to such expenditures as were authorized by a rigid construction of the other specific grants, how easy would it have been to have provided for it by a declaration to that effect; the omission of such declaration is, therefore, an additional proof that it was not intended that the grant should be so construed.

Story quotes Monroe with approbation. Then Monroe proceeds at length to give his views why he had changed his opinion. It is not necessary to read that. Now, in a note to this Judge Story says:

> There is no doubt that President Washington fully concurred in this opinion, as his repeated recommendations to Congress of objects of this sort, especially of the encouragement of manufactures, of learning, of a university, of new inventions, of agriculture, of commerce and navigation, of a military academy, abundantly prove.

The Senate knows that upon the strict construction theory the Naval Academy at Annapolis and the Military Academy at West Point were combated for years and years, until finally they were carried through by overwhelming majorities. In the building of these two academies, in the establishment of them, this construction was brought to bear and they rest upon no other basis. But now let me proceed with Story:

> SEC. 991. In regard to the practice of the Government, it has been entirely in conformity to the principles here laid down. Appropriations have never been limited by Congress to cases falling within the specific powers enumerated in the Constitution, whether those powers be construed in their broad or their narrow sense. And in an especial manner appropriations have been made to aid internal improvements of various sorts, in our roads, our navigation, our streams, and other objects of a national character and importance. In some cases, not silently, but upon discussion, Congress have gone the length of making appropriations to aid destitute foreigners and cities laboring under severe calamities, as in the relief of the Saint Domingo refugees in 1794, and the citizens of Venezuela, who suffered from an earthquake in 1812. An illustration equally forcible, of a domestic character, is in the bounty given in the cod-fisheries, which was strenuously resisted on constitutional grounds in 1792, but which still maintains its place in the statute-book of the United States.

In a later edition he gives a note to this, in which he says:

> It would be impracticable to enumerate all these various objects of appropriation in detail. Many of them will be found enumerated in President Monroe's Exposition, of 4th of May 1822, pages 41 to 45. The annual appropriation acts speak a very strong language on this subject. Every President of the United States except President Madison seems to have acted upon the same doctrine. President Jefferson can hardly be deemed an exception. In his early opinion, already quoted (4 Jefferson's Corresp., 524), he manifestly maintained it. In his message to Congress, 2d December, 1806, (Wait's State Papers, 457, 458), he seems to have denied it. In signing the bill for the Cumberland road, on the 29th March, 1806 (act of 1806, chapter 19), he certainly gave it a partial sanction, as well as upon other occasions. See Mr. Monroe's Exposition on 4th May, 1822, page 41. But see 4 Jefferson's Corresp., 457, where Mr. Jefferson adopts an opposite reasoning. President Jackson has adopted it with manifest reluctance; but he considers it as firmly established by the practice of the Government. See his veto message on the Maysville road bill (27th May, 1830, 4 Elliot's Deb., 333 to 335).

Mr. President, as we proceed with the history of the subject it will be instructive to note somewhat the events of the times running in parallel lines with these expositions. When some of us went down to Montgomery to erect the Southern confederacy, as it was called, having a dread of this "general-welfare" power in the Constitution of the United States, which appears in the preamble to the United States Constitution as well as in the part granting powers to Congress, that clause was omitted from the constitution of the confederate government, and the language used read thus:

The congress shall have power to lay and collect taxes, duties, imposts, and excises for revenue necessary to pay the debts and provide for the common defense—

Here is where the "general welfare" comes in in the Constitution of the United States, but instead of it was inserted at Montgomery—and to carry on the government of the Confederate States.

That was ingrafting on the constitution what a certain school considered to be the meaning of the "general-welfare" clause in the Constitution of the United States; but the "general-welfare" clause still stays in the Constitution of the United States; and how has it been interpreted and acted upon by every President save and except, according to Story, Madison himself? Directly we shall see dozens of instances almost, by the side of which, so far as the principle is concerned, the present application to Congress dwindles into utter insignificance. We have seen, according to Story, the construction which Mr. Monroe in his more mature years conceded and acquiesced in; we have seen that the Military and Naval Academies have been built and grown up on this power and on none other in the Constitution.

I cite this provision from the constitution of the Confederate States for the purpose of showing that very essentially and materially different language is used to carry out the idea that is contended for by implication and construction, and grows out of the present language of the Constitution of the United States. Story says in quoting from these authorities that you could not in your Constitution specify minutely, in detail, the grounds that shall bring about a requisition upon Congress. That is left for the occasion calling for the exercise of "the general-welfare" power, Congress being the judge of that occasion.

On the present occasion the Senator from Kansas presents the fact that, overleaping the local and domestic authorities of the State of Kansas, a disease there exists which threatens to become general in its character over the whole country whose interests are bound up in this great industry. If the cod-fishery bounty was constitutional, as Story said, for the purpose of encouraging the formation of a hardy class of men who should be ready for the Navy, why is not this? Those bounties were granted, says Story, not silently, but after long debate on the constitutional theory involved, and passed as early as 1792.

Mr. MORGAN. Allow me to inquire of the Senator from Arkansas whether he takes the position that it is the nature of the disease that is to overleap the boundaries of State authority?

Mr. GARLAND. It is the nature, and character, and extent of this disease in threatening the destruction of this industry that is the point; and I will show directly, when I come to quote the legislative history, that no one who sanctioned the acts to which I shall refer can stop for a moment and hesitate to swallow this dose.

Mr. MORGAN. There may have been a bad precedent.

Mr. GARLAND. It is not a bad precedent. I have the language of the commentator upon it, and even as great a man as Monroe said he had changed his views upon it, and he gave his reasons, which I could detail at length if it were necessary.

It is not a bad precedent. It is a good precedent when it is based upon anything of a general character, and it is not within the purview of Congress to go to the States and ask them how the Congress of the United States shall execute the powers delegated to it or which it performs in carrying out the delegated powers. That is a mistaken idea. The truth is, legitimately, properly, and constitutionally speaking, Congress can not delegate its authority in any instance to a State official or a State agent to perform.

Story states three or four instances, to which I have referred and on which I have commented somewhat. I have made an abstract of most of the subsequent acts for the information of the country.

In 2 Statutes at Large, page 730, is "An act for the relief of the citizens of Venezuela," approved May 8, 1812, which appropriated $50,000 for the purchase of provisions for the relief of citizens of Venezuela who suffered in the late earthquake. Under what power of Congress, if you are acting on a strict and rigid interpretation of the powers granted, did we get the authority to relieve the suffering people of Venezuela? That measure was supported by some of the first men who ever stood in this country, whose names are not only historical but whose lives are classic. Even as early as the second volume of the Statutes at Large we have that precedent set, in the year 1812.

Then in 3 Statutes at Large, page 211, we have "An act for the relief of the inhabitants of the late county of New Madrid, in the Missouri Territory, who suffered by earthquake." That was approved February 17, 1815, an act by which the United States gave the sufferers in the county of New Madrid who had bought scrip a like amount of land to that which was injured by that earthquake, they surrendering and by operation of law their right to the injured lands reverting to the United States. That was not an entire grant, but was supplemented by other acts, out of which has grown some of the greatest litigation in this country that has come to the Federal court of last resort.

How by a strict construction of the powers of Congress could it have that authority? Here is a whole State that is about to be prostrated, a whole State that is about to be struck down by a calamity that can not, according to the experience of the ex-Secretary of the Treasury on this floor, be measured in its length and breadth, and which threatens to be not only general but national. We granted relief to the inhabitants of one county that suffered from an earthquake, and yet we are told we can not rescue this great industry from a calamity that threatens to overthrow it and prostrate it forever!

In 9 Statutes at Large, page 207, is a joint resolution authorizing the employment of the ships Macedonian and Jamestown in transporting provisions for the famishing poor of Ireland and Scotland, approved March 3, 1847.

In 14 Statutes at Large, page 369, is a joint resolution for the temporary relief of the sufferers by the late fire in Portland, in the State of Maine, approved July 27, 1866. One town in the State of Maine that suffered by fire was relieved in 1866, one town not quite as big as the State of Kansas, nor quite as broad as the line between Missouri and Kansas; and yet we are told we can not relieve this calamity!

Mr. MORGAN. Does the Senator from Arkansas say that was a constitutional appropriation of money?

Mr. GARLAND. The act passed was constitutional.

Mr. MORGAN. One hundred and fifty men were killed in a mine in Virginia yesterday. Can we appropriate money to support their families?

Mr. GARLAND. We can if it is shown here that the local and domestic authorities can not meet the emergency. I hope I have answered the Senator from Alabama.

Mr. MORGAN. To your satisfaction, not mine.

Mr. GARLAND. I have answered the question directly. I did not hope to satisfy the Senator from Alabama, but I have answered directly and squarely. You present me a calamity that is general in its character, that the local and domestic authorities, so to speak, can not meet, and I vote to afford relief with as clear conscience as I ever voted for any measure. If I did not believe we had the constitutional power, there is no sympathy in my bosom—and I believe I am as sympathetic as most men, if not women—that would induce me to violate the oath I took at yonder desk to support the Constitution. I act according to my interpretation of that instrument which I have sworn to support. I was very sorry that the Senator from North Carolina withdrew his resolution the other day in reference to the cyclone in certain States.

In 14 Statutes at Large, page 567, will be found a joint resolution authorizing the employment of a public vessel for the transportation of provisions to the people of the Southern States suffering from the failure of crops, approved February 22, 1867, approved on the anniversary of the day General Washington was born. That was to relieve suffering from the failure of crops. Here is an industry now that is threatened with prostration which will be worse than the failure of crops to the people who suffer from it, and it is not worth while to say, "Wait till the blow is struck and the calamity done; then relieve it." The sound of the fire-bell is always unpleasant, especially when you have to get up at night to go out to suppress the fire and endeavor to save life and property. We had better take precautions in advance, and not wait until these people come crippled here and say, "Our industry is gone." Let us take time by the forelock with this threatening aspect before us. But let us proceed.

On the 10th of February, 1871, was approved a joint resolution authorizing the use of a naval vessel to transport breadstuffs to Europe. (14 Statutes at Large, page 596.)

Then February 5, 1872 (17 Statutes at Large, page 51), was approved an act for the relief of sufferers by fire at Chicago. That is very significant. There was another fire in a bigger town, with more people than Portland; it was a calamity of a character not local or domestic, so that the State authorities could reach it, and the exigency called for the exercise of the power of Congress.

In 18 Statutes at Large, part 3, page 34, is an act to provide for the relief of persons suffering from the overflow of the Lower Mississippi River, approved April 23, 1874, which authorized the temporary issue of army rations and clothing. Then on May 13, 1874 (same volume, page 45), was an act to enable the Secretary of War to carry out the act of April 23, 1874, which appropriated $70,000 for the purchase of supplies of food for sufferers by the overflow of lower Mississippi, described in the act of April 23, 1874. And still further, in the same volume, page 287, was a joint resolution authorizing the issue of army provisions and clothing to the destitute people in the valleys of the Tombigbee, Warrior, and Alabama Rivers, rendered destitute by the recent inundation of their homes in those valleys.

Again, in the same volume, page 230, the sundry civil appropriation act, approved June 23, 1874, appropriated $400,000 to carry out the act of April 23, 1874, and the joint resolution of May 28, 1874, and also allowed part of the money to be used for the relief of destitute people on the Tennessee River suffering from the recent overflow of that river.

These are some of the precedents of Congressional legislation that I have taken the pains to note. I undertake to say that there is no case upon this list that is more important and urgent than the appeal now made to Congress. There is not one based on higher or more general considerations than this that we now have in hand. But these are not all. Where did we get the power to do these things? Where do we get the power to appropriate for educating the children, as we have done and probably will soon be called upon to do again?

Mr. President, under your gallant lead [Mr. HARRIS in the chair] Congress a few years since established a national board of health to guard against yellow fever and cholora and small-pox and all those ravaging diseases which afflict the human family. After long debate—every inch of ground was contested and fought a battle over—the Senate passed that bill. And what I advocate now is but the doctrine I stood upon then in urging the passage of that bill; and the same doctrine I advanced and argued for when we had the hard struggle over the appropriation for the improvement of the Mississippi River in this body some two years and more since.

Mr. BUTLER. If I do not interrupt the Senator from Arkansas I should like to ask him a question in connection with the precedents he has presented to the Senate.

Mr. GARLAND. Certainly; I yield.

Mr. BUTLER. My question is whether, in the Senator's judgment, in the making of those appropriations by Congress there was any interference with the reserved powers of the States under the Constitution?

Mr. GARLAND. No; I do not think there was, and I do not think there is in this proposition. That is just what I am talking about. I do not think there is any interference with the reserved powers of the States here. But let us proceed. We shall have a little more directly.

It is only a short time since, comparatively, when I was called upon and voted very freely and not grudgingly to supply the people who had been afflicted by the locusts in the Western country with money to buy seeds to replant. It is only a short time since, comparatively, when I voted money for the relief of sufferers from the overflow of the Mississippi Valley, in which I am directly interested. Where do you get the authority to do all this unless you get it from the power that I have attempted to discuss? It will not do to say that it is sympathy. There is not anything said in the Constitution about sympathy. I do not believe that the word is in there, from A to Z.

Where do you get the power to keep the flower-garden near your Capitol? What power in the Constitution is that necessary to execute? Or take the Library building that most of us voted for some time since; why is that? It is done for the general welfare of the people of the country. Where do you get the power to erect the statues of great men, men whose reputation in life has been won in killing their human brethren? You get it under this power, and nowhere else. It is not necessary to any war power or any naval power to erect these monuments or these statues. Where does the Senator from Missouri get the authority to vote for sending books and pamphlets from the Agricultural Department or any other Department to his constituents in Missouri? It is because it is for the gneral welfare, to educate the human mind.

Mr. MAXEY. Will the Senator from Arkansas permit me to ask him a question?

Mr. GARLAND. I will.

Mr. MAXEY. The Senator from Arkansas relies, as I understand his argument, very greatly upon the authority of Mr. Justice Story in his Commentaries on the Constitution for his construction of the expression "general welfare." I will ask him if Judge Story does not lay it down in his work, after summing up as he has done all that had been said on both sides of the question, that the general-welfare clause is not an independent grant of power, but that it refers to the grants of power set forth on the face of the Constitution, and not to a distinct and independent power; and I ask if the same position was not taken by Mr. Madison and others on the subject?

Mr. GARLAND. I have read from their works and given the page. Judge Story indorses or approves what Monroe said in his more mature days and sums it up with a note, and says every President of the country has signed bills and indorsed and approved them resting on this principle, except in the one case of Mr. Madison. It is from him that I get this language, that you can not specify and minutely detail the different objects for which an appropriation can be made, but they are according to the occasion, and Congress is the judge of the occasion.

Mr. MAXEY. I should like to understand that point, because it is important. There is a difference between the Senator and myself. Does the Senator state that Judge Story lays it down that the clause of the Constitution relative to the promotion of the general welfare is a distinct and independent grant of power, not referring to the express grants of power set forth on the face of the instrument?

Mr. GARLAND. Judge Story lays it down that it is an independent power for Congress to judge of the occasion.

AID TO COMMON SCHOOLS.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The hour of 2 o'clock having arrived, it becomes the duty of the Chair to lay before the Senate the special order, being the bill (S. 398) to aid in the establishment and temporary support of common schools.

Mr. BLAIR. I have no desire to interfere with the remarks of the Senator from Arkansas. In fact it would, of course, appear to be a discourtesy to him, and after a conference with the friends of the pending joint resolution I have consented that the special order be laid aside informally, to be taken up when the pending measure is disposed of.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to laying aside the special order informally for the further consideration of the resolution which has been before the Senate? The Chair hears no objection.

CATTLE DISEASE.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the joint resolution (S. R. 75) making an appropriation to eradicate the foot-and-mouth disease, the pending question being on the amendment of Mr. COKE.

Mr. GARLAND. Responding a little further to the question propounded by the Senator from Texas [Mr. MAXEY], I say that not as I read Judge Story does he claim that the "general-welfare" power under the Constitution rests upon any other power or is connected with it; it is an independent power. I read from the constitution of the Confederate States where that was omitted for the express reason, as gentlemen of that school believed, that that power ought to rest upon other powers and be a dependent power upon others, and they incorporated in that constitution what they considered was a fair and just interpretation of the Constitution of the United States upon this question.

I state now, as I stated once before and probably oftener, that Judge Story, in assuming and adopting the language of Monroe and the other Presidents who had signed these papers and had approved these calls and appeals and demands, adopts the language first beginning with Mr. Hamilton in his report on manufactures in 1791, and even that of Mr. Jefferson himself, who was the father of what we understand as the State-rights school, who worshiped State rights as devotedly as ever the Persian bowed before the eternal fires of the sky. How did Jefferson himself buy Louisiana? How did he get possession of Louisiana except from the fact that he said it was essential to the general welfare of the country that we should have that territory, and that river, and the mouth of that river?

Mr. HARRIS. Will the Senator from Arkansas allow me to interrupt him?

Mr. GARLAND. Certainly.

Mr. HARRIS. I should like to ask the Senator from Arkansas if under his construction of the general-welfare clause of the Constitution it would not be competent for a majority of the two Houses of Congress to levy and collect taxes and appropriate the money to any object which in the opinion of that majority would promote the general welfare, except of course such things as are expressly forbidden by the Constitution?

Mr. GARLAND. I can not be any more definite on that than I have been. So said Story, so said Monroe, so said Jefferson, so said Washington, so have said all of them, I believe, except Mr. Madison.

Mr. HARRIS. Will the Senator allow me to add an additional question?

Mr. GARLAND. Yes, sir.

Mr. HARRIS. If that construction be the proper one, is there any limit to the power of Congress to levy and collect taxes and appropriate the money at will to any object which will, in the opinion of Congress, promote the general welfare?

Mr. GARLAND. Plenty, but it is not necessary for me to enumerate them. I could enumerate fifteen or twenty positive inhibitions, but it is not necessary for the purpose of this argument. I answer the question directly that there are plenty of inhibitions.

Mr. HARRIS. Of course I mean except in those cases where it is expressly prohibited.

Mr. GARLAND. Diverting, then, for the purpose of answering the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. HARRIS] a little more fully, which is not entirely necessary to this argument, but still I will do so, it has been repeatedly decided in the courts of the States and the courts of the United States that no moneys could be raised or expended for any purpose except a public purpose. I have contended all along that this must be a public purpose; that it must be a general purpose; and the testimonials offered here by the Senator from Kansas [Mr. PLUMB] make it public or it is nothing; it is a myth, it is a ghost, or it is general and public in its character. So the question is answered so far as my views of it are concerned.

Now, following up the line of precedents, I will call them to mind simply from memory. Where did we get the authority to go and exhibit ourselves at the Centennial Exposition? That was debated here at length before I came into the Senate. It was debated for days, and the Senate, I believe by a unanimous vote, said that we should appropriate money for it.

Mr. SAULSBURY. There was one vote against it.

Mr. GARLAND. There was one vote against it, I am informed.

Mr. SAULSBURY. I do not say that there were no more votes than one against it, but there was one at least against it.

Mr. GARLAND. I was only speaking from memory. Suppose there were any quantity of votes against it, yet the measure was carried, and I believe the nation and, I think by legislative action in one way and another, all the States approved it. There is no express grant of power in the Constitution under which you could say you got that authority. You got it because you believed it to be for the general welfare, for improvement in the arts and sciences and the development of the human intellect and a generous high-toned emulation with the world that we should expend money in that way, and we did it.

But a short time since we went down to Yorktown and made speeches and enjoyed ourselves very much. Where did that authority come from? That was not the war power, although we went there to celebrate a victory. Where did we get the authority to send off the expedition that we voted a short time since to hunt Greely and his lost crew? Going further back, where did we get the power to donate the swamp lands to the States, as we did by the act of September 28, 1850? This was a donation pure and simple. So of the grant of lands to aid agricultural colleges, and the grant for the benefit of insane asylums.

Before leaving this topic one thing more occurs to me. We are purchasing the papers of great men. We bought Jefferson's works in times gone by; we bought Mr. Adams's works, and Mr. Madison's; and since I have been in the Senate we have passed a resolution through both Houses to buy the papers of a distinguished French gentleman. The Senator from Indiana [Mr. VOORHEES] who sits to my left introduced but a short time since a resolution to purchase the papers of somebody else. Where did we get all this authority and this power?

Now, it is time, if we can not do this, to call a halt. But imbedded and concreted as this action is in the very theory of our Constitution as interpreted by some of its best lights and expounders, interpreted and applied by President after President, piled almost as high as Pelion upon Ossa, it is too late in the day for us to say we can not do it. We must turn back the history of this country almost a century, and reverse its whole order. When I cite the precedents here and the interpretation, I cite that which is legitimate, because, as Sir James Mackintosh said, "No government has ever been made, but governments grow."

We have construed the Constitution, we have interpreted it, we have applied it time after time, day after day, month after month, and year after year. It is too late now to say that we can not apply it in this instance, when our country is threatened with cattle disease, as we have it from gentlemen who are familiar with the subject and whose duty it is to speak of it. It is too late, I say, to question the authority. It is there; it is written in the text, for what is understood in the text is a part of the text. It is written in the precedents which have become a part of the law of the country.

Repeating what I started out with, I favor the resolution as it is introduced and reported, without any amendment. When you come to this other matter that has been brought in about the quarantining of sections infected with diseases of cattle, it is very questionable indeed how far the authority of the States to act in that matter extends.

I wish to call the attention of the Senate very briefly to the decision of the Supreme Court upon a question of this character, in the ninety-fifth volume of United States Reports, the Railroad Company vs. Husen. Missouri attempted to pass a law something like what has been intimated here as the measure that should be passed. Some one, I do not know who it was, intimated that the governor of Illinois was going to do a certain thing. In that case the Supreme Court decided it could not be done affecting the commerce in cattle between the States. They held the ordinance of the Legislature of Missouri to be invalid under the Constitution because it was interfering with the commercial power of Congress. That case was upon the very question of cattle disease and cattle complaint. The court said it was no part of the police power of the States. There is where the fault of this matter comes in. It is no part of the police power, says the Supreme Court, that you can use the inhibitions to prevent the importation of cattle and the commerce from State to State. That is the language of the Supreme Court in that case, which I will not detain the Senate to read, but there it is on page 465, ninety-fifth volume of United States Reports.

Mr. COKE. If the Senator from Arkansas will permit me, I will ask him if the Supreme Court did not decide in that case that the State authorities could quarantine against diseased cattle?

Mr. GARLAND. They do not decide that, as I understand. They decide that the States can not do anything in reference to the transportation of cattle as between States; that it is wholly a commercial power, with which the States can not interfere, and which they can not exercise at all. That was the broad decision, and upon that decision the argument was mainly based for the establishment of the National Board of Health, and the doctrine now advocated generally by me is but substantially what I said in the debate on the national quarantine and board of health bill four years ago. Following that decision almost within a few pages is the case of Hall vs. De Cuir, in the same volume. A statute of Louisiana having been passed to regulate licenses, &c., the Supreme Court declared that to be an infringement of the commercial power as between the States, and held the statute of Louisiana to be invalid and unconstitutional.

When we deal with this subject it branches into questions affecting commerce between the States. If we could by some kind of means, by some magic power, say that the cattle of Kansas alone should be affected by this measure and of no other State we might get a resting-place for the argument; but that can not be done, because it is a contagious disease, as mentioned in the resolution, and as spoken of by the Senator from Ohio, with his experience and his observation and investigation of the matter.

I am not speaking now in reference to any particular section of the pleuro-pneumonia bill and the power of Congress to go into the States to do thus and so, for I have not examined that bill; I am speaking of the general authority and the general power and the general jurisdiction of Congress over this matter. That has been drawn into this discussion in advance at least of the final consideration of the bill on the subject of pleuro-pneumonia.

Mr. President, I have cited some authorities, and they could be duplicated, they could be trebled and quadrupled from the same court. In the ninety-sixth volume of United States Reports, in the Pensacola telegraph case, the Supreme Court went the full length of the whole argument into this commercial power. Many good lawyers believe that decision is not law, but I am speaking of what has been decided and how this constitutional power has been interpreted and applied.

I favor the resolution as reported from the committee as it stands, without the amendment of the Senator from Texas. I think it is wise and just if the facts are as they are presented here, and they must be, because they would not be presented by the Senator from Kansas if they were not, and we have other corrobation of them which he has not presented but which has been stated, and which seems to me to put the question entirely beyond any doubt. I for one shall support the resolution. When we come to consider the pleuro-pneumonia bill with the general propositions applying to that measure, I shall investigate it and see whether or not any of its sections are objectionable in my mind.

As I said before, I have taken this occasion to give my views on this proposition somewhat more at length than I am in the habit of detaining the Senate in doing; but it is a proposition that recurs and comes back upon us, and sometimes we see a Senator hasten from his desk and run somewhere hunting up the authority to do some such act as this, and yet not find it. I have attempted to show that we have the authority under a fair, legitimate construction of the Constitution, and that by the precedents it is put beyond any cavil or dispute.

Mr. VEST. Mr. President, so far as the resolution of the Senator from Kansas [Mr. PLUMB] is concerned the argument of the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. GARLAND] answers itself, because I understand that Senator to state that the Congress of the United States even under his latitudinarian construction of the Constitution could only interfere where the authorities of the State gave the General Government or Congress to understand that the calamity was so great and general as to be beyond the power of redress or assistance on the part of the State.

The facts in this case show that the governor of Kansas has made no such official statement to Congress or to the Government of the United States. He has sent telegrams here, but so far from there being an official enunciation of the facts necessary to support the legal arguments of the Senator from Arkansas, they do not exist.

But over and above the question of the appropriation of $25,000, I beg leave most earnestly to protest against the doctrine asserted here by a gentleman belonging to the same political party with myself. If the position of the Senator from Arkansas be correct, there is no difference between the old Federal school and the Democratic school to which he and I profess to belong. If his position be correct here, then the General Government can do what it pleases, without regarding any limitation in the Constitution, under the general power to provide for the common defense and the general welfare of the people of the United States.

The Senator has quoted high authority, that of Monroe and Story upon the Constitution. I deny that either Mr. Monroe or Mr. Story ever asserted any such doctrine or anything that approximated to it. The Senator from Arkansas challenges proof upon that question, and I will proceed to give it. He quoted a portion of the message of Mr. Monroe, but he did not quote the concluding part of it, which is absolutely and entirely in conflict with the position of the Senator from Arkansas. Let us first take the statement of Mr. Story in his Commentaries on the Constitution, the text-book which is put into the hands of every student of the law, which is taught in the universities, but to which I have never myself given the greatest weight and authority. As the Senator has appealed to it, I will proceed now to read what Mr. Story says upon this question, and I appeal to fair-minded gentlemen upon both sides of the Chamber to say whether in this treatise upon the Constitution there is one scintilla of authority for the statement made here by the Senator from Arkansas. In chapter 14 of Story upon the Constitution, in reference to the powers of Congress, he proceeds to discuss this question as follows:

SEC. 907. Before proceeding to consider the nature and extent of the power conferred by this clause and the reasons on which it is founded it seems necessary to settle the grammatical construction of the clause and to ascertain its true reading. Do the words "to lay and collect taxes, duties, imposts, and excises" constitute a distinct, substantial power, and the words "to pay the debts and provide for the common defense and general welfare of the United States" constitute another distinct and substantial power?

That is the question between the two schools of politicians of the United States, and which the Senator from Arkansas has not met. That is the great question, whether the clause in regard to the general welfare is a substantive and distinct clause of granted power in the Constitution. Mr. Story proceeds to discuss the great question as follows:

Or are the latter words connected with the former, so as to constitute a qualification upon them? This has been a topic of political controversy, and has furnished abundant materials for popular declamation and alarm. If the former be the true interpretation, then it is obvious that under color of the generality of the words to "provide for the common defense and general welfare" the Government of the United States is, in reality, a government of general and unlimited powers, notwithstanding the subsequent enumeration of specific powers; if the latter be the true construction—

That is, that it is connected with the taxing power and not a substantive, distinct, and independent power—then the power of taxation only is given by the clause, and it is limited to objects of a national character, "to pay the debts and provide for the common defense and the general welfare."

SEC. 908. The former opinion has been maintained by some minds of great ingenuity and liberality of views. The latter has been the generally received sense of the nation, and seems supported by reasonimg at once solid and impregnable.

That is to say, it is not a distinct and substantive power, but is connected with the taxing power and with the limitation the Constitution puts upon it.

The reading, therefore, which will be maintained in these commentaries is that which makes the latter words a qualification of the former; and this will be best illustrated by supplying the words, which are necessarily to be understood in this interpretation. They will then stand thus: "The Congress shall have power to lay and collect taxes, duties, imposts, and excise, in order"—

Says Mr. Story, interpolating the words—in order to "pay the debts and to provide for the common defense and general welfare of the United States;" that is, for the purpose of paying the public debts and providing for the common defense and general welfare of the United States. In this sense Congress has not an unlimited power of taxation; but it is limited to specific objects—the payment of the public debts and providing for the common defense and general welfare. A tax, therefore, laid by Congress for neither of these objects would be unconstitutional, as an excess of the legislative authority. In what manner this is to be ascertained or decided will be considered hereafter. At present the interpretation of the words only is before us; and the reasoning by which that already suggested has been vindicated will now be reviewed.

I ask the attention of the Senator from Arkansas to the subsequent section. Says Mr. Story:

SEC. 909. The Constitution was, from its very origin, contemplated to be the frame of a national government, of special and enumerated powers, and not of general and unlimited powers. This is apparent, as will be presently seen from the history of the proceedings of the convention which framed it, and it has formed the admitted basis of all legislative and judicial reasoning upon it ever since it was put into operation by all who have been its open friends and advocates, as well as by all who have been its enemies and opponents. If the clause "to pay the debts and provide for the common defense and general welfare of the United States" is construed to be an independent and substantive grant of power, it not only renders wholly unimportant and unnecessary the subsequent enumeration of specific powers, but it plainly extends far beyond them, and creates a general authority in Congress to pass all laws which they may deem for the common defense or general welfare. Under such circumstances the Constitution would practically create an unlimited national government. The enumerated powers would tend to embarrassment and confusion, since they would only give rise to doubts as to the true extent of the general power, or of the enumerated powers.

SEC. 910. One of the most common maxims of interpretation is (as has already been stated) that, as an exception strengthens the force of a law in cases not excepted, so enumeration weakens it in cases not enumerated. But how could it be applied with success to the interpretation of the Constitution of the United States if the enumerated powers were neither exceptions from nor additions to the general power to provide for the common defense and general welfare? To give the enumeration of the specific powers any sensible place or operation in the Constitution it is indispensable to construe them as not wholly and necessarily embraced in the general power. The common principles of interpretation would seem to instruct us that the different parts of the same instrument ought to be so expounded as to give meaning to every part which will bear it. Shall one part of the same sentence be excluded altogether from a share in the meaning, and shall the more doubtful and indefinite terms be retained in their full extent, and the clear and precise expressions be denied any signification? To what purpose could the enumeration of particular powers be inserted if these and all others were meant to be included in the preceding general power? Nothing is more natural or common than first to use a general phrase and then to qualify it by a recital of particulars. But the idea of an enumeration of particulars which neither explain nor qualify the general meaning and can have no other effect than to confound and mislead is an absurdity which no one ought to charge on the enlightened authors of the Constitution. It would be to charge them either with premeditated folly or premeditated fraud.

In other words, if the English language has any signification or meaning, this Government is one of limited and enumerated powers, and the clause in the Constitution to provide for the general welfare must be taken in connection with the power to levy taxes, and is not a substantive and independent and separate power of itself.

But the Senator has referred to the message of President Monroe. He read the first portion of it, but he left out the concluding part in which Mr. Monroe summarizes his opinion upon this subject. After giving his reasons for modifying his opinion as originally entertained in regard to the general-welfare clause of the Constitution, Mr. Monroe says:

"If, then, the right to raise and appropriate the public money is not restricted to the expenditures under the other specific grants, according to a strict construction of their powers respectively, is there no limitation to it?"

Can you go on and give money to burned houses; can you give it to sufferers from an overflow; can you appropriate money to any local object that the sympathy or humanity or mercy of Congress may be induced to operate upon? That is the question. Mr. Monroe proceeds:

Have Congress a right to raise and appropriate the public money to any and to every purpose, according to their will and pleasure? They certainly have not. The Government of the United States is a limited government, instituted for great national purposes, and for those only. Other interests are committed to the States, whose duty it is to provide for them. Each government should look to the great and essential purposes for which it was instituted, and confine itself to those purposes. A State government will rarely, if ever, apply money to national purposes without making it a charge to the nation. The people of the State would not permit it. Nor will Congress be apt to apply money in aid of the State administrations, for purposes strictly local, in which the nation at large has no interest, although the State should desire it. The people of the other States would condemn it. They would declare that Congress had no right to tax them for such a purpose, and dismiss at the next election such of their representatives as had voted for the measure, especially if it should be severely felt. I do not think that in offices of this kind there is much danger of the two governments mistaking their interests or their duties. I rather suspect that they would soon have a clear and distinct understanding of them, and move on in great harmony.

I do not understand that Mr. Monroe assumed the position taken here by the Senator from Arkansas. Upon the other hand he held to the Democratic doctrine that the Constitution of the United States is one of enumerated and limited powers and that strict construction is to be given to those clauses of the Constitution which create and confer those powers.

Mr. President, I do not propose to discuss the bill in regard to pleuro-pneumonia in discussing this resolution and the position of the Senator from Arkansas. I will say, however, that the decision of The Railroad Company vs. Husen, in 5 Otto, to which the Senator has alluded, does not touch the question now before the Senate and could not possibly do so. I was originally of counsel in the cases in which that decision was rendered in the Supreme Court of the United States. The State of Missouri had passed what was known as the Texas cattle law, and that statute in so many words excluded Mexican, Spanish, Indian, and Texas cattle from the State of Missouri during eight months of the year, whether they were diseased or not.

The Supreme Court of the United States affirmed our position in the court below to the effect that no State had the right to exclude cattle that came from another State unless it did so under the police power and because those cattle were diseased and endangered the health of cattle within the domain of the State that passed the legislation. That is the whole of it. In other words, the court held that the States had no right to exercise any powers or functions under that clause of the Constitution of the United States which gave the right to regulate commerce with foreign nations and among the States to Congress alone. That was the whole extent of the decision. But does that touch the question in this resolution and in the bill in regard to pleuro-pneumonia? Here we have it not in direct terms in the resolution, we have unquestionably in the bill a specific grant of power from the General Government to go into a State with the right to segregate a single county, to put it under quarantine, to kill its cattle, to usurp the functions of the State authorities, and this is defended under the power given, says the Senator from Arkansas, to the Congress of the United States to provide for the general welfare.

But I do not propose now to discuss that question. I only rose to protest against the doctrine that under the clause relative to providing for the general welfare these grants of money are constitutional. It is true that the Senator has given a number of precedents in regard to towns that have been burned and in regard to sufferers from overflow. The only case in which I voted that I recollect for any grant of money was when the governor of the State of Missouri and I believe the governor of Arkansas applied for money. As I said before, in this specific case the governor of Kansas has made no such application. The basis of action is made up of statements, made it is true from the highest sources, by the Senator from Kansas, and we are expected now to exercise this doubtful power under a construction of the Constitution which I hold to be utterly variant to the construction put upon it by the party to which I belong.

Mr. MAXEY. Mr. President, during the very able remarks of the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. GARLAND] I took occasion to ask him if I should understand him to state to the Senate that the construction placed by Judge Story upon the clause in section 8, article 1, to pay the debts and provide for the common defense and general welfare of the United States was a distinct, substantive, and independent power. He said, as I understood him, that he so understood Judge Story. I remarked that I did not so understand that learned commentator. I had not read Judge Story for some time upon that subject, but to my mind his teaching upon that point was as clear as the noonday sun. My recollection was entirely clear that he had taught that the clause in the eighth section of the first article, "to lay and collect taxes, duties, imposts, and excises, to pay the debt and provide for the common defense and general welfare," was properly construable to read, "to lay and collect taxes, duties, imposts, and excises in order to pay the debt and provide for the common defense and general welfare." I sent to the Library and got his commentaries to see if I was so fearfully mistaken in my reading of Judge Story, and I find that the Senator from Arkansas has gone far beyond the ablest Federalist judge who had ever construed the Constitution of the United States according to his views. I find in section 906 of Story's Commentaries the following:

SEC. 906. The Constitution was, from its very origin, contemplated to be the frame of a national government of special and enumerated powers, and not of general and unlimited powers. This is apparent, as will be presently seen, from the history of the proceedings of the convention which framed it, and it has formed the admitted basis of all legislative and judicial reasoning upon it, ever since it was put into operation, by all who have been its open friends and advocates as well as by all who have been its enemies and opponents. If the clause "to pay the debts and provide for the common defense and general welfare of the United States" is construed to be an independent and substantive grant of power, it not only renders wholly unimportant and unnecessary the subsequent enumeration of specific powers, but it plainly extends far beyond them, and creates a general authority in Congress to pass all laws which they may deem for the common defense or general welfare. Under such circumstances, the Constitution would practically create an unlimited national government. The enumerated powers would tend to embarrassment and confusion, since they would only give rise to doubts as to the true extent of the general power or of the enumerated powers.

So Judge Story goes on with the most able and exhaustive reasoning, and he comes down to section 923, which I beg to read, stating first that Judge Story furnishes to the reader the ablest arguments presented by the advocates of the doctrine that the clause referred to is a substantive, distinct grant of power, as well as the arguments of those who believe, as I maintain, that the clause is not a grant of power at all, but a statement of the objects to which the grant of power to lay and collect taxes, duties, imposts, and excises must be directed. In short, the power is to lay and collect taxes, &c.; the purpose is to pay the debts, &c. One is power, the other purpose.

Section 923 reads:

SEC. 923. The argument in favor of the construction which treats the clause as a qualification of the power to lay taxes has, perhaps, never been presented in a more concise or forcible shape than in an official opinion deliberately given by one of our most distinguished statesmen. "To lay taxes to provide for the general welfare of the United States is," says he, "to lay taxes for the purpose of providing for the general welfare. For the laying of taxes is the power, and the general welfare the purpose for which the power is to be exercised. Congress are not to lay taxes ad libitum for any purpose they please; but only to pay the debts or provide for the welfare of the Union. In like manner they are not to do anything they please to provide for the general welfare, but only to lay taxes for that purpose. To consider the latter phrase, not as describing the purpose of the first, but as giving a distinct and independent power to do any act they please which might be for the good of the Union, would render all the preceding and subsequent enumerations of power completely useless. It would reduce the whole instrument to a single phrase, that of instituting a congress with power to do whatever would be for the good of the United States, and as they would be the sole judges of the good or evil, it would also be a power to do whatever evil they pleased. It is an established rule of construction, where a phrase will bear either of two meanings, to give that which will allow some meaning to the other parts of the instrument, and not that which will render all the others useless. Certainly, no such universal power was meant to be given them.

The above citation is from the master-mind of Mr. Jefferson, and I call the attention of the Senate to the closing of Mr. Jefferson's able and conclusive remarks on that point:

It was intended to lace them up strictly within the enumerated powers, and those, without which, as means, those powers could not be carried into effect.

Upon that what does Judge Story say? He says:

SEC. 924. The same opinion has been maintained at different and distant times by many eminent statesmen. It was avowed, and apparently acquiesced in, the State conventions called to ratify the Constitution; and it has been, on various occasions, adopted by Congress, and—

And what?

and may fairly be deemed that which the deliberate sense of a majority of the nation has at all times supported. This, too, seems to be the construction maintained by the Supreme Court of the United States.

How far was I wrong, then, when I had the temerity to ask the question if Judge Story had laid down the proposition that the clause to provide for the common defense and general welfare was a distinct and substantive power? It is not. He distinctly, clearly shows that it is not. It has never been taught by the great party to which I belong. On the contrary, the whole teaching has been, as Mr. Jefferson stated, that the power of Congress should be laced up strictly within the enumerated powers.

Then I say, in respect to the measure which is pending, the granting of $25,000 for the purpose of investigating the character and nature of diseases of cattle is one thing, but the power to appropriate the money of this Government to destroy cattle and pay out of the people's Treasury for the cattle thus destroyed is a power which I boldly assert in my judgment Congress has not and never was designed or intended to have. It can not be found in any one of the enumerated powers. It can not be drawn from any one of the enumerated powers. It is not linked to or coupled with any enumerated power, and therefore it does not exist.

Neither can you go inside a State and assert the right of eminent domain over the property of the people of that State without their consent and deprive them of their property by strange and heretofore unused methods, because you can not deprive a man of "life, liberty, or property without due process of law." What due process of law is has been long since judicially settled. I ask if the arbitrary, autocratic, and dictatorial power which is proposed to be conferred upon the Commissioner of Agriculture to go without a trial, without evidence taken in any mode known to the law, without a judicial investigation, and destroy a man's property is due process of law? Nor, if it be assumed that the property is taken for the public use, can it be done without just compensation. There is no judicial condemnation, no judicial ascertainment of its value, no provision for ascertaining the value, and no appeal from the condemnation, nor from the value fixed, however inadequate.

Sir, this is simply the advance guard, the skirmish line, of the pleuro-pneumonia bill. We are starting out upon the most dangerous route in my judgment that this country ever traveled. Twenty-five thousand dollars is a mere bagatelle in this matter compared with a startling precedent. You give that. You make it the duty of this Government to pay for the property which is destroyed by disease in this country out of the common Treasury, and your surplus revenue will soon vanish, and the country will be taxed untold millions of dollars.

I do not fancy the manner in which this measure has come in, right upon the heels of the great stock-destroying bill now pending, the most dangerous bill upon our Calendar. The resolution is supported by a certain class of dispatches, and the true inwardness of those dispatches may be seen by reading but one of them:

BURLINGTON, KANS., March 8, 1884.

Senators PLUMB and INGALLS, Washington, D. C.:

At a meeting of citizens of Coffey County a resolution was passed asking you to use your best efforts to have the pleuro-pneumonia bill so amended as that the Government will pay all the expense, and have it passed immediately, as an emergency exists which calls for prompt action; or, if not amended, have it passed as it is. Answer at once and tell us what the prospect is for its immediate passage.

J. A. KENNEDY, Secretary.
JOB THROCKMORTON, Chairman.

Attest:

HARRISON KELLEY.

Here is an attempt to run deep the arm into the public Treasury and take out the money of the people for diseased cattle destroyed by legislative decree. When hog-cholera has been through this country certainly since I was a boy, when pleuro-pneumonia, as shown by the very papers brought forward in support of this measure, has been in existence in this country for forty years, and when the Spanish or Texas fever, as it is called (though that is a misnomer), has been in the country, as shown by their own papers, for one hundred years, suddenly there is sprung upon us this attempt to go out upon a line of legislation which will wind up and end up in the cost to this Government of untold millions of dollars. Why this haste?

Believing as I do that the expression "to provide for the general welfare" is not a distinct, independent, substantive power, and that the whole case rests upon that, and that the authorities, both Federal and Democratic, are directly the reverse, I can see no reason why the resolution pending should pass this body. I see no power in the Constitution to warrant its passage.

Mr. JONES, of Florida. Mr. President, I think discussions of this kind are somewhat wholesome, but I do not propose to detain the Senate very long in respect to this question. It is one that has embarrassed, I am free to confess, some of the best minds in the country in days gone by, but I believe that the accepted view of the question at the present time is that stated by the Senator from Missouri [Mr. VEST].

I do not know any safer way to reason than by analogy. When we come to reflect upon the powers contained in the Articles of Confederation when the present Constitution was adopted, it will be found that the general-welfare clause was incorporated into the Articles of Confederation just as it was in the present Constitution with reference to taxation. Every lawyer who has investigated this subject must admit that Congress, in the exercise of its power under those regulations, had nothing but what was expressly given. Article 2 of the Articles of Confederation reads as follows:

Each State retains its sovereignty, freedom, and independence, and every power, jurisdiction, and right, which is not by this confederation expressly delegated to the United States in Congess assembled.

The trouble with the old Articles of Confederation was that they restricted the powers of the Government so much that it was without authority to do many things necessary for the general welfare according to a more extended delegation of powers. Under this very system, when it comes to taxation, almost the identical language is employed with reference to taxation that we find in the present Constitution. Says article 8 of the Articles of Confederation:

All charges of war, and all other expenses that shall be incurred for the common defense or general welfare and allowed by the United States in Congress assembled, shall be defrayed out of a common treasury.

Nobody ever pretended that the general-welfare clause in the Articles of Confederation could have been construed to go beyond the express delegations of power given in that instrument. When our present Constitution was before the people for ratification, when it was assailed fiercely by its enemies and advocated with equal ability by its friends, it was distinctly avowed by the celebrated writers in the Federalist that this power did not mean what the Senator from Arkansas says it means.

It is very well known that with respect to all the great powers of government there was no difference of opinion between Alexander Hamilton and Mr. Madison at that day. Both felt it to be incumbent upon them to defend the proposed constitution in advance of its ratification, and I presume that they intended to deal honestly with the American people when they repelled the accusations brought against it by that large class of liberty-loving men who imagined that it was fraught with dangers to the liberties of this people. The very subject to which the Senator from Arkansas referred a while ago agitated the public mind, and Mr. Madison did not conceive it worthy of a moment's thought. He said the fears with respect to the indefinite power proposed to be given under the general-welfare clause had no foundation in reason. I will read what he said in the Federalist on that subject. This was before the Constitution was adopted, and it is known to have received the sanction of Mr. Madison, because I think their papers were all prepared on consultation. Mr. Madison said:

A power to destroy the freedom of the press, the trial by jury, or even to regulate the course of descents, or the forms of conveyances, must be very singularly expressed by the terms "to raise money for the general welfare."

But what color can the objection have, when a specification of the objects alluded to by these general terms immediately follows, and is not even separated by a longer pause than a semicolon? If the different parts of the same instrument ought to be so expounded as to give meaning to every part which will bear it, shall one part of the same sentence be excluded altogether from a share in the meaning, and shall the more doubtful and indefinite terms be retained in their full extent, and the clear and precise expressions be denied any signification whatsoever? For what purpose could the enumeration of particular powers be inserted if these and all others were meant to be included in the preceding general power? Nothing is more natural or common than first to use a general phrase and then to explain and qualify it by a recital of particulars. But the idea of an enumeration of particulars which neither explain nor qualify the general meaning and can have no other effect than to confound and mislead is an absurdity which, as we are reduced to the dilemma of charging either on the authors of the objection or on the authors of the Constitution, we must take the liberty of supposing had not its origin with the latter.—The Federalist, No. XLI, pages 224, 225.

Mr. President, that is all I propose to say.

Mr. COKE. Mr. President, I do not propose to detain the Senate with a speech. I desire simply, in the strongest possible manner and with the greatest emphasis I can command, to express my dissent from the argument and the conclusions respecting constitutional construction and the powers of this Government announced in the elaborate and apparently well-considered speech of the honorable Senator from Arkansas [Mr. GARLAND]. The clearness and force with which that justly distinguished Senator always presents his views strongly characterized his remarks to-day. There can be no misconception or misconstruction of his meaning. I therefore feel the less hesitancy in declaring my convictions of the fallacy of his argument, as well as the unsoundness of its results. I have heard no argument, no course or line of reasoning pronounced in this body during the seven years I have been a member of the Senate further off, more alien to what I have been taught was the true theory of this Government, than that embraced in the remarks of the honorable Senator. To say that I was surprised and astonished is but a feeble expression of the emotions with which I listened to his powerful and plausible presentation.

Coming, as this expression does, from a distinguished and honored member of the party to which I belong, and subversive as I believe it to be of the oldest, most deeply rooted, time-honored principles of that party, I would not be true to myself or my constituents did I fail here and now to challenge and take issue with it. I have been taught to believe that this Government is one of enumerated and delegated powers; that the Constitution is a limitation upon the powers of the Government; that only granted powers, and those necessary or convenient for carrying into effect the granted powers, can be exercised; that the "general-welfare" clause, in section 8 of article 1 of the Constitution, is a dependent of the clauses following, which limit and control its meaning, and not an independent per se grant of power. I had learned from article 9 of the amendments to the Constitution that "the enumeration in the Constitution of certain rights shall not be construed to deny or disparage others retained by the people." And from article 10, that "the powers not delegated by the Constitution nor prohibited by it to the States are reserved respectively to the States or to the people."

These things I had learned from the Federalist, from the Constitution itself, from the decisions of the Supreme Court from the time of Marshall down, from the debates of the convention which framed the Constitution, from the great commentators on the Constitution like Kent and Story, from the writings and utterances of great party leaders and the platforms of political parties, and from what I have believed to be the uniform and unbroken and unquestioned creed of the great Democratic party. Indeed, Mr. President, I believe I can, strictly within the bounds of truth and accuracy, say that all the great political parties which have ever existed in this country have subscribed substantially to these propositions, and that divisions between them have never called these doctrines into question.

If, Mr. President, the honorable Senator from Arkansas is right in the views he has announced to-day, I have always been wrong, and have the teachings of a lifetime to unlearn. Instead of the power of Congress being limited to that which is expressly or by implication granted in the Constitution, the honorable Senator from Arkansas takes the broad ground that under the "general-welfare" clause Congress may do anything not prohibited by the Constitution. Why enumerate, as the Constitution does, the powers which Congress may exercise, if under that clause all powers not prohibited may be exercised? The honorable Senator, in order to establish his position, has collected and enumerated in his remarks a list of precedents in which Congress appropriated money at various times for various sentimental and charitable purposes, for which he says no authority can be found in the Constitution save in the "general-welfare" clause. These in my judgment utterly fail to give aid or comfort to his argument.

The debates when these appropriations were made uniformly show that the constitutional power to make them was gravely doubted and these doubts were frankly admitted by many who voted for them. They were made usually under the most patriotic and praiseworthy impulses, and voted for by many who felt as a distinguished member of the House did, who is reported to have said, when he voted for the appropriation for the Ohio flood sufferers a few weeks ago, that it was a violation of the Constitution to do it, but such a one as God Almighty would forgive. All these cases referred to by the honorable Senator are exceptional, and a thousand more of them would not fortify his argument. Infractions of the Constitution many of them doubtless were, but one notable fact exists with reference to all of them, and that is, that if unconstitutional not one of them invaded the reserved rights of the States. Not one of them violated any one of the rights of any of the States. If wrongful, the wrong consisted simply in an improper appropriation of money out of the public Treasury.

The argument of the honorable Senator proves too much. If Congress may do anything required by the "general welfare" and is the sole judge, as he says, of what the general welfare does require, if, as he says, the prohibitions of the Constitution are the only limitations upon the power of Congress, then we have practically a government in which the will of Congress is supreme. The Constitution contains very few prohibitions; it is made up almost entirely of grants of power, its authors seeming never to have dreamed that this new construction could be placed upon it. If Congress may, in violation of the police power of a State, send the Commissioner of Agriculture with his deputies there to "stamp" out cattle disease because the "general welfare" requires it, why may not Congress establish a system of common schools in all the States, and place them in charge of Federal officials; why may not marriage and divorce, the descent and distribution of property, and other domestic affairs of the State also be regulated by Congress? The Constitution of the United States and the laws made in pursuance thereof are supreme over this country, and if Congress may do everything not prohibited by the Constitution which in the judgment of Congress the "general welfare" requires, the States may be stripped of the power to manage their domestic affairs, and this Government become a grand consolidation of all the political power in this country.

Mr. President, I am a devout believer in the Constitution of the United States, and in the right of local government in the States as well. They with me are of equal sanctity. They have their separate spheres of action. Each is necessary to the other. Either without the other would be shorn of the major part of its excellence. Whoever strikes either injures both. Neither can be impaired in efficiency without injuring the other. I will stand by both, for together they constitute one unrivaled plan of government. I will claim for the National Government all the power a just, liberally just, construction of the Constitution will give, and for the States the powers reserved to them in the Constitution.

I offered an amendment to the resolution of the honorable Senator from Kansas simply providing that the Commissioner of Agriculture should not go into a State and exercise authority with reference to diseased cattle without having the consent and co-operation of the authorities of the State. The honorable Senator from Arkansas says that he will vote for the proposition of the Senator from Kansas without such an amendment.

Now, Mr. President, I hold that the States have some powers, that they have some rights. I have here a decision of the Supreme Court of the United States that ought at least to be somewhat persuasive. I have also Cooley's Constitutional Limitations. Judge Cooley is a great constitutional lawyer. He says, quoting an eminent judge:

"This police power of the State," says another eminent judge, "extends to the protection of the lives, limbs, health, comfort, and quiet of all persons, and the protection of all property within the State." * * * And again: [By this] "general police power of the State persons and property are subjected to all kinds of restraints and burdens in order to secure the general comfort, health, and prosperity of the State, of the perfect right in the Legislature to do which no question ever was, or upon acknowledged general principles ever can be, made so far as natural persons are concerned."

Again, says Judge Cooley:

In the American constitutional system the power to establish the ordinary regulations of police has been left with the individual States, and can not be assumed by the National Government. Neither can the National Government, through any of its Departments or officers, assume any supervision of the police regulations of the States so long as they do not invade the sphere of national sovereignty and obstruct or impede the exercise of any authority which the Constitution has confided to the nation.

He refers to a decision of the Supreme Court, which I have here, in a note:

So decided in United States vs. De Witt (9 Wallace, 41), in which a section of the internal-revenue act of 1867—which undertook to make it a misdemeanor to mix for sale naphtha and illuminating oils, or to sell oil of petroleum inflammable at a less temperature than 110° Fahrenheit—was held to be a mere police regulation, and as such void within the States.

Can anything be clearer than this? Can anything be clearer than that the State of Kansas has all the police power necessary to enable her to deal with all questions arising within her borders, and that the United States Government has no power over the subject? The governor of Kansas, we are informed, has issued his proclamation convening the Legislature on the 18th of this month to provide the necessary ways and means for suppressing the disease which has broken out among the cattle of that State. The State of Kansas has taken the initiative for the exercise of her jurisdiction, which the Supreme Court says is exclusive over the subject. My amendment only proposes that the money appropriated by this joint resolution shall not be expended in any State without the consent of that State, for the obvious reason that without such consent the Commissioner of Agriculture would be a trespasser.

Mr. CALL. Mr. President, I shall vote for the amendment of the Senator from Texas, and I shall also support the resolution introduced by the Senator from Kansas, and I shall endeavor in a very few words to state the reasons why I shall support the resolution, inasmuch as there has been a criticism in regard to the constitutional power of the Senate to adopt such a resolution.

I agree with the Senators on this side of the Chamber in the theory of the strictest construction of the Constitution and with the authorities which have been read; but the question is not the one they have presented. The power of appropriation has at every period of the history of this Government been regarded as not confined within the special grants of power in the Constitution; and these Senators can not find in the strictest of the school of construction one of the statesmen of this country who has maintained that the power of appropriation was restricted within the special grants contained in the Constitution. That is the explanation of the whole difference, and whether they agree with the Senator from Arkansas in the very clear speech that he has made or do not agree with him upon this much controverted question does not concern the conclusion upon which this resolution stands. Let us see. They have all quoted from Story and from Mr. Monroe. The authority on this subject is entirely plain, so plain that there can not be even any controversy in regard to it. I read section 987 of Story on the Constitution and extracts from Mr. Monroe's Exposition:

If we look to the second branch of this power, that which authorizes the appropriation of the money thus raised, we find that it is not less general and unqualified than the power to raise it. More comprehensive terms than to "pay the debts and provide for the common defense and general welfare" could not have been used. So intimately connected with and dependent on each other are these two branches of power, that, had either been limited, the limitation would have had a like effect on the other. Had the power to raise money been conditional, or restricted to special purposes, the appropriation must have corresponded with it; for none but the money raised could be appropriated, nor could it be appropriated to other purposes than those which were permitted. On the other hand, if the right of appropriation had been restricted to certain purposes, it would be useless and improper to raise more than would be adequate to those purposes. It may fairly be inferred that these restraints or checks have been carefully and intentionally avoided. The power in each branch is alike broad and unqualified, and each is drawn with peculiar fitness to the other; the latter requiring terms of great extent and force to accommodate the former, which have been adopted, and both placed in the same clause and sentence. Can it be presumed that all these circumstances were so nicely adjusted by mere accident? Is it not more just to conclude that they were the result of due deliberation and design? Had it been intended that Congress should be restricted in the appropriation of the public money to such expenditures as were authorized by a rigid construction of the other specific grants, how easy would it have been to have provided for it by a declaration to that effect. The omission of such declaration is, therefore, an additional proof that it was not intended that the grant should be so construed.

Had it been declared by a clause in the Constitution—

Says Mr. Monroe—

that the expenditures under this grant—

That is, the power of appropriation—should be restricted to the construction which might be given of the other grants, such restraint, though the most innocent, could not have failed to have had an injurious effect on the vital principles of the Government, and often on its most important measures.

Here is the specific question whether the power of appropriation was to be confined by the construction placed upon the other grant of power in the Constitution, and the express affirmation that to have so regarded it would have been to have deprived the Government of a vital principle. Again:

Many considerations of great weight operate in favor of this construction, while I do not perceive any serious objection to it. If it be established, it follows that the words "to provide for the common defense and general welfare" have a definite, safe, and useful meaning. The idea of their forming an original grant with unlimited power, superseding every other grant, is abandoned. They will be considered simply as conveying a right of appropriation, a right indispensable to that of raising a revenue and necessary to expenditures under every grant. By it, as already observed, no new power will be taken from the States, the money to be appropriated being raised under a power already granted to Congress. By it, too, the motive for giving a forced or strained construction to any of the other specific grants will in most instances be diminished and in many utterly destroyed.

Again says Mr. Monroe:

Have Congress a right to raise and appropriate the public money to any and to every purpose according to their will and pleasure? They certainly have not. The Government of the United States is a limited government, instituted for great national purposes, and for those only.

I now read from the views of Mr. Monroe on internal improvements, transmitted in his message to the House of Representatives of May 4, 1822:

It is believed that there is not a corporation in the Union which does not exercise great discretion in the application of the money raised by it to the purposes of its institution. It would be strange if the Government of the United States, which was instituted for such important purposes and endowed with such extensive powers, should not be allowed at least equal discretion and authority. The evil to be particularly avoided is the violation of State rights; shunning that, it seems to be reasonable and proper that the powers of Congress should be so construed as that the General Government in its intercourse with other nations and in our internal concerns should be able to adopt all such measures lying within the fair scope and intended to facilitate the direct objects of its powers as the public welfare may require and a sound and provident policy dictate.

The measures of Congress have been in strict accord with the view taken of the right of appropriation, both as to its extent and limitation, as will be shown by a reference to the laws, commencing at a very early period.—Annals of Congress, Seventeenth Congress, first session (1882), volume 2, page 1843.

He declares the entire consistency of the proposition which gentlemen have maintained with the proposition that the power of appropriation of the public money is not restrained by the other and express grants of power, for the reason that the power of appropriation is one which must be left to the discretion of the sovereign Legislature, restrained alone by their judgment of the necessities within the constitutional power of the Government. This has been illustrated by the history of the Government and is established by Mr. Monroe in the elaborate exposition which he made of the acts of appropriation.

Reference has been made to the appropriation for the Venezuela sufferers, to that to aid destitute foreigners, to that for the relief of San Domingo, to the bounty to the cod-fisheries, to the appropriations in aid of the public health, and for the relief of the sufferers upon the Mississippi River by the flood—none of these things affecting the vital autonomy of the States nor their powers under the Constitution.

I shall vote for this resolution upon the authority of the entire past history of the Government affirming the consistency of appropriation for what? Not to enter into the State of Kansas with the strong hand asserting the power of the Government to condemn cattle, but to protect the cattle throughout the whole country in its interstate commerce; and if in the exercise of that authority for the regulation and protection of the general commerce of the people in their interstate relations it is necessary or useful for the Government of the United States to appropriate public money to be expended in the State of Kansas in purchasing and killing the diseased cattle which are to be or may be carried out into other States, thus affecting a great commercial interest throughout the country, the State of Kansas consenting, I can see objection. That is what the resolution proposes to do.

If it is necessary to purchase and kill diseased cattle, the State authorities of Kansas not objecting but asking for the exercise of this power in the interest of the general commercial relations and interstate commerce of the country, there can be no invasion of the State sovereignty in the State of Kansas consenting to this exercise of power in her territory and none in Congress appropriating money for the regulation and protection of the interstate commerce of the United States. The interest is certainly one of the greatest magnitude and national in its character. The commerce in cattle between the States can not exist if there is no power to stop in transit infected cattle.

If it be lawful to stop them in transit in aid of commerce, why not before they have started (the State consenting)? If they are detained or killed in the interest of the commerce of all the States, why should one of the States be compelled to pay for them, when the sacrifice is made for the benefit of all the States? Mr. Monroe, in vetoing the Cumberland road bill, on a theory of construction so strict that it denied the power of Congress to make internal improvements and construct and maintain post-roads in the States without their consent (a strictness now altogether disregarded by the Senators who oppose this resolution), maintained the power of Congress to make an appropriation for this purpose, and insisted that the absence of power to enter the State and exercise power therein for the purpose of making internal improvements was no restriction on the power to appropriate money for this purpose.

The argument of Mr. Monroe was, the appropriation of money must be for the "common defense and general welfare," but "shunning," to use his expression, any interference with the rights of the States, Congress could determine what was required for the common defense and general welfare. In the resolution of the Senator from Kansas any interference with the rights of the States is "shunned" by requiring the "co-operation" of the authorities of Kansas. There is therefore no conflict between the propositions of Senators who oppose this resolution on this side of the Chamber and those who support it; and the question is only one of expediency, of the magnitude of the danger and injury.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. HOAR in the chair). The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Texas [Mr. COKE], which will be read.

The SECRETARY. In line 5, after the word "agriculture," it is proposed to insert "with the consent of," and in line 6, after the word "authorities," to strike out "of the State of Kansas" and insert "in the State in which it may be used."

The question being put, a division was called for; and the ayes were 19.

Mr. MILLER, of New York. I call for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. INGALLS. Mr. President, I am apprehensive that eventually we shall be called upon to make a very large appropriation to extirpate foot-and-mouth disease from the Democratic party, for it begins to be apparent that they very seldom open their mouth without putting their foot in it. [Laughter.] I want to say to the Senator from Texas that the State of Kansas will waive its privileges under the Constitution and make no point about the invasion of its rights by an appropriation of the kind that is mentioned in this bill.

The doctrine of State rights and State sovereignty dies hard, but I think it is moribund and in the course of time will eventually be buried. If any Senator upon the opposite side of the Chamber can tell me what power a majority of Congress can not exercise under the Constitution according to the recent decision of the Supreme Court in the legal-tender case I shall be very much instructed.

The Senators appear to be ignorant of the march of events during the last twenty-five years when they insist that whenever a majority of the people or a majority of their representatives in Congress believe that any appropriation is necessary for the general welfare, or for the exercise of any of those rights which are named in the Constitution, no matter what it may be, they can not accomplish it. The political history of this country from the foundation of the Government has moved in an orbit whose course has been defined by the identical struggle that is presented upon the floor of the Senate to-day, and that is the question as to whether the nation, a majority of the people of all the States, is supreme, or whether one State has a right to negative and veto the expressed wishes of a majority of all the people. And, Mr. President, those who preach to-day the doctrine of State rights and State sovereignty, and insist that in any great question involving the interests of a majority of all the people a single State can interpose its objection successfully to the accomplishment of the national will, have read history and the events of the last twenty-five years to very little advantage.

But, Mr. President, I do not propose to be drawn from the consideration of the main topic under discussion by debate upon an exploded, abandoned, and defunct interpretation of the Constitution. The question that is before the Senate is whether or not this appropriation in the light of the knowledge before the Senate is one that is fit to be made in view of the great exigency that threatens the general welfare.

The live-stock of this country according to the last census, including cattle, horses, sheep, and hogs, was something in excess I believe in value of $1,500,000,000, a trifle more than the entire amount of the national debt I think. It therefore becomes an important and interesting question to ascertain in view of this fact what is the relation of the General Government to this vast interest. I admit that so far as the amount appropriated in this bill or resolution is concerned the $25,000 that is mentioned, if this is a great national exigency, is entirely inadequate. If $25,000 is sufficient to deal with this question, then those people interested in this stock or the people of the community where the difficulty exists ought to appropriate it. It would be idle to say that an interest represented by the vast sum of money that I have named, $1,500,000,000, could not appropriate the petty and paltry sum of $25,000 to avoid the danger of the total destruction of that enormous value.

The United States Government does not stand as the guarantor, as the insurer of the live-stock of this country, any more than it does of the shipping of this country, of the buildings of this country; and it would be as idle to say, because there is difficulty threatening isolated herds, because there is danger threatening a locality in Kansas, that the Government should pay that from that fact alone, as it would to say that in case of a conflagration or the loss of a ship at sea the Government should be called in to make good the loss of the person who had been damnified. No, sir; this bill, if it rests upon any solid foundation, rests upon broader ground than that. It must rest either upon the right of Congress to deal with this question as one of interstate commerce, or under the clause providing for the general welfare, and it must be apparent that if there is a disease, if there is a danger that threatens an interest involving such stupendous sums of money, and that might be of such serious and momentous result to the commerce of this country, to the food of this country, and to all its interests, we can be called upon not only to make this appropriation of $25,000, but whatever may be necessary to extirpate the disease and save the country from the difficulty that threatens it.

I am inclined to think, Mr. President, that the actual danger that menaces the country at this time from the irruption of this disease has been exaggerated. I believe that to a very great extent by the action of the people of Kansas and by the action of those who are interested in this property and who own the stock the danger that threatened the country is very largely under control. The people there have held public meetings; the men interested in this stock have assembled; they have instituted the most rigid quarantine. The country in which these infected herds exist has been isolated; guards are placed along the entire frontier; and the governor of the State, acting in response to a general demand, has issued a proclamation calling upon the Legislature to assemble in special session on Tuesday next, the 18th instant, for the purpose of considering what is necessary to be done to further guard against the difficulty that threatens this vast interest.

So I say, sir, that there is no necessity of acting in any trepidation in this matter. The people of Kansas have taken precautions; the men who are interested in this property have associated themselves together for the purpose of guarding against the spread of this disease. But that does not relieve the Congress of the United States from the necessity of considering whether or not it is appropriate for the nation to unite with the State in taking such measures as may be necessary to prevent the further spread of this disease.

I should doubt, as a distinct and independent proposition, very much whether it was within the legitimate exercise of the powers of Congress to appropriate money for the purchase of these infected herds and their destruction. I am told that in dealing with this question in Massachusetts, when the valuable herds of that State were threatened with pleuro-pneumonia or lung-plague, a commission was created by the Legislature and a report made by that commission, and a sum of money, perhaps nearly $100,000, expended by the Commonwealth for the purchase and destruction of those herds that were infected or that had been exposed to contagion. But, sir, if we are to be called upon to inaugurate that principle as a matter of legislation by Congress, it involves vastly more than that. If the money that we propose to appropriate by this bill could be spent for the purchase and slaughter of one infected animal, then by an irresistible process of reasoning, if all the animals in this country are infected, or if they have been exposed to contagion, the Government may be compelled to purchase or pay for the entire live-stock in this country, amounting, as I said a while ago, to a sum in excess of the entire aggregate of the national debt I am not prepared to commit myself to that proposition.

The Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. DAWES] asks me where I will stop. I will not begin, Mr. President, and that is where I will stop.

Mr. DAWES. If you are under obligation to do anything, you are under obligation to go the whole length.

Mr. INGALLS. I will not commit myself to that proposition, and there is where I will stop. I say that the Government of the United States, so far as the value of this property is concerned and its ownership, is no more bound to guarantee and insure the live-stock men of this country against loss than it is the owners of houses or ships against loss. The only thing that the Government can legitimately do in my judgment is to co-operate with the owners of the property and with the local authorities and with the State governments in such measures as will prevent the spread of the disease and to that extent eradicate it.

Mr. DAWES. Suppose it is necessary to destroy somebody's herds?

Mr. INGALLS. The Senator from Massachusetts asks me, "Suppose it is necessary to destroy somebody's herds?" When a great conflagration is raging in a city and it becomes necessary to blow up a building in order to arrest the progress of the conflagration, upon whom does the loss fall?

Mr. DAWES. The owner of the building.

Mr. INGALLS. It does not fall upon the State. There is no more reason for saying that because this danger threatens this industry the Government shall stand as guarantor between the men who own the property and loss than there is in saying that it shall stand between any other citizen engaged in any other enterprise whom disaster overtakes against loss by his calamity.

Mr. DAWES. I do not want to interrupt the Senator; I do not want to throw any obstacle in the way of his argument; but he tells us that it does not fall on the State. If he has a conviction about it, will he be kind enough to tell us on whom it does fall?

Mr. INGALLS. I am not called upon to discuss side issues or incidental questions. I should be glad to illuminate the entire horizon of the Senator from Massachusetts, as I have no doubt I should upon occasion be able to do were it necessary; but that is not a question involved in this controversy.

But for the purpose of showing that the danger does exist and that there is a special reason why the action that is now invoked of Congress should be taken, I wish to invite the attention of the Senate to one other consideration, and that is this: A very large proportion of the cattle that are in Kansas are what may be properly designated as transitory herds. They are not owned there; they do not belong there. Those who are familiar with the movements of these herds know that during the early part of the season they start from Texas; by easy stages they are driven northward through the Indian Territory; they pass into Kansas in the western half of the State; through that State they pass slowly during the summer season still farther northward through Nebraska, grazing as they go, until at last they reach the great plains and grazing regions of Wyoming and Montana, where they are finally fattened and shipped to the markets of the East. When it appears that a very large proportion of the stock that is in Kansas at any one given time is not owned there, does not belong there, when the ownership is in citizens of other States, it would be obviously unjust to compel the citizens of that State to bear the entire expense even of these remedial measures.

The Senator from Ohio [Mr. SHERMAN] in the course of his remarks expressed some doubt whether or not the disease that has appeared upon the soil of Kansas in the eastern portion of the State was really of the kind and type that has been designated and described. For the purpose of setting that matter at rest I will ask the Secretary to read extracts from reports that have already been made upon this subject by Dr. Holcomb, the Army veterinary surgeon at Fort Leavenworth, who on the 4th of March was summoned to General Augur's headquarters on a telegram from the governor of Kansas requesting that a surgeon be sent to Neosho Falls for the purpose of examining diseases that had broken out there among cattle, and also from the report of Dr. Trumbower, who was sent out as veterinary expert by Commissioner Loring, of the Agricultural Department. They will be found between the marked lines of the paper which I send to the desk.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

Dr. Holcomb, Army veterinary surgeon at Fort Leavenworth, said that on the 4th of March he was summoned to General Augur's headquarters and there shown a telegram from the governor of Kansas requesting that a veterinary surgeon be sent to Neosho Falls, Woodson County, to examine a disease that had broken out among the cattle. In company with the governor and Major Sims he arrived here, and though thoroughly convinced in his own mind before arriving here that the cattle could not be afflicted with the foot-and-mouth disease he had on the closest examination become convinced, and could not declare the disease anything else but the dread contagion, the foot-and-mouth disease. The doctor then went on to say he visited Mr. Keith's herd, five miles north of Neosho Falls, and found the disease there in all its stages. A typical case was that of a two-year-old steer three or four days affected. He was lame in the left hind foot. The doctor examined it, and after cleaning out the cleft of hoof there found a vesicle which when ruptured left a well-defined oblong ulcer, true and typical of the disease. The animal's temperature was from 100° to 102°. Another case was of two weeks' duration. The temperature was 103°, and when the animal defecated the excrement had a small ulcer on it, as well as blood. This case was of a yearling, and he was lame in the right hind foot.

The last case was that of one with only a stump at the fetlock with a deep scab under it, and a swelling on both hind legs up to the hock joint. The doctor said some animals had lost one toe, others two, again others a foot to the top of the hoof, and others were on stumps half way to the hock joint. He had seen all four feet gone, which was a new feature of the disease and showed its virulent character. In the Goodrich or Hindman herd mouth lesions or ulcers were plainly shown, and covered the mouth from the lips to the larynx. These cattle had been well protected, sheltered, and were away above the average condition of stock cattle. Beard's herd had been infected by a cow introduced from Keith's herd, which showed the contagious character of the disease.

* * * * * * *

Dr. Trumbower, sent out as a veterinary expert by United States Commissioner Loring, of the Agricultural Bureau, next made a report. He agreed in all particulars with Dr. Holcomb and gave his experienee with cases similar to those related by Dr. Holcomb. The incubation of the disease took from twenty-four hours to four days, and at that stage the vesicles about the mouth appeared. Sometimes only the mouth symptoms and not the foot symptoms appeared, and vice versa. When the mouth symptoms alone appeared the recovery of the animal, if he recovered at all, was more speedy than when the foot is affected. The fatality of the disease is not so great as might be surmised, and in the severest cases on record of the ravages the losses have never exceeded 30 per cent., and have been as low as 3 per cent. of the cattle directly affected, not those exposed as well, but many survived as cripples and so poor in flesh that they cost as much again to recuperate them. The disease is undoubtedly mouth-and-foot disease.

Mr. INGALLS. In corroboration I will ask the Secretary to read the dispatches which appear in the telegraphic news of this morning from Chicago, dated yesterday, from Neosho Falls and from Topeka, of the same date, showing the condition of affairs yesterday.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

FOOT-AND-MOUTH DISEASE—THE TROUBLE EXTENDING—SEVERAL CASES REPORTED IN ILLINOIS.

CHICAGO, March 18.

The Tribune's dispatches to-night regarding the cattle disease show the situation to be in the highest degree alarming and indicate that the live-stock men at the Union Stock-Yards whose views were given yesterday have either ignorantly or intentionally belittled the case. The disease prevalent in Kansas has made its appearance in the southern and central part of Illinois. Reports from Effingham and Cumberland Counties tell of symptoms so closely corresponding with those in Kansas as to leave no doubt that the disease is the same, though milder in form. In one herd in Effingham County twenty cattle were found in the several stages of the plague. Out of forty-six yearlings in another herd nearly half were found to be diseased. Similar reports from other points in the same section show that the plague has gained a firm foothold in Illinois.

NEOSHO FALLS, KANS., March 13.

Several new cases of the foot-and-mouth disease were reported to-day, only one new herd being affected, however. It appears to be spreading rapidly in the herd on Owl Creek, and as the owner has sold several head since the disease appeared, it is feared that other herds may be affected. The herd reported yesterday to be diseased was examined by Dr. Holcomb to-day, who reported that it was a false alarm, which may be the case with the report of to-day. So far the quarantine regulations established by the committee are being acceded to by all classes of citizens. The Commissioner of Agriculture has dispatched a veterinary surgeon from Washington, who will arrive here Saturday. Dr. Holcomb has gone to Lyon County to examine infected herds near Hartford. The alarm has somewhat subsided, as it is generally believed that the quarantine commissioners can control matters until the governor can convene the Legislature.

TOPEKA, KANS., March 13.

In obedience to the almost universal demand from every part of the State, and in view of the enormous interest at stake, Governor Glick has issued a proclamation convening the Legislature in special session on March 18 to consider the cattle-plague and to adopt measures whereby it may be absolutely stamped out.

Mr. INGALLS. It will be apparent from the reading of the last dispatch that it is a matter of indifference to the representatives of Kansas whether or not the amendment of the Senator from Texas prevails, because it will be entirely within the power of the Legislature of that State to give its consent within the next week; there will be ample time in which to co-operate with the national authorities; but if that amendment is adopted, except in those States where a law now exists or in which the Legislature is now assembled to take the necessary measures for co-operation, the resolution offered by my colleague, if adopted, will be entirely inoperative.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President——

Mr. COKE. Let me suggest to the Senator from Kansas that I am willing to modify my amendment so that the governor of the State may act.

Mr. INGALLS. But what right has the governor to act for a State without legislative sanction? If the Senator from Texas can give me any information on that point I shall be gratified.

Mr. COKE. Well, Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Kentucky [Mr. WILLIAMS] is entitled to the floor.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I do not rise to respond to the argument of the Senator from Kansas [Mr. INGALLS] nor to criticise anything he has said, but I rise to congratulate him and to congratulate the farmers of the West and the stock-raisers of the West that within three years he has totally changed his opinion on this subject. I recollect three long years ago, when I was urging on Congress the passage of some restrictive measure so as to prevent animal diseases, the Senator was the most formidable opponent of my efforts.

Mr. INGALLS. Will the Senator permit me to make an observation?

Mr. WILLIAMS. Let me get through.

Mr. INGALLS. Very well.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I remember with what violence he fought the measure, how he denounced it as impolitic and wrong and unconstitutional. He came down on me like a thousand of brick. With lance well poised, he came dashing down like the commander of a company of Kansas jayhawkers upon a band of border ruffians and he unhorsed and floored me, and my bill was sent back to the committee that had reported it. I congratulate him upon the change that has come o'er the spirit of his dream. I do not want to twit him for his change of front, but I congratulate myself on the support he now gives, not only to the principles of this resolution but on his approval of the bill that is on our Calendar, and I congratulate him again and the people of his State, for I recollect I said on that occasion that he might see the time when his whole State and the whole of the great Northwest and all these boundless plains over which there then roamed in perfect health millions of cattle would be infected with this plague. I said that perhaps his own State might be the very first of all to be infected. I do not want to claim to be prophetic; but as the event has come I can not but confess that I am a little gratified that of all the Western States Kansas has been first struck. I hope the blow may be averted. I know it is a great calamity; but the very prophesy that I made three years ago has been fulfilled.

I am glad to welcome the Senator as an ally in support of a measure which I think is second to none in importance of any which has been before Congress since I have had the honor of a seat on the floor of the Senate. It involves greater interests, it affects more people than any other measure that has been before Congress since I have been a member of it.

What I have to say in regard to this whole subject I shall say hereafter when the main question on the passage of the bill to protect our domestic animals against infection comes forward. Upon this resolution I shall say nothing but vote for it. I think it is a step in the right direction, and I shall vote also for the bill. It strikes me, however, that we might have settled the whole question on the bill as well as we can settle it on this resolution now; but its friends seem to differ, and I am for the resolution, and I shall be for the main measure when it comes up, and what I have to say on the general principles and on the constitutionality and propriety of the whole measure I will reserve until the main question comes before the Senate.

Mr. INGALLS. Mr. President, it has been observed by some wise philosopher that there are but two classes of men who never change their opinions, and those are the dead men and the fools, and to neither class do I profess to belong.

The Senator from Kentucky is in the condition of the gentleman who jumped before he got to the stile. If he had reserved his observations until his pleuro-pneumonia bill came before the Senate he would find that I have abated no jot or tittle of my objections to it, and I think if I came down upon him as he says, with somewhat chaste classicality of language, like a thousand of brick, he will find when that bill comes up that I will come down upon him like a five-story edifice. [Laughter.]

Mr. WILLIAMS. I am sorry that I congratulated my friend from Kansas too soon. I shall regret and the whole country will regret if he adheres to his former position.

Mr. VEST. Is it proposed to take a vote on this resolution this afternoon?

Several SENATORS. Yes.

Mr. VEST. Do I understand the Senator from Kansas to object to the amendment?

Mr. PLUMB. No, sir; I stated more than an hour ago that the amendment was entirely satisfactory to me, that I had in framing the resolution designed entirely to avoid any of the discussion that has arisen by putting in that provision which required everything that was done by the Commissioner of Agriculture to be done in co-operation with the State authorities, and I did not see how anything could be done in co-operation with them that was not done with their consent. However, there has been a debate about that, and I am willing to admit that the amendment of the Senator from Texas, being a little more satisfactory to those who are sticklers about that question, as I am not, covers the case more fully, and so far as I can give any consent to it I shall consent that it go in. I myself do not believe that consent is necessary, but this is an emergency in which as I believe we ought not to debate about questions which are not material, and this is not material because in the emergency now before the country that consent which is provided for in the amendment will be had, and the purpose which I had in the introduction of the resolution will be fully accomplished. I do not see how any one who has any regard for the great interest at stake can feel that now guarded as it will be by the adoption of the amendment of the Senator from Texas there can be any objection to the resolution if there is any emergency whatever calling for Congressional action.

Mr. VEST. The Senator from Kansas [Mr. PLUMB] can not overstate in my opinion the importance of the exigency if there is any danger of pleuro-pneumonia. His colleague [Mr. INGALLS] has made a statement in regard to the amount of cattle. The report of the Commissioner of Agriculture shows the amount of cattle in the United States in 1883 to have been in value $1,008,106,514; in 1884, $1,106,715,703. The value of the cattle in Texas was $91,356,301; in Iowa, $85,301,255; in Illinois, $71,977,766; in Kansas, $55,541,873; and in the State of Missouri, $49,087,375.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Will the Senator from Missouri allow me a moment? Those figures show the value of the cattle and the number of cattle as reported by our officers. Our reports are made by subordinates in the States, and they do not include the town or city cows at all. The number is much greater than is estimated in the census and the value nearly twice as great. These things I know myself. The census reports as to the number and value of our live-stock are not at all reliable. For instance, in some of the States the cattle are put down at $9 a head. There never was a calf in my State that was not worth more than that. The cattle of my own State are put down at $23 a head, and they are worth a great deal more. The farmers in giving in their stock are not particular, so that statistics obtained for taxation purposes are not very accurate. These reports are not reliable at all.

Mr. VEST. I am not reading from any census report; I am reading from the report of the Commissioner of Agriculture.

Mr. WILLIAMS. The figures ought to be doubled.

Mr. VEST. By the report of the Commissioner I notice that the value of the cattle in New York is $77,975,913, while the value of those in the State of Iowa amounted to $85,301,255, in Kansas to $55,541,873, in Nebraska to $44,116,092, in Missouri to $49,087,375, and in Illinois to $71,977,766.

I refer to these figures to show that the statements usually made on this question of the values are incorrect. If the amendment of the Senator from Texas is adopted and incorporated in the resolution there is but one difficulty in my mind in the way of voting for it, and that is that there is nothing before the Senate either in the statements of the Senator from Kansas or in the documents that have been read here to show that the authorities of Kansas asked for this money at all. If it is voted now by Congress it is voted out of hand on our own volition. I understand the Senator from Kansas [Mr. INGALLS] thinks to-day that the amount and magnitude of the disease have been exaggerated.

Mr. PLUMB. I can appreciate the position of the governor to some extent in not preferring himself directly a request, because a request of the governor would practically be a request from an individual unless he were authorized by the statute of the State to prefer it. The request of the dispatches I read this morning was in answer to one I sent to him, stating that I had introduced a resolution for this purpose and stating its terms generally, and inquiring of him whether there was a necessity for action and whether the reports had been exaggerated or not; and his reply is expressly that there is necessity for action, that the reports have not been exaggerated, that the disease is spreading, that the emergency is very great, and that unless something is done immediately for the purpose of stamping it out the disease will extend to all herds west of the Missouri River. I can not conceive how he could with propriety have gone further than he did. He was not authorized in any way to address Congress on the subject, but he expresses his opinion in the most emphatic manner in regard to the subject-matter now before the Senate.

Mr. VEST. I was pleased with the remarks of the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. HAWLEY]. I was gratified to hear such opinions expressed from that side of the Chamber. I am glad to know that there are members of the Republican party who believe in the old-fashioned construction of the Constitution; and I honestly believe, as I believe in my own existence, that the downfall of this country will date from the day when local self-government and the rights of the States are trampled upon. Whenever the General Government becomes a great paternal and national government, as the Senator from Kansas [Mr. INGALLS] by his speech indicated, it is the downfall of republican government on this continent; it is the end of it.

The Senator from Kansas [Mr. INGALLS] said that the question was whether one State shall nullify the action of all the States. That is not the question. The question is whether, under the Constitution of the United States, there is any power given to the National Government to go inside of the States and interfere with their domestic affairs. When the act of 1879, establishing a National Board of Health, was argued here, in most emphatic terms I expressed my opinion on this question that nowhere in the Constitution of the United States was the power given to the Federal Government to go inside of the States to interfere for health or any other purpose with the domestic affairs of the States. That is the position; and until a State comes here and tells the General Government that it can not protect itself, either from domestic insurrection or disease, the General Government can not interfere. There is too much of this interference to-day in local and domestic affairs, and the people, instead of looking, as the fathers of the Constitution did, to their domestic governments in the States, are too apt to turn their eyes to the great national luminary. They are beginning to look here for everything. I deprecate it.

When the governor of my State a year ago appealed to Congress, sent a telegram to my colleague and myself asking the General Government for aid to the people of South Missouri, Missouri was perfectly competent to take care of her own people in that contingency just as the Senator from Ohio [Mr. PENDLETON] said in regard to the Ohio River overflow that Ohio was perfectly competent to take care of her own people. And yet we are to-day indoctrinating the people with the idea that they must look away from the States, that they must look to Congress. They should look first to their own States and trust to the power of the people. It springs up from individuals to the family, from the family to the State, from the State to the Union. But to-day the people are being taught to look first to the National Government and afterward to the States. It may be that when the Democratic party opens its mouth it always puts its foot in it. The difference between us and the Republican party is that when it opens the Treasury it always puts its hand in. I am willing to stand on the difference.

Mr. BUTLER. Mr. President, it seems that there were some other Senators on the floor a few years ago who entertained very much the same opinion with my friend from Missouri [Mr. VEST]; and inasmuch as the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. WILLIAMS] did not read from the eloquent speech of the Senator from Kansas [Mr. INGALLS], I will do so. I find in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD containing the proceedings of February 19, 1881, the following:

Mr. INGALLS. Mr. President, it is unnecessary for me to say that I sympathize very cordially with the ostensible purpose of this bill. I have read the measure with a great deal of care, and I desire to speak with deliberation and with caution; but I feel impelled to say that it is without any exception the worst bill that I ever read upon any subject. It is bad in principle; it is bad in theory; it is bad in policy, and worse in detail. Pleuro-pneumonia is unquestionably a great evil; but this remedy is worse than the disease. The bill is a confused, conflicting, incoherent, and incongruous medley and jumble of provisions, every one of which, in my judgment, is directly at variance with the Constitution and is at war with the reserved rights of the States and of the people.

Mr. INGALLS. So I say still, and when that bill comes up I will say that again.

Mr. BUTLER. He used the words "reserved rights of the States and the people."

Mr. INGALLS. When that bill comes up I will say it again.

Mr. BUTLER. Well, Mr. President, when the Senator does so, I should like to contrast that language with what he has uttered to-day for the purpose of calling attention to what struck me as being a wonderfully marvelous variance from his language on that occasion. However, he said further——

Mr. INGALLS. If the Senator will allow me——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from South Carolina is entitled to the floor and can not be interrupted without his consent.

Mr. BUTLER. I always yield to the Senator. That is the reason why I am able now to show how far the Senator is from where he was on February 19, 1881. He said of the bill then pending:

It creates a monstrous and anomalous machine, unknown to the Constitution and the laws, composed of the Commissioner of Agriculture—

Just as this resolution does—the National Board of Health, commissioners, inspectors, municipal and State and local police authorities, the Navy of the United States, and the Secretary of the Treasury, responsible to no one and committing the Government to an indefinite and enormous expenditure for all coming time. It would be difficult for human ingenuity to devise within so narrow a compass a contrivance that embraced more principles that appear pernicious and doubtful and doctrines that commit this Government to measures that are fraught and pregnant with immeasurable mischief for the future.

Further on the Senator said:

Pleuro-pneumonia—

Or I suppose he would have said "foot-and-mouth disease" if that had been before the Senate at that time:

Pleuro-pneumonia, as I said, is undoubtedly a great evil; but it is after all a question of private loss to individuals and to communities, and as such it is to be dealt with like other private calamities; and I am curious to know upon what theory of the Constitution or of the functions of Government this select committee have proposed this bill when they attempt to establish the principle that the Government shall purchase every sick and unhealthy animal in this country and pay for it two-thirds the value of a well one, when everybody knows that a sick animal has no market value at all.

Those were the sentiments of the Senator from Kansas on February 19, 1881, and yet, unless I misunderstood him, he has stated to-day that there was no restraint upon the majority of the people of this country as represented upon the floors of the two Houses of Congress, the Senate and House of Representatives; none whatever except their will. I confess I was very much surprised at that statement of the Senator's opinion in view of what he had uttered when the pleuro-pneumonia bill was under consideration a few years ago.

This resolution, in my humble judgment, is just as objectionable substantially, with the exception of the details of that bill, as the bill itself. It says that there shall be $25,000 appropriated—for what purpose?

To be used under the direction of the Commissioner of Agriculture, in cooperation with the proper authorities of the State of Kansas—in eradicating a contagious disease popularly known as the foot-and-mouth disease.

In doing what?—

Which the Senator said, in speaking of pleuro-pneumonia, was purely and simply a local matter, and like all local calamities should be dealt with by the local authorities; and as the Senator from Missouri has stated, I have heard nothing from any official source in the State of Kansas saying that this appropriation of $25,000 is necessary. I have heard nothing from any official source stating that the local authorities of Kansas may not deal with the question and effectually stamp out the disease in the locality where it exists.

There have been some telegrams read from the newspapers; I believe one from the governor of Kansas. I do not understand the governor to say that it is not entirely within the power of the State of Kansas to control this matter. It seems to me, therefore, that this resolution in principle is as objectionable as the bill to which the Senator from Kansas referred in the remarks which I have read; and I say to you, sir, frankly, that on that occasion I not only sympathized with him but agreed in every respect with him that Congress was going entirely outside of its constitutional power in passing the bill which was then before the Senate, and I think it is equally beyond its constitutional power to pass this joint resolution.

The precedents cited by the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. GARLAND] this morning do not go to the extent of this joint resolution. There is nothing in the appropriation which Congress makes to buy seeds, to establish an agricultural bureau, to build a military academy, to build a naval academy and support them, to send expeditions to the North Pole for the relief of Greely, or for the relief of sufferers from a flood or a fire or an earthquake or any other great national calamity—there is nothing in those appropriations which trenches upon the reserve powers and rights of the States. Still, Mr. President, I think they are of very questionable constitutional authority.

The Department of Agriculture was originated on an appropriation bill about the year 1842 or 1843, beginning with an appropriation of $3,000; and from that it has grown to an annual appropriation of half a million. I believe the Military Academy at West Point was originated in the same way upon an appropriation bill. But, Mr. President, all of those questions relate to the whole country at large. Here is a proposition to go into a State to interfere with something purely local, which the State has the authority and the power and the ability to control under its powers to regulate its police and quarantine; and yet we are asked to appropriate $25,000 to send into Kansas to deal with a disease among cattle. I submit, notwithstanding the scoffings of the Senator from Kansas in relation to the Constitution, that this Congress has no right whatever to do it; but, as has been said by the Senator from Missouri, when we reach that point in the history of this country when this Congress and this central power assume to control the local internal affairs of the States and the people, the alarm-bell will have sounded which will ultimately destroy the liberties of this people and republican institutions upon this continent.

I will go as far as any Senator upon this floor and as far as my vote can go to relieve the people of this country when a great national calamity overtakes them which extends beyond the power and the ability, or, if you please, the will of the local authorities to control; but further than that I am not willing to go; and although the amendment of the Senator from Texas relieves this joint resolution of some of its objections, I can not vote for it even with that amendment adopted, because I believe it is wrong in principle and is adding another to the long line of dangerous precedents which the Senator from Arkansas read this morning. Hence even if, as I said, the amendment of the Senator from Texas should be adopted I shall be constrained to cast my vote against this resolution until there is more evidence before the Senate that the exigency demands that Congress shall make an appropriation.

Mr. HOAR. I shall vote against this resolution if it comes to a vote to-day, because I do not think there is yet sufficient evidence that this disorder has assumed national proportions. As has been already said, we took care of a case apparently quite as bad in my own State without appealing to Congress for help, and I understand the Kansas Legislature is to be in session next Tuesday, and that Legislature will determine whether it finds the difficulty beyond its control or whether it is something which comes from interstate causes relating to interstate commerce, which it can not be expected to expend the resources of that State in dealing with. I therefore move that the further consideration of this resolution be postponed for one week.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Massachusetts moves that the further consideration of the joint resolution be postponed until Friday next. The question is on that motion.

Mr. HARRIS. I believe a motion to postpone indefinitely takes precedence, does it not?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It does.

Mr. HARRIS. I make that motion.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Tennessee moves that the resolution be postponed indefinitely.

Mr. CONGER. Is that debatable?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It is.

Mr. CONGER. I think, Mr. President, that I am called upon to vote in favor of this resolution, this preliminary effort to ascertain whether in fact there is in this country so threatening a disease, and if there is, to have reports upon it as early as possible.

Now, sir, without one word of discussion, or with but little discussion, we have seen resolutions passed here by almost unanimous consent appropriating thousands and hundreds of thousands of dollars, and succeeded the next day by other appropriations appropriating other hundreds of thousands of dollars on exactly the same principle and for exactly the same reason that this little appropriation is asked, to inquire into and attempt to stop the spread of a disease which it is alleged will destroy thousands and millions of dollars' worth of the property of the good people of these United States. And, sir, every man here that opposes this measure rushes with untold speed to hide himself under the common old shadow of the Constitution. How they gather behind it! How men shelter themselves there after having voted for the appropriation of hundreds of thousands of dollars to meet and avert some great public calamity! When this question comes up for the appropriation of a paltry $25,000 to meet a calamity which, if it does portend as much wrong and injury to the people of the United States as is claimed, would be equally disastrous, equally injurious, equally destructive of property and of comfort and of health and of prosperity as the measures against which the appropriations were aimed for which these gentlemen voted without a word, they shelter themselves under the shadow of the Constitution!

I took occasion the other day to say that it seems to me from my observation in the Senate that any bill whatever that looked to some protection of some agricultural interest in this country was met either with sneers or with frowns or with votes opposed to it, no matter in what shape it came. This is a measure affecting the vast agricultural interest; it is to guard against a danger threatening the interests of a large majority of the people of these United States directly and of all the people of the United States as a whole indirectly. There is no pretense but that as much of $25,000 as may be necessary to inquire into and eradicate, if possible, a great oncoming and threatening evil may be appropriated; and that is all this simple resolution does; it appropriates a small sum in itself, and only so much as is necessary of that, to answer the call of the governor of a great State, to bring to the assistance of that people and of the whole people whatever knowledge in regard to such a disease is in possession of the Government, so as to stop this great threatening evil.

Sir, I do not wonder sometimes that when we are appropriating for ornament, when we are appropriating thousands of dollars to gratify taste, when we are appropriating thousands of dollars to gratify sentiment, when we are appropriating thousands of dollars from sympathy, and when this little pittance is asked in the name of the farmers of the United States, of the cattle-raisers of the United States, it is met as these propositions uniformly and continuously are in this body—I say I do not wonder that there is a growing feeling of distrust among the common people of the United States of their representatives here. I do not wonder that granges are formed all over; that men following the quiet and peaceful avocations of life, finding their plans thwarted, their petitions cast carelessly aside, their demands upon their representatives treated with silent contempt or with open scorn—I do not wonder that, as the best means which occurs to them, the people try to combine together in granges, or even in political associations, to find out whether there are enough of them among the great mass of the people of the United States to demand and have a reasonable hearing before the representatives of the nation.

That feeling exists; it is spread all over this country. It crops out in petitions to this Congress, in communications to the press, in the State Legislatures, in the reports of committees, in the discussions before agricultural and other societies, in the granges which have been formed and are forming all over the country, and the agricultural community will inquire whether any proposition affecting their interests, whether any answer to their inquiries, whether any petition which they present here can receive a fair hearing. The man that says anything for it is charged with appealing to the prejudices and to the passions of a class. The man that speaks of the treatment of the agricultural community when they present their petitions and ask for the passage of laws here is usually called by these high-toned gentlemen that I see around me, or by many of them, a demagogue, appealing to passion, appealing to prejudice. It has got so that from the sacred precincts of the scholar's library no sympathy comes to that vast class of the people who control the prosperity of our country. It has got so that from the politician no word of approval for any of these propositions comes until the political prosperity of the party or the person is endangered.

Now, sir, there has been no proposition which seemed to me demanded such immediate and direct action of this body, almost without delay and almost without discussion, as this little, simple proposition, a forerunner to the propositions and to other means which could be more carefully devised to ascertain whether an alarm that is spreading all through the country, given new impetus, given aggravation by recent events, is well founded or not.

I am not responsible for the action of others in this House. I am not responsible for the action of those who cast ruthlessly aside and will not even permit a vote to be taken upon this question direct, but first move to cast it aside for a moment, and next to cast it aside forever. We all have the right to judge for ourselves of the propriety of our conduct, but I desire to vote directly upon this question, and there are no lions in the way.

There are no grim shades and monsters of State rights to prevent my voting in favor of the passage of a resolution which in its tendency is to protect the whole American people, directly or indirectly, from the threatening invasion of a plague and a scourge that seems to be more disastrous to the property and the prosperity of our people than any other that has been threatened for years, a scourge which compels the nations of Europe to shut down the gates to their boundaries and prevent the passage back and forth of the ordinary transportation of animals of all kinds—a scourge like other scourges and diseases among cattle which have brought to the people of the United States a loss already in the fancy or views of foreign governments of millions of dollars by preventing the transportation of our product, our meats, to the Old World. The people of Europe charge that the beef and the pork and the meat raised in the United States are diseased, are injurious to health, so much so that foreign governments shut out our meats from their markets; they compel us to keep at home these products which we used to send abroad, and for which we received so much in return in former years.

With the papers full of the progress of disease, with the published appeals of the governors of States, with the gathering together here within the last few weeks of hundreds of representatives of the agricultural classes of the Northwest imploring Congress to act upon this question—with all these things in view, we say to the authorities of the Old World, who by a resolution or by an ordinance destroy our prosperity, "Be assured there is a disease here destroying our cattle, threatening our prosperity; be assured there is a disease spreading contagion, not only infecting the meats we offer, but alarming our whole people by their contagion; still what is that to you and what is that to us, if you do withhold the purchase of millions of our property? You are sovereigns, and while we would like to protect the property of our people, while we would like to pass laws restraining the spread of infectious and contagious diseases that you fear, while we would like to help the great body of the American people, the farming population, in their efforts to protect their property, as we give protection to all other subjects, yet we happen to live in a land upon which the shadow of our Constitution falls, and that prevents us from aiding our own people or removing the cause of your alarm." That is the attitude we hold to-day; that is the position that this discussion assumes, a rivalry in zeal between Senators here to show what the Constitution does mean to a "t" and to a dot, and to show what it does not mean.

The contagion spreads; the telegrams are read over and over again showing that destruction is on the wing, and the tempest and the storm sink into insignificance before the spread of the pestilence and the plague. But having given to it that due and calm deliberation which becomes the highest assembled legislative body in the world, having ransacked the past and the present for examples and for precedents and for opinions, having brought up clothed with the cerements of the grave the former philosophers and statesmen of the land with their books, and read the musty records of the past with confused notions and confused ideas of what this resolution means and whether it comes within State power or the power of the General Government; having exhausted ourselves and bewildered our minds, and uncertain what we believe ourselves, the only remedy for our trouble is to postpone till we have time to rally and collect our thoughts and see what the Constitution really means, and then perhaps those who think they never can arrive at a satisfactory conclusion of it wish to postpone this subject indefinitely.

Sir, I hope it will not be postponed. I hope we may come upon this little resolution, fraught with so much meaning, to a direct vote, and if the Senate by a vote refuses to pass the resolution and make this paltry appropriation, let the people of the country understand what they may expect now and in the future when calamities come upon them. Let them see that where the tornado strikes, tearing down houses, destroying property, men are willing to rush forward with appropriations; where the rains have descended and the floods have risen and driven people from their homes to higher land and to safer places, the Senate is willing to appropriate $300,000 one day and follow it by two or three hundred thousand dollars another day to send them food and blankets and clothing and comforts—bills for which I voted most cheerfully; but when the agriculturist, the farmer, the stock-grower sends up his cry for help, for something to find out what kind of a disease is sweeping like a pestilence among his cattle and his property, that is a thing to be postponed, to be scorned, and, as this has been, to be ridiculed out of the Senate Chamber of the United States.

Mr. VOORHEES. Mr. President, may I ask that the resolution be read?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The resolution will be again read if there be no objection.

The Chief Clerk read the joint resolution.

Mr. BAYARD. Mr. President, I do not believe it competent for Congress to pass this resolution, and I desire to offer an amendment which will, as far as I conceive it competent for Congress to act, assist in obtaining information as to the means of cure and the arrestation of this disease. I have no doubt that it is fully competent for the Commissioner of Agriculture to collect information on this subject and for Congress to disseminate it. I do not believe it is in its power to enter the States and eradicate the disease, which means by taking the lives of the diseased cattle and paying certain prices either as we shall fix by agreement with the owners or as they shall be awarded under some system of appraisement not disclosed by this bill. I can perfectly well imagine the operation of such a measure as this in some of the Eastern States, Connecticut, Massachusetts, New Jersey, Maryland, Delaware, Pennsylvania, where very choice herds of expensive cattle exist and which are no more to be protected from this dire disease than the cattle that roam the great prairies of the West, and I can imagine a very large expenditure being incurred under the authority of the United States for the purpose of preventing the spread of diseases of this character.

But that, sir, is not to be stated in a moment nor to be computed in a long time. I desire to offer an amendment and to discuss it and the powers of Congress in dealing with this important subject; and to that end, as it is near the proper period of the adjournment of the Senate, I move that the Senate do now adjourn.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. No amendment is at present in order, as the motion pending is to postpone the bill indefinitely.

Mr. HARRIS. I will withdraw the motion to indefinitely postpone if the Senator from Delaware desires.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The pending question now is on the motion of the Senator from Delaware that the Senate adjourn.

Mr. MANDERSON. If the Senator from Delaware will allow me I should like to make a report from a committee.

Mr. BAYARD. Certainly.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Delaware withdraw his motion?

Mr. BAYARD. Certainly, for the purpose of allowing the Senator from Nebraska to present some formal business.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. By unanimous consent the report may be received at this time. Is there objection? The Chair hears none.

REPORT OF A COMMITTEE.

Mr. MANDERSON, from the Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the bill (S. 902) for the relief of Peter Targarona, reported it with an amendment, and submitted a report thereon.

PRESIDENTIAL APPROVAL.

A message from the President of the United States, by Mr. O. L. PRUDEN, one of his secretaries, announced that the President had yesterday approved and signed the act (S. 616) to establish a standard of time in the District of Columbia.

BILL INTRODUCED.

Mr. MANDERSON introduced a bill (S. 1850) to change the name of the Marsh National Bank of Lincoln, Nebr., to that of the Capital National Bank of Lincoln; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Finance.

PEREZ DICKINSON.

Mr. HARRIS. With the permission of the Senator from Delaware I will state that yesterday morning I took an order that Perez Dickinson should have leave to withdraw the papers on file in respect of a claim of his, upon the conditions imposed by the rule. I was requested to-day instead of having the papers withdrawn to ask that they be referred to the Committee on Claims, on the conditions imposed by the rule. I do not remember whether there has been a report in the case at this session or not.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If there be no objection, the order of withdrawal will be made.

Mr. HOAR. Has there not been a report at this session of Congress?

Mr. HARRIS. I just stated that I did not remember whether there had been a report. Oh, yes; there have been reports in favor of the claim.

Mr. HOAR. I think a report was made at the present session.

Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin. Not at the present session. There was an adverse report made at the last session.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair is informed at the desk that the matter now spoken of has been reported upon at the present session, and the bill was indefinitely postponed.

Mr. COCKRELL. That is correct, I take it, for I read the report.

Mr. HARRIS. At this session?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The report was made on the 23d day of January.

Mr. HARRIS. My request was "subject to the rule." Of course the papers can not be transferred under the rule, but I was not aware of the fact that the report had been made at this session or that any report had been made.

NAMING OF A PRESIDING OFFICER.

Mr. BAYARD. I renew my motion that the Senate adjourn.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Before putting the motion, the Chair asks unanimous consent to say that it is quite probable the Chair will be obliged to be absent for two or three days of next week, and although the rule permits the Chair to name day by day in writing a Senator to perform the duties, the Chair prefers to ask unanimous consent that the Senator from Ohio [Mr. SHERMAN] may, if the Chair is obliged to be absent, occupy the chair for three days, Monday, Tuesday, and Wednesday of next week. Is there objection? The Chair hears no objection, and it is so ordered. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Delaware that the Senate adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and (at 4 o'clock and 51 minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

FRIDAY, March 14, 1884.

The House met at 12 o'clock m. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. JOHN S. LINDSAY, D. D.

The Journal of yesterday's proceedings was read and approved.

GOOSE RAPIDS, RED RIVER.

The SPEAKER, by unanimous consent, laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of War, transmitting a report on Goose Rapids (Red River of the North) improvement; which was referred to the Committee on Rivers and Harbors.

GEORGE S. COMSTOCK.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of the Interior, transmitting additional papers in relation to the claim of George S. Comstock on account of depredations committed by the Cheyenne and Sioux Indians in Nebraska in 1864; which was referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

By unanimous consent leave of absence was granted as follows:

To Mr. JONES, of Alabama, till Tuesday next.

To Mr. WHITING, till March 24, on account of important business.

To Mr. HART, for ten days, on account of important business.

To Mr. COVINGTON, until Wednesday of next week.

To Mr. TUCKER, until Saturday next.

WITHDRAWAL OF PAPERS.

On motion of Mr. HUNT, by unanimous consent, leave was given to withdraw from the files of the House the papers in the claim of Fanny Maury, there being no adverse report thereon.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. I call for the regular order.

Mr. DIBBLE. I am instructed by the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds to offer the resolution which I send to the desk and to request its immediate consideration.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. I must insist on the regular order. I would be glad to accommodate all the gentlemen that desire to ask unanimous consent.

Mr. DIBBLE. This is reported by the unanimous instruction of the committee.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. But there are at least forty members who desire the same thing; and if I commence yielding a great deal of time will be lost.

MILITARY ACADEMY APPROPRIATION BILL.

The SPEAKER. The Chair names as the conferees on the part of the House on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the bill (H. R. 4971) making appropriations for the support of the Military Academy for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1885, and for other purposes, Mr. KEIFER of Ohio, Mr. FORNEY of Alabama, and Mr. ELLIS of Louisiana.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. HANCOCK. I am instructed——

The SPEAKER. The regular order is demanded, which is the call of committees for reports.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. I move to dispense with the morning hour.

The question being taken on Mr. TOWNSHEND's motion, there were—ayes 75, noes 29.

Mr. STEELE. I call for tellers.

The SPEAKER. A quorum not having voted, the Chair will order tellers, and appoints the gentleman from Indiana, Mr. STEELE, and the gentleman from Illinois, Mr. TOWNSHEND.

The House again divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 107, noes 18.

Mr. STEELE. I withdraw the point as to a quorum.

So (further count not being called for) the motion was agreed to—two-thirds voting in favor thereof.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. I am instructed by the Committee on Appropriations to move to dispense with the consideration of private business, the object being that we may proceed with the consideration of the Post-Office appropriation bill.

Mr. ROBINSON, of New York. I hope that will not be done.

Mr. MCMILLIN. We have but one day in the week for private business and only five hours on that day. I hope that the consideration of private business will not be dispensed with.

The SPEAKER. The question is not debatable.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. I think it is important that the consideration of the appropriation bill should be proceeded with.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois moves that private business be dispensed with for to-day, which requires a vote of two-thirds.

The question being taken, there were—ayes 65, noes 55.

The SPEAKER. Two-thirds have not voted in the affirmative.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. I call for tellers.

Several MEMBERS. Oh, no.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. In order to save time, I ask for the yeas and nays.

The question being taken on ordering the yeas and nays, there were ayes 33—more than one-fifth of the last vote.

Mr. REED and Mr. STEELE. Count the other side.

The negative vote being counted, there were noes 95.

The SPEAKER. The affirmative being more than one-fifth of the entire vote, the yeas and nays are ordered.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. I desire to state that the motion does not include the evening session.

The SPEAKER. The Chair so understands.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. I am imformed by a number of members that they do not understand the question before the House.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. TOWNSHEND] moves to dispense with the consideration of private business for to-day——

Mr. TOWNSHEND. In order to take up the Post-Office appropriation bill.

The SPEAKER. The Chair can not state what the gentleman's purpose is. That is no part of the motion. The Clerk will proceed to call the roll.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 128, nays 117, not voting 75; as follows:

Mr. TOWNSHEND. I am paired on all political questions with Mr. WASHBURN, of Minnesota; but as this is not a political question, I have voted.

The result of the vote was then announced as above stated.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. MCCOOK, its Secretary, informed the House that the Senate had passed with an amendment, in which the concurrence of the House was requested, a bill of the following title:

A bill (H. R. 1015) for the relief of Fitz-John Porter.

The message also announced that the Senate had passed, and requested the concurrence of the House in, a bill of the following title:

A bill (S. 1819) to print certain eulogies delivered in Congress upon the late Thomas Allen.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. MCMILLIN. I now move that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole for the purpose of considering business on the Private Calendar.

Mr. DIBRELL. I rise to a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. DIBRELL. Does not the unfinished business of Friday last come up now for consideration?

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks that inasmuch as the previous question was not ordered on the bill to which the gentleman refers, it will not come up until after the House shall have come out of the Committee of the Whole to-day. It will then come up as an unfinished report from the Committee of the Whole, and will be the first bill to be considered.

The motion of Mr. MCMILLIN was then agreed to.

The House accordingly resolved itself into Committee of the Whole, Mr. COX, of New York, in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The House is now in Committee of the Whole for the purpose of considering business on the Private Calendar. The Clerk will report the title of the first bill.

The first bill on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 999) granting a pension to the sole surviving grandchild of the author of the Declaration of Independence.

Mr. BAYNE. A bill was called up in Committee of the Whole last Friday and partially considered, and is the unfinished business in the committee. It is the second bill on the Calendar and can be disposed of in a moment.

MYRON E. DUNLAP.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman is correct. The unfinished business will now be taken up.

The unfinished business was the bill (H. R. 1389) for the relief of Myron E. Dunlap, reported from the Committee on Military Affairs with an amendment.

Mr. BAYNE. The bill and the report were read last Friday and the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HOLMAN. I ask for the reading of the bill and the amendment.

The bill was read, as follows:

Whereas Myron E. Dunlap, late first lieutenant of Company E, Fourteenth Regiment New York Heavy Artillery, was cashiered from the service for tendering his resignation; and

Whereas said dismissal was based upon insufficient grounds: Therefore,

Be it enacted, &c., That the said First Lieut. Myron E. Dunlap, late of Company E, Fourteenth Regiment New York Heavy Artillery, be, and he is hereby, honorably discharged from the military service of the United States, with like effect and with the same rights and privileges in all respects as if he had been regularly mustered out with said Fourteenth Regiment New York Heavy Artillery on the 26th day of August, 1865; and the Secretary of War is hereby directed to enter upon the proper records of the War Department the corrections made by this act of the military record of said officer.

The amendment was to strike out the words "with said Fourteenth Regiment New York Heavy Artillery on the 26th day of August, 1865," and to insert in lieu thereof the words "of the military service of the United States on the 23d day of July, 1864."

The CHAIRMAN. That amendment has already been adopted by the Committee of the Whole.

Mr. STEELE. I move to further amend by adding the proviso which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Provided, That by the passage of this act the said Myron E. Dunlap shall have no right or claim to any pay or allowance of any kind under it.

Mr. BAYNE. I have no objection to that amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

There being no further amendment, the bill as amended was laid aside to be reported favorably to the House.

SEPTIMIA R. MEIKLEHAM.

The next business on the Private Calendar was a bill reported by Mr. ROBINSON, of New York, from the Committee on Pensions, entitled a bill (H. R. 999) granting a pension to the sole surviving grandchild of the author of the Declaration of Independence.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he hereby is, directed to place the name of Septimia Randolph Meikleham, widow of David S. Meikleham, deceased, and the only surviving grandchild of Thomas Jefferson, author of the Declaration of Independence, on the pension-roll, and pay her a pension, during her natural life, at the rate of $5,000 a year, from and after the passage of this act.

The amendment reported by the Committee on Pensions was read, as follows:

Strike out before the word "dollars" the words "five thousand" and insert "two thousand five hundred," and at the end of the bill add "and that it be made payable quarterly in advance."

Mr. HOLMAN. I call for the reading of the report of the majority of the committee, and also the views of the minority.

The report was read, as follows:

The Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 999) granting a pension to the sole surviving grandchild of the author of the Declaration of Independence, respectfully report as follows:

Thomas Jefferson had six children, only two of whom arrived at the age of maturity. Mary Jefferson, his fourth child, married John Wayles Eppes, who was a Representative and Senator in Congress from Virginia, and had one son, who is long since dead. Martha, his oldest child, married Thomas Mann Randolph, jr., afterwards governor of Virginia, and had twelve children, all of whom are dead but the eleventh child and seventh daughter, Septimia Randolph Meikleham. Her brother, Thomas Jefferson Randolph, died in 1875, and her sister, Virginia Jefferson Randolph Trist, died in Washington in 1882, leaving Septimia the only living grandchild of Jefferson. She was born under her illustrious grandfather's roof, at Monticello, on the 3d day of January, 1814, and is therefore now in her seventy-first year. She married Dr. David Scott Meikleham, who is long since dead. She had two daughters, both of whom live with her and are unmarried.

Mrs. Meikleham's mother, Martha, was Jefferson's favorite daughter and housekeeper. All her children but three were born at Monticello, and one at the White House while her father was President and her mother the mistress of the Executive Mansion. Her children received the particular care and love of their grandfather, and received much of their education from him. Mrs. Meikleham was 12 years old when he died, and was present when his eyes closed in death. She had imbibed and still retains much of his spirit and inherited much of his genius, and retained his striking features, refined by a graceful womanhood. Though in comparative want, she has made no appeal to her grandfather's country, through its representatives, for aid. It was only recently that a member of the committee heard of her existence, and, without consultation with her or request from her, introduced the bill for her relief. The committee are gratified that this movement in her behalf was commenced without her knowledge, for they feel that the country would regret if an educated, high-minded representative of the Randolphs and Jeffersons, the only living descendant (born in his house) of the author of the Declaration of Independence, herself a widow in straitened circumstances and delicate health, venerable in years and beloved by all who have known her in her solitude, with her two amiable daughters, should be allowed to make an appeal for aid to the Congress of a nation which he so largely contributed to create.

During the first session of the last Congress the widows of Presidents Tyler, Polk, Lincoln, and Garfield were each granted a pension of $5,000 a year, and one of them had given to her a gratuity of nearly $50,000. The daughters of other eminent men have been liberally pensioned. It will not be denied that Jefferson rendered as important service to his country as any of these distinguished Presidents, and none of their descendants stood so much in need as the only living representative of his household. During the same session Congress voted $10.000 to erect a monument to Jefferson's memory in the solitude and ruins of Monticello, now owned by strangers.

While we take pride in monumental honors to the illustrious dead, it is believed that an equally appropriate monument to his memory would be to make the humble cottage of Georgetown radiant in the light with which this pension would adorn it. All the cold marble that a thoughtless world could chisel amid the secluded shades of Monticello would not outlive the record of a nation's generosity and gratitude to his suffering grandchild.

The only objection that can be made to granting a pension to Mrs. Meikleham is that it might form a precedent for others' claims. This objection does lie to the pensioning of the wife of any President, but in this case no argument can be founded for similar grants, unless we have another author of our Declaration of Independence or another of his grandchildren should rise from the grave.

Nor do your committee recommend this pension on the ground that she is merely a descendant of the author of the Declaration of Independence. It is for the only living descendant that now or ever can claim that she was a member of his own immediate family, born in his own house, receiving and returning his caresses, fondled on his knee, and blessed with his dying breath; nay, more, for whom he made the most touching prayer ever breathed by patriot from the brink of the grave to a country in the creation of which he signally aided by contributing with unstinted liberality, time, unexcelled ability, and patriotism.

Five months before his death, this lady, then a thoughtful and beautiful child of 12 years of age, with a wealth of his own sunny hair, was comforting his sad heart when he penned the following appeal, which your committee present to this House as if addressed to every member individually. He saw the ruin of his fortune. He saw the loss of his chosen mountain home; his only living child and her children, whom he loved as his own, left in destitute circumstances. He saw the increasing glory of a country whose Declaration of Independence his pen had written. He saw the swelling number of States carved out of the great Territory of Louisiana, which he had purchased for a mere trifle. He knew that he was the only signer of the Declaration then lingering on earth save John Adams and Charles Carroll, the former so soon to accompany him to another world, and the latter to linger for some years in venerated and sainted age, and he penned that sad epistle in which he thus appeals to us in behalf of this his only living grandchild:

"For myself I should not regard a prostration of fortune, but I am overwhelmed at the prospect of the situation in which I may leave my family. My dear and beloved daughter, the cherished companion of my early life and nurse of my age, and her children [of whom Mrs. Meikleham is the only one alive when this appeal shall be laid before Congress], rendered as dear to me as if my own, from having lived with me, left in a comfortless situation, hold up to me nothing but gloom."

If Thomas Jefferson should rise from the tomb at Monticello and present himself to this House to beg for this favor to his grandchild he could not speak in more direct terms than by that voice from the gloom of his opening grave. Can any member of this Congress read that petition from him who contributed so much to the independence and wealth of the country, and see the gloomy foreboding of his sinking heart verified in the situation of his darling grandchild, the only living member of the family for whom he pleaded, now living in her lonely and cheerless little cottage in Georgetown, hired at $20 a month, the rent of which is paid by the toil of a devoted daughter, and refuse to grant this favor to her, alone surviving of all for whom he pleaded?

It will probably take but little from the Treasury. One of those to whom we voted a pension last Congress of $5,000—though younger than Mrs. Meikleham—has already passed away; but no matter how brief a time she may enjoy the benefit we extend to her, it will be a credit to us to have tendered it. It is believed that the brightest page in the history of this Congress will be that on which this good deed shall be recorded. There are three grounds on which we can grant this pension: First, through gratitude to the author of our Declaration of Independence, who has appealed to us from the brink of the grave that we should not let this grandchild suffer from want in the closing of her honored life; second, as a donation to the only living representative of an illustrious President, at whose death it would have been in accordance with recent custom to grant substantially a year's salary to his surviving representative; and, third, in commemoration of and gratitude for the purchase of Louisiana.

During the last session of the last Congress a bill granting a pension of $5,000 a year to Mrs. Meikleham was introduced into the House and referred to the Committee on Pensions. On the 12th day of February, 1883, the committee reported back the bill with an amendment reducing the amount, but unanimously recommending that, as amended, it do pass. This report was made so near the close of the session that the bill was not reached and no action was taken upon it.

Your committee believe that when we have granted liberal pensions to the living representatives of several of our recent Presidents, who were not in need and for whom these dying Presidents asked no relief, she, the only living representative of one of our most illustrious Presidents (and shall we not say the most illustrious signer as well as the author of the Declaration of Independence), for whose relief he begged with almost his last breath, should not be forgotten, but that she should be permitted to feel a throb of sympathy from the great and generous heart of the American people, whose representatives in Congress assembled will not allow her rapidly declining days to end in gloom. Your committee believe that the American people would not be gratified by any exhibition on our part of parsimony or niggardliness, and that the claim of her friends to put her name among the most favored of America's daughters will meet approbation of a prosperous, generous, and grateful people.

Your committee therefore report back the bill, with an amendment striking out the words "five thousand" and inserting "twenty-five hundred," and adding the words "and that it be made payable quarterly in advance," with the recommendation of the committee that it do pass as amended.

The "views of the minority" of the Committee on Pensions were read, as follows:

The undersigned, a minority of your Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 999) granting a pension to Septimia R. Meikleham, the only surviving grandchild of Thomas Jefferson, being unable to agree with the majority, who report in favor of the passage of the bill with sundry amendments, submit the following as their views and their objections to the passage of the bill:

The grounds upon which the committee report in favor of the passage of the bill are the illustrious services of Thomas Jefferson to the Government and the people, and the age, infirmity, and need of Mrs. Meikleham.

However illustrious were the services rendered by Thomas Jefferson to the Government and the people—and we certainly have no disposition to disparage his services or his greatness—they were purely of a civil character, as contradistinguished from military or naval.

It is not contended that any legal or equitable grounds exist for granting the pension asked for. That the only surviving grandchild of this illustrious American, who rendered such valuable services to this Government and to humanity, is in our midst, aged, feeble, and in want, would naturally appeal strongly to our patriotism and our sympathies. The undersigned are as deeply moved by our sympathies as the majority could possibly be; but what authority have we to vote money out of the public Treasury—the people's money—to objects of charity which may appeal to our sympathies? Certainly no warrant can be found for such action, and we can not consent that it shall be done without entering this our solemn protest.

That under the shadow of this Capitol, with all its wealth and dazzling splendor, this good old lady should be permitted to be in want, is a disgrace to our people and should not exist for a day. But this furnishes no reason, in our opinion, why the Government should grant her a pension. It is not the business of Government to pension all who happen to be in need. It is not the amount of money which would probably be drawn from the Treasury by this bill so much as it is the principle involved and the precedent which it would establish. It is simply and purely a civil pension, without disguise.

We fully recognize the right and duty of the Government to grant military and naval pensions under proper restrictions and in proper cases. This has been done by the Government since its foundation, but we are unalterably opposed to granting civil pensions upon any pretext whatever. We regard it wrong in principle, utterly at variance with all our ideas of republican government, and dangerous and subversive in its tendencies. If persisted in, it will fasten upon us, as pensioners for life, first one class, and then another a little less meritorious, and continue on and on, adding class after class, always quoting precedent, until finally we may witness the legislative department of the Government voting pensions to its own members. From that point to the making of the masses little better than "hewers of wood and drawers of water" for the favored classes who repose in regal splendor, a sign of universal corruption and debauchery and the final overthrow of the Republic, would be, in the light of the history of the other republics of the world, but a few steps indeed.

Let us imagine, if we can, Jefferson, with all his love for pure republican simplicity, and his hatred of all class legislation, favoritism, and monarchical tendencies, a member of this House—ay, of this committee—and a similar question before it; does any one doubt what his course would be? His seal of condemnation would be placed upon the principle involved in such forcible and unmistakable language as we sincerely regret we have not the ability to employ in the condemnation of this measure.

We regret to say that the majority of your committee have been able to cite a few precedents in this country which tend to sustain the principle involved in this bill. Had they gone to England and other monarchical governments, which are overloaded with their rapidly growing civil pension lists, they could have found numerous precedents. Happily for us, only two important precedents appear: one the pensioning of the Federal judiciary, passed in 1869, and the other the act to pension widows of deceased Presidents, passed at the last Congress.

We desire to again emphasize our opposition to the whole vicious system, and to earnestly urge that it be not extended, as this bill seeks to extend it, to the grandchildren of deceased Presidents. The readiness and earnestness with which these precedents are pressed upon us in the report of the majority of your committee should admonish us that, if we but pass this bill, and establish, as it will do, this precedent, it will be seized upon in the near future and made a pretext for extending the same privileges to all the children and grandchildren of deceased Presidents. Then, indeed, will we be aping our foreign prototypes and have a "royal family" provided for to the latest generations at the public expense. Believing thus, we would recommend that the bill and the amendments do lie on the table.

TYRE YORK.

Mr. ROBINSON, of New York. Mr. Chairman, on the 5th day of June, 1882, I introduced "a bill granting a pension of $5,000 a year to the sole surviving grandchild of the author of the Declaration of Independence," and on that bill I made a speech, which was published in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of July 15, 1882, from which I shall take the liberty of making few a extracts upon the present occasion, as they state the case as clearly as I could hope to state it now:

In a humble cottage, rented at $20 a month, in a secluded part of Georgetown, in this District, lives Septimia Randolph Meikleham, widow of Dr. Meikleham, daughter of Martha Jefferson and only surviving grandchild of Thomas Jefferson, with her three children, depending mostly upon the exertions of a delicate and dutiful daughter for their support. She was born at Monticello, beneath her illustrious grandfather's roof, on the 3d day of January, 1814. She was the seventh daughter, and hence called Septimia, and, I believe, the youngest child but one of Governor Thomas Mann Randolph and Martha Jefferson. They had twelve children, five sons and seven daughters, all born in Jefferson's home at Monticello except Mary Jefferson and Benjamin Franklin, who were born at Edge Hill, and James Madison, who was born at the White House, in the city of Washington, when her mother was the mistress of that establishment.

Thomas Jefferson was the prophet and founder of American republicanism, the father of the University of Virginia, the author of the statute of Virginia for religious freedom, and of the Declaration of American Independence. A few minutes past noon on the 4th of July, 1826, just half a century after the adoption of his immortal Declaration, he and his great compeer, John Adams, one the second and the other the third President of the United States, of whose independence they had been among the stoutest champions, winged their flight to another world on the same day, in the term of the sixth President, the son of the second, John Quincy Adams, each supposing that the other survived him, leaving the country whose liberties they so largely contributed to establish trebled in population, with all the signers of her independence dead but one, the first gentleman of the world, Charles Carroll of Carrollton, who for six years longer lived to enjoy the homage of the entire country, and then to pass away and follow them to the starry home of the good and great.

Jefferson had five children. His wife was five years younger than he. They were married on the 1st day of January, 1772; he at 29, she at 24 years of age. Ten years after they married, and four months after the birth of their fifth child, she died. No dying wife ever received such attention or was followed to the grave with such anguish from her husband. Their children were:

Martha Jefferson, born September 27, 1772, at 1 o'clock a. m.; married Thomas Mann Randolph, jr., February 23, 1790; died October 10, 1836.

Jane Randolph Jefferson, born April 3, 1774, at 11 o'clock a. m.; died in September, 1775.

A son (nameless), born May 28, 1777, at 10 o'clock a. m.; died June 14, the same year, at 10 o'clock p. m.

Mary Jefferson, born August 1, 1788, at half past 1 o'clock a. m.; married John Wayles Eppes, October 13, 1797; died April 17, 1804, between 8 and 9 o'clock a. m.

A daughter (nameless), born in Richmond, November 3, 1780, at a quarter before 11 o'clock p. m.; died April 15, 1781, at 10 o'clock a. m.

Lucy Elizabeth, born May 8, 1782, at 1 o'clock a. m.; died 1784.

Martha's husband, who was afterward member of Congress and governor of the State, died in 1828; Mary's husband in 1825 (Lanman says 1823). Mr. Eppes was a distinguished Representative and Senator in Congress. Their son Francis was their only child living at Jefferson's death, but is long since dead. His descendants now reside in Florida.

Martha had twelve children, whom I shall here name in the order, I believe, of their birth: Ann Cary Randolph married Charles Bankhead, of Virginia, and died the same year with her grandfather; Thomas Jefferson Randolph died in 1875; Eleonora Wayles Randolph died in 1795; Eleonora Wayles Randolph (second) married Joseph Coolidge, of Boston, and died in 1876; Cornelia Jefferson Randolph died in 1871; Mary Jefferson Randolph died in 1876; Virginia Jefferson Randolph married Nicholas P. Trist, and died in Washington during the year 1882; James Madison Randolph died in 1834; Benjamin Franklin Randolph died in 1871; Merriwether Lewis Randolph died in 1839; Septimia Randolph married Dr. David Scott Meikleham, of Glasgow, Scotland, now deceased; and George Wythe Randolph died in 1867.

Jefferson's daughter Martha, Mrs. Meikleham's mother, and her children received the particular care and love of her father. When she was only 11 years of age, a year younger than Mrs. Meikleham was at Jefferson's death, and one year after the death of her mother, he left her at school in Philadelphia with Mrs. Hopkinson while he journeyed to Annapolis. November 28, 1783, he wrote her a letter, informing her that he had arrived at Annapolis safely "after four days' journey." He tells her to improve her opportunity for education, as that would console him for having to part with her and would prevent the diminution of his love; it could not be increased. He asks her to consider her teacher as her mother, with whose loss Heaven had been pleased to afflict her; that should she do anything to incur her teacher's disapprobation she should think no concession too much to regain her good-will. He suggested the distribution of her time:

"From 8 to 10, practice music.
"From 10 to 1, dance one day and draw another.
"From 1 to 2, draw on the day you dance and write a letter next day.
"From 3 to 4, read French.
"From 4 to 5, exercise yourself in music.
"From 5 till bed-time, read English, write," &c.

He wanted her to write to him by every post, and to tell him what books she read, what tunes she learned, and to inclose to him her best copy of every lesson in drawing; to take care and never spell a word wrong. It is great praise for a lady to spell well. He had placed his happiness on seeing her good and accomplished; and no distress which this world could now bring would equal her disappointment of his hopes. A fortnight after, he wrote her a letter warning her to disregard rumors then prevalent about the end of the world. The Almighty never had told anybody when He would end it. The best way to be prepared for the end of the world or for death, which was a more certain event, was never to do or say a bad thing. Ten days later he wrote her on the subject of dress. He wanted her to have fine but not gay dresses. She should see that her clothes were clean, whole, and properly put on. She should, from the moment she rose till she went to bed, appear as cleanly and as properly dressed as at dinner or tea, so that she could at any time be seen by any gentleman without a pin being amiss.

On the 5th of July, 1784, Mr. Jefferson sailed on a diplomatic mission to Europe from Boston for Cowes, in England, taking with him his beloved Martha, leaving his two younger daughters, Mary and Lucy, 6 and 2 years of age, behind him, never more to see the latter, as she died during the year. They made the voyage in three weeks. Martha was then 12 years of age, and was placed at a convent school in Paris, L'Abbaye Royale de Panthémont, the most fashionable and select seminary in France. To this school many letters from him were directed to her. In one of them he says:

"The more you learn the more I love you; and I rest the happiness of my life on seeing you beloved by all the world, which you will be sure to be if to a good heart you join those accomplishments so peculiarly pleasing in your sex. Adieu, my dear child. Lose no moment of improving your head nor any opportunity of exercising your heart in benevolence."

In another letter, when she was 15, he lectures her on the evils of idleness. In another he tells her that her sister "Polly" (Mary), then 9 years old, was coming, and that she must act the mother to her younger sister, then his only other surviving child.

"Teach her above all things to be good, because without that we can neither be valued by others nor set any value on ourselves; teach her to be always true; no vice is so mean as the want of truth and at the same time so valueless; teach her never to be angry; anger only serves to torment ourselves, to divert others and alienate their esteem; and teach her industry and application to useful pursuits."

It was no wonder that Martha (his Patsy) grew up to be, as one of her eulogists described her—

"The most dutiful of daughters, the most attentive of learners, possessing a solid understanding, a judgment ripe beyond her years, a most gentle and genial temper, and an unassuming modesty of demeanor which neither the distinction of her position nor the flatteries that afterward surrounded her ever wore off in the least degree; she was the idol of her father and family, and the delight of all who knew her."

These beautiful accomplishments of womanhood I may here say without fear of contradiction she transmitted in their full value to her now only surviving child, Mrs. Meikleham. Martha had now grown up to be a lady of 17; she had imbibed a strong love for the school in which she was secluded and for the holy sisterhood of Panthémont. She wrote to her father in April, 1789, for his permission to remain in the convent and to dedicate herself to the duties of a religious life. To this letter she received no answer, but in a day or two afterward his carriage came to the door. He met his daughter with the kindest smile and warmest love. He had a private interview with the abbess, and a few minutes afterward the carriage with Mr. Jefferson and his two daughters drove away from the quiet seclusion of a home in which she had grown to young womanhood adorned with every virtue and accomplishment.

Neither Martha nor her father, then or ever afterward, referred to the subject, but in after years, when he was gone, she spoke of it to her children with approbation of her father's course. It should be observed that for several months before this request of his daughter he contemplated taking them from the convent to return to the United States. Indeed, in a letter to Mr. Francis Eppes, sr., he had fixed the date of his intended departure for the United States about the very day on which he took his children from the convent. He left Paris on the 26th of Setember, 1789, and on the 23d of October left England with his two daughters, and in due time arrived with them at Monticello, where they had a princely reception from his numerous servants, who took the horses from the carriage and drew their master and his daughters to their welcome mountain home.

While they were yet at sea Washington had written to Jefferson tendering him the appointment of Secretary of State.

On the 23d of February, 1790, three or four months after her return to the United States, Martha was married to Thomas Mann Randolph, jr., eldest son of Col. Thomas Mann Randolph, of Tuckahoe, Virginia. It is worth noting that both Jefferson's daughters married their cousins, and that the husbands of both, while young men at college, and before contemplating such pleasant relationship, had written to Mr. Jefferson, at Paris, for advice as to their course of life. Young Randolph was a student at the University of Edinburgh, and visited Paris in 1780. I have already given a description of the mother of Mrs. Meikleham; a portrait of her father by the same hand will not be out of order:

"He was tall, lean, with dark, expressive features, and a flashing eye, commanding in carriage, elastic as steel, and had that sudden sinewy strength which it would not be difficult to fancy he inherited from the forest monarchs of Virginia. (He was descended by several different strains of blood from Pocahontas). He was brilliant, versatile, eloquent in conversation when he chose to be, impetuous and imperious in temper, chivalric in generosity, a knight-errant in courage, in calm moments a just and at all times a high-toned man. His education was a finished one; his reading was extensive and varied; his fortune was ample in prospect, and would have been immense but for the change effected in the Virginia statutes of descent by the efforts of his father-in-law."

In a week after the marriage Mr. Jefferson set out for New York to take his place in President Washington's Cabinet, and rented a house at No. 57 Maiden Lane.

On the 9th of February, 1791, he writes to her and says: "Your last two letters are those which have given me the greatest pleasure of any I ever received from you. The one announced that you had become a notable housewife; the other, a mother. This last is undoubtedly the keystone of the arch of matrimonial happiness. Accept my sincere congratulations for yourself and Mr. Randolph." Henceforth his letters contained frequent mention of his grandchild and requests that his daughter "kiss the little Anne for me." In one of his later letters (January 15, 1792) he expresses his desire to be at home with them, "and dear little Anne, with whom even Socrates might ride on a stick without being ridiculous." At a still later date, May 17, 1798, he anticipated much pleasure in carrying home to her children from Philadelphia to Monticello "the game of the goose."

One extract more from his letters to this beloved daughter is all I shall notice. It is dated at Monticello, March 27, 1797. He had reached home from the Vice-President's chair and found both his daughters absent on an estate of Colonel Randolph:

"I value the enjoyments of this life only in proportion as you participate them with me. All other attachments are weakening, and I approach the state of mind when nothing will hold me here but my love for yourself and sister and the tender connections you have added to me (his grandchildren). I hope you will write to me, as nothing is so pleasing during your absence as these proofs of your love. Be assured, my dear daughter, that you possess mine in its utmost limits. Kiss the dear little ones for me; I wish we had one of them here."

And thus through many letters during his Vice-Presidency he expressed his longing to get away from the turmoil of politics to his quiet home, to enjoy the society of his two daughters, their husbands, and children. Mary he loved. She was like his departed wife, whose death so much affected him; but Martha was a Jefferson, and was like her father, as his only living grandchild is. Few women could have secured such a compliment as John Randolph paid her. When, notwithstanding his quarrel with her husband and father, her health was proposed at a table of gentlemen among whom he was a guest, he rose with glass in hand and said, "I drink, gentlemen, to her—to the sweetest woman in Virginia." During her brief presidency of the White House in her father's Presidency of the nation she had one child added to the seven then born, all but one at Monticello.

Two days before her father's death he handed her a little casket, in which, on opening it after his death, she found some papers written by him, in one of which he says: "The last pang of life is in parting with you;" but he would bear her love to her mother and sister, "two seraphs long shrouded in death." On another paper were written the following lines from Thomas Moore:

"It is not the tear at this moment shed,
When the cold turf has just been laid o'er him,
That can tell how beloved was the friend that's fled,
Or how deep in our hearts we deplore him.
'Tis the tear through many a long day wept,
'Tis life's whole path o'ershaded;
'Tis the one remembrance, fondly kept,
When all lighter griefs have faded.

"Thus his memory, like some holy light,
Kept alive in our hearts will improve them,
For worth shall look fairer, and truth more bright,
When we think how he lived but to love them.
And as fresher flowers the sod perfume,
Where buried saints are lying,
So our hearts shall borrow a sweetening bloom
From the image he left there in dying."

Jefferson was fond of Moore's poetry, notwithstanding the ridicule which the poet had heaped upon him in writing from Washington during Jefferson's Presidency. It is said that Mrs. Meikleham's mother shared with the President deep resentment at Moore's attack upon him, but upon the publication of his Irish Melodies, about the time of Mrs. Meikleham's birth, she showed him a copy. "Why," said Jefferson, "this is the little man that satirized me;" and on reading some of the melodies he exclaimed: "Why, he is a poet, after all!" From that till his death Moore's works were favorites at Monticello. Moore, in visiting this country, came across the ocean with a pompous British minister and his more pompous wife, Mr. and Mrs. Merry. The Federal party and the Republican party had been and were then in bitter hostility. The British minister sympathized with the Federalists. Moore fell in with the same set and lampooned the Republican party,

Which courts the rabble's smile, the rabble's nod,
And makes, like Egypt, every beast its god.

Jefferson had very decided republican ways with him, and he failed to make much demonstration on the reception of Mr. Merry and Mr. Moore, and the latter, in a letter to his mother, dated June 13, 1804, says:

"I stopped at Washington with Mr. and Mrs. Merry for near a week. They have been treated with the most pointed incivility by the present democratic President, Mr. Jefferson, and it is only the precarious situation of Great Britain which could possibly induce it to overlook such indecent, though at the same time petty, hostility."

It seems that Mr. and Mrs. Merry were invited to dine at the White House, and when dinner was announced the President gave his arm to Mrs. Madison, the elegant wife of his Secretary of State, when Mrs. Merry thought it should have been offered to her, and they were going to have war over the insult.

I have dwelt upon the love of Thomas Jefferson for his eldest daughter and her children to emphasize the confidence with which I appeal to this Congress for relief to the only living member of his family, now in our midst. She has made no appeal for assistance. An educated, high-minded representative of the Jeffersons and Randolphs of Virginia ought not to be allowed to wait till she appeals. Neither by her nor by any friend of hers, either directly or indirectly, was any suggestion made to me to introduce this bill. I happened to learn, through the great-granddaughters of President Monroe, who live in the same street where I reside in this city, that the granddaughter of the author of the Declaration was living in Georgetown, and without her knowledge, of my own sense of justice, propriety, and patriotism, I introduced this bill.

I have a pride in this Congress, and believe that on no page of its record will so proud a monument be perpetuated to its credit as that on which will be registered the passage of this bill. I have known personally every President of the United States since Monroe save only Jackson, and highly as I esteem the privilege of having known as friends all our Presidents since then, including John Quincy Adams, who has frequently walked these streets leaning on my arm, I would count it higher honor to contribute to the comfort and independence by my single vote here, which is all that I can give, to save the only living descendant of Jefferson, who was born in his house and was the loved object of his affection, from poverty and want. I summon from his grave to plead for her the author of the Declaration, and the man who secured to us the undisputed possession of the Mississippi Valley and its exit to the sea.

Jefferson looked up from the depths of the gloom that was settling around him. He had justly hoped that his country would come to his rescue and clear away the cloud that was settling on his home and all that he loved dear. Or if too late to come to his rescue and save Monticello, they would not let his grandchildren beg bread or toil in old age through a country whose independence was the child of his own brain. Five months before his death he wrote to Mrs. Meikleham's brother this mournful message:

"For myself I should not regard a prostration of fortune, but I am overwhelmed at the prospect of the situation in which I may leave my family. My dear and beloved daughter [Mrs. Meikleham's mother], the cherished companion of my early life and nurse of my age, and her children, rendered as dear to me as if my own from having lived with me, left in a comfortless situation, hold up to me nothing but gloom."

Of all that family none remains but one, and the voice which I summon from the grave pleads now for her in tones which I think this Congress can not refuse to hear. When he wrote that gloomy message now addressed to you, my fellow-members, Mrs. Meikleham was beside him trying to lessen his grief by words of womanly sympathy from girlish lips that pressed their warm kisses on lips that first pronounced our independence, then growing cold in the gloom of approaching death.

She was then 12 years of age. She was the pet and solace of his later years. She was as like him as a beautiful girl could be to one of the rougher sex. His head of gold had turned to silver and her wealth of sunny hair recalled the glory of his own in his earlier manhood, and the hand that penned the noblest instrument ever written by man loved to play among its tresses. She sat upon his knee; she climbed upon his chair to play with his whitening locks, and brought many a smile to chase away the gloom and many a solace to succor his sinking heart. Is there any Representative here who can read the message which I have just quoted from the brink of his grave and see his foreboding of the distress of the only living member of the family for whom he pleaded verified in yonder lonely cottage, whose humble roof is kept above her only by the toil of a devoted daughter? Who will hesitate to vote for this relief, too long delayed, but still in time to save our honor if we act promptly and generously? It will take but little from the Treasury, for her life in the common course of things can not be long.

You have within the last month or two given, by a nearly unanimous vote by both Houses, $10,000 to raise a monument to Jefferson's memory in the deserted ruins of Monticello. Think you that this pension which I ask of you for his grandchild who is living in our midst, and who deserves to have each member of Congress and the Cabinet and the President call upon her at least once a year while she lives—think you that this pension will not prove a more acceptable monument to his memory than shafts of marble or decorations over his grave? Think you if Thomas Jefferson's spirit can bend from the celestial abode of departed patriots and note what is occurring in this Capitol of his country that he would not a thousand times prefer to see that humble Georgetown cottage where dwells the only relative now living whom he ever saw on earth gilded by your munificence than all the marble you could pile upon his ashes at Monticello? You have during the present session given the same amount I ask for her to Mrs. Tyler, Mrs. Polk, Mrs. Lincoln, and Mrs. Garfield; none of them so well deserving as she deserves. Nor is there any danger of setting a precedent for other similar grants. We shall never have another living member to care for of that family circle which gathered around the dying couch of the author of the Declaration of Independence.

This sole surviving grandchild of our illustrious statesman and patriot, born in his house, fondled on his knee, carried in his arms, kissed by his lips, is now living in this District in straitened circumstances, a widow, with her delicate family, in a humble dwelling within sight of the White House, where her mother once shone as the first of American women; within the shadow of this Capitol which but for him would probably never have reared its majestic Dome above its assembled statesmen; within sight of that majestic column slowly mounting heavenward to perpetuate the fame of him who vindicated by his sword what his great compatriot had created by his pen. And shall she be permitted to feel no throb of patriotic pride pulsing around her humble home from the great heart of the American people represented in these Halls of Congress? Senators and Representatives, I call upon you to see that this grandchild shall not suffer for anything you can give her for the brief time that she may live to keep alive the memory of the heroic age of this Republic.

Representatives of the great West, living in the almost boundless empire drained by the Mississippi and its tributaries, secured by him for the mere trifle with which he made by the purchase of Louisiana free exit of this empire's commerce to the sea, will you see this only living heir of your benefactor who ever looked into the wealth of love which slept within his tearful eyes as he wrote that paragraph about her for whom I plead to-day—will you see her suffer for want of the pittance for which I pray?

I have called him from his grave to plead for his favorite granddaughter, the solace of his age. I summon from the speaking canvas of Trumbull, from whose lips I have heard the history of every majestic figure in his immortal painting; I summon the four patriots, Sherman, Franklin, Adams, and Livingston, the committee that stand around him as he reads the immortal document; I summon Hancock from his chair and Charles Thompson from his desk; I invoke the representatives of a nation, listening to his words while he "proclaims the story of its birth;" I summon the members sitting around him in their grand simplicity to come from the silent sitting of the Continental Congress in the Rotunda into this Hall, to our Congress, their successors, to urge the cause of the only living grandchild of the majestic figure in their midst. I summon a jury of thirteen from the embryo States, one from each Colony represented in Independence Hall—Thornton of New Hampshire, Hancock of Massachusetts, Ellery of Rhode Island, Sherman of Connecticut, Livingston of New York, Witherspoon of New Jersey, Franklin of Pennsylvania, McKean of Delaware, Carroll of Maryland, Lee of Virginia, Penn of North Carolina, Rutledge of South Carolina, and Walton of Georgia—to find a verdict for this grandchild of the Republic. I call upon old Virginia, the mother of Presidents and his mother; on young Ohio, Virginia's child and his daughter. I call upon every State and Territory whose mountain passes and hillsides and plains contribute their varying rills and rivers to the volume of the Mississippi which bears their commerce to the sea through territory secured by him to this Republic for a mere nominal sum; I summon every Representative here from every district in the Union, from the Saint Lawrence to the Rio Grande and from the Atlantic to the Pacific, to ratify their verdict by a unanimous vote in favor of this bill.

Soon after the publication of that speech I received numerous letters from eminent citizens of our Republic thanking me for bringing the attention of the people to their long-neglected duty; many of them from distinguished ladies and gentlemen, proposing public subscription if the nation should longer neglect its duty; some of them worthy of publication in this connection. I can make room for only one. It is from my distinguished colleague, Mr. POTTER, of New York, whose generous heart is even larger than his immense fortune, and written immediately after reading a recent letter of mine favoring this pension.

NEW YORK, January 4, 1884.

HON. WILLIAM E. ROBINSON: I thank you, as thousands more will, for your appeal in behalf of the granddaughter of Thomas Jefferson. It is impossible to believe that in sight of the national Capitol the sole surviving grandchild of the author of the Declaration of Independence shall be left to languish in want by the Government whose powers he, more than any other man, compacted and endowed with immortal strength, to make sure forever to his countrymen self-government and commend it through them to mankind.

I send you my check of $250, which please use toward the end you seek. If the country shall refuse your request, call upon me for whatever you may need to this end, and while I have means a grandchild of Thomas Jefferson shall not want.

Most obediently and truly, yours,

O. B. POTTER.

That check I had the pleasure to present to her as she was celebrating her seventy-first birthday, and it has relieved her from want till the people's representatives can come to her more abundant relief.

I am sorry, sir, that we have a minority report on this bill, as I think its authors will yet be that they ever offered it. I wish I could get my friends who have presented it even now to withdraw it; but as it is here I must reluctantly pay my respects to it. It is signed by four of the eleven members of the Committee on Pensions, the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. STOCKSLAGER], the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. HEWITT], the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. TILLMAN], and the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. YORK].

Their first objection to this bill is that the services of Thomas Jefferson, however illustrious, "were purely of a civil character, as contradistinguished from military or naval." The lesson here taught us is that the Republic must not recognize the pen and brain, but that the sword and bayonet must be allowed to monopolize its honors. I dissent from this doctrine. I do not believe that republics should degrade the pen and glorify the sword. They are twin agencies in a country's independence. However brilliant Washington's sword was on all our battlefields, the pen of Jefferson designated the cause for its flaming splendor, and both instruments are equally honored by all who are worthy of the liberties which they jointly achieved. The crowning glory of the nineteenth century should be in its statesmanship as well as in its heroism.

But as a second objection the minority informs us that while they are moved to the bottom of their generous hearts at the illustrious services of Thomas Jefferson and at the moving appeal of his beloved child, they challenge us to show by what authority we could vote money out of the public Treasury, the people's money, for the uses contemplated in this bill, and they gravely inform us that they can not consent that it shall be done without entering their solemn protest against it. They fully recognize the right and duty of our Government to grant military and naval pensions, but they proclaim themselves as "unalterably opposed to granting civil pensions upon any pretense whatever."

Now, without consenting to this second attempt to glorify the sword, let us turn to the record of the last Congress and see how consistently and potently they protested against and opposed the granting of civil pensions. Here is a volume containing the public and private statutes of the first session of the Forty-seventh Congress, of which all the gentlemen joining in this minority report were members, excepting alone the gentleman from North Carolina. I find the first public statute enacted by that Congress reads as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That all mail matter carried by post to Lucretia R. Garfield, widow of the late James A. Garfield, or sent by her, under her written autograph signature, be conveyed free of postage during her natural life.

It will be seen that by this bill Mrs. Garfield is entitled to receive and send under her frank all mail matter for her natural life. Now, mail matter includes letters, newspapers, books, cards, engravings, models, ores, metals, minerals, paintings, merchandise, and almost everything in the world, if not dangerous to other mail matter or above a certain weight; and under that bill she might tax the country with thousands of dollars yearly. Neither the President nor any member of Congress has the right which she enjoys, and this was a purely civil gift or pension, not naval nor military, and these minority gentlemen were present when it was introduced into this House on the 19th of December, 1881, by the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. MCKINLEY], for it was bill day, and they are all reported as introducing bills; and yet not one word of protest nor a single objection, which would have been sufficient to prevent its passage. It was passed by unanimous consent.

Mr. HEWITT, of Alabama. The gentleman will allow me to say——

Mr. ROBINSON, of New York. The gentleman will pardon me. I want to get through in order to give a chance to others who are to follow me. With all due respect, I say firmly that I will not yield to anybody. I would gladly hear and answer the gentleman from Alabama at any other time, but now I want to get through.

Now, I consider this bill giving such a sweeping franking privilege to Mrs. Garfield much more objectionable than this bill to pension Jefferson's granddaughter. But the minority may reply, in defense of their apparent inconsistency, that this was not a pension, but only the franking privilege. Well, if you show me in the Constitution where we have the right to grant the one, I will easily show you the right to grant the other. But I next call attention to a purely civil pension. I turn to the first page of the private statutes in this volume of the laws of the Forty-seventh Congress, and the first act reads as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he hereby is, directed to pay to Mary Lincoln, whose name is now on the roll as the widow of Abraham Lincoln, deceased, late President of the United States, the sum of $15,000 forthwith, as pension money, in addition to any sum that may have accrued on her existing pension under the act of July 14, 1870; and from and after the passage of this act the Secretary of the Interior is directed to pay to the said Mary Lincoln, in lieu of the pension she is now receiving under the act aforesaid, a pension at the rate of $5,000 per annum during the remainder of her natural life.

Mrs. Lincoln had been receiving a pension—a purely civil pension—of $3,000 a year from July 14, 1870, and this bill increased it to five thousand a year and gives her a gratuity of $15,000.

It had passed the Senate unanimously and came before this House on the 26th of January, 1882. It was called up by the distinguished gentleman from Illinois [Mr. SPRINGER], who asked unanimous consent for its immediate consideration. All these minority gentlemen were present, as I find that they are all recorded as taking part in the proceedings of that day. Now here was a bill much more liable to all the objections made by the minority to the present bill; one single objection would have prevented its passage. All were called for their objections and not a single dissenting voice! And when the gentleman from Illinois challenged the House that if any further explanation was wanted he was ready to give it, the RECORD informs us that there were cries of "Oh! no, it is not necessary;" and so this purely civil pension of $2,000 a year, received by this lady for twelve years previously, was increased to five thousand a year with a gratuity of $15,000, and all these gentlemen who are making such a noise now were present and not a whisper nor a whimper of objection. How can they strain at this gnat when they swallowed that camel?

Well, sir, I turn again to the statutes of the first session of the Forty-seventh Congress, and at page 6 of the private statutes I find the following act:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, directed to place the names of Lucretia R. Garfield, widow of James A. Garfield, deceased; Sarah Childress Polk, widow of James K. Polk, deceased, and Julia

Gardner Tyler, widow of John Tyler, deceased, on the pension-roll, and pay to each of them a pension during their respective natural lives at the rate of $5,000 a year from and after the 19th day of September, 1881.

SEC. 2. That the pension of $5,000 granted by this act to Julia Gardner Tyler shall be in lieu of the pension heretofore granted her by Congress.

This bill was introduced into the House on the 16th day of February, 1882, by a gentleman who, if he were not immediately in front of me, I would call the most illustrious member of this House. I mean my distinguished colleague now in the chair [Mr. COX, of New York]. [Applause on both sides.] It proposed to give a pension of $5,000 a year to Mrs. Garfield alone from and after the passage of the act. This was purely a civil pension and open to all the objections made by the minority to the present bill. The Speaker asked if there were any objections, but none were made, and the bill passed unanimously. There sat these three gentlemen who sign this minority report and not a whisper of objection. Where was their "solemn protest" then?

The bill then went to the Senate, where it was immediately passed by a unanimous vote, adding, however, as an amendment, the names of Mrs. Polk and Mrs. Tyler. Mrs. Tyler had been for some time receiving a pension of six hundred a year, and by this amendment it was increased to five thousand, and Mrs. Polk, who had not asked and did not need it, had a purely civil pension of $5,000 a year given to her. The Senate also amended the bill so that these large pensions should date back over six months, giving each of these ladies a gratuity of $2,500.

Thus this objectionable purely civil pension bill, rendered still more objectionable by the Senate additions, came back to the House, and Mr. House, of Tennessee, on the 29th day of March, 1882, moved to take it up out of its order and pass it. This required unanimous consent. Here was a chance for indignant protest, and here sat these three gentlemen who now protest when the name of Jefferson is mentioned, and not a syllable of protest or a symptom of objection, and it passed unanimously. It was ten times more objectionable than the present bill, doubly liable to all the objections urged in this minority report. It was twice before the House, the last time much more liable to objection than at first, and these protesting gentlemen were present, and it met unanimous approval, every member, Democrat and Republican, voting unanimously for it, and not a snarl nor a growl nor a bark from any watch-dog of the Treasury. It seems as if all were allowed to help themselves till the needy and worthy representative of Thomas Jefferson appeared.

But, sir, I turn again to this instructive volume of the statutes of the Forty-seventh Congress, and at page 77 of the private statutes I find an act which reads as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to pay, out of any money not otherwise appropriated, to Mrs. Lucretia R. Garfield, widow of James A. Garfield, late President of the United States, or, in event of her death before payment, then to the legal representatives of the said James A. Garfield, the sum of $50,000, less any sum paid to said James A. Garfield or to his widow or representatives on account of his salary as President of the United States.

This bill was introduced by Mr. TAYLOR, of Ohio, on the 14th day of July, 1882, immediately after a long discussion on the payment of the medical attendance on the dead President. It had to be introduced and go through its first, second, and third readings, its engrossment and passage by unanimous consent, and not a single objection was raised. It then went to the Senate, where, on the 22d day of July, 1882, it passed unanimously, without amendment, on motion of Mr. ALLISON.

Now, Mr. Chairman, am I not at liberty to ask these three signers of this minority report for some explanation of their action? There were five applicants at the doors of your Treasury during the last Congress for whom aid in the way of pensions and gratuity was asked. First of all in every sense, the beloved and widowed child of Thomas Jefferson, the sole surviving member of the household of the author of the Declaration of Independence, suffering uncomplainingly at your door, in straitened circumstances, whose pensioning can not possibly create any precedent unless we have another Declaration of Independence and another granddaughter of its author one hundred and eight years after its declaration. Second, the widow of John Tyler, the tenth President, who had been for some time receiving a pension and was not in want, but a brilliant light at receptions in Washington society. Third, the widow of James K. Polk, eleventh President, comparatively wealthy and in comfortable circumstances, not asking or even thinking of a pension. Fourth, the widow of Abraham Lincoln, sixteenth President, suffering from sickness but not in need, and who for twelve years then past had been drawing a princely civil pension of $250 a month, and whose son was then and is now Secretary of War. And fifth and last, the widow of James A. Garfield, twentieth President, who was wealthy, almost a millionaire, and in no need of a pension.

Now you say in this minority report that you can not stand by and see the people's money voted for civil pensions without entering your solemn protest. You were all three members of the Forty-seventh Congress. You were present and saw the door of the Treasury opened while Mrs. Garfield helped herself to a gratuity of $50,000, less what her husband had already drawn, while she was helped to the franking privilege of thousands of dollars of taxes on the American people, and finally to a princely civil pension of $5,000 a year for her natural life of likely forty years, or upward of $200,000, with an additional gratuity of $2,500, and your solemn protest was silent acquiescence! You stood at the door of your open Treasury and saw Mrs. Lincoln helped to $5,000 a year of a civil pension after she had received $15,000 dollars as a gratuity and an additional gratuity of $2,500, added to the $36,000 of a purely civil pension which she had already received, and your solemn protest was unheard. You stood at the "gates ajar" of the United States Treasury while Mrs. Polk was helped to $5,000 a year for her life, with a gratuity of $2,500, and you stood as mute as lambs in place of watch-dogs of the Treasury. "And Tyler, too," you saw his widow, moving in fashionable circles at brilliant receptions in this gay city, helped out of the "people's money" to $5,000 a year for her life, with a gratuity of $2,500, without a word of objection or solemn protest. And all these sums voted to widows of Presidents knowing that we should have other Presidents leaving widows, and therefore making unmistakable precedents for a long succession of similar purely civil pensions.

But when the name of Jefferson, not as President, but as the author of our Declaration of Independence, is called, and his venerable, widowed, and beloved child appears to ask but a comparatively trifling sum compared with what these other worthy ladies have received, you rudely slam the door in her face. Pay and pensions and presents by the tens and hundreds of thousands of dollars to all the living representatives of our dead Presidents, but to the venerable representative of the illustrious author of our national charter alone you deny the homage of grateful hearts and a generous people, and yet all three of you claim to be Democrats. Oh, sir, with what bitter irony I could here retort on the minority talking of "royal families." All the royal families were allowed freely to help themselves. It is only when the poor and needy but still noble and worthy representative of the democratic republican author of our independence appears that conscience is quickened into solemn protest and the command promulgated that the doors of the overflowing Treasury are to be closed. Why do you strain at this gnat when you have swallowed so many camels? Shade of Jefferson, what have you done, to what democratic republican idea have you been unfaithful, that you should be considered less worthy of a nation's grateful remembrance than Garfield and Lincoln, Polk and Tyler?

I might refer to other pensions granted. Mrs. Admiral Farragut has, I think, a pension of two thousand a year; the widow of Lieutenant Black, twelve hundred; Mrs. Fletcher Webster, twelve hundred, Mrs. General James Shields, twelve hundred; President Taylor's daughter, six hundred; Mrs. Meacham, six hundred; Mrs. General Anderson, fifteen thousand cash and a pension of six hundred a year; Mrs. Rawlins, ten or fifteen thousand cash and a pension of six hundred; the Supreme Court judges and other Federal judges, from five to ten thousand a year, and hundreds of military and naval officers retired on pensions of five to ten thousand a year. It was but last Friday that you passed in this House unanimously, I believe, a pension to the widow of General Judson Kilpatrick of $360 a year. Some of these were purely civil pensions and none of them granted or grantable under our pension laws, liberal as they are.

I stand here to plead for equal honor to the most illustrious claimant at the door of the Treasury. I demand that it shall remain open till she receives her share or till the others return what they have received. I demand room for Jefferson in the vestibule of American sympathy, in the bounding impulse of national gratitude. I demand in the name of the American people equal, if not superior, consideration for the only living widow of his Monticello household. She alone remains hitherto unrecognized before your Treasury, not seeking for herself in her uncomplaining poverty; but I, as a humble member of this House and of the majority of its committee, demand for her equal recognition with other favored daughters of the Republic. She is the grandest link that connects the infancy of our Republic with its maturity. She is, above all others, the first living lady of America, the most distinguished of earth's living daughters. I stand here to plead her cause and defend her claim against all comers. Around her venerable form I draw the sympathetic circle of American womanhood! Put but a hostile foot or cast but an unkindly glance within that sacred circle, and on your heads I launch the awful curse of an indignant people!

Mr. Chairman, if I could have my way this nation should do itself the honor of acting much more liberally with this lady than we are likely to do. A paltry pension of twenty-five hundred or five thousand a year would be but a small portion of the gift I would give her. Never before and never again on earth can such coincidences exist. That a nation of 60,000,000 of freemen, grown so great that it far excels any nation in the history of all time, should be so blessed by the Almighty maker of heaven and earth as to be allowed to contribute to the living heir and representative of the family circle of him whose pen created its nationality was never before and never will again be known. I should have this nation buy back Monticello at any cost. I would repair its ruins, restore its library, decorate its walls, and supply it with every necessity and comfort of life, with her grandfather's horses and carriages, with help to wait upon her and anticipate her every want and wish. I would make it obligatory on the President and his Cabinet, with every Senator and Representative, to call upon her on the Fourth of July every year to lay the congratulations of the nation at her feet, and I would give her a blank check upon the Treasury to draw all the money necessary to sustain the dignity of the nation's daughter.

Mr. Chairman, I represent upon the floor of this House a peculiarly patriotic population. I think death on the battlefields of the recent war made more widows in my district than in any district of the country. The patriotic people of Brooklyn poured their wealth from the purses of her merchants, and their blood from the hearts of her workingmen who left their daily toil in their workshops to die upon the bloodiest battlefields of history. It has been and is now my daily duty to plead for pensions to the widows and orphans of hundreds of heroes who died for the salvation of their country. Many of them are poor and needy and hungry and homeless, weary, waiting for the pittance which their country owes them for the premature death of their hero husbands and fathers. And yet I do not believe there is one widow or orphan for whom I am daily seeking relief who would not gladly give precedence to the widowed grandchild of Thomas Jefferson. Can I not pledge for all the members of this House and their generous constituents similar deference to this distinguished lady; for the hearts of the American people and of their chosen representatives are above all other peoples noble and generous and grateful.

Provoking as it is to be compelled to answer the objections of this minority report, there is a gleam of truth in it—one sentence worthy to be quoted with approbation. It is the opening sentence of the fourth paragraph and in these words:

That under the shadow of this Capitol, with all its wealth and dazzling splendor, this good old lady should be permitted to be in want is a disgrace to our people and should not exist for a day.

Bravely spoken! That is the sentiment of the American people, "a disgrace to our people." Will you suffer it to exist for a day longer? "A disgrace to our people." Who shall make atonement for a people but the people's representatives? You can not blot it out by looking to private redress. "A disgrace to our people" is the concern of a nation. I thank the minority for that sentence. It is the condensed summing up in favor of this bill. It is the people's cry to save them from further disgrace by prompt and liberal action. On that one sentence alone I would risk and rest this whole question. The people feel that it is a national disgrace which they want to see instantly wiped out, and they will hold those who delay or oppose its atonement for a day or for an hour as guilty of fastening disgrace upon them.

But the minority appeals to Jefferson himself in these words:

Let us imagine, if we can, Jefferson, with all his love for pure republican simplicity and his hatred of all class legislation, favoritism, and monarchical tendencies, a member of this House—ay, of this committee, and a similar question before it.

Well, I suppose this minority wants to know what would be his advice, and I think I can tell.

Mr. Chairman, order the page in the room behind you to connect the House telephone with Monticello and call Thomas Jefferson. I shall hear and repeat his words. The aged patriot comes forth leaning on his staff and his gray hair flutters in the beam. The sun appears in the west after the steps of his brightness have moved behind a storm. He speaks to the minority:

"You have called me from my grave to ask me if I were a member of this House what I would do with this application for relief to my darling and long-suffering child. My soul is full of other times. I stand in the cloud of years; few are its openings toward the past, and when the vision comes it is but dim and dark. Fifty-eight years ago the eighth day of February this darling child sat upon my knee in my Monticello home, which I had fondly hoped to leave unencumbered to my family, but which I saw was passing away from me in my financial difficulties. She noticed the dark cloud of sorrow that settled on my forehead from which her soft and loving hand was chasing its shadow and fondling with the gray hairs that carelessly fell upon its gloom. I had tried to sell my property by lottery to save something out of the wreck of my fortune for her and my other grandchildren, but even that hope was disappointed and its shadow sat sullenly upon my face. She inquired the cause of my sadness. I asked her to bring me pen and ink and I would state the cause of my grief to her brother. She did so, and then and there I penned the saddest letter I had ever read or written. I shall repeat from its sorrowful pages only a few words:

"'MONTICELLO, February 8, 1826.

"'MY DEAR JEFFERSON: I duly received your affectionate letter of the 3d, and perceive there are greater doubts than I had apprehended whether the Legislature will indulge my request to them. It is a part of my mortification to perceive that I had so far overrated myself as to have counted on it with too much confidence. I see in the failure of this hope a deadly blast of all my peace of mind during my remaining days. You kindly encourage me to keep up my spirits; but oppressed with disease, debility, age, and embarrassed affairs, this is difficult. For myself I should not regard a prostration of fortune, but I am overwhelmed at the prospect of the situation in which I may leave my family. My dear and beloved daughter, the cherished companion of my early life and nurse of my age, and her children (one of whom, your sister Septimia, is now with me gazing with tearful eyes into my saddened soul), rendered as dear to me as if my own, for having lived with me from their cradle, left in a comfortless situation, hold up to me nothing but future gloom, and I should not care were life to end with the line I am writing, were it not that in the unhappy state of mind which your father's misfortunes have brought upon him I may yet be of some avail to the family. Their affectionate devotion to me makes a willingness to endure life a duty as long as it can be of any use to them. My difficulties have been produced by my devoting my time to the service of my country. Perhaps I have no right to complain, as misfortunes have been held back for my last days when few remain to me. I have gone through a long life with fewer circumstances of affliction than are the lot of most men—uninterrupted health, a competence for every reasonable want, usefulness to my fellow-citizens, a good portion of their esteem, no complaint against the world, which has sufficiently honored me, and above all a family which has blessed me by their affections, and never by their conduct given me a moment's pain; and should this, my last request, be granted I may yet close with a cloudless sun a long and serene day of life.'

"This and more the minority may find in the third volume of my biography by Henry S. Randall, at page 531, but no writer can depict the pain with which I gazed into the tearful eyes of my dear Septimia trying to cheer her despairing grandfather. My heart was filled with anxiety about her. Might she not be the last of my dear Martha's children left alive to suffer want, and when her friends might appeal to Congress for such recognition as was given to others, might not some minority party wait till all others were helped and then shut the door in her innocent face?

"Nine days afterward I wrote a letter to my friend ex-President Madison, from Monticello, in which I said:

"'I must sell everything here, perhaps considerable in Bedford, move thither with my family, where I have not even a log hut to put my head into, and whether ground for burial will depend on the depredations which, under the form of sales, shall have been committed on my property. * * * If ever the earth has beheld a system of administration conducted with a single and steadfast eye to the general interest and happiness of those committed to it, one which protected by truth can never know reproach, it is that to which our lives have been devoted.'

"Death was rapidly approaching, but my friends did not forsake me. Individuals and newspapers protested against allowing my property to be taken from myself and my family to pay my debts, the amount of which they averred my countrymen owed me a hundred-fold. Generous offers of relief came from various parts of the Union. Philip Hone, then mayor of New York, sent eight thousand dollars, Philadelphia sent five thousand, and Baltimore three. I then believed that my debts would be paid and my hearthstone would descend to my children. 'I had spent three times as much money as would have relieved my estate from embarassment and had given my whole life to my countrymen, and they will save an old servant from being turned, like a dog, out of doors.' In that pleasing belief I died; but, alas! all my property was sacrificed.

"Just before my death an invitation came to me from General Weightman to attend the celebration of the fiftieth anniversary of the Declaration of Independence in the national capital. There were living then only three of its signers—myself, and Adams, and Carroll. In answer to that invitation I wrote my last letter on earth, dated June 24, 1826, and at fifty-five minutes past meridian of the day on which I wished to die I closed my eyes, and this my now only living grandchild was among the last objects of my affection that faded from my view, and you summon me back to ask me what I shall say of her. I have not forgotten her features, for they reflect my own and mirror the memory of her mother on my heart; nor is her voice strange to me, for its loving tones were the last notes of music which I heard on earth and her loving eyes the last glimpse of light that flashed upon me from a receding world.

"At the moment I passed away thousands of patriotic orations pronounced my name. Bells were ringing, cannons booming. Aged men were talking of the sword and pen of America, and mentioning my name with Washington's. Young men and maidens and children were singing songs of freedom together in which I was not forgotten, while they did not know that I had seen my last day on earth.

"And now, at the end of fifty-eight years, I find the angel of my life whose cradle I rocked, who sat upon my knee and lightened my heart in its latest beatings, living in the capital of my country and suffering from want. I know her angel form again, though faded in its bloom and bending over its grave. I see the wealth of golden hair turned to gray. I recall her from Monticello with her silver voice and holy smile and girlhood innocence, born beneath my roof-tree to the light and glory of my mountain home.

"And you have called me to say what I would do with this application for her relief. I am informed that in your last Congress there were five applicants for national relief placed before your committee, one my own beloved grandchild, the other four widows of four of my successors in the Presidency. You ask me what I would do with them; I answer I would treat them all alike. You ask me if I would refuse to her in her sufferings and sorrow the boon which was granted to all the others; I answer I would not. I can not speak of my own services to the Republic, nor weigh the merits of my labors when put in comparison with those of Garfield, and Lincoln, and Polk, and Tyler. I stood over your cradle; I wrote your charter of independence; I served in your places of power; I was your servant and your President; I saw your coming glory; I secured for a trifling sum your great empire of the Mississippi; I died in poverty and I appealed to you with my last breath that this my child, should not be allowed to die in want. I find her now in the comfortless condition which I dreaded. If my ghostly hand could hold out assistance to her she should not continue an hour longer in that gloom nor beg at the door of your Treasury. But alas, I am penniless and powerless! I have read your minority report in such light as the shades of Monticello afforded me, and I am amazed that its authors should have heaped wealth upon all the living widows of Presidents and should protest only when they come to my darling widowed child. You seem to dread disasters from civil pensions, but not from military or naval pensions. This is a false idea. A free pen and honors paid to civil benefactors never endangered republican institutions. Those who trampled down their country's freedom were the Cæsars, who gloried in the sword. Are my services as the author of your Declaration of Independence less valuable than those of the brave soldiers who fought to sustain it at Trenton and Princeton, at Monmouth and Yorktown? Why paralyze the pen to sanctify the sword?

"Whether you now listen to my prayer for her relief will not be of much moment for any length of time. A few months or weeks or days may bring her to my side at Monticello, where I am waiting for her in my old home, now owned by strangers. You have in your last Congress voted $10,000 to erect a monument over my grave. If you can not give my child any relief from the Treasury, pull down your monument and sell the material for her relief, of which she is in more need than I am of monuments. Take it away, for while she is left to suffer this monument is a mockery and an offense. It is resting heavy on my heart and is crushing my bones. I asked for bread and you gave me a stone."

Rest, perturbed spirit, rest! Your services are not forgotten and your darling child shall not be allowed to die in want. A nation's heart is throbbing in sympathy and a nation's purse is open to relieve her.

The closing paragraph of the minority report seeks to evade the question by stating that this bill seeks to extend pensions to President's grandchildren. It has no reference to any President or his descendants. If they will read the title of the bill as it is printed in the Calendar before them they will see that it is "A bill granting a pension to the sole surviving grandchild of the author of the Declaration of Independence." Is there any Representative here from Massachusetts, whose illustrious son accompanied Thomas Jefferson to heaven on that memorable fiftieth anniversary of our immortal declaration, who will refuse to pay this small sum, this just debt, to his memory? Is there a son of Virginia here, whose fame he created, whose liberties of person and of conscience he secured, whose university he founded, who will hesitate to vote this tribute to his memory? Is there any member of this Congress from generous New England, or the impulsive South, or the thriving Atlantic States, or the wealthy communities throbbing with unrivaled life on the shores of the Pacific, or the boundless empire of the intermediate mountains, plains, and valleys, secured to them by his purchase of Louisiana, who will not rejoice at the opportunity of linking his name by this act to the fame of the Sage of Monticello?

This Congress can make their individual names immortal by passing this bill. Whatever may be said against our acts here, and we all deserve more or less censure, this deed will plead for us on the Day of Judgment. However dark the record which the Angel of Time may carry up to heaven's chancery against us, the light which will play upon the page where this deed is registered will brighten up and glorify the entire volume with luminous splendor. Your vote to-day will see

> Liberty write, with a pencil of light
> That illumined her pages, her Jefferson's name.

I would rather that my children and their children's children should read my name in the affirmative on the yeas and nays on this question than on any measure passed by Congress since the Declaration of this good lady's grandfather was adopted. Blot out everything else I have done or shall do in Congress, but preserve for me and for my children, my pride and their glory, that their father voted this contribution to the spirit of '76, connecting the heroic past with the glorious present. I paraphrase the language of Dr. Samuel Johnson, in his visit to the Hebrides, wandering amid ruins far less interesting than those of Monticello: "Whatever makes the past, the distant, or the future predominate over the present advances us in the dignity of thinking beings. Far from me and from my friends be such frigid philosophy as may conduct us indifferent and unmoved over any ground which has been dignified by wisdom, bravery, or virtue. That man is little to be envied whose patriotism would not gain force upon the plain of Marathon, nor grow warmer amid the ruins of Monticello."

In asking this House to pay tribute to this granddaughter of Jefferson I call attention to a similar act in one of our original States.

Johnston Blakely was brought by his parents from Ireland when 2 years old, and with them settled at Wilmington, in North Carolina. At seventeen he was appointed a midshipman in the United States Navy, and went with Commodore Preble to the Mediterranean. In 1814, during the second war with England, he sailed from Portsmouth, in New Hampshire, in the United States ship of war the Wasp, and on the 28th of June of that year, at the entrance of English ports, challenged his majesty's sloop of war the Reindeer to combat, and in nineteen minutes silenced her guns and lowered her flag above the gory deck on which her captain and first lieutenant lay dead and blew her up to save her from recapture. Again, in August of that year, he met and conquered his majesty's ship the Avon, and in two weeks of that month met and captured fifteen English ships, at the rate of one a day. But he never returned to his adopted country. Whether in disaster at night or in storm at sea he went down with his gallant ship and all her daring crew to a limitless grave was never known. Six months before he fought the Reindeer he was married to Jane, daughter of William Hooper, one of North Carolina's signers of the Declaration of Independence. A daughter, whom he never saw, was born to him and was named Udney. Before she was two years old the Legislature of North Carolina unanimously resolved to make her the ward of the State. She was educated and brought up by the State till she was married. Such is the example set by one of the old thirteen to the modern United States, now trebled in numbers, and few are the pages that are brighter in the history of the State than that which records this tribute of a State to the child of its benefactor.

Let there be no niggardliness, no parsimony. Remember that the sum you give is to a certain extent the index of the value you set upon your independence, and, in another sense, the value you put upon the Louisiana territory, that bountiful and boundless territory of fruitful valleys and lofty mountains, north and west, between the Mississippi and the Pacific and up to the British territory, expanding into limitless production of Louisiana, Arkansas, Missouri, Iowa, Minnesota, Nebraska, Kansas, and other States. The wildest generosity and liberality of your grateful hearts can not make the sum too great which you will give in part payment to the grandchild of him who gave you such extensive territory and boundless freedom. The eyes of the whole American people are upon you, and they will mark with their disapprobation any hesitancy or parsimony in this business. One of your daily papers of this city has well said that—

> This theme is rich in glorious reminiscences and patriotic suggestions. The country is immeasurably the debtor of Thomas Jefferson. There is no party or faction that does not honor his memory. Congress has voted money too tardily to erect a monument over the grave of Jefferson. But what a solemn mockery it will be to put up a marble column in illustration of the nation's love, while this great, rich, and prosperous nation permits Jefferson's only living grandchild to spend the little remainder of her days in poverty. The people of this country are not niggardly. They are far more generous in their impulses than many of their representatives suppose them to be. They would vote, were it in their power, a pension sufficient to make the closing years of this lady's life happy, dispelling every suggestion of poverty. Congress has granted many pensions on grounds far less tenable than those on which it is proposed to pension this sole surviving grandchild of the Sage of Monticello.

I beseech the kindly consideration of this House, I invoke its generosity, I pray for its unanimity, in paying this debt of justice and gratitude. The worth and beauty of Washington are looking upon you from your galleries; and far above them, in the boundless blue that overarches this magnificent Dome, I see the sacred forms of Washington and Jefferson bending over us and blending the light of their pen and sword to illumine the page on which shall be written the record of this glorious deed.

Mr. HEWITT, of Alabama. Mr. Chairman, we have listened to a very extraordinary speech, especially when we remember that it has fallen from the lips of a Democrat. The speech which has just been delivered by the gentleman from New York [Mr. ROBINSON] is a condemnation of Thomas Jefferson and Thomas Jefferson's political career, around which his glory clusters. It is a condemnation of every word that Jefferson ever wrote upon political subjects. It is a censure of Jefferson's whole political life and of all his writings upon the subject of government. And, sir, he who votes for this bill to-day, instead of honoring the memory of Thomas Jefferson, votes a condemnation of Thomas Jefferson's views upon the powers of the Federal Government.

I know that there is a large party in this country that does not believe in the doctrines which were taught by Thomas Jefferson. The members of that party can vote consistently for this bill. Men who hold that this Government is a government of absolute power, without limitation save the will of Congress, can very well vote for this bill. But men who believe in the doctrines which were taught by Thomas Jefferson, and which are held by the great Democratic party of this country to-day—that is, that this Government is a government of limited and delegated powers, that it can not exercise any power not granted or delegated to it, and which is not necessary to carry out the granted powers—men holding these views of our Constitution and Government can not support this measure without doing violence to their consciences and trampling under foot their professions of faith.

The gentleman from New York appeals to precedents in support of his bill; and he has said that when the bills to pension Mrs. Garfield, the widow of President Garfield, and to pension Mrs. Lincoln and Mrs. Polk and Mrs. Tyler were passed, I and others who have signed this minority report did not raise our voices in opposition to these measures. Sir, those bills, it will be remembered, passed the House by unanimous consent. My recollection is that they were reported—at least two of them—by the gentleman from New York [Mr. COX], who in making the report consulted more his heart than the Constitution. Under unanimous consent the bills were passed without discussion and without deliberation. So far as I am concerned, I am a very humble and by the way a very modest member of this House. I do not raise objection when a large majority here are in favor of a measure, because I am one of those who believe that a majority ought to do the legislation of Congress. But when those bills were passed by the House I voted against every one of them. I am as much opposed to them to-day as I was then; and I have no doubt that a large number of members of the House to-day are of the same opinion.

Mr. ROBINSON, of New York. I do not wish to interrupt my friend, but will he allow me a moment?

Mr. HEWITT, of Alabama. Yes, sir. The gentleman refused to allow me to interrupt him, but I shall return good for evil.

Mr. ROBINSON, of New York. If the gentleman will allow me, I will say that I have looked over the RECORD, and there was no opposition to any of those bills—for Mrs. Tyler, Mrs. Polk, or any of the others.

Mr. HEWITT, of Alabama. But the gentleman remembers very well that there was no yea-and-nay vote.

Mr. ROBINSON, of New York. Well, there should have been, if any members considered the bills wrong.

Mr. HEWITT, of Alabama. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman himself who has quoted these precedents condemns them in his speech; he does not favor them; he has not told you that they were right; but his argument is that because we did wrong then we should continue to do wrong.

But, Mr. Chairman, the precedents which the gentleman has quoted, bad as they are, are not precedents for this bill. Each and every one of the cases to which the gentleman from New York has referred was to pension the widow of a President. This bill passes over the widow of Thomas Jefferson, passing over the daughters of Thomas Jefferson to come down to the grandchildren and establishes an extraordinary precedent—a civil pension for life to the granddaughter of a President.

If you are ready to establish this extraordinary precedent let us stop for a moment to see what it means. What does it mean? There are other men believed by some people to have done great service for this country, civil as well as other service. I am a believer in Thomas Jefferson. I believe in Thomas Jefferson's political sentiments; I believe he was one of the greatest as well as one of the best men this country has ever known. But, as I have said, there are others who believe the services of Abraham Lincoln were as great if not greater than those of Thomas Jefferson or any other. If you pass this bill, then are we to put all the children of Abraham Lincoln and all his grandchildren upon the pension-roll? Yet by passing this bill we would establish a precedent which would command such a pension for all the descendants of Mr. Lincoln and other Presidents.

Mr. ROBINSON, of New York. No, I wish only to make this provision for the granddaughter of the author of the Declaration of Independence.

Mr. HEWITT, of Alabama. There are many great and illustrious men who adorn American history and who have rendered invaluable service to their country, and whose children and grandchildren may now be in penury and want. Pass this bill, and you would establish a precedent by which all these could be pensioned.

When Congress passed a bill pensioning Mrs. Polk and Mrs. Tyler and Mrs. Garfield they only intended to pension those widows, but they are cited as a precedent by the gentleman from New York to justify his support of this bill. They are seized upon as a precedent for the passage of a bill to pension the granddaughter of Thomas Jefferson. You have claimed them as a precedent all the way through. They are set out as such in the report of the majority of the committee, and the gentleman from New York has referred to them to-day in his speech as precedents for this bill.

Now, where will you stop? If we are to pension a granddaughter of Thomas Jefferson, why not a great-granddaughter? Why not put on the pension-roll all the descendants of all the men who have performed great civil service for the country? Why should you select the grandchild of Thomas Jefferson and leave all the others unprovided for?

Pass this bill, Mr. Chairman, and this House will establish a precedent by which, if you follow it hereafter, you will put not only the children but the grandchildren and the great-grandchildren of all the Presidents we have ever had upon the pension-roll.

You talk about precedents. You need not say, "Oh, no," for you seized upon the other cases as precedents for this case. This necessarily follows from those, and I appeal to every thinking man here to-day to pause and ponder this matter. I ask them not to allow their sympathies to run away with their judgment. Sympathy has been the fruitful source of much vicious legislation. Sympathy is not within the powers conferred upon Congress by the Federal Constitution.

Now, Mr. Chairman, let us look for a moment whether we have any power under the Constitution to vote this bill. Let us lay aside these bad precedents which the gentleman has appealed to and which he admits himself to have been wrong, and let us inquire whether there is any power under which we can do the thing which is here proposed. Now, what are the powers conferred by the Constitution upon Congress? Congress has the power to lay and collect taxes, duties, imposts, and excises. This power is expressly conferred by the first clause of the eighth section of the first article of the Constitution. Now, for what purpose has Congress this power of taxation? Thomas Jefferson taught us that this power to lay and collect taxes was limited and confined to the objects specified in the other enumerated powers. This was the view also held by Mr. Madison. When we examine the other enumerated powers we fail to find any power to pension a person who has rendered no public service, military or civil, to the country. But if we take the view of this eighth section held by Monroe and Jackson and the great body of Democrats of to-day we will fail to find any power to pass this bill. The first clause of the eighth section of the first article of the Constitution was construed by Mr. Monroe as giving Congress full power to lay and collect taxes, to pay debts and provide for the common defense and general welfare; that the power thus to collect taxes is limited to these specific purposes. The common-defense-and-general-welfare clause is not a power to lay and collect taxes, but is a limiting and restraining clause on the taxing power. It is also the power, and the only power, granted for the appropriation of money. Mr. Story says:

> The power to lay taxes for the common defense and general welfare of the United States is not in the common sense a general power. It is limited to those objects. It can not constitutionally transcend them. If the defense proposed by the tax be not the common defense of the United States; if the welfare be not general but special or local, as contradistinguished from national, it is not within the scope of the Constitution.

It will not be contended that Congress can constitutionally appropriate money from the national Treasury to an object for which a tax could not be constitutionally laid and collected. There are but three purposes for which Congress may lay and collect taxes. It may collect taxes to pay the debts of the United States. There is no claim that the Government owes this granddaughter of Jefferson one cent. Taxes may be collected for the common defense of the United States. It will hardly be contended by any one that this pension is to be granted for any such purpose. We may also collect taxes for the general welfare. No one has been so bold as to contend that this bill would in any way, should it pass, promote the general welfare of the people. Then where will be found any authority under the Constitution by which Congress can grant the pension proposed by this bill? If there is no power granted to the Federal Government for taking money out of the Treasury and giving it as a gratuity to a citizen who has in no way rendered any public service to the country, then there is no authority for this bill and it should not be passed.

The gentleman from New York has around the venerable form of Jefferson's grandchild drawn the holy circle of American womanhood, and launches the curse of an indignant people at him who sets a hostile foot or casts an unkind glance within that sacred circle. Sir, no man has a higher regard for Jefferson's granddaughter than I have or who reveres the great name of Jefferson more than I do. He was one of the most illustrious men of this or any other country; but as much as I love and respect his memory, I love the Constitution of my country more; and I draw around that grand instrument the sacred circle of freedom's safeguard and bulwark, and launch the curse of the American people at him who dares to invade it with hostile intent.

I now yield twenty minutes to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. POST].

Mr. POST. Mr. Chairman, if I were to be governed by the promptings of sympathy or deterred by the natural dislike of being subjected to the possible charge of a lack of gallantry, I should certainly not rise to oppose this bill. But, impelled by a sense of duty, I am led to ask the indulgence of the committee, that I may briefly present the reasons which induce me to refuse my support of the measure so ably, eloquently, and pathetically advocated by my distinguished and venerable friend from New York. That flesh is weak is proverbial, and the truth of this is forcibly brought home to me when I see a man of ripe experience, and who has grown gray in the advocacy of Jeffersonian democracy, blinded in his judgment and setting at naught the tenets of his political faith under the influence of a generous impulse. To my mind, Mr. Chairman, the growing tendency toward sentimental legislation is a serious evil and one which should arrest our attention.

If I read the early history of my country aright and understand the principles which actuated the founders of the Republic, it was never the intention to make the Government an eleemosynary institution, nor was the Federal Treasury expected to be on tap for the relief of indigent people, however deserving.

The report of the Committee on Pensions recommending the granting of an annuity to Mrs. Septimia R. Meikleham is most creditable to the hearts of the gentlemen of that committee, and the eloquent language in which the tender relations existing between Mrs. Meikleham and the author of the Declaration of Independence are portrayed is indeed touching, but as the representatives of the people, charged with the protection of the interests of a great nation, with our functions specifically defined by the Constitution, I assert that we have no right to gratify our personal philanthropic impulses at the public expense.

Sir, I yield to no man in my admiration of the pure statesmanship and magnificent public services of Thomas Jefferson, and I believe that if the public servants of the present day would follow more closely in the footsteps of that illustrious statesman in the discharge of official duty we would have better legislation, fewer sinecures, and an entire absence of profligacy in the expenditure of public funds. Certain it is that no such measure as is now pending would have met his approval.

The only apology offered in defense of this bill is that it is intended to put on record in substantial form a mark of our regard for the exalted character and public services of the author of the Declaration of Independence.

Do we, as members of the American Congress, desire to show our appreciation of and respect for the services of Thomas Jefferson? Then let us strive earnestly to emulate his lofty example and in our official conduct demonstrate our veneration for his memory. Let us reduce the number of useless offices, compel employés of the Government to render a full equivalent in labor for the compensation drawn, cut off every needless expenditure, trample under foot any and every attempt to erect an official aristocracy, and wage an unceasing warfare against all kinds of corruption and maladministration in Government affairs. This was the Jeffersonian standard, and the adherence to these principles it was which rendered him a model public servant whom coming generations will admire.

Knowing as we do from a study of his life his abhorrence of anything that savored of favoritism or misappropriation of the people's money, I ask in all sincerity, is it consistent, is it right, is it desirable to seek to honor his memory by the passage of an act he would have denounced as unwarranted and dangerous? We are told, Mr. Chairman, that our nation is rich, prosperous, and generous, and that it would be niggardly to refuse to grant the annuity provided for in this bill. Why, sir, this is the cry set up upon any and all occasions by enterprising patriots who meditate an assault upon the surplus revenue.

When a measure is brought forward calling for a liberal appropriation and for which there does not appear any warrant of law, it is considered by many to be a sufficient answer that the Treasury is full, the country is rich, therefore the money must be spent. Under the cry that the Government is rich all manner of raids are made upon the Treasury, and from all quarters come pouring in upon Congress plausible and cunningly devised schemes to relieve the public purse of its plethoric condition.

We must not forget, however, that this money is not our personal property, and that when we go outside of the path of constitutional duty to appropriate money for purely benevolent purposes, and in response to no other appeal than that of absurd sentimentality, we are guilty of an absolute breach of fidelity to the trust reposed in us.

Because we are in official position we have no right to compel the people to foot the bills for our spasms of generosity; but if we find a worthy case where pecuniary assistance is proper and desirable, let us in a manly way make our contributions from our own resources, rather than shoulder the burden upon the Government whose purse-strings we happen temporarily to hold. To illustrate this point: I presume that nearly all of the members of this House when they came here left varied interests in the hands of subordinates to be conducted in their absence.

Now, these agents or representatives are empowered by you in your absence to perform certain acts necessary for the proper conduct of your business affairs, and when you return home you will demand a full and detailed statement of all transactions carried on, and particularly will you scan the items of disbursements. What would you think if among the disbursements you should find an item showing the payment of $500 to Mrs. Jones, and upon demanding an explanation you were blandly informed by your representative that Mr. Johnson, one of the men who assisted in erecting, in fact who planned, the building wherein your place of business is located had died several years ago in rather straitened pecuniary circumstances leaving a grandchild of whom he was very fond, who was present when he passed away, and who in addition was possessed of a wealth of sunny hair; that the grandchild had been found by your representative to be in feeble health and poor, and he, in view of the services rendered by Mr. Johnson in erecting an edifice wherein you carried on business, had been so moved and touched by the sad plight of Mr. Johnson's granddaughter that he had given her $500 of your funds to relieve her embarrassment, and further that he proposed to continue paying a like sum yearly. Well, now, I imagine there would be somewhat of an exhibition of temper at such a monstrous perversion of your funds.

I will venture to say that in good set terms you would insist, and rightly, too, that if your representative was such a tender-hearted fellow and so generous he should not use your money to accomplish his benevolent purposes, but that whenever his feelings were so wrought upon that nothing save a donation of cash could satisfy his large heart he should put his hands into his own pocket and disburse for charitable purposes money earned by and belonging to himself, and not that left in his charge for altogether different uses.

Mr. Chairman, it strikes me that the bill under consideration presents an analogous proposition. "Giving away what isn't yours looks generous, but it is not expensive;" and this is a pastime that is indulged in too frequently of late among legislators for the purpose of posing as big-hearted humanitarians, whose generosity is only limited by the amount of wealth in the national coffers.

I am opposed, Mr. Chairman, to all civil pensions. Unfortunately precedents have been established, but it is high time to retrace our steps in this matter, get into the habit once more of expending the people's money for the legitimate expenses of Government, leaving all purely charitable enterprises to be sustained by the liberality of private individuals. And the history of our country has proven conclusively that no movement having in view the establishment of a deserving charity has ever failed to meet a ready and generous response.

Bad as the precedents heretofore established may have been, there was yet something more substantial upon which to base them than is now presented. The proposition to pension Mrs. Meikleham simply because she is the sole surviving grandchild of Thomas Jefferson is utterly indefensible, and is a step, if taken, which, as a logical result, must open the door for the admission of innumerable claims of a similar flimsy nature, and tend to build up in our midst a favored class (based upon the accident of birth), which is repugnant to the spirit of our institutions.

Where will this end? Where shall the line be drawn? The United States have been prolific of grand, illustrious men who have filled with credit and benefit to the country the highest official stations within the gift of the people. Their services, however, were purely civil, and their elevation to office the result of contests with other distinguished and worthy citizens, and the responsibilities incident thereupon were willingly assumed in order to attain the coveted distinction. No dangers to life or limb were faced, no privations endured, no sacrifices made; but raised to the pinnacle of political eminence by the partiality of enthusiastic and devoted partisans, they tasted the sweets of preferment, ran their race, passed from the stage of action, and have gone the way of all living. In this they differed not one whit from Jefferson, and their grandchildren are equally deserving with his.

It may be that Jefferson was the wisest of our statesmen and the purest, but wisdom comes from God, and its possessor is thrice blessed and thereby qualified for increased usefulness by the Creator, while purity of life and character surely bring sufficient reward of themselves, without the necessity of affixing hereditary pensions as a recompense therefor. I can conceive of no reason based upon sound common sense whereby, under our form of government, the granting of pensions for civil service can be justified, and particularly where it is sought to grant such pension to one solely because of the service of her grandfather, and for which he in his lifetime received the highest possible homage, and who was honored to the full power of his countrymen.

I desire to indulge in a comparison of the condition of Mrs. Meikleham with that of a soldier's widow whose life-companion was slain while in the defense of his country.

On the one hand we see a lady surrounded by a host of friends and admirers, with such a halo of ancestral glory enveloping her that she need have no fear of coming to want, as is demonstrated by the statement of the gentleman from New York citing the generous donation of Hon. O. B. POTTER. I am informed that she has two children employed in the Government offices.

Mr. ROBINSON, of New York. Will the gentleman allow me a moment? I do not like to interrupt him, but I am satisfied he will not object to being interrupted when I tell him that that statement is absolutely without foundation. It is not true. This lady has a sickly daughter who has a little place that she is scarcely able to attend to, and totters to it from day to day to keep her old venerable mother from dying of starvation. That is all.

Mr. POST. I am glad, Mr. Chairman, to have had the opportunity of showing this courtesy to the gentleman from New York who refused so emphatically to be interrupted while he held the floor. I am satisfied, with all due respect to the gentleman, that his fertile imagination and florid rhetoric have painted the condition of the estimable Mrs. Meikleham much worse than the actual facts will warrant. I grant you that she is not living in opulence, but I am confident that she is absolutely in the possession of every actual requirement for personal comfort, at least as much so as thousands of other widows of limited means, and differs from them only in the fact that her grandfather was the author of the Declaration of Independence. She has suffered or sacrificed nothing for the public weal.

On the other hand we see the noble, heroic woman who gave to her country her companion, supporter, and the father of her children. Oh! the anguish of soul she has suffered as she has waited for the return of her husband who came not, but who yielded up his life, so dear to him and his family, for the good of the land he loved so well; how she has struggled all these years to rear her family. Often has she been in want and her little ones deprived of the necessaries of life. Thrown upon her own resources, frail and desolate in her loneliness, she has toiled and endured untold hardships, from which she would have been spared had she not bade her husband go to the rescue of the Union. Freely and cheerfully she had made this great sacrifice that her children might enjoy the blessings of liberty and that the Union might not be disintegrated.

Which of these women say you is the more deserving of the consideration of this Government? Yet here is a proposition to give to the one the annual sum of $2,500, equal to the income of men charged with the conduct of important business interests, while according to the laws of the land the paltry sum of $8 per month is considered sufficient compensation for the other. Out upon such an injustice! I spurn such an insult to the soldiers' widows of this country.

Scattered all over this broad land are brave men who responded to the call of duty when the safety of our institutions was imperiled, who were wounded, who languished in prison-pens, who are broken in health and incapacitated from gaining a livelihood for themselves and families, but who, by reason of the strict requirements of law and the construction placed thereon by the pension authorities, are unable to obtain a favorable consideration of their claims for recognition, and are to-day denied that to which they are in equity entitled; and I consider that it is unbecoming in the Congress of the United States and those charged with the execution of the laws to haggle over fine technicalities when dealing with the application of a needy veteran for a pension and at the same time undertake to pour money in the lap of a person who has no claim for recognition whatever except absurd abnormal sentimentality.

Let us be just to the men who fought our battles and their dependents before we are generous to the descendants of any statesman, however great. So long, Mr. Chairman, as widows of the nation's dead receive but $8 per month, so long as one maimed, poverty-stricken, and suffering soldier who stood the shock of battle and amid the leaden hail of the rebel musketry upheld the honor of his country's flag is without proper recognition and refused a place upon the pension-roll by reason of hair-splitting technicalities and requirements impossible to comply with, I shall not favor the seeking out of grandchildren of civilians, no matter how brilliant their achievements, upon whom to shower the bounty of this nation.

Mr. HEWITT, of Alabama. Will the Chair be kind enough to state how much time I have remaining?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Alabama has twenty-eight minutes left.

Mr. HEWITT, of Alabama. I yield five minutes to my friend from Georgia [Mr. HAMMOND].

Mr. HAMMOND. The five minutes allowed me by the courtesy of the gentleman from Alabama will be altogether sufficient for the expression of my position with referrence to this bill. It stands before us upon no other grounds than the alleged poverty of the applicant and the fact that she is the granddaughter of Thomas Jefferson. Her alleged poverty is put as strongly as it could be by the report of the committee in these words: "She is comparatively in want." So are all when compared with many others. We take it that had she been in real want they would have left out the qualifying adverb "comparatively."

But if she were in want it would make no difference on principle. The only other argument that is urged in support of the bill is that she is the granddaughter of a great man. There are a thousand such in this land—ten thousand—perhaps not the grandchildren of as great men, but certainly of as deserving men; for Jefferson did only what they did. Each did all he could for the honor and glory of the country. Some allusion having been made to the widow of President Tyler, my memory was called to the action of my own State many years ago as to the wife of his predecessor, General Harrison. The Legislature of the State of Georgia in 1841 was peculiarly Democratic. Robert M. Echols was the president of the senate, William B. Wofford was the speaker of the house of representatives, and Charles B. McDonald was the governor of the State. Every one of them swore by Jefferson as his political god. Yet because the extra session of Congress had passed a bill giving to Mrs. Harrison, widow of President Harrison, $25,000, they regarded that action of Congress as important enough to be denounced by a solemn joint resolution in these words:

Resolved, That in our opinion the act passed by the present Congress, at the late extra session, making a donation from the public Treasury of $25,000 to Mrs. Harrison, is unconstitutional, unequal, and oppressive, and calculated to lead to the establishment of a civil-pension list, which will eventually saddle the people of this country with an unjust and enormous debt.

Perhaps some may think the danger was not so great as they apprehended. But the objection that that was unconstitutional, unequal, and oppressive, when urged by the authority of such an assembly as that, all Democrats, must be certainly taken as a strong argument against the passage of this bill.

Mr. HEWITT, of Alabama. I now yield eight minutes to the gentleman from New York [Mr. MILLARD.]

Mr. MILLARD Mr. Chairman, I thank the distinguished gentleman from Alabama [Mr. HEWITT] for granting me a portion of his time in which to be heard upon the question under consideration.

It seems to me, Mr. Chairman, that this bill ought not to pass. If I understand the provisions of the bill correctly it proposes to place the name of the grandchild of Thomas Jefferson upon the pension-rolls of the Government for the sole reason that she happens to be his only surviving descendant. I have examined the majority report of the committee with great care, and if any other reason is given or stated I have been unable to find it.

Now, sir, I have no doubt but that the person named in the bill and to whom it is proposed to pension for life at the rate of $2,500 a year is a very intelligent and worthy person. The fact that her cause is championed upon the floor of this House by my venerable friend and colleague from New York [Mr. ROBINSON] is sufficient evidence of the fact, and while I fully appreciate the value and importance of the services which the author of the Declaration of Independence rendered his country, and while I agree with him in all he has said or can say in praise of the great virtues and distinguished talents of Thomas Jefferson, I still think the bill under consideration wrong in principle, and if allowed to pass would establish a precedent that would give this House much trouble in the future.

Sir, this measure is not only without a precedent, but is in violation of the Constitution and opposed to the lifelong teachings of Thomas Jefferson himself. Pass this bill, and your Private Calendar will be crowded with thousands of just such measures as this; pass this bill, and the dream of the distinguished member from Colorado [Mr. BELFORD] would be realized, and you will have paved a way for unlocking the vaults of the national Treasury. No; the bill is wrong in principle and without a precedent in the history of the legislation of this country.

My distinguished friend from New York [Mr. ROBINSON] says that the last Congress voted the widows of Lincoln and Garfield each the sum of $5,000. The gentleman is correct in his statement, but I assert that in this action of the last Congress he can find no precedent for the passage of this bill. Lincoln and Garfield died in office. They fell at their post of duty. Had the American Congress neglected or refused to acknowledge in some such way the debt of gratitude it owed Abraham Lincoln and James A. Garfield it would have justly merited the condemnation of every civilized nation upon the face of the earth. Sir, while this bill may arouse our sympathies it has not even the merit of private or public service, but rests, as I have stated, entirely in the fact that the claimant is the last of a noble race and the sole surviving descendant of one of the founders of the Republic.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I am in favor of giving pensions, and liberal pensions, but not civil service. A civil pension is a gift to be bestowed at pleasure, but a military and naval pension is a debt. Pensions should be given as a reward and compensation for naval and military service rendered. A pension is a nation's acknowledgment and recognition of the highest possible loyalty. It says to him who receives it: "While it is true that as a citizen you owed your services and your life to your country, that you received a stipulated sum as pay for your labor and exposure, yet as an acknowledgment of my gratitude and an inducement to your fellow-countrymen to emulate your patriotism and loyal devotion I bestow this bounty."

Yes, sir; I am in favor of pensions, and this Government, with its vast wealth and almost unlimited resources, with its hundred and thirty millions surplus, can not afford to be niggardly or ungenerous. I would vote to-day to give every disabled Federal soldier of the late war a pension, whether his disability was incurred in or since the war. These men have a claim upon the gratitude of this nation that can not be estimated in dollars and cents. It was no common struggle. The very life and existence of the nation was threatened. The actual individual enlistments during the war were 2,063,391; of this number more than one-half have applied or been pensioned by the Government. Nearly 300,000 have died leaving no pensionable relatives. Why not provide for the remainder of these veterans? It is now nearly twenty years since the close of the war, and what better use could be made of the surplus in the Treasury? It would be only a partial payment for services and sufferings that saved the nation from absolute destruction.

It seems to me that if my friend and colleague is sincere in his desire to reward those who really deserve the gratitude of their countrymen he is putting himself to unnecessary trouble in his search for a pensionable person. I want to say to him that it is no disrespect to the person named in the bill or to the gentleman himself who has so earnestly and eloquently urged its passage to say that there are thousands of men who fought in the war of the rebellion and hundreds and thousands of widows and children of men who fell in that struggle, who as yet receive no pensions, whose claims upon the gratitude of this Government are superior to those of this claimant.

The gentleman from New York says that Jefferson was the author of the Declaration of Independence, the father of equal rights. Grant it; but what equality or justice would there be in giving this claimant $2,500 a year while you give the widows of the Union soldiers the paltry sum of $8 per month? This was not the equality or justice that Thomas Jefferson taught, or I have failed to read his life and teachings correctly.

Mr. Chairman, I was one of the members upon this side of the House who voted last week against the passage of what was styled as the Mexican-war pension bill, a bill, Mr. Chairman, in my judgment not only wrong in principle, but more objectionable than the measure under consideration. It was not a bill to place upon the pension-rolls of the Government the names of the soldiers and sailors who were disabled in the war with Mexico, as that had already been done, nor was it a bill to place on the pension-rolls of the Government the names of the widows of the men who had fallen in that war. They had all been pensioned. Such was not the object of the bill. Had such been its purpose or had it been a measure to reward those who had actually seen military service and only those, it would have met with no opposition from me; on the contrary, I should have voted for it, for I would not say that the men who fought under Taylor and Scott may not have been as brave and patriotic as those who fought the battles of the Union under Grant and Sherman. I voted against the passage of the bill for the reason it placed upon the pension-rolls of the Government the names of thousands of men who had seen no military service whatever, not even thirty days, while it made no provision for the surviving veterans of the late war, and who had seen not days but years of the severest military hardships. It proposed to pension men for life who had never shed a drop of blood or trod a foot of Mexican soil. I voted against the passage of the bill for the reason it was legislation exclusively in the interest of the able-bodied, while it excluded the surviving Federal soldiers of the war of the rebellion.

Now, sir, if we are to be magnanimous let us be just. The bill was not only wrong in principle, unjust in its discrimination, but can not be defended upon the ground of precedent. The pensions granted by the acts of 1818 and 1820 were in the nature of payments for long years of heroic service upon the field and in the face of the enemy, and limited to those in reduced circumstances. The act of 1832 had a similar object in view, and was in the nature of the performance or fulfillment of a contract for services. The recipients of the pensions granted by that act had trod the bloody fields of the Revolution from Lexington to Yorktown.

Mr. Chairman, there was another reason which compelled me to oppose the passage of the bill, and in referring to it I trust I may not be charged with a desire to arouse sectional feeling or awaken party prejudice, for I care not from what section of the country the soldier comes if he has fought the battles of his country. Patriotism is the same the world over, but the Mexican pension bill not only placed upon the pension-rolls men in comfortable circumstances and who rendered but little if any military service whatever, but it pensioned for life men who were disloyal during the late war, and who, after having been educated by the Government and at the Government's expense, joined in a rebellion that for years carried sorrow, suffering, and death to nearly every household throughout the length and breadth of this fair land. What nation has ever pensioned the men who betrayed and for years sought its destruction? It may forgive and restore the once disloyal to citizenship. This, sir, it has done, and I rejoice at the mutual good feeling that every day puts further away the recollections of the war, but for this House to say that the men who fought against their country are as much entitled to its gratitude or to be placed upon the pension-rolls as those who exposed their lives to preserve the integrity of the Union and the honor of the flag, is the enunciation of a proposition as unjust as it is monstrous.

Now, Mr. Chairman, a word further and I am done. From the report of the United States Commissioner of Pensions, Mr. Dudley, I find that on the 30th day of June last there were pending in his department upward of 180,000 applications for pensions, and these applications were not from soldiers in good health and comfortable circumstances, but from men who had lost their health and limbs in the late civil war. Sir, what I desire to say is this, that so long as these claims are pending undetermined or unadjusted I do not think I would be justified in voting to place the name of any able-bodied person upon the pension-rolls of this Government, even though that person be the sole surviving descendant of Thomas Jefferson. [Applause.]

Mr. HEWITT, of Alabama. How much time have I remaining?

The CHAIRMAN. Fifteen minutes.

Mr. HEWITT, of Alabama. I yield ten minutes to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. REAGAN].

Mr. REAGAN. As I shall vote against the bill under consideration I desire to say a word in reference to it. We are asked to pass this bill because the proposed beneficiary of it is said to be poor and is the granddaughter of Thomas Jefferson, the author of the Declaration of Independence.

If we are to pension people because they are poor our bounty should be impartially distributed to all those in like condition, and our list would be a very large one. I doubt not there are a million of women in the United States as poor as the one whose bill is before the House, whose sufferings are as great, probably greater, and whose necessities appeal in each individual case to the sympathies and to the charity of every one present. But because that is the case, because we sympathize with the poor, because we would relieve their misfortunes, that is not a sufficient reason for proposing to vote money out of the public Treasury for such a purpose. As suggested by the distinguished gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. POST], this Government is not an eleemosynary establishment; it is not a charitable institution. Public charities throughout the country are provided for very amply in most of the States of the Union. Laws for taking care of the poor who are unable to take care of themselves have been enacted in the various States of the Union; but if we attempt to provide for the needs of the poor here we shall not long be complaining of an overfull Treasury.

As to the argument that we should pass this bill because it is for the benefit of the granddaughter of Thomas Jefferson, I desire to say in the first place I do not suppose there is a living person who has a more profound veneration for the great ability, for the great patriotism, for the originality of genius, and the powerful grasp of intellect possessed by Mr. Jefferson than I have.

He is the political teacher whom I would follow as closely as I could and whom I have tried during my life to follow in most things as closely as I could. And if the doctrines taught by him, if the principles enunciated by him in his political career could this day be applied to the Government of this country, instead of seeing one vast seething pool of corruption, we should see the Government purely administered according to the Constitution and in the interest of the people.

Mr. Chairman, it is not testifying our respect for the memory of Mr. Jefferson to do what we know he would not have done. Who is there here who does not feel in his heart that if Mr. Jefferson were alive and here on this floor to-day he would vote against this bill? Who believes that if he were President now as he was in the past and such a bill should be passed by Congress and sent to him he would not veto it? If we wish to show respect for his memory we should follow the sublime doctrines that he taught and inculcated.

Among the great principles which he laid down was this, that we should have no privileged classes, no aristocracy, but that all men should be equal in their political privileges and their rights under the Constitution. Yet we are now asked to build up a civil-list in this country which will sap the foundations of the Government and create a class having no claim upon the bounty of the Government more than have thousands of others to be supported by the toil of another class poorer perhaps than themselves. That is one of the things which Mr. Jefferson sought to avert. It was his object to strike down all classes, titles, and special privileges, and to place all men on an equality as to their political rights under the Government.

But there is another principle which we should bear in mind when we are asked to transfer the property of one person to another, for that is what this proposition amounts to. We collect taxes from the people and pay them out for public purposes. We are asked to take the property of the tax-payers and devote it to a purpose other than was intended. There is no power in this Government to use the money of the public Treasury for private purposes disconnected with public necessity and requirements. We have no power to take the property of one citizen and give it to another because we may think that other is in needy circumstances.

Private property can never be taken except for public uses and upon just compensation. I do not know how far this principle may be strictly applicable to this case, but it is an illustration of the argument that we must apply our power as legislators to the collection of taxes for the support of the Government and the payment of its debt, and not to be devoted to private charity.

It may be urged that we grant pensions to soldiers, and why not grant a pension in this case. There is a broad distinction between the two. The soldier who is maimed in battle or disabled by disease contracted while in the service of his country so as to be disqualified from earning a living, or the widow of a soldier who has fallen in the service of the country, and is deprived thereby of the means of support for herself and family, has a right to look to the Government for some measure of protection and assistance because of the loss thus incurred in defense of the country and the support of the Government.

But this is not a case of that kind. It is a case not distinguishable from that of any of the millions of poor people in this country who may desire to have property taken from others and bestowed upon themselves. I regret to have to do anything which any one might think was not a compliment to the memory of Mr. Jefferson, and I shall not do it. I do not believe it to be a compliment to the memory of Mr. Jefferson to pass this bill. I believe it would be a reproach upon his memory to violate the Constitution to the preservation of which he attached so much importance.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. HEWITT, of Alabama. I will inquire, Mr. Chairman, how much time I have remaining?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman has five minutes of his hour left.

Mr. HEWITT, of Alabama. I will yield that time to the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. MATSON], the chairman of the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

Mr. MATSON. I do not care to discuss the question of the constitutional power of Congress to pass the pending bill. I will waive that, because it has already been thoroughly discussed by others. I propose to look at the subject merely from the standpoint of expediency.

This bill is a very clear proposition to deliberately begin the establishment of a civil-pension list. It has been said that we already have precedents, that the bills which were passed so unanimously by the Forty-seventh Congress giving pensions to widows of ex-Presidents are precedents, and that the passage of this bill will not be the establishment of any new precedent.

Sir, the circumstances under which those bills were passed were not such as to make them the deliberate precedents of this House. They were passed in the early part of the year 1882, before the country had recovered from the shock of the tragic death of one of its Presidents. The person for whose benefit the act was passed at that time was a person toward whom the sympathies of the whole world had been moved. The passage of that bill, granting a pension to the widow of President Garfield and pensions to the widows of two or three other Presidents, was not the deliberate action of this House, but was simply a sort of gush on our part. As was stated by the gentleman from New York [Mr. ROBINSON], the bills passed without any objection; without the yeas and nays being called upon them at all.

But here to-day we are confronted with a serious question, pressed upon us, after debate and after viewing the matter, to begin the establishment of what no one can deny is a civil-pension list. It remains for this House to say whether it will enter upon so vast a scheme as that. As suggested by my friend from Texas [Mr. REAGAN], where is it to end? How much of a step will it be from the passage of this bill to pensioning some one who has served the Government in a civil capacity for a long term of years? It is not a very great step from that which you are now asked to take to the other. Whenever a single civil officer is pensioned because of his civil service to the Government, then thousands and tens of thousands of others must follow.

I have not time to discuss fully the question of the creation of favored classes under this Government; I wish I had time to go into that. I think that this bill can be clearly shown to be in the direction of establishing a favored class.

Something has been said concerning the gentlemen who presented the views of the minority of the committee against this bill. Some of those gentlemen are here to defend themselves, but my colleague, Mr. STOCKSLAGER, is not here. I wish to say for him that so far as the passage of bills pensioning the widows of ex-Presidents is concerned, they were passed at a time when his party were in the minority in this House, and he had no responsibility for such measures.

I wish to say for another gentleman who signed the minority report, the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. YORK], that he was not a member of Congress at the time when those bills were passed; so that the criticism upon that gentleman is certainly unjust.

Mr. STEELE. The criticism applies to all who were members. The whole House was to blame, if anybody was.

Mr. MATSON. I accept to a certain extent what the gentleman from New York [Mr. ROBINSON] has said. I think we ought to be scolded for having passed those bills pensioning the widows of Presidents. I believe it ought not to have been done. We deserve a scolding for our action in that respect. But I think it may be said for some gentlemen who were members that they were not responsible, because they were in the minority. They certainly were not so much responsible as those who were in the majority and who had the control of legislation here.

Mr. MCMILLIN. For the purpose of making a motion in the House to limit debate I move that the committee rise. [Cries of "Oh, no!"]

The question being taken, there were on a division—ayes 74, noes 41.

Mr. BROWNE, of Indiana. I do not desire to delay proceedings by making the point that no quorum has voted; but I do think that after some gentlemen have had the opportunity of speaking as long as they pleased——

Mr. MCMILLIN. This vote does not require a quorum.

The CHAIRMAN. On a motion that the committee rise it is not necessary a quorum should vote. The Committee of the Whole may rise because there is no quorum.

Mr. BROWNE, of Indiana. I call for tellers.

Mr. STEELE. It is too late.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will entertain the call for tellers, and appoints the gentleman from Tennessee, Mr. MCMILLIN, and the gentleman from Indiana, Mr. BROWNE.

The committee proceeded to divide; but before the count by tellers was concluded,

Mr. BROWNE, of Indiana, said: I withdraw the call for tellers.

The CHAIRMAN. The call for tellers being withdrawn, the motion that the committee rise is agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. COX, of New York, reported that the Committee of the Whole House having had under consideration the Private Calendar had come to no resolution thereon.

Mr. MCMILLIN. I move that the House again resolve itself into Committee of the Whole for the consideration of the Private Calendar; and pending that motion I move that general debate in Committee of the Whole on the pending measure terminate at 4 o'clock.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. The gentleman ought to allow at least an hour.

Mr. HEWITT, of Alabama. I move to amend the motion of the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. MCMILLIN] so as to close debate at the expiration of two hours.

Mr. MCMILLIN. If that be agreed to this bill cannot be disposed of before the recess, which will be at 5 o'clock.

Mr. HOLMAN. This is a very interesting subject.

Mr. ROBINSON, of New York. I rise to a parliamentary inquiry. If the motion of the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. MCMILLIN] should be agreed to, would not the gentleman having the management of the bill be entitled at 4 o'clock to one hour? I do not wish to occupy myself more than two or three minutes; but I presume I should be entitled to close the debate.

The SPEAKER. That is a question for the decision of the chairman of the Committee of the Whole House, not a question for determination by the presiding officer of the House.

Mr. WOLFORD. There are a great many of us who wish to speak on this important question. Gentlemen on both sides want time. I move to amend the amendment of the gentlemen from Alabama [Mr. HEWITT] so as to provide that the debate be continued for three hours.

The question being taken on the amendment of Mr. WOLFORD, there were, on a division—ayes 31, noes 67.

Mr. COSGROVE, I make the point that no quorum has voted.

Tellers were ordered; and Mr. WOLFORD and Mr. MCMILLIN were appointed.

The committee again divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 23, noes 88.

Mr. HOLMAN. No quorum, I believe, has voted. I suggest that two hours be allowed for further debate. A number of gentlemen wish to be heard. Two hours I presume will be satisfactory.

Mr. MCMILLIN. A fact which members of the House probably do not bear in mind is that this is a pension claim, and under the rule devoting Friday-night sessions to business of this character it would, if not disposed of before the recess to-day, come up to-night as unfinished business. Am I not right in that respect?

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks so.

Mr. MCMILLIN. If gentlemen wish to occupy the evening session with this bill I have no objection. I desire that we shall come to some conclusion on the matter if possible, but if it is desired that the bill go over till the night session for debate upon it, I have no objection whatever.

The SPEAKER. Is the point insisted upon that no quorum has voted?

Mr. HOLMAN. I will not insist upon it.

The SPEAKER. The amendment is not agreed to. Does the Chair understand the gentleman from Tennessee to accept the suggestion that there shall be but two hours of debate?

Mr. MCMILLIN. I desire to know whether it is agreed the bill shall come up to-night? If the gentleman is willing to consent to that, then I have no objection. I do not wish to have it go over to some other Friday and consume the time that should be devoted to other bills on the Private Calendar.

Mr. STEELE. I move to close all debate in thirty minutes.

Mr. YORK. Mr. Chairman, the members who signed the minority report desire to be heard on this question before the vote is taken on the bill. I wish to be heard, and shall be content with five or ten minutes to reply to the gentleman from New York [Mr. ROBINSON], who has chosen to attack me. So I can get five or ten minutes, I do not care.

MESSAGE FROM THE PRESIDENT.

A message in writing was received from the President, by Mr. PRUDEN, one of his secretaries, announcing that the President had approved and signed bills and a joint resolution of the following titles:

An act (H. R. 5462) making appropriation to supply deficiency in amount required for expenditure to June 30, 1884, for examination and surveys required by acts of March 3, 1875, and June 19, 1878, to ascertain depth of water and width of channel of South Pass of Mississippi River, also for gauging the water of the Mississippi River and its tributaries.

An act (S. 616) to establish a standard of time in the District of Columbia.

Joint resolution (H. Res. 191) for the printing of certain eulogies delivered in Congress upon the late Dudley C. Haskell.

SEPTIMIA R. MEIKLEHAM.

Mr. BROWNE, of Indiana. I propose to the other side that this debate be allowed to continue until 5 o'clock.

Mr. MCMILLIN. Make it half past 4, so we can get action on the bill after we come back into the House. I am willing to agree to anything if we can get action to-day; but I do not wish to use up the day with this debate and not come to some conclusion.

Mr. STEELE. If we can close debate at half past 4 I will withdraw my amendment.

Mr. BROWNE, of Indiana. If it be desirable the vote shall be taken before the recess, I am for one willing that this debate shall be closed at fifteen minutes to 5 o'clock. That would allow time for the roll-call, and I believe it would be satisfactory to both sides.

Mr. MCMILLIN. I think it should be, as it will enable us to get action this evening.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. That is, general debate?

The SPEAKER. Is that satisfactory?

Mr. HOLMAN. State the proposition.

The SPEAKER. That debate be closed at fifteen minutes to 5 o'clock.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. All debate?

The SPEAKER. All general debate.

Mr. HEWITT, of Alabama. And that time to be equally divided between both sides?

The SPEAKER. That can be done by unanimous consent.

Mr. BROWNE, of Indiana. That is what I propose.

The SPEAKER. Under the rules of the House it is not in order to limit the five-minute debate before that debate has begun.

Mr. BROWNE, of Indiana. I am aware of that, and I have proposed that all debate, all general debate, shall be closed at fifteen minutes to 5 o'clock.

Mr. STEELE. All debate; not all general debate.

Mr. MCMILLIN. That will give a chance for action to-day.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to that arrangement? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered by the House.

Mr. McMILLIN. I move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar.

The motion was agreed to; and the House accordingly resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar (Mr. COX, of New York, in the chair).

The CHAIRMAN. The committee resumes the consideration of the bill (H. R. 999) granting a pension to the sole surviving grandchild of the author of the Declaration of Independence. By order of the House all debate will close on this bill at a quarter to 5 o'clock.

Mr. HEWITT, of Alabama. And it is the understanding that time is be equally divided between those in favor and those opposed to the bill.

Mr. LYMAN. That is understood.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will divide the time between the two sides.

Mr. TILLMAN. Who will control the time?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will endeavor to control it.

Mr. TILLMAN. And be under the five-minute rule?

The CHAIRMAN. No; but general debate.

Mr. LYMAN. It is hard to say why my friend from New York has asked me to speak on this question; for if he can not carry a measure with the strength he must derive from his Samsonian locks, what is to be expected from the feeble efforts of one whose head has been polled by that cruelest of all Delilahs, Time? Perhaps he thinks it wise to draw a soldier from the camp of the enemy; for he knows full well that I am of Federalist tradition and a Whig by birth, and that there must therefore be great merit in his bill to persuade me to favor a descendant of Thomas Jefferson. Nevertheless, I honor the memory of Jefferson, albeit his political philosophy appears to me to have been wrong. My friend from New York has recounted the services of Jefferson as a statesman, as President of the United States, and as framer of the Declaration of Independence; but he performed one service greater than all these: he founded an opposition party, and founded it on principles which, whether right or wrong, were philosophical principles. They were the rights of individuals and of localities as against the rights of a central government, or, as afterward formulated, State rights against Federalism.

These two opposing theories of government hung like a positive and a negative thunder-cloud over this country. The slavery question brought them in contact, and there followed the storm which we call the war of the rebellion. That storm has cleared the air and we now know what powers properly belong to local governments and what to the central Government. Thomas Jefferson rendered a great service by bringing into being a party which, in its early days at any rate, did battle for beliefs which are natural to mankind. It is fit that the Congress should remember him in the person of his last surviving grandchild; such acts of recognition should not be frequent and can not be frequent; but it is wise public policy occasionally to do honor to names that are great in the nation. This policy is illustrated in the statues we erect, the centennials we celebrate, and the special pensions we occasionally grant. It is a policy pursued by every civilized nation, and this is a case which certainly comes under it.

Mr. JOHN S. WISE rose.

Mr. LYMAN. I will yield the remainder of the time allotted to those in favor of this bill to the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. JOHN S. WISE].

Mr. BROWNE, of Indiana. Mr. Chairman, I rise to oppose the bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Virginia is recognized.

Mr. BROWNE, of Indiana. I understood that the time was to be equally divided between the friends and opponents of the bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will state that of the time allowed for debate thirty-seven and one-half minutes will be allotted to those in favor of, and the same time to those who are opposed to, the bill. The gentleman from Virginia is now entitled to the floor.

Mr. JOHN S. WISE. Mr. Chairman, I had not intended to speak upon this subject until I was requested to do so by the gentleman who has presented the bill. But I accept, sir, the responsibility which that request imposes upon me. The task is a most grateful one and the compliment gratifying.

We are here to-day asked to recognize in this act the memory of the illustrious Thomas Jefferson. Of all the historic figures of the Revolution, I undertake to say that Thomas Jefferson stands pre-eminent as the type and the embodiment of republican democracy. About George Washington, the greatest of all, there ever lingered an element of lace and powder, suggestive of an aristocracy, which has no place in our system or in the sympathies of our people. About Hamilton, great and proud as he was, in all his thoughts and in all his deeds there was an eternal inclination toward centralization, which always repelled the idea of a pure democracy in that early day of the Republic. But Thomas Jefferson, from his red head to his homespun socks and red waistcoat was a democratic republican, pure and simple intus et in cute. And what has America ever done to perpetuate his memory? An inexpensive shaft in the wilderness of Monticello; now and then a counterfeit presentment of his noble lineaments, that reflect honor on those who put them up rather than to his memory; and occasionally a fulsome eulogy of Thomas Jefferson, who needed no eulogy to make him memorable in the hearts of the American people.

These constitute about the sum and substance of our recognition.

These, Mr. Chairman, constitute the whole acknowledgment of his illustrious service by the people of the United States. And here again to-day we have the idea presented that in granting this recognition on the part of this Government to his sole surviving grandchild we are granting a civil pension. I can not conceive how it is a civil pension when granted in right of the Commander-in-Chief of all the armies and navies of the Union. We are told that this grant is outside of our power, that this little one-horse Government, as it is described, and as they would have us understand it to be, has not power in all the broad grant of jurisdiction contained in the chart to give to this sole surviving grandchild of Thomas Jefferson, for eight years Commander-in-Chief of all the armies and navies of the Union, some acknowledgment of his pre-eminent services and abilities. We are told that the precedent is dangerous. Mr. Chairman, this people have waked up at last, after sixty years' sleep, to find they never did have but one Thomas Jefferson and will probably never have another. Until they do they need not be alarmed about the precedent.

Why, sir, looking around for a moment at the pensions that have been already granted by this Government, what will this country say of a Congress that declines to help this poor old lady? What was Thomas Jefferson? Who was he?

Sir, there is not a feature in all the history of the Government but what to-day bears the stamp and impress of his greatness. The child of the wilderness, in his mind's eye, in his visions of the future, he peopled this land with the teeming millions and boundless industries which now make it the greatest and the most powerful of earth. He adapted every law that his great mind drew to the condition of greatness to which the country has grown. Though he has been dead for sixty-odd years, to-day there is not a feature of government but what Thomas Jefferson foresaw. Wherever we turn and see the church-steeples pointing to heaven and hear the voices of the people assembled together without let or hinderance to praise God in their own way, with no one to oppress or make them afraid, let them not forget that the wizard mind of Thomas Jefferson foresaw that upon religious liberty was to be based the foundations of the fabric which he reared—the foundations of the future greatness of this country. Let them bear in mind that no other hand than Thomas Jefferson's wrote the statute of religious freedom. Wherever merry children are gathered together to receive instructions and be made civilized Christians instead of starving, naked heathen, let them bear in mind that none but the mind of Thomas Jefferson first conceived the idea of a system of general education in America.

Let it not be forgotten that although a slave-holder himself and in the midst of slave-owners, he, with godlike prescience, foresaw the dangers and curse of slavery, and that before even Wilberforce or Macaulay, before Adams or Phillips, Thomas Jefferson advocated emancipation.

Let it be remembered, Mr. Chairman, that Thomas Jefferson in the wilderness sat down and penned the greatest chart of human liberty. He penned a story of human wrongs and human aspirations that gave to the coming ages a government the greatness of which he never lived to witness, but the like of which has never existed from the dawn of civilization until the present time in the history of the world. These are but brief episodes snatched from the life of Jefferson. And yet when these things are remembered gentlemen on the other side talk about the dangers of establishing a precedent by the passage of this bill. When they can show that there is a danger of having another Thomas Jefferson there may be something in their suggestion.

I have heard to-day expressed by gentlemen upon the other side a strange misgiving about these principles. For my part I have no fear about stretching our constitutional powers too far. If we stretch our powers a little too far we can justify it by the precedents of Thomas Jefferson, who stretched his arm out and brought to this land the splendid territory of Louisiana, which is able to pay the bill we now propose.

Sir, if you will look about you to-day and see the pigmies who have come up and put their hands into the Treasury, I say it seems like puerile waste of time to raise this question about the power of this great Government to succor this poor, lone, feeble old lady, the last surviving representative of the greatest—the only Thomas Jefferson that ever lived.

How does she come here to-day? The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. POST] said this was not an eleemosynary institution; that we do not keep a Government poor-house. I accept the statement. Thank God, this gentle, pure, and noble old woman does not come here like a genteel mendicant. It was not of her motion the bill was offered. It was the spontaneous offering of other people. Sir, she has had too much experience of the gratitude of republics to come here asking for alms.

It is not the best-beloved daughter of Thomas Jefferson who comes here. For fifty years that true and beloved child of his old age has lain forgotten in her grave, and the Government never gave her one penny. It is not the quaint, little, old-fashioned grandchild who stood by Thomas Jefferson's dying-bed, and perhaps when his grand soul burst its earthly bonds saw for the first time the great mystery of life and death. No, this nation did not go to his illustrious bedside and lead that little weeping girl away and claim her as the nation's ward. Sixty years have gone by since that day, and the little child has grown up to be a woman, wife, mother, widow. Springs, summers, falls, and winters have come and gone; half a century of years has passed on; and to-day, schooled in the neglect of the Republic, she doubtless would be surprised at this act of charity, as she sits feeble, old, dying, with never one penny of succor to him or his heirs from this Government for services that stand up as proud and pre-eminent as the Dome of this Capitol stands amid the other structures by which it is surrounded.

So far as I am concerned I do not claim that I would have originated this bill. I do not claim that if it had been left to me alone I would have conceived the idea of passing such a bill.

But I do ask this House to-day in no sectional spirit and from no partisan standpoint, I ask all men here present, regardless of party, to make this Presidential year remembered by putting upon the highway of our travels this splendid milestone of gratitude on the part of the American Republic to the greatest politician, the greatest statesman, that this country ever produced, and whose memory never has been properly acknowledged in all the years that have gone by since he died. [Applause.]

Mr. ROBINSON, of New York. We now want to hear from the gentleman from Kentucky, Colonel WOLFORD. And I want to ask the Chair to reserve for me till the end of the debate four minutes. I yield the rest of the time allotted in support of the bill to Colonel WOLFORD.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will state to the gentleman from New York that the time allotted to the supporters of the bill will expire at 7½ minutes after 4 o'clock.

Mr. WOLFORD. Mr. Chairman, the proposition to pension the granddaughter of Thomas Jefferson is not unconstitutional in my humble judgment, as has been intimated by some able gentlemen upon this floor. If it were, it would have been unconstitutional to donate $500,000 to feed the sufferers by the floods. One is as much unconstitutional as the other. And in fact, sir, every pension that was ever voted by the United States is unconstitutional, if this is unconstitutional. In the brief time allotted to me to speak upon this subject I do not propose to waste any of the time I have upon the question of the constitutionality of this measure.

It has been said that republics are ungrateful. Are we to have that proposition demonstrated here to-day? When we have here before us this claim on behalf of the granddaughter, poor, penniless, of one who has done as much for his country as any man who ever lived in the United States of America, when we know all the friends of civil liberty throughout the world admire the principles and views of Thomas Jefferson, when the friends of liberty everywhere in the United States and throughout the world are listening to hear what the Government of the United States will say upon the question of giving a small pension to the only remaining granddaughter of Thomas Jefferson, are we to stop and argue about the unconstitutionality of a thing which has been settled by all the acts which have been passed by this Congress granting pensions?

The gentleman from Alabama [Mr. HEWITT], the chairman of the committee which reported this bill, voted to pension the Mexican soldiers on the ground of service. I do not object to pensioning the widows of Presidents. I believe, sir, that every man that does great service, that brings his mind and soul and heart to the service of his country, ought to be remembered. I am as much in favor of pensions for civil service as I am in favor of pensions for military service, provided that service is as great, provided it is as good, provided it is rendered for a common country and the common interest.

When the world recognizes the great intellect of this our illustrious statesman, when mankind everywhere recognizes it, are we to say that because we are in a republic we will not recognize these great services? When the widow of Abraham Lincoln was pensioned Congress did right. Congress did right also to pension the widows of other ex-Presidents because of their great services. In that Congress set an example well worthy of imitation.

But I do not care about precedents. Were I a judge I would want a law and a precedent. But when I come here to legislate for my constituents, to legislate for 50,000,000 of freemen, I want no precedents. What I want to know is the right or the wrong of any proposition presented to me. I apprehend that this Congress has sense enough to take care of itself on every question that may come before it. And I apprehend also that those who will come after us will have equal sense to decide whether they will follow precedents or act according to their own judgment of right and wrong. This is simply a question of right and wrong.

At the crowning point in our history, when it was thought that we as a nation could not survive; at a time when the independence of the Colonies had never been thought of except by a few great, far-seeing, wise patriots like Thomas Jefferson; at the crowning time when the world thought that our fathers would be overwhelmed in their efforts to establish on this continent a nation founded upon freedom and justice, Thomas Jefferson stepped forward and indited that great document which has challenged the admiration of friends of freedom everywhere, that great charter of our freedom, of equal rights and equal privileges, the Declaration of Independence. His whole life, as has been said by the eloquent men who have preceded me in this discussion, was devoted to the good of his country and to the happiness of his fellow-citizens.

Who can read the history of Thomas Jefferson in connection with the history of our country, I care not whether he be a Republican or a Democrat—who can read his history in which is recorded the fact that he rose above all little prejudices and little obstacles, and with a great mind and a great heart grasped the right and the wrong of every question as he did when he obtained for us that empire, Louisiana, and like a statesman rose above all partisan feelings—who can read that history and be willing to tell the world by his vote to-day that he will not with heartfelt gratitude remember the distinguished services of Thomas Jefferson?

I have not time to discuss this question as I would like to discuss it. But if you say that you will not pass this bill, that you will not perform this act of simple justice, that you will let the granddaughter of Thomas Jefferson remain in poverty, the world will understand what you have done. Ay, more; the world will see that this Republic is so afraid of giving a little money, is so afraid of—I was going to say of doing right, but I will use the language of the distinguished gentleman from Texas [Mr. REAGAN] and say is so afraid of doing wrong—that it will not vote a pittance to the granddaughter of Thomas Jefferson.

Take the history of our country and examine it, and you will find there the records of great men, who upon important occasions have arisen equal to the emergency; you will find numbers of them. But gentlemen say, this will open a door. I hope the door will be opened. I hope that we will have a door opened when men perform great services to be remembered through all ages and for all time. My distinguished friend who stands before me says that he remembers with heartfelt gratitude the distinguished services of Thomas Jefferson. And I am told by him and others that if Thomas Jefferson was here he would not vote for this bill.

Sir, I do not believe it. I believe he would vote for a bill like this, and I know of nothing in the Constitution of the United States that would prevent his voting for it. I never saw anything in any of his writings that would lead me to believe he would not vote for such a bill as this.

If it had so been that General Washington had a grandchild and Thomas Jefferson was sitting here in the Congress of the United States when a bill granting her a pension was presented for the action of Congress, do you believe that Thomas Jefferson would say, "Well, George Washington, your name was illustrious; you were first in war, first in peace, and first in the hearts of your countrymen. Oh, how I admire you. Oh, how I love you; yet there is something, I can not tell what, it is not in the Constitution of my country, it is not in the history of the past (and, thank God for that), it is not in the history of any party in this country; but there is something, I can not tell you what, which prevents my voting for this bill. I want to save the public money. I want to go before the world as a man who holds fast by the public Treasury; as a man who stickles for constitutional rights, and therefore I can not vote a pension to your granddaughter?"

Do you believe he would say that? Do you believe he would say, "The world may look with amaze and wonder at the vote that I shall give; but I, Thomas Jefferson, the great philosopher, the great advocate of equal rights and equal privileges, the great friend of free government, the lover of America, the friend of education, will sit here and, although my heart swells almost to bursting (like some distinguished gentlemen who on this occasion have argued on the other side), although I love the memory of Washington, although I love the granddaughter of the illustrious Washington, yet I can not vote for this bill and his granddaughter must starve?" I do not believe Thomas Jefferson would ever have said any such thing.

If we reject this bill and refuse to the granddaughter of Thomas Jefferson a pension, the world may know that the American Congress has not risen to the high point of saying that the distinguished services of Jefferson for his country will never be forgotten.

The constitutional right to pass the bill is clear; the precedents are clear, and, as I have said, I hope those precedents will be followed. I trust that in every case where our country has received such services as those of Thomas Jefferson, if the patriot rendering those services should have a granddaughter in want, the Government will come forward and say to that grandchild, "You are the daughter of this nation; the people of the United States love you; the Congress of the United States, the representatives of the people, testify their affection, and with fraternal care take you by the hand and say, you shall not suffer want." We thus refute the slander that republics are ungrateful; we forever put that cry to silence. We do remember such great and lasting services as those of Thomas Jefferson.

But gentlemen say, "We have so many great men." I admit, sir, that in the constellations of our political and military sky there are a great many bright and shining stars. I thank God for it. I would that they were like the sands of the sea, that they could not be numbered. I would remember every one who has done his duty faithfully. But in the galaxy that shines forth in our national firmament there is only one name greater and higher than that of Thomas Jefferson. The immortal Lincoln must be placed below him, though in an emergency he made himself great by doing what he believed to be his duty and violating the Constitution, as he said he did, for the good of the nation. Others have done well; but I say there is only one name in our roll of Presidents that can be placed above that of Thomas Jefferson. I mean, of course, George Washington, the Father of his Country—" first in war, first in peace, first in the hearts " of the American people; Washington, whose reputation was as pure as it was brilliant, whose career was as great and grand as it was good. Next to him, I say, stands Thomas Jefferson.

[Here the hammer fell.]

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York [Mr. ROBINSON] has four minutes remaining.

Mr. ROBINSON, of New York. I wish to reserve my time until the close of the debate.

Mr. HOLMAN obtained the floor, and said: I yield to the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. YORK].

Mr. YORK. Mr. Chairman, as a member of the Committee on Pensions I was one of those who signed the minority report on this bill, but I had not intended to take part in this discussion, and I would not do so if I had not been attacked in the course of the debate. My friend from New York [Mr. ROBINSON] has seen fit to step aside to assail me. He has said that gentlemen who signed the minority report were here in former Congresses when bills were passed pensioning widows of Presidents, &c. As his remarks would appear to include me among that number I want to say to the gentleman that this is my first session in Congress, and I had nothing in the world to do with the passage of the bills referred to.

The gentleman from New York has said further that while the other gentlemen of the minority occupy a certain political standpoint, yet as to myself he does not know where to find me. I want to say to him that he will always find me on the side opposed to civil pensions. So far as my political record is concerned I propose to be on the side of the laboring people of this country, and I am opposed to taking their money and voting it in this way.

We all acknowledge the great services of the patriot Thomas Jefferson. In the "hour that tried men's souls" he was faithful to his country. I would be willing to do almost anything in honor of the memory of Thomas Jefferson; but I can not so far step aside from the duty which I owe to my country and my people as to vote for a civil pension, even though the recipient be a grandchild of Jefferson.

Let the Forty-eighth Congress pass this bill, and it will be the entering wedge for hundreds and thousands of propositions of the same character which will follow in its track. I know that this case appeals to the sympathy of every man on this floor; I know we all feel impelled to do what may be in our power for this poor helpless woman. But still the obligation which we owe to our constituents forbids us to initiate a policy of granting civil pensions.

In this country, Mr. Chairman, we have but few precedents for this step. There have been bills granting relief to the widows of some of our deceased Presidents. But in Europe the civil list is weighing down the people, crushing them to the earth; and I feel that if the American Congress should pass this bill to-day its tendency will be inevitably in the direction of the creation of an oppressive civil-pension list in this country.

Gentlemen talk about the services of Thomas Jefferson. But, sir, we have the same right to talk about the services of those gallant soldiers, those patriots who stood by the flag of the country in the Revolution, who gave us the liberties which we to-day enjoy. If those services had proper recognition, would not the children of those men be receiving pensions to-day? They have gone to their graves in sorrow, pinched by hunger and in want. They were granted no pension during their lives. Here to-day, notwithstanding such has been the case in the past, it is attempted to establish a precedent by which we would give in the future a civil pension to the grandsons and granddaughters of everybody who had served the public. I say that I am opposed to the establishment of any such system in this country.

I have risen only to state the grounds of my opposition. If I had not been attacked by the gentleman from New York [Mr. ROBINSON] I would not have opened my mouth. As other gentlemen desire to be heard I will yield the time I have remaining to the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. TILLMAN].

Mr. TILLMAN. Mr. Chairman, this bill appeals to our sympathies. All of our sensibilities are aroused in behalf of this claim; but, sir, sentiment is a poor guide in legislation. The great nation from whom we descend, from whom we have derived our precedents, our literature, our language, ay, from whom we have inherited our liberties, is governed by judgment, by enlightened self-interest, and not by sentiment. The misfortune of the gentleman who introduced this bill is that he and his nation (Ireland) are too much governed by sentiment.

Sir, there is no authority in the Constitution to grant this pension. Jefferson himself, in the Declaration of Independence, says all men are born equal. Would it be equality to pension his granddaughter and not pension other men's granddaughters?

The Constitution also says private property shall not be taken for public use without just compensation. Now, the taxes we collect from the people are private property appropriated for public use, and what compensation would the people get for the taxes they would yield to be turned over to this good lady, if the bill shall pass, except the indulgence of a sentiment?

The Constitution also says that Congress shall have power to lay and collect taxes to pay the debts of the United States and to provide for the common defense and the general welfare. It provides for the common defense by granting military and naval pensions, but how it can provide for the common defense by pensioning Jefferson's or any other man's granddaughter I fail to see.

Mr. Chairman, we ought to grant liberal naval and military pensions. I shall so long as I hold a seat on this floor be ever ready to vote pensions to the soldiers and sailors of the United States, even those in the late civil war who conquered the South. But, sir, while in favor of just and liberal military and naval pensions, I can not and never will vote for civil pensions to anybody.

Soldiers and sailors risk their lives. They risk their health. They may be disabled by disease or wounds. They may become disabled from supporting themselves, much less their wives and children. If they lose their lives in the service of their country, that country should do something to supply the place of the parent toward the sustenance and establishment in life of their children as well as toward supporting the widows.

When men enter the military and naval service of their country they enter it voluntarily it is true, but they are slaves of the Government, bound to obey its orders as long as the contract they made shall continue. They have no choice but to obey and risk their health and their lives, and they should be pensioned when disabled, and when killed their widows and children should be pensioned. But where is the man in the civil service of the country who did not enter and remain in it voluntarily, and who, therefore, has no right to claim a pension, no matter what he does for his country?

Why, sir, the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. JOHN S. WISE] said Jefferson had no reward. Was it no reward to be made President of the United States? What is it moves the men who are here and the boys who will take our places in a few years? Honor. It is the pursuit of honor that makes statesmen. It is gratified ambition that rewards a life of daily and nightly toil, and careful regard for one's private character and public conduct that makes statesmen in this or any other free country. And when the highest honor the people of the United States could bestow was given to Jefferson, was that nothing?

And, Mr. Chairman, the gentleman also said that Jefferson had received no pension, that his family had received none. Sir, he only confesses his ignorance of the legislation of his country when he said it. I assert that Jefferson and his family have received over $40,000 in pensions from the United States. Why, sir, in 1814–'15 a debate came up in both Houses of Congress about the purchase of his library. This was after the Capitol and Congressional Library had been burned by the British. Congress appropriated $23,950 for his library as an act of charity, for it was notorious he had no skill in finance and that he was very poor. There was great opposition to it in the debate. It was carried only by a vote of 81 to 71 after a prolonged discussion. It was asserted and admitted that his library was worth very little for public purposes, because it was mostly of works in the French and other foreign languages and in the abstruse sciences, for he was a very scientific man. Therefore it was held that they were comparatively worthless as a library for Congress; and another objection was that his library was full of works of imagination and atheistical and infidel books. But, sir, owing to the veneration that they had, and the admiration and the gratitude they felt, for him they voted that sum of money to support him in his declining years, as he did not die until 1826. It was also conceded in the nature of a pension, although given in a lump sum to Mrs. Randolph, who was the daughter of Jefferson and the mother of this lady.

Again, in 1848 Congress appropriated $20,000 to purchase the manuscripts of Mr. Jefferson. That was carried, after a protracted discussion, by a vote of 58 to 60, being a majority of only two in favor of it. Why? Because the representatives of the people said that every public paper of Jefferson that was of any value had been already published. Still a majority, out of the gratitude and admiration which prevailed for him, as I have said in regard to his library, concluded that they would vote the $20,000 more for this very lady who is asking this pension here, and her brother, Thomas Jefferson Randolph, who was named for his grandfather. Six thousand dollars more was appropriated to publish the manuscripts, and the heirs have had the benefit of it. So that Jefferson, you may say, was pensioned, his daughter was pensioned, and his granddaughter, and her brother, his namesake, were pensioned to the amount of $50,000 when money was worth twice as much as it is now. Hence so far they have all been pensioned. Now, in the name of justice and democratic equality, is there to be no end to the applications here asking us to unlock the Treasury doors to pension Jefferson's descendants?

Sir, I wish my time was not limited. There are a great many general principles involved in this question and a good many facts which I could present, but I have not the time. I will simply say that I can very well account for the position taken by a good many gentleman on my right (Republicans) who are supporting this measure. It is because, like the sentimental gentleman who introduced this bill and the too-tender hearted but brave Kentuckian [Mr. WOLFORD] who advocates it, they believe the powers of Congress are limited only by the discretion of Congress. There would never have been any use to have had a written constitution if our forefathers had been willing to concede that doctrine; and every patriot of common sense I think must admit that no man who knows human nature in all of its aspects would be willing to intrust his rights to the discretion even of an angel from heaven, much less to poor, fallen, sinful man. But the discretion of Congress in the pursuit of the general welfare is too often the guide, I fear, of my friends on my right; and I do hope that none on this side will approve such a principle. I believe that a great many, even over on the other side, will not follow a bad precedent in support of a measure merely because it excites our profoundest sympathies.

Mr. BROWNE, of Indiana. Will the gentleman be good enough to tell me to what party the committee belongs that reported this bill?

Mr. TILLMAN. I believe to three parties. [Laughter.] One of Independent proclivities, like the gentleman on my right from North Carolina [Mr. YORK].

Mr. BROWNE, of Indiana. But to what side——

Mr. TILLMAN. Please do not take up my time.

Mr. BROWNE, of Indiana. But my colleague [Mr. MATSON] asserted a while ago that the majority was responsible for the legislation of Congress.

Mr. TILLMAN. I think the majority of the last House set a very bad example by pensioning the widows of the Presidents, although that was not as bad as pensioning the superannuated Federal judges in 1869, because there was some justification in pensioning the widows of Lincoln and Garfield in particular, as these latter were each Commander-in-Chief of the Army and Navy when they were assassinated, and assassinated because they were Commander-in-Chief. Hence those pensions were in one sense military.

If we ever open the door as proposed by this bill to grant a pension to a President's granddaughter, then there will at no distant day be innumerable applications from all quarters to grant pensions to other Presidents' granddaughters and great-granddaughters, just like the members of Washington's family made application to be interred in the burial vault erected for the Father of his Country. The guide-books tell us that nearly every member of the Washington family, even to the remotest degree, thought he or she was worthy of being buried alongside of the illustrious man who was "First in war, first in peace, and first in the hearts of his countrymen;" and they were buried there until the nuisance became so great that the key to the vault had to be thrown into the Potomac to stop the sacrilege forever.

Thirty Washingtons in name and kindred blood were laid away in that vault for the reason that example is contagious, and a demand for equality is planted deeply in the human breast. What is only an act in this generation becomes a practice in the next, a custom in the next, and then it gets to be law.

Tennyson has truly said

> Freedom broadens slowly down
> From precedent to precedent.

He might have said as much of tyranny, luxury, or corruption, since every virtue or vice broadens and lengthens, deepens and strengthens with repetition.

I repeat, grant this civil pension, and you will but follow the precedents of the pensions you granted to the Federal judges in 1869 and the other pensions you granted to the Presidential widows in the last House. You confine this bill to the granddaughter of Jefferson, it is true, now; but it will go on, and on, and on, generation after generation, in respect to Jefferson's posterity, and soon other great civilians' families will be successively pensioned, until our Treasury shall groan under the burden of its civil-pension list as is the case with every effete government in Europe. The United States has a larger military and naval pension-roll than all the governments in the world put together; but, thank God, as yet the pettiest kingdom abroad has a larger civil-pension list than we have. Do not, I implore you, add civil pensions to our present and still rapidly growing enormous Army and Navy pensions.

Mr. Chairman, as we all claim to be democrats, all republicans, all patriots—I say as the door leading to the Treasury by which civil pensioners can enter has been opened only to admit Federal judges and Presidential widows, I hope we will agree on both sides of the House to lock the civil-pension door of the Treasury for the future and throw the key into the Potomac. [Applause.]

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. HOLMAN. I now yield five minutes to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. WARNER.]

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. Mr. Chairman, somebody has said that it is in the name of the Lord that all evil begins. The old Latin maxim, freely translated, is that all bad precedents have their rise in good beginnings. That has always been the case. That this bill would establish a precedent new in its character in the history of this country nobody I think will deny; and it is proposed to establish this precedent by the force of the great name of Thomas Jefferson.

I trust I am not lacking in appreciation of the great services of Thomas Jefferson, the man who beat down the doctrines of entail and primogeniture, who established religious freedom, and penned that great paper which I hold to be the most important state paper in the possession of man—the Declaration of Independence. The services of such a man Democrats, at any rate, I trust appreciate. But that is one thing, and the proposition to make use of a great name to establish a bad precedent is quite another thing.

Upon what ground is this claim for a pension based? Why upon the ground of need or want, coupled with the great services of a grandfather. Now, Mr. Chairman, that is precisely the ground upon which the entire civil and hereditary pension-lists of England now rest; that is, want and services to the state, or, if a hereditary pension, then the services of an ancestry of greater or less distinction. It was on that ground that the doctrine was based that a king had a right to alienate the revenues of the crown and to select persons whose ancestors had been distinguished, or who themselves, perhaps, had rendered distinguished services, and place them upon a civil-pension list.

Undoubtedly there were excellent precedents for the beginning of the present permanent pension-lists in European countries, which now amount to millions of dollars. There were precedents for pensioning the descendants of the Duke of Marlborough, or the Duke of Cornwall, or the Duke of Grafton. Precedents were doubtless followed in establishing the long pension-roll I find here in the book that I hold in my hand.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I believe that every gentleman upon this floor, certainly every Democrat here, will agree that all the teachings of Thomas Jefferson are opposed to the principle of a civil-pension list on any plea whatever. I want to read, Mr. Chairman, a few words taken from Randall's Life of Thomas Jefferson, and quote a few lines from his own writings on this question.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. I think I have not had the five minutes assigned me, if the time be allowed which was occupied by the Chair in bringing the committee to order.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair allowed half a minute for that.

Mr. HOLMAN. How much time have I remaining?

The CHAIRMAN. Eleven minutes. By order of the House debate will be closed at a quarter before 5.

Mr. HOLMAN. I yield to my friend from Ohio [Mr. WARNER] three minutes more of my time.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. It is well known that Thomas Jefferson's estate became seriously involved on account of his obligations in connection with the failure of Governor Nicholas. Mr. Randall, his biographer, says in the Life of Thomas Jefferson:

> Those who knew how determinedly he has refused to accept, under any circumstances or in any form, a donation from the State had felt some interest to know how he would receive the proposal to have his debts paid by a popular subscription. Instead of wounding, it gratified his feelings. It struck him in the light of a purely filial offering. "I have spent three times as much money and given my whole life to my countrymen," he declared, "and now they nobly come forward in the only way they can to repay me and save an old servant from being turned like a dog out of doors. No cent of this," he exclaimed, "is wrung from the tax-payer; it is the pure and unsolicited offering of love." These feelings "closed with a cloudless sun a long and serene day of life."

I suggest that it would be much more appropriate if the gentleman from New York [Mr. ROBINSON] would circulate the hat here and take up a contribution; that such a proceeding would be much more in accordance with the precepts and principles of Thomas Jefferson than to levy a tax or to use the power of the Government to appropriate money to his descendants.

If the door be opened by the passage of this bill where will we stop? With the granddaughter? Why not go on to the great-granddaughter? That is the principle of hereditary pensions. Why not include the descendants of Washington, Adams, and Franklin? Is there any real reason why on a like plea a like pension should not be given to any descendant of a distinguished ancestor? Show that there is need on the one hand and great services on the other, and with this precedent a claim to a pension is established. Then where will we stop? I say to you gentlemen this is the beginning of a civil-pension list, the end of which no one can predict. In my opinion they honor Thomas Jefferson most who carry out the principles which he established, and who say "no" to this proposition. To do that will be establishing a precedent of the greatest possible value, for if a pension be denied to a granddaughter of Jefferson it will be granted to no one in the civil service or for the distinguished services of any ancestor. No doubt this case appeals to our sympathies, but it is not safe to legislate from such motives. There is nothing so unsafe as emotional legislation.

Mr. HOLMAN. We have passed through the first century of our history as a Government. We have fairly entered upon our second century. The great principle of the civil compact announced by Thomas Jefferson, fully recognizing the inalienable right of the individual man and the natural equality of men as the only just foundation of government, has through all this period guided the fortunes and controlled the advancement and directed the forces of this Republic. And it is at least a cause for profound gratitude that it was not until the opening years of the second century of the Government that such a measure as this, in absolute defiance and reversal of the doctrines he taught, has come before the American Congress. The presence of this measure in this House is a remarkable event, but it is still more remarkable that it is here in this House controlled by the representatives of the great party founded upon the great principles of the apostle and champion of human rights.

What a commentary on human affairs! The great name of Jefferson—great because he broke into fragments the old idea of government resting on privileged and favored classes with rights transmitted through the blood of successive generations, and founded free institutions, a living government, on the natural equality and equal rights of men—is appealed to in behalf of his own posterity for going back on the great thought that has made his name immortal! The name of Jefferson invoked in behalf of a civil-pension list in consideration of rights founded in and resulting from descent and transmission of blood! What sacrilege! Every student of history has found right there the germ and origin of the aristocracies of the Old World. If that is not the basis on which the privileged and aristocratic classes of the Old World rest, then history teaches no lesson to mankind.

The name of Thomas Jefferson is invoked in a House of Representatives controlled by his avowed disciples, by men professing to be controlled by his grand yet simple maxims of government, in behalf of a civil-pension list not even resting on personal merit or public service, but on hereditary claim—a civil-pension list an outgrowth and support of monarchy, a privileged class living on the labor of others; a feature of the Old World's institutions the most abhorred by our fathers, yet now being gravely discussed by the American Congress, and the name of Jefferson invoked in its support. It is sacrilege to appeal to his name to support this measure. Among his first utterances when he came to be President of the United States was this:

> Still one thing more, fellow-citizens: A wise and frugal government, which will restrain men from injuring one another, which will leave them otherwise free to regulate their own pursuits of industry and improvement, and which shall not take from the mouth of labor the bread it has earned—this is the sum of good government, and this is necessary to close the circle of our felicities.

And yet it is the illustrious statesman who could utter sentiments like those whose name is invoked in a Democratic Congress to plant here the germ from which the aristocracies of the world have sprung. An early historian has said that when it was proposed in the convention which framed the Federal Constitution to embrace in it an article to prohibit the establishment of a civil-pension list one of the great statesmen of that convention rose to his feet and said: "No; put no such provision as that in your Constitution, for whenever the people of the government we are forming are prepared to establish a civil-pension list and permit a favored class to live on the fruits of their labor, then the very foundations upon which a republic rests will have already perished."

Yet at the beginning of our second century it is proposed to begin this movement for a civil-pension list, by which in the progress of time, following the example we are now asked to establish, growing with the years, broadening and deepening and widening as time shall advance and opportunity shall occur, you will fasten upon the labor of this country a privileged class, the existence of which in the Old World filled the land with poverty and wretchedness and peopled our shores with multitudes seeking shelter from oppression.

I protest against the begging of a civil-pension list in the name of Thomas Jefferson. I protest against it on the authority of every immortal truth he uttered. I protest that the history of that great and illustrious champion of human rights shall not be appealed to to justify a most dangerous and subtle precedent, which, growing with years, sanctioned by time, borne up by great names, sanctified by noble deeds and memories which our people will delight to cherish, may and will inflict fearful wrong upon our free institutions. Already your civil-pension list, the outgrowth of the last fifteen years, ought to excite the attention and alarm of our people; but here for the first time, and in behalf of an estimable lady, and in the name of one of the most illustrious champions of human rights and the foremost and grandest builder the world has produced, the right and claim are based solely on inheritance and descent. Here and on such an appeal all personal considerations should disappear and the effort to establish a dangerous and subtle precedent should be firmly resisted.

[Here the hammer fell.]

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair now recognizes the gentleman from New York [Mr. ROBINSON] for four minutes.

Mr. ROBINSON, of New York. I have but a few minutes to say what I desire to say upon this occasion. The gentleman from Indiana [Mr. CALKINS] desired to speak on this question, but I do not see him here, otherwise I would yield to him.

I am sorry that I am limited to four minutes to answer such eloquence as we have had poured out here against this benevolent act. The pension of Thomas Jefferson, which was referred to by my venerable friend from South Carolina [Mr. TILLMAN], was simply the purchase of his books. Does that gentleman propose that those books shall be brought out and burned if Thomas Jefferson's friends do not pay back what they cost? Does he intend to take away the property which Jefferson had in those books and of which his family received very little? If so, then let us know it.

I say that Mrs. Meikleham never received a penny of pension, and that anything which has been obtained by the Government from the descendants of Jefferson was of more value than the amount paid for it and is now of ten times the value.

The fathers of this Republic have been quoted here. If I had time I could show that Mr. Monroe, while minister to France, was applied to about a pension for a descendant of Benjamin Franklin, and he was in favor of it, and so stated in a book which a member of his family showed me the other day and which I have now in my possession. He would have been in favor of granting a pension to the descendant of Benjamin Franklin if it had been shown that she was in need.

Gentlemen on the other side say that we must draw the line somewhere. Do so, but for God's sake do not draw your infernal line across the face of Thomas Jefferson. You gave to the widows of Lincoln and Garfield, and all those men who did so are here.

Mr. TILLMAN. Yes; but it was because they were killed while in office, and because they were the Commanders-in-Chief of the Army and Navy, doing their duty toward the Government.

Mr. ROBINSON, of New York. I have no time to be interrupted. I say that all those gentlemen were here in Congress and voted for pensioning the widows of those Presidents. I say draw the line, but draw it this side of Jefferson, so that this poor old lady will be inside of it. As was suggested by my friend from Virginia, Jefferson was Commander-in-Chief of the Army and Navy, and served in that position longer than these other men did.

Mr. TILLMAN. But he was not killed while in office.

Mr. ROBINSON, of New York. There were other things to which I have not time to refer. Some question has been made about my having sympathies. I rejoice that I have some sympathies, that I have some Irish sympathies.

Mr. TILLMAN. I have, too, for I am part Irish myself.

Mr. ROBINSON, of New York. When Montgomery fell at Quebec, when Stark rescued your honor on the battlefield, when Morgan went down South and rescued you honor at the Cowpens, which was so much in need of rescuing; whenever you wanted a friend and appealed to Irish sympathy, Irishmen poured out their blood and treasures in order that the American Republic might be able to-day to give a small pension to the most illustrious lady living in the United States.

The CHAIRMAN. The time for general debate has expired. The bill will now be read for amendment and discussion under the five-minute rule.

The amendments reported by the Committee on Pensions were read, as follows:

> Strike out, before the word "dollars," the words "five thousand" and insert in lieu thereof "twenty-five hundred."
> Add to the bill the following:
> "And that it be made payable quarterly in advance."

Mr. WHITE, of Kentucky. I desire to ask whether it is in order now to offer a substitute for the bill?

The CHAIRMAN. When these amendments are disposed of a substitute will be in order.

The amendments were agreed to.

Mr. HEWITT, of Alabama. I move to strike out the enacting clause of the bill.

Mr. WHITE, of Kentucky. Mr. Chairman——

The CHAIRMAN. Debate is not in order.

Mr. WHITE, of Kentucky. I rise to a parliamentary inquiry; whether it is in order at this time to offer a substitute?

The CHAIRMAN. Not while the motion to strike out the enacting clause is pending. That takes precedence.

The question being taken on the motion of Mr. HEWITT, of Alabama, there were—ayes 129, noes 60.

Mr. ROBINSON, of New York. I call for tellers.

Tellers were not ordered; there being only 11 voting therefor.

So the motion of Mr. HEWITT, of Alabama, was agreed to.

Mr. MCMILLIN. I move that the committee rise to report to the House the bills on which we have acted.

The motion was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. COX, of New York, reported that the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar had directed him to report the bill (H. R. 1389) for the relief of Myron E. Dunlap with a recommendation that it be passed with amendments; and the bill (H. R. 999) granting a pension to the sole surviving grandchild of the author of the Declaration of Independence with a recommendation that the enacting clause be stricken out.

SIDNEY HENDERSON.

The SPEAKER. The first bill in order is the unfinished business coming over from last Friday, the bill (H. R. 3522) for the relief of Sidney Henderson, executrix.

Mr. GEDDES. I desire to offer a resolution with reference to recommitting this bill.

The SPEAKER. The question is upon ordering the bill as amended to be engrossed and read a third time.

Mr. DIBRELL. The resolution of the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GEDDES] is to be offered by agreement and its adoption will save some time.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the resolution.

The Clerk read as follows:

> Resolved, That House bill 3522, for the relief of Sidney Henderson, executrix of John Henderson, deceased, with the substitute therefor adopted by the House, be recommitted to the War Claims Committee, with instruction to report the same back to the House within ten days from this date, with the amount that they think should be paid on said claim; and that when said report is made this claim shall not lose its place upon the Private Calendar, but shall be placed where it now stands for action by the House.

Mr. DIBRELL. Mr. Speaker, upon examination of the papers and evidence in this case I find that every statement I made to the House in regard to it is corroborated; but in order to prevent any delay it has been agreed that this resolution be adopted.

The resolution was adopted.

MYRON E. DUNLAP.

The next bill reported from the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 1389) for the relief of Myron E. Dunlap.

The amendments reported from the Committee of the Whole House were agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. BAYNE moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

SEPTIMIA RANDOLPH MEIKLEHAM.

The next bill reported from the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 999) granting a pension to the sole surviving grandchild of the author of the Declaration of Independence.

The SPEAKER. This bill has been reported from the Committee of the Whole House with the recommendation that the enacting clause be struck out.

Mr. ROBINSON, of New York. On that question I demand the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were not ordered, there being only 10 voting in favor thereof.

The question being taken upon agreeing to the recommendation of the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar that the enacting clause of the bill be struck out, it was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. This recommendation of the Committee of the Whole House having been concurred in, the bill is rejected.

Mr. HOLMAN moved to reconsider the vote just taken; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

PUBLIC BUILDINGS AT SAN FRANCISCO.

Mr. MCMILLIN. I move that the House now take a recess till half past 7 o'clock this evening.

The SPEAKER. The Chair, before putting that question, if there be no objection, will lay before the House a message from the President of the United States, and also several requests of members for leave of absence.

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER laid before the House the following message from the President of the United States; which was read, and, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds, and ordered to be printed:

To the Senate and House of Representatives:

I transmit herewith for the consideration of Congress a communication from the Secretary of War, of the 12th instant, and accompanying papers, requesting an appropriation of $230,869.44 for the erection at the Presidio of San Francisco of additional buildings at heaquarters, military division of the Pacific, rendered necessary in consequence of the proposed increase of the garrison by removal of troops from points in San Francisco Harbor.

CHESTER A. ARTHUR.

EXECUTIVE MANSION, March 14, 1884.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

By unanimous consent, leave of absence was granted as follows:

To Mr. WARNER, of Tennessee, indefinitely, on account of the destruction of his dwelling-house by fire;

To Mr. POTTER, until Thursday next;

To Mr. HOUSEMAN, for ten days from to-morrow;

To Mr. COX, of New York, until Wednesday next;

To Mr. CONVERSE, until Monday next, on account of sickness;

To Mr. KELLEY, until Tuesday next; and

To Mr. BENNETT, for to-day, on account of sickness.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. DUNN. I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD an amendment which I desire to offer to the Post-Office appropriation bill.

Mr. HOLMAN. I call for the regular order.

The SPEAKER. The hour designated by order of the House for the recess has arrived. The gentleman from Tennessee, Mr. MCMILLIN, will preside at the evening session. The House is now in recess until half past 7 o'clock p. m.

EVENING SESSION.

At 7 o'clock and 30 minutes p. m. the House resumed its session, Mr. MCMILLIN in the chair as Speaker pro tempore.

Mr. MATSON moved that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar.

The motion was agreed to; and the House accordingly resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar, Mr. HATCH, of Missouri, in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. Under the order of the House the committee resumes the consideration of pension cases on the Private Calendar.

MRS. ELLEN M. FLAGG.

The first business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 3238) granting a pension to Mrs. Ellen M. Flagg.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and hereby is, authorized to place on the pension-roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Mrs. Ellen M. Flagg, widow of the late William H. Flagg, late a member of the Fifty-seventh Regiment Massachusetts Volunteers.

The report was read, as follows:

Ellen M. Flagg is the widow of William H. Flagg, Company G, Fifty-seventh Massachusetts Infantry. He enlisted February 27, 1864, and was honorably discharged May 31, 1865, for wounds received in service. He was granted an invalid pension (certificate No. 49183). His wounds were received at the battle of the Wilderness, a ball shattering both bones of left forearm, rendering it always after useless; and he also had two ribs fractured and the lung perforated, the ball passing around to his side, near the spine, where it was afterward found and extracted. In the same battle a ball passed through his cap and over the cranium, producing a concussion, from the effect of which he ever afterward suffered, causing him severe pains in the head and to become unconscious for hours. Recovering from these attacks he would be prostrated and weak. He finally died in the infirmary at Cleveland, Ohio, January 1, 1880, whither he was taken, from his room at a hotel where he was stopping, in an unconscious condition, and remaining so until his death. His widow filed an application for pension June 26, 1880, which was rejected on the ground of lack of sufficient medical evidence that the soldier's death was the result of wounds contracted while in service.

The evidence in the case is as follows, namely:

Sarah Eliza Randall certifies that—

"Flagg was in good health before enlistment, &c.; complained of great pain in head at times after service; suffering extreme agony, ofttimes becoming unconscious; never had these attacks before the war."

James E. Robbins certifies:

"Lived in same house with Flagg two years; saw him every day; was in poor health; he would often fall from his chair, and while at work, suffering from the pains in his head, would be unconscious for hours, and after such attacks be prostrate for days."

Dr. Horatio W. Clapp testifies:

"No brain trouble before enlistment; always healthy," &c.

Martha P. Clapp corroborates the above.

Alexander Flagg certifies:

"Soldier was in good health at enlistment. After discharge had frequent attacks of acute brain disease and paroxysms of pain; never had brain trouble before enlistment."

B. W. Holliday, M. D., and Thomas Rome, steward at the Cleveland city infirmary, certify that—

"Flagg was admitted to the institution December 30, 1879, in an insensible condition, and remained so until he died, two days later; that, as no post-mortem examination was made, the real cause of death was unknown, as well as a history of the illness, to any one here."

There is no evidence showing treatment for this disease in civil life; but the indications are that, as the trouble was permanent and by him considered incurable, he endured it as best he could until death relieved him.

We think the evidence of neighbors and acquaintances as to the extent and frequency of his paroxysms of pain and insensibility, supported as it is by the manner of his death, as certified by Dr. Holliday and Steward Rome, show a condition which, had a post-mortem been had, would have demonstrated that the cause of death was nearly connected with and had its origin in the injury to brain at the time the bullet passed through his cap, cutting into his hair, &c.

The committee therefore recommend the passage of the accompanying bill.

The bill was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

CHRISTOPHER P. DAVIDSON.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 2252) for the relief of Christopher P. Davidson.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That Christopher P. Davidson, who served as a surgeon's steward in the United States Navy, be allowed and paid out of the naval pension fund the amount of pension that would have been due him if he had been an enlisted person instead of an appointed one, as provided in section 4756 of the Revised Statutes, namely, one-half the pay of his rating at the time of his discharge.

The report was read, as follows:

Christopher P. Davidson, of Boston, Mass., served in the Marine Corps of the United States from October 3, 1836, until April 2, 1853, at which time he was honorably discharged. He was immediately appointed a surgeon's steward, United States Navy, serving in that capacity from April 2, 1853, until April 30, 1860. He was again appointed surgeon's steward December 15, 1862, and served until May 20, 1864, his total years of service being twenty-four. In August, 1879, he made an application for servitude pension under section 4756 Revised Statutes, which allows pension for twenty years' service in the Navy of the United States and honorable discharge therefrom. His claim was rejected for the reason that he did not come within the meaning of "enlisted man" as referred to in said section. So by technical construction he lost all benefits which should and would have accrued to him by reason of his faithful and meritorious service for eight years.

The Navy Department, recognizing the injustice by this discrimination between hospital stewards and the other petty officers of same grade, have since issued circulars (6 and 10) which in effect abolish this distinction and place all petty officers on the same footing. But Davidson, not being in the service at the time said circulars were issued, is precluded from enjoying the benefits arising thereunder. Your committee are of opinion that he has a claim in equity, and that he should be entitled to the same benefits he would have been had the last eight years of his service been under an enlistment instead of an appointment. They therefore recommend the passage of the accompanying bill with the following amendment: "This act shall take effect upon its passage."

The amendment was agreed to; and as amended the bill was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

GEORGE OVERMIRE.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 1756) granting a pension to George Overmire.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension-roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of George Overmire, formerly captain Company F, Thirtieth Regiment Illinois Volunteers, and pay him a pension as of the rank of captain from the date of his discharge from the military service of the United States, in lieu of the pension allowed him, under the general pension law, of the rank of sergeant of said company and regiment.

The report was read, as follows:

The Committee on Invalid Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 1756) granting a pension to George Overmire, having had the same under consideration, hereby report and recommend that said bill be amended by striking out the words "from the date of his discharge from the military service of the United States" from the eighth and ninth lines, and also striking out the words "under the general pension law, of the rank of sergeant of said company and regiment" from the tenth and eleventh lines, and also by adding thereto at the end of said bill the words "from the date of the passage of this act;" and that said bill so amended is hereby reported favorably, its passage recommended, and the discharge of the committee from its further consideration requested.

The amendment was agreed to; and the bill as amended was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

THEODORE C. HAWKINS.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 3838) granting a pension to Theodore C. Hawkins.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension-roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Theodore C. Hawkins, late a private in Company C, Fourth Wisconsin Volunteers, and late an employé in the United States Quartermaster's Department.

The bill was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

SIMPSON HARRIS.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 433) to increase the pension of Simpson Harris.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and is hereby, authorized and directed to increase the pension of Simpson Harris, a soldier of the war of 1812, and who now holds pension certificate numbered 3706, to the sum of $50 per month.

The report was read, as follows:

That Simpson Harris served in the war of 1812 as a private in Capt. James Graham's Company, North Carolina Militia, from November 28, 1814, to February 22, 1815; that he was honorably discharged, and was placed upon the pension-rolls as a pensioner at the rate of $8 per month under act of February 14, 1871.

Your committee further report that the petitioner is probably the oldest pensioner on the pension-rolls, being now over 104 years old. It also appears from the affidavit of Dr. Samuel A. Hinton, the claimant's family physician, that for more than five years he has been sorely afflicted; that he has suffered from paralysis since 1866; that he has steadily grown worse, other diseases intervening, until, since 1880, he has been entirely helpless. He has not been able to perform manual labor since 1868, and is poor and needy, and a charge upon the charity of his family and friends. He requires the services of an attendant at all times. In view of these facts your committee are of opinion that said claimant should receive the same pension which he would be entitled to if rated by the Pension Department for his disability, and report the bill back with a recommendation that it pass.

The bill was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

RUDOLPH JOHN MARTI.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 4697) for the relief of Rudolph John Marti.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension-roll the name of Rudolph John Marti, late of Company A, Sixty-third Regiment Pennsylvania Volunteers, at $20 per month, in lieu of $8 a month now received as pensioner of the late war.

The report was read, as follows:

Rudolph J. Marti's immediate trouble, by reason of which he was placed upon the pension-roll, was inguinal hernia. By the testimony of four thoroughly competent physicians the character of the hernia is such that a very strong truss has to be employed to confine it. Marti is a laboring man, with a dependent family, and toiling, confined by the truss, it has produced varicose veins in his legs by retarding circulation, until he is utterly incapacitated for work. He has exhibited his person to the committee, and his condition is truly pitiable. We recommend the passage of the bill at $24 per month instead of $20 as in the bill.

The amendment was agreed to, and the bill as amended was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

JOHN S. WEAVER.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 4717) for the relief of John Swearer.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension-roll the name of John Swearer, late a private in Company C, First United States Artillery, subject to the provisions and limitations of the general pension law.

The report was read, as follows:

The applicant alleges a shell wound of the left leg, at Fort Sumter, South Carolina, April 13, 1861. The only cause for rejecting his claim was that the records of the War Department do not show him to have been in the military service of the United States when wounded. He was a laborer, employed in the engineer department; was located at Fort Sumter, and it is shown by the records of the Surgeon-General United States Army that he was badly wounded by the explosion of a shell from the enemy's battery, and was admitted to hospital April 19, 1861. He has been examined by a proper board of examining surgeons, who find him one-half disabled by reason of shell wound of left leg. The Commissioner of Pensions recommends his claim.

We recommend allowance of his claim and passage of the bill.

The bill was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

CAROLINE SHEWARD.

The next business on the Private Calender was the bill (H. R. 4718) for the relief of Caroline Sheward.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension-roll the name of Caroline Sheward, widow of N. D. Sheward, late a teamster in the United States Army, who died in the prison of the enemy, subject to the provisions and limitations of the general pension laws.

The report was read, as follows:

N. D. Sheward, as appears by the records of the Quartermaster-General's Office, was a teamster in the United States service; was captured February 12, 1864, and died October 24, 1864, while a prisoner of war.

Under the law his widow, Caroline Sheward, can not obtain a pension without special relief. Her claim is certified as meritorious by the Commisioner of Pensions, who recommends that her name be placed on the pension-rolls, subject to the provisions and limitations of the general pension laws.

The committee recommend the passage of the bill.

The bill was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

WILLIAM W. DAY.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 4188) granting a pension to William W. Day.

The bill was read, as follows:

The report was read, as follows:

William W. Day, father of Cornelius V. Day, and husband of Abbie A. Day, deceased, asks to be paid the pension granted to his wife, but of which she received no part, owing to her death occurring a short time prior to the completion of the case by the Pension Office. The son, Cornelius V. Day, died of disease while in the service of the Government, in the late war, at Baton Rouge, La. The evidence in his case was deemed conclusive as to his disabilty, and the pension was granted to the mother. The evidence shows that both father and mother were largely dependent upon the son for support, and that he sent them money while in the Army.

The father, the petitioner, is now about 75 years of age and is quite infirm, and entirely unable to gain a living and wholly dependent upon others. Had the mother lived to have received the pension granted her it would have inured to the benefit of the father also, although her death had occurred a day after its reception.

As the father was equally dependent with the mother, it seems that he should not be cut off from the benefits awarded by the law to the mother, death intervening to prevent her enjoyment of it. Your committee think the father should receive the pension, and therefore recommend the passage of the bill H. R. 4188.

Mr. McMILLIN. Does this not provide for an arrearage, and, if so, should that not be struck out in accordance with the action at the last Congress?

Mr. BAGLEY. This is an exception to ordinary arrears of pension. The pension certificate in this case was granted to the mother, but before it was received by her she died. The father is 75 years old. Had she lived and received the certificate he would have had the benefit of it. When the son died these old people were supported by the daughter, who taught school. She is now blind and her father is blind. It is only just this pension should date back to the original issue. Had the mother lived to have received the pension granted her it would have inured to the benefit of the father also, although her death had occurred a day after its reception. This is not the case of an ordinary arrear of pension.

Mr. McMILLIN. Before she died was the pension certificate issued to her.

Mr. BAGLEY. It was issued, as stated by the report, a short time prior to the death of the pensioner.

Mr. McMILLIN. The certificate then did issue?

Mr. BAGLEY. I understand it did issue.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. This is to allow what had been previously granted by the office.

Mr. BAGLEY. Yes, sir.

Mr. BEACH. Mr. Chairman, I can answer the question of the gentleman from Tennessee, as I happen to know something of the circumstances of this case.

A little over two years ago, when I first entered upon my duties here, a very respectable neighbor of this aged couple called my attention to their destitute condition and requested me to expedite a claim which the mother was prosecuting in the Pension Office.

I was satisfied then that it was a very meritorious case, and gave particular attention to it, and did all that I could to hasten its adjudication; but, owing to the delays with which the members here are all familiar, it was perhaps a year before I succeeded in getting it out of the Pension Office. The office decided in favor of granting the pension and the certificate was issued in favor of the mother. This certificate was forwarded to the claimant, who was a resident of Sullivan County, New York, one of the counties I have the honor to represent. It reached there, however, too late. She had died a few days before, perhaps some ten days prior to the arrival of the pension certificate.

This bill simply gives the father the right to draw the money which the mother would have drawn under the original certificate issued by the Pension Office if she had lived; and here let me say that the father was entitled equally with the mother to the benefits of this pension. The very fact that the certificate issued to the mother was evidence that the father could not support her, and that both were dependent upon the son who had been killed.

For a long period after the death of the son this aged couple was supported in a scant and meager manner by the exertions of their daughter, who taught school in a small country village. The father is now deprived of that source of support, because the daughter has gone absolutely blind. So we have the father and sister of a gallant soldier who gave up his life on the battlefield in the service of his country, the one approaching his fourscore years, the other hopelessly blind, both of them in a state of abject poverty, helpless themselves and unable to help each other, with no living relative to assist them, asking us to give them the money which had been declared to belong to the mother, but which she could not make available because the hand required to indorse the papers was laid still in death when they arrived.

Mr. McMILLIN. I see from the statement of the gentleman from New York that this does not embrace the arrearage feature which I thought it did, but which has not been granted by Congress in these special acts.

Mr. BAGLEY. It does not.

Mr. McMILLIN. I thought it proper that this explanation should be made.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection the bill will be laid aside and reported to the House with a favorable recommendation.

There was no objection, and it was ordered accordingly.

SAMUEL C. WRIGHT.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 2267) granting an increase of pension to Samuel C. Wright, with an amendment.

The bill is as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension-roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Samuel C. Wright, late a sergeant of Company E, Twenty-ninth Regiment Massachusetts Volunteers, at the rate of $50 per month, instead of $24 per month, which he has heretofore been receiving; said increase to date from the passage of this act.

The report is as follows:

Samuel C. Wright enlisted at Plymouth, Mass., May 6, 1861, into an unattached company, which afterward was attached to the Twenty-ninth Massachusetts Infantry and lettered E. He was discharged February 3, 1865, serving some three years and nine months. The history of this soldier discloses a list of wounds and casualties the effects of which, increasing with years, render him at the present time unfit for and unable to perform any manual labor.

His record shows that he was wounded in the head at White Oak Swamp January 30, 1862, by a fragment of shell. He was next wounded at Antietam September 17, 1862, in the left leg, at knee, while volunteering with some sixty others to pull down the fence previous to the charge into the "Corn field," so called; and, though told by his officers to go to the hospital, refused so to do, and kept with his regiment, receiving treatment from the surgeon of the regiment.

In June, 1863, he became worn down by hard marching and fell by the roadside unconscious, from which condition he did not recover until some two weeks after, when he found himself in Overton hospital, Tennessee, sick with typhoid fever, from the effects of which he has never fully recovered.

In October, 1863, while returning to his regiment from Overton hospital, and while in line of duty, he was run over by a six-mule team and army wagon near Camps Nelson and Dick Robinson, which broke the bones and cords of the left foot, injuring him also internally, and from the effects of which he is lame to-day, besides being compelled to wear a truss for support of his bowels. He was next wounded at Cold Harbor in the left arm by a rifle-ball, and was treated at his regiment by the surgeon.

At the (crater) "battle of the mine" he was wounded again by a rifle-ball, which destroyed his right eye, the ball passing through to the back of his head, was left for dead on the field, and so reported. (See Adjutant-General's report, Massachusetts three years' volunteers.) He was taken from the mine on a stretcher to his home, and was in bed under the doctor's care for eighteen months of the next two years, spending in that time $2,000 for physicians, surgeons, and opticians in the endeavor to save his other eye.

He is borne on the pension-roll at $24 per month (certificate No. 39469), which he felt was not commensurate with his increasing disability. He applied for an increase, which was rejected for the reason that he was receiving the full amount he was entitled to under the law.

In February, 1882, he had a partial stroke of paralysis (certificate of doctor filed) on the left side, rendering his leg almost useless, and since which time he has been compelled to accept a minor position from that in which he had been employed, and at a loss of $540 per year to him, and that the duty he now performs is one requiring but one hour in writing per day, and which he only succeeds in accomplishing by the greatest effort on his part, sometimes being compelled, as testified to by those in the office with him, to lie down several times while doing the hour's work required in making his return, such is his pain and suffering from his wound in head.

The evidence in this case is, namely:

Dr. Underwood reports:

"Claimant unable to do any labor."

Dr. Jackson certifies:

"Ball entered right temple, passing through the brain to back of cranium, whence it was extracted through original wound. Loss of right eye. Wound occasionally opens to discharge small pieces of bone. The least effort is attended with severe pain in head; and a continuance of effort increases the severity of pain until partial loss of use of limbs results, with confusion of intellect. The least deviation from a strictly quiet life is followed by suffering."

The board of examining surgeons at Boston, Mass., certifies:

"He has practically loss of right eye, and deficient vision of left eye. It is impossible to rate separately the eye and wound of the head, as they were both caused by same ball."

It seems that he is estopped under the law from receiving more than $24 per month for the reason that, while practically disabled for performance of manual labor, he does do light work requiring but one hour per day, but accomplished with great pain and suffering, and which he is required to do by force of circumstances to obtain subsistence for his wife and family.

Appended is a copy of a letter of Brig. Gen. Joseph H. Barnes, former commander of Sergeant Wright's regiment.

Your committee are satisfied that this is a most deserving case, and one which it is impossible to do justice to under existing laws. They therefore recommend the passage of the bill with an amendment to substitute "$40" instead of "$50" per month, as printed in the bill.

Certificate of Dr. J. H. Barnes.

This is to certify that Samuel C. Wright served in the Twenty-ninth Massachusetts Volunteer Infantry during the war of the rebellion.

His record in the Army was peculiarly eventful and honorable. He entered the service in the month of May, 1861, and was discharged in March, 1865, serving continuously in one regiment nearly four years. He participated in many of the most important campaigns of the war; was present at the four famous sieges of Richmond, Vicksburg, Knoxville, and Petersburg, and was engaged in twenty-one pitched battles. He was four times wounded in action, namely, at the battle of White Oak Swamp, in the head by a shell; at Antietam, in leg by a shell; at Cold Harbor, in arm by a rifle-shot; and at the battle of the mine, very badly in the head by a rifle-shot. Here he was left on the field for dead, and was so officially reported. His wounds, which are plainly visible, still cause him much suffering.

He was twice promoted for gallantry in action, and he certainly was in every respect one of the very best soldiers in the Army—brave, faithful, and reliable under all circumstances, and always prompt and cheerful in the performance of any duty, however hazardous or arduous.

During the greater portion of Mr. Wright's term of service, and in each of the battles in which he was wounded, I commanded the regiment in which he served, and have therefore an intimate personal knowledge of his entire record in the Army, and I do not hesitate to say that whatever credit is to be awarded to the best soldiers of the Republic, or whatever consideration they are to receive, belongs in the fullest sense to him.

J. H. BARNES.

Mr. BROWN, of Pennsylvania, rose.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment reported by the committee.

Mr. BROWN, of Pennsylvania. I want to say, sir, that I am opposed to the amendment. It seems to me that if there could possibly be a case where a private soldier is entitled to a pension of $50 a month this is the case. I repeat it, sir, if it is possible for a case to be made up by evidence so strong as to entitle a private soldier to a pension of $50 a month this case is that one. For that reason I am opposed to the amendment.

It seems that this man has been wounded again and again, six or seven times, until his constitution is entirely destroyed; that when he undertakes to perform the slightest duty, of an hour's work per day, that duty is performed with pain so excruciating that he has to postpone his labors for long periods of time, so as to enable him to get in even a single hour's work during the day. Now, it seems to me that a man who has performed such service for his country, who has been wounded in almost every part of his person, should be rewarded with a pension from his Government large enough so that he shall not be compelled to labor at all, since it has to be done in great pain, in order to support his family. What I would like to see in this case is the granting of a pension of $50 per month, so that the excruciating pain through which this man has to pass every day of his life in order to obtain a livelihood for himself and family may be avoided, and that he may be spared the necessity of attempting it.

Mr. MATSON. The amendment proposed by the committee is to increase this pension from $24 to $40 per month, instead of $50 as originally proposed by the bill. That is the judgment of the Committee on Invalid Pensions. If this soldier was so wounded as to require the regular aid and attendance of another person, or was so disabled in any way as to be in that condition, he would be entitled to a pension of $50 per month and need not come to Congress for any relief. The committee deem that an increase of the pension from $24 to $40 per month is all that is warranted by the facts in the case.

There is no rate of pension between $24 and $50 per month—a striking defect in our pension laws; so that unless he has reached that degree of helplessness as to require the aid of another person, he has to come to Congress to get the relief that he asks. If he had been in such a condition as other soldiers who get $50, as I have said he need not have come to Congress for a special act, because the pension could have been granted under the operation of the general law directly through the office. But it was decided by the office, as is manifest by this report, that he was not in such condition as to warrant the granting of the pension. Instead of being in a condition to require the attendance of another person he is able to work, it is true with some effort, perhaps with considerable pain, but he is able to work an hour every day; his suffering is no doubt very great, having been shot through the head, but $40 a month is all that the committee deem it right to allow him in view of the pensions that are granted to other soldiers under similar circumstances.

Mr. BROWN, of Pennsylvania. I would like to ask the gentleman from Indiana a question. I did not listen attentively to all the evidence that was read, but I gathered it would be necessary, even with the $40 a month—the amount proposed—that this man, in order to get his living, should perform the service, which the evidence shows to be painful in the extreme? Mr. Chairman, it seems to me a cruelty that a man so wounded, who can not exercise his brain or any part of his body without producing agony, should be compelled to labor. I therefore ask the question I have stated, whether he could support himself and his family on $40 dollars a month without labor.

Mr. MATSON. I do not know if that question is touched upon in the report. The question in this case is purely one of disability and of the rate fixed for such disability. There are men on the pension-roll who are drawing much less than $40 per month who were wounded and by reason of their wounds can not perform labor without pain. So far as that is concerned scarcely any man who has been severely wounded can exert himself much in labor without suffering considerable pain.

I do not think this sum can be increased without doing an injustice to other classes of pensioners.

Mr. STRUBLE. I desire to express my sympathy with what has been said by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. BROWN]. I dislike very much to take any position here that is at all in antagonism to that of the Committee on Invalid Pensions. I take pleasure in making this observation, that I believe the Committee on Invalid Pensions are giving very earnest and conscientious work to the matter of examination into these cases and reporting upon them. I have been especially pleased with the work that committee has done, and I have been greatly pleased by the ability, the fairness, and the honor which have actuated the chairman of that committee in conducting this business assigned to him and his committee by the House.

But it seems to me, as has been said by the gentleman from Pennsylvania, that this is a case in which to reject the proposed amendment and allow the bill to pass fixing the rate at $50 per month will not be regarded by the Committee on Invalid Pensions as indicating any disposition whatever to criticise their action. I believe they have acted in this case honorably, fairly, and conscientiously. But it does seem to me that this poor cripple ought to be entitled to more than $40 a month, and that he ought not to be compelled to labor in the condition in which it is stated he does labor, suffering thereby the most excrutiating pain. It has been suggested that contrasting this with the rate of other soldiers it may seem to be somewhat unfair toward them. But let us decide this case as it is presented to us upon the facts, and when other cases are presented of like strong claims let us meet them in a spirit of fairness, as I believe all the gentlemen in this committee and all the gentlemen who constitute the Committee on Invalid Pensions are disposed and are endeavoring to do with reference to all the cases they have considered.

I am opposed to the amendment and am in favor of sustaining the original bill.

Mr. HENDERSON, of Illinois. I sympathize also with the soldier in the condition in which this one is alleged to be. But at the same time we should not lose sight of what the chairman of the Committee on Invalid Pensions says as to preserving the equity in this case. Take the case of a soldier who is not only entirely disabled from performing any manual labor whatever but absolutely requires the assistance of some person constantly to assist him, and you only give him $50 per month. If you give a soldier who does not require the assistance of any person $50 a month, are you going to increase all the pensions of that class of cases where the personal attendance of somebody else is required? It seems to me that you must necessarily arrive at the conclusion that if you give $50 a month in cases of disability where no personal attendance is required you ought to give more where it is.

Mr. BROWN, of Pennsylvania. I have said nothing in this case, Mr. Chairman, with the view of criticising the Committee on Invalid Pensions. Far be it from me, sir, to do so. I see what commends itself to my mind in the action of that committee all the way through, and especially in the action of its chairman.

I have nothing to say against the report in general. I want to say, however, upon this question of equity that I think in this pension business we have got a million of miles away from equity, and I want to act in all cases as they come up before me as the merits of each case demand. We can not undertake to score a line of equity that is to make this case entirely coincide and be equal in all respects in the range of equity with preceding cases with what has been done in the Pension Office or in this Congress. Why, sir, only a few days ago this House voted to put men on the pension-roll of this Republic who had been borne on the muster-rolls only for sixty days. Now that is so far away from equity, when we take into consideration the suffering that comes upon men who have received wounds in the defense of their country and have lost their health—it is so far away from equity in that comparison that they are not to be named together. We can not get general rules of equity in this matter. Here is a case that demands of us that we should give enough to this soldier to support him. And I say to argue anything else is to ask this Congress to do that which is cruel.

Mr. MCMILLIN. Will the gentleman yield to me for a question?

Mr. BROWN, of Pennsylvania. Yes, sir.

Mr. MCMILLIN. Will my friend from Pennsylvania be pleased to inform me what evidence there is that this amount of $40 a month will not support this soldier?

Mr. BROWN, of Pennsylvania. I think it is almost impossible for a man in these times to support himself on less than $50 a month.

Mr. MCMILLIN. A great many do it.

Mr. MORRILL. The average wages of laboring people in the United States is not $40 a month.

Mr. MCMILLIN. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. BROWN] is making his argument on the hypothesis that the amount here proposed by the committee will not support this man.

Mr. BROWN, of Pennsylvania. Yes, sir.

Mr. MCMILLIN. I want to know what evidence the gentleman has of that?

Mr. BROWN, of Pennsylvania. I make my argument on that hypothesis, for I do not believe that a man can support himself reasonably well, without having want staring him in the face half the time, on less than $50 a month. I know that a great many of us have worked for less than that amount in our time, but not in the present time.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. Just on that point a word. I have always thought that the proper standard by which to measure the relief to be given in cases of total disability is the average earning power of a laboring man in the United States, and that in cases where the services of another are required then the measure of relief should be double that amount.

Now, what is the average earning power of a healthy laboring man in the United States? The census report of 1880 shows us that on the average the laboring classes of this country, those who produce the wealth of the country, earn less than $300 a year each. That includes, of course, all the laborers in our mills and factories, including the women and children. It shows, however, that the average earning power of a healthy man, one who toils all day, is less than $400 a year; that is the average.

Now, it seems to me that ought to be the measure of relief for total disability. At any rate it would seem that as much would be required, if not somewhat more, to support a man who labors all day as to support a man who does not labor, for the one who labors would at least require somewhat more in the way of food and clothing. At any rate, if we take as our measure of relief for total disability the amount which a laboring man on the average can earn, we come as near a correct standard as it is possible for us to do. The $40 a month proposed in this case by way of amendment to the bill comes very near that standard; a little above rather than below it.

Mr. COLLINS. I did not intend, Mr. Chairman, to take any part at all in this discussion. I introduced this bill for the benefit of one of my constituents, and it has been reported from the Committee on Invalid Pensions by my colleague, Mr. LOVERING. This constituent of mine does not agree with me politically, but I recognize a brave man whenever I see him and a deserving case whenever it presents itself.

The original bill provided for a pension of $50 a month for this man. As reported from the committee it provides for $40 a month. I do not intend to set up my own judgment of what ought to be done against the judgment of the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

I desire, however, to answer my friend from Tennessee [Mr. MCMILLIN] by giving a reason why $40 a month will not support this man and his family. He lives within a half mile of me, and I find very great difficulty in supporting myself a cannon's shot distance in finance on $40 a month.

But it may be, as my friend from Ohio [Mr. WARNER] says, that the standard of relief in these cases is what a laboring man in the United States may be able to support himself upon. And it may also be, if we leave out entirely an element which I think ought to be considered, that a laboring man will require more than a non-workingman. This man is a sick man, and his doctor's and surgeon's bills may amount some months to more than $40.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. That is no ground for increasing the pension.

Mr. COLLINS. That, it strikes me, is a sufficient ground. This man was shot all through and through; he is a mere physical wreck and almost blind. If this great nation to which he gave all can not afford to give him $50 a month, then he is thrown partly at least upon charity.

I do not stand here to antagonize the report of the Committee on Invalid Pensions. But I do say that I think the original bill provided little enough. I trust this House will not allow this man to go away, as it were with the brand of $40 a month on him, when his surgeon's and physician's bills may some months amount to more than that. As I have said, he is a neighbor of mine; I know he has a wife and family. I know too that $40 a month will not support him and his family; I am sure that $50 a month will not. But $50 a month is probably as far as we can go, and I beg the Committee of the Whole to be a little generous in this case.

Mr. BROWN, of Pennsylvania. As I understand the gentleman, this man has a wife and family.

Mr. COLLINS. Yes; a wife and three children.

Mr. BROWN, of Pennsylvania. Are you advised of that?

Mr. COLLINS. I am very well acquainted with the man, and I am advised that he has such a family. I do not know the precise ages of his children or whether they are able to earn anything or not.

Mr. MATSON. After all that has been said upon the subject, as to whether $40 per month will support this man or not and what ought to be the real basis of our action, the fact is that men who are blind in both eyes, men who are totally helpless so that they can not move in bed and require the constant aid and attendance of other persons, get but $50 per month.

Mr. DAVIS, of Illinois. Seventy-two dollars a month.

Mr. MATSON. Fifty dollars a month.

Mr. DAVIS, of Illinois. The rate of pension for a person who has lost both eyes or both hands or feet is $72 a month.

Mr. MATSON. But that applies only to those who were on the roll at the time of the enactment of the law. Those whose pensions have been granted since get only $30.

Gentlemen here attempt to erect a standard for fixing the rate of pensions by determining how much it is going to take to support a man and his family in a given case. Why, sir, no more uncertain standard than that could be adopted. The expense of supporting a person is dependent very largely upon the manner in which he lives, where and how he lives. The only admissible basis for fixing the rate of pensions for disability must be the disability itself.

Now, after all that has been said, here is a man who is able to go out without an attendant. When the pensioner requires the constant aid and attendance of another person he gets only $50 a month. Ought the present applicant to receive as much?

Mr. BROWN, of Pennsylvania. Is not $50 a month altogether too small a pension for a man who requires a servant to go about with him?

Mr. MATSON. I am not discussing that question. We are not here to amend the general pension law, and in these special cases we ought certainly to be governed by the rates fixed in our general laws; because in a great majority of cases persons receiving pensions are obliged to accept such rates as the general law fixes. When a person comes to Congress asking the favor of a special act ought he to receive more than one who goes to the Pension Office, proves his case, and gets his pension through the regular channel?

Mr. DAVIS, of Illinois. I wish to ask the gentleman whether the law which provided that those who had lost the sight of both eyes or lost both hands or feet, and required an attendant to assist them, should receive $72 a month—I wish to know whether that law has been repealed.

Mr. MATSON. It has not been; but that law applies only to those who were on the rolls at the time of its passage.

Mr. DAVIS, of Illinois. The later law, as I remember, provided that persons under such disability who were on the rolls at $50 a month should receive $72. But I think it will be found that to-day a person who obtains a pension for the loss of the sight of both eyes receives $72.

Mr. MATSON. I am quite sure the gentleman is mistaken on that proposition. When he comes to examine the law he will find that the pension of $72 applied only to those who were on the rolls at the time of the enactment of the law, not to those who have obtained pensions since. A person under this degree of disability, applying now for a pension, gets only $50.

The question being taken on the amendment reported by the Committee on Invalid Pensions to strike out "$50" and insert "$40," it was agreed to, there being—ayes 42, noes 19.

The bill as amended was laid aside to be reported to the House with a favorable recommendation.

Subsequently, Mr. DAVIS, of Illinois, said: I ask unanimous consent to occupy but a moment in reading the law to which I referred a moment ago, in order that I may put myself right before the House.

Mr. MCMILLIN. I suppose the House will give the gentleman due credit for legal information.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair hears no objection to allowing the gentleman from Illinois to make a brief statement.

Mr. DAVIS, of Illinois. I wish merely to read the law of June 17, 1878.

Be it enacted, &c., That on and after the passage of this act, all soldiers and sailors who have lost either both their hands or both their feet, or the sight of both eyes, in the service of the United States, shall receive, in lieu of all pensions now paid them by the Government of the United States, and there shall be paid to them, in the same manner as pensions are now paid to such persons, the sum of $72 per month.

Mr. MATSON. That has been construed to apply only to those persons on the rolls at the time the act was passed.

Mr. DAVIS, of Illinois. Who gave the law that construction?

Mr. MATSON. The Secretary of the Interior.

Mr. ROBINSON, of Ohio. I will state, in support of the position taken by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. DAVIS], that I know instances where soldiers have within the last two years been placed on the pension-rolls at $72 per month.

PATRICK DRONEY.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 759) granting a pension to Patrick Droney, reported from the Committee on Invalid Pensions by Mr. LOVERING.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension-roll the name of Patrick Droney, son of Matthew Droney, late a private marine in the United States Navy, and pay him a pension at the rate of $8 per month.

The report was read, as follows:

The Committee on Invalid Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 759) granting a pension to Patrick Droney, having had the same under consideration, report as follows:

It appears from the evidence before this committee that the petitioner, Patrick Droney, is the son of Matthew Droney, late a private marine in the United States Navy, on the Miami, and who died on the 3d day of August from a gunshot wound received in action while in the line of duty.

On the 7th of March, 1865, Margaret Droney, widow of said Matthew Droney, was allowed a pension at the rate of $8 per month, which sum she received up to May, 1879, at which time she died.

Said petitioner is over the age of 16, but is a helpless cripple in both feet, utterly unable to perform labor of any kind, and can barely walk with the aid of crutches. He was supported during the lifetime of his mother by her labor and with the aid of the small pension she received from the Government. Her death left him wholly without the means of support, nor has he any relatives who are able in any degree to contribute to his maintenance. He is now an object of public charity in Marlborough, Mass.

The general pension laws give pensions to the children of soldiers who died by reason of disabilities incurred in the military service of the United States and while in the line of duty, provided said children are under the age of 16 years, proceeding upon the assumption that children under that age are incapable of maintaining themselves by their own effort.

While it is true in this case that the petitioner is over the prescribed age, it is nevertheless a fact that he is more helpless than a child under that age. If his father were living he (the petitioner) would be wholly dependent upon him for his maintenance.

Taking all the facts into consideration, your committee are of opinion that, as the father lost his life in the service of his country, thus depriving this unfortunate cripple of the means of support, it is nothing more than justice that some provision should be made by Congress to keep him out of the almshouse. They therefore report the bill favorably, with an amendment, namely, that the act take effect on its passage.

The amendment reported from the Committee on Invalid Pensions was read, as follows:

Add to the bill these words: "To take effect from and after the passage of this act."

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill as amended was laid aside to be reported to the House with a favorable recommendation.

JOHN T. MARSHALL.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 3663) granting a pension to John T. Marshall, reported from the Committee on Invalid Pensions by Mr. LOVERING.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension-roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of John T. Marshall, late a seaman in the United States Navy.

The report was read, as follows:

The Committee on Invalid Pensions, to which was referred the bill (H. R. 3663) granting a pension to John T. Marshall, respectfully submit the following report:

The petitioner asks to be placed on the pension-roll on account of disease contracted in the service, while in the Navy of the United States, in the war of the rebellion. The committee find that John T. Marshall enlisted in the Navy April 30, 1861, at which time he was rugged and sound; in July of the same year he was taken sick from exposure and lay sick with fever in the hospitals until the latter part of September, when he was discharged, as a result of his exposure and sickness, and from which he has never recovered. Chronic diarrhea ensued, which has attended him ever since, in attacks of from a few days to several months' duration, and which have seriously impaired his health and undermined his constitution, forcing him to abandon his calling—that of following the sea—and take up a trade (shoemaking) adapted to his enfeebled condition, in the prosecution of which, from frequent attacks of his disease, he incurs much lost time. He applied for pension in September, 1880, but his claim was rejected on legal grounds, "No record of alleged disability in the service, and inability to show origin of same in service and line of duty." Since his discharge he has not employed physicians regularly, but has treated himself with simple remedies, which were checking in their nature.

The fact that he has been affected with chronic diarrhea since his discharge, taken into consideration with the fact that he was rugged and healthy when he entered the service, presumes that the said chronic disease since discharge was owing to his exposure and consequent fever incurred while in service and line of duty. Your committee therefore recommend the passage of the accompanying bill.

The bill was laid aside to be reported to the House with a favorable recommendation.

ISABELLA I. RAMSDELL.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 4981) granting a pension to Isabella I. Ramsdell.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension-roll, at the rate of $8 per month, to date from September 24, 1877, the name of Isabella I. Ramsdell, on account of the death of her husband, David D. Ramsdell, a sailor and marine of the United States service for over thirty years, who died of disease superinduced by said service.

The report was read, as follows:

The committee find, from the petition and papers filed in the original pension claim, that the petitioner is the widow of David D. Ramsdell, who was a member of the United States Marine Corps for thirty-one years eleven months and eleven days, who, having been discharged the service, was admitted to a pension, and subsequently he was admitted to the naval asylum at Philadelphia as a beneficiary. His history will appear more fully from the following letter granting him admission to the institution above named:

BUREAU OF YARDS AND DOCKS, NAVY DEPARTMENT,
Washington, D. C., October 14, 1876.

SIR: Referring to your application of the 12th instant, and the Fourth Auditor having verified your services as seaman and marine thirty-one years eleven months and eleven days in the Navy, a permit is herewith granted for your admission to the naval asylum at Philadelphia, which please find inclosed. The governor of the asylum has been notified accordingly, and upon presenting yourself with this permit and the delivery of your pension certificate will receive you as a beneficiary of the institution. Inclosed also is your pension certificate.

Respectfully,

J. C. HOWELL, Chief of Bureau.

DAVID D. RAMSDELL, United States Marine.

It further appears in evidence that this pensioner, David D. Ramsdell, died in the Naval Asylum hospital at Philadelphia on the 24th day of September, 1877, of disease contracted in the service.

The petitioner has minor children and is destitute.

In view of the fact that the pensioner, David D. Ramsdell, died of disease caused by the service, and of his long service as a marine, your committee believe that his widow, Isabella J. Ramsdell, is a proper person to be placed on the pension-rolls.

The bill was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

MERLIN C. HARRIS.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 2136) granting an increase of pension to Merlin C. Harris.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to increase the pension of Merlin C. Harris, late captain of Company C, Ninety-sixth Regiment New York Volunteer Infantry, from the amount now paid him as sergeant to the amount paid a first lieutenant, as the disability for which he was pensioned was incurred while serving as first lieutenant; said increase to be computed from date of discharge.

The report was read, as follows:

We find that claimant enlisted October 12, 1861, in Company K, Ninety-sixth Regiment of New York Volunteers; that he was taken prisoner July 1, 1862, near Long Bridge, Virginia, was confined in Libby Prison till July 14, when he was removed to Belle Isle; that on the 13th of September, 1862, he was paroled; that during his imprisonment he suffered terribly from want of proper food, and became sick with diarrhea and scurvy; that after returning to his regiment he recovered his health and served faithfully till December 31, 1863, when he re-enlisted as a veteran; July 13, 1864, he was promoted to first lieutenant; at the battle of Fort Harrison, Virginia, September 29, he received a gunshot wound in his right leg.

On the 27th of October, 1864, while in command of his company, he was again taken prisoner while engaged in assaulting the outer line of works around Richmond. He was confined in Libby prison until November 5, when he was removed to Danville, Va., where he was held in an old tobacco warehouse without windows and without bed or bed-clothing, except a scanty blanket, which he shared with a comrade. The torture of the long cold nights of starvation and pain words are inadequate to describe. On the 5th of February, 1865, after suffering weeks of torture, he escaped by crawling into an oven, where, after remaining nine hours in a cramped and exceedingly painful position, he got out and started for the Union lines, which he finally reached after several nights' travel.

The testimony shows that he was a brave and gallant soldier; his colonel says, "the bravest man in my command." June, 1865, he was made captain. He is now allowed a pension of $4 per month, being one-half rating as a private soldier. The disease with which he suffered was greatly aggravated, if not entirely caused, by his last confinement in the rebel prison without proper food and clothing. In view of his long and faithful service, his brave and gallant conduct, and his terrible suffering during his confinement as a prisoner of war, your committee believe he is justly entitled to the pension allowed a lieutenant, and would therefore recommend the passage of the bill, amended by striking out all after the word "lieutenant," in the seventh line.

The amendment was read, as follows:

Strike out these words: "As the disability for which he was pensioned was incurred while serving as first lieutenant; said increase to be computed from date of discharge."

The amendment was agreed to; and the bill as amended was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

JOHN A. CROZIER.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 1965) granting a pension to John A. Crozier.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension-roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of John A. Crozier, of Madison, Ind., late second-lieutenant of Captain Fowler's company of artillery, attached to Ninth Regiment of the Indiana Legion, who lost aa arm in the military service while serving as such lieutenant during the late war, and grant hm a pension as such second lieutenant from and after the approval of this act.

The report was read, as follows:

The militia force of the State of Indiana was organized during the war of the rebellion to repel the invasion of that State, and this provisional force was subject to the orders of the governor of the State to do military duty within the borders of that State and in aid of the Government in putting down said rebellion.

Among other organizations, a company of artillery was organized at the city of Madison, in said State, which was attached to what was known as the Ninth Regiment of the Indiana Legion.

After the fall of Vicksburg the governor of said State issued an order requiring all the military companies then in said State to fire a salute in celebration of said event.

John A. Crozier was second lieutenant of the artillery company organized at the city of Madison as aforesaid, and in pursuance to the order of the governor as aforesaid, and the orders regularly made by his superior officers, was on the 8th day of July, 1863, engaged in firing said salute.

Because of some defect in the piece of artillery, and not because of any fault or negligence on his part, the gun was prematurely discharged, and Crozier's right arm was blown off and the sight of his right eye was destroyed. These facts are established by the testimony of the colonel of said Ninth Regiment of the Indiana Legion and that of the captain and first lieutenant of said artillery company. He was not mustered into the service of the United States, but was an officer in an auxiliary force to the Army of the United States. He has never received any pension or other compensation for the injuries above stated, and in view of the foregoing facts this committee recommend the passage of said bill, with the following amendment: Strike out all after the word "Legion," in line 8 of said bill.

The amendment was read, as follows:

Strike out these words: "who lost an arm in the military service while serving as such lieutenant during the late war, and grant him a pension as such second lieutenant from and after the approval of this act."

Mr. VAN ALSTYNE. I should like to inquire what there is in the testimony in this case to show wherein the militia force of Indiana in its relation to the General Government differed from the militia force of any other State.

Mr. MATSON. I can only say in answer to the gentleman that Indiana at that time was on the border and near military operations. About that time it will be remembered there was a raid into Indiana and Ohio by John Morgan. This company was organized with a view of repelling that invasion. It was used as a force auxiliary to that of the United States. It was differently situated, therefore, from the militia of States not exposed and not in danger.

The fact is stated that the company was regularly organized in the city of Madison, on the Ohio River, and on the border. It was engaged to operate at the time as circumstances required, and this accident occurred while firing a salute over the victory of Vicksburg. The order made by Governor Morton was exhibited to the committee as well as the order issued by the captain, showing that this man was acting only in obedience to the orders of his superior officers.

Mr. VALENTINE. Has not the United States recognized this service by reimbursing the State of Indiana?

Mr. MATSON. Of course Indiana has made some war claims, but whether this is included among them I am not prepared to say. There is no question about the fact stated in the report that this force was operating in connection with the Federal force.

Mr. MCMILLIN. I would like to ask the gentleman from Indiana if it is not the fact that this man was not in the service, the military service, of the United States at all?

Mr. VAN ALSTYNE. The report shows that to be the fact.

Mr. MCMILLIN. And that this service in which he was engaged when he received this injury was not in the line of the military operations of the Government at all?

Now, I remember during the last Congress a case even worse than this was presented and championed by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. TOWNSHEND], where a salute was ordered to be fired by such an organization as this, if I remember correctly, and where the applicant had both arms shot off, and yet in that case Congress refused to grant the pension. I know of no instance where we have gone to the extent demanded here. If there are any such cases I should like to be informed of them. But I do not believe it to be proper to grant pensions on such grounds.

Mr. VAN ALSTYNE. Mr. Chairman, for my part I can see no reason why this applicant is entitled to receive a pension for an accident any more than many others who were injured under similar circumstances.

There was not a State north of the disputed territory that did not have these militia organizations during the war. Very many of these organizations from time to time aided in repelling invasions of their own States or by going into the neighboring States for that specific purpose. If the accident in the present instance had occurred while the soldier was engaged, being a member of a militia force in any one of the States, in repelling an invasion, I think he would be in a position to come before the Congress and ask the favor which he now seeks. But, sir, that was not the fact. He was simply engaged, and it is not pretended otherwise, in firing a salute, rejoicing over the victory that had been obtained at Vicksburg.

Many occurrences of like character could be cited from the State of New York. We had our militia force there, and they did not remain at home during the entire war. They went nigh unto the front. They went where danger threatened. They went into the State of Pennsylvania to assist in repelling the invasion of the confederates into that State. But it never occurred to a member of the militia of the State of New York who received an accident in firing a salute, rejoicing over a victory that had been obtained by the Federal arms, to come and seek at the hands of the Government a pension, as we find in this case. I think myself, sir, that it is opening a very wide door when we extend pensions to such cases.

Mr. HOUK. Mr. Chairman, this is again drifting outside of the latitude where our duties as Representatives lie. Here is a man who happened not to be mustered into the service of the United States, but he is in an actual military organization acting in concert with the soldiers of the United States, and while thus situated he is, in the discharge of a duty imperatively imposed upon him by the orders of his superior officer, injured in the manner that renders him a cripple for life and entitles him to a pension.

Mr. BUCHANAN. Was he shooting for fun? Was that his duty when he met with the accident?

Mr. HOUK. He was obeying his orders when he was wounded; orders that he was bound to obey and for the disobedience of which orders he could have been punished. His superior officer had directed him to perform this duty.

Mr. VAN ALSTYNE. His superior officer was not in any sense connected with the Army of the United States.

Mr. HOUK. The man was discharging a military duty, for the disobedience of which, as I have said, he could have been court-martialed, and I adhere to the position that I have laid down all the time upon this subject, that Congress in trying pension cases is not bound by strict legal principles. We are not bound by legal rules in dealing with such cases. The reason that the Department does not allow pensions in such cases is that they are governed by rules and must adhere to the legal technicalities. These intervene, so that pensions are refused and the applicants must come to Congress, where the power of this tribunal is able to do equal and exact justice, without regard to technicalities. In this case I propose to vote, as I would in any other case where a soldier has been injured in the discharge of his duty, for granting the pension.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. I would like to ask the gentleman from Indiana a question. Was the company or regiment to which this soldier belonged at the time that this accident occurred afterward mustered into the service of the United States?

Mr. MATSON. I do not think it was; but I am not sure.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. It was in the State's service at the time?

Mr. MATSON. Yes, sir.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. Was this company called out by the governor of Indiana to defend the State against an invasion?

Mr. MATSON. They were called out to repel an invasion of the confederate forces under Morgan.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. That is what I mean. Was, then, the company at the time the accident occurred in the service to that extent, being under the call of the governor to protect the State against a raid?

Mr. MATSON. The gentleman will remember that this occurred just at the time of the Morgan raid.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. I understand that. I was simply saying that while I believe we have not extended the provisions of our pension laws heretofore to the case of accidents that have occurred in the firing of salutes—and I think that is going a little too far—nevertheless we have in this as in all former wars extended the provisions of the pension laws to all soldiers, whether in the regular service or the volunteer service of the General Government of the United States or whether they were in the militia service, if, belonging to the militia, they were called into service in the war in any way so that they were employed at the time in any way in connection with the troops of the United States. Now, I did not understand if this was a case going quite so far as that or if it was a case simply where the soldier was disabled by an accident while firing a salute.

Mr. WOLFORD. Mr. Chairman, at the time the Indiana and Ohio militia were called into the service of the United States—and to my personal knowledge they were so called—General Burnside, at the request of the President of the United States, Mr. Lincoln, who was the Commander-in-Chief of the Army and Navy of the United States, when General Morgan started to invade Indiana and Ohio—and I know about that, for I followed him and helped to capture him in the State of Ohio—General Burnside, I say, called upon the authorities of Indiana and Ohio to place their militia in the service of the United States. It was a war of the United States against the Confederate States in which every State in this nation was involved. And the militia of those States did come into the service of the United States all along that line as we followed General Morgan every day along the line.

I can say to the distinguished gentleman from Ohio [Mr. WARNER] the militia of Indiana, as long as General Morgan was in the State of Indiana, met him and fought him and delayed him while we were hanging upon his rear and fighting him all the time until he was captured. They followed him out of the State of Indiana into Ohio. And they were then soldiers of the United States. They were in the service of the United States. They were performing service for the United States. They followed Morgan out of the State of Indiana into Ohio and all along the line in Ohio. And the Ohio militia also came to the front and joined with us in the fight, and fought sometimes before we got there so as to delay and hinder him in his march, until he was captured. They did great service to the United States.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. And when in that service this man was disabled?

Mr. WOLFORD. Yes; while called into that service. That is the very proposition I want to make. They were called into the service of the United States according to the Constitution of the United States by the President of the United States. The militia can be called into the service of the United States and then they are under the command of United States officers. That is in accordance with the Constitution. That is exactly what was done. While they were thus engaged in fighting for their country, fighting in the common cause in which we were all engaged and in which everything was at stake, they met together and fired a salute. Now the question, Mr. Chairman, is, would a soldier mustered into the service of the United States—and the position would be exactly the same there as in this case—would a soldier mustered into the service of the United States, while a soldier of the United States, if he was ordered to fire a salute, be in the line of his duty? It is not necessary to argue such a question as that.

Mr. VAN ALSTYNE. What was the date of the fall of Vicksburg?

Mr. KLEINER. The 3d of July, 1863.

Mr. VAN ALSTYNE. And when was this raid made by Morgan into Ohio?

Mr. WOLFORD. He left for Ohio on the 3d of July, 1863, and we followed him right there, and we found those men belonging to the militia who were called out under the President's orders to fight and who did fight.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. I quite agree if these troops were employed in attacking the common enemy, although not under the orders of United States officers, there would be reason for sustaining the report of the committee; for it has been the practice to extend the privilege of the pension laws to men employed in the service of the United States in that way.

Mr. MCMILLIN. The reason I made the statement I did was that it seemed from the report that these men were not in the actual service of the United States. If they were, the case would be different of course.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment reported by the committee.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill as amended was laid aside to be reported to the House.

LEROY C. RANKIN.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 4431) granting a pension to Leroy C. Rankin.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension-roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Leroy C. Rankin, who was wounded while engaged in battle fighting for the Union in the ranks of the Eighteenth Kentucky Volunteers, but not regularly mustered in the service.

The report was read, as follows:

The Committee on Invalid Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 4431) granting a pension to Leroy C. Rankin, have had the same under consideration, and beg leave to make the following report:

That Leroy C. Rankin was a private soldier in the Harrison County Home Guards, in the State of Kentucky; that his company was temporarily attached to the Eighteenth Kentucky Volunteer Infantry, commanded by Lieutenant-Colonel Landram; that while in the service and in the line of duty, under the immediate command of the said Landram, and that while engaged in repelling an attack made by the rebel forces commanded by General John H. Morgan, on the city of Cynthiana, in the State of Kentucky, on the 17th day of July, 1862, received a gunshot wound in the left shoulder. These facts have been proven by the officers and the surgeon of the Eighteenth Kentucky Regiment to the entire satisfaction of the Pension Office, and the claim rejected wholly and upon the only ground that he had not at the time of receiving said wound been mustered into the service of the United States. The committee therefore recommend the pasage of the accompanying bill.

The bill was laid aside to be reported to the House with a favorable recommendation.

BRIDGET SHERLOCK.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 439) granting a pension to Bridget Sherlock.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place the name of Bridget Sherlock, mother of Stephen Sherlock, late of Company F, Fifteenth Indiana Volunteers, upon the pension-roll.

The report was read, as follows:

The Committee on Invalid Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 439) granting a pension to Bridget Sherlock, have had the same under consideration, and beg leave to report as follows:

Stephen Sherlock enlisted as a private soldier in Company F, Fifteenth Indiana Volunteers, on the 14th day of June, 1861, and served as such until the 23d day of November, 1862, when he was honorably discharged by the order of General Rosecrans upon a certificate of disability given to him as the result of a severe injury received during the siege of Corinth, "resulting in scrotal hernia and numbness and difficulty in using the lower extremities. His case is one of very bad scrotal hernia, caused by a fall over a log, May 10, 1862, in front of Corinth, while carrying a heavy load of rails upon his shoulder for the purpose of building a road over which to pass the artillery and wagons during that memorable siege." The above is the language of the certificate. He was the son of Patrick and Bridget Sherlock, who were at the time of his enlistment quite old and feeble, and depended largely upon said Stephen for a support. After his discharge he returned to the home of his parents, at Bedford, Ind., and within a few months took employment on the Louisville, New Albany and Chicago Railroad, as the conductor of a freight train. It is clearly shown by the testimony of the family physician that his disability continued until his death, and that it approached a condition of paralysis that would probably have rendered him totally helpless.

While in the employ of the railroad company, as aforesaid, in leaving the train, and because of his disability contracted in the Army, he fell under the wheels of the train, and was so injured that his left foot was amputated. By reason of the weak and enfeebled condition of his blood erysipelas resulted, and he died of that disease.

Because he did not die of the injury which he received in the Army his mother's claim for pension was rejected. His father is dead, and his mother is now nearly 80 years of age and has no property. The evidence of her dependence at the time of his death is clear and convincing.

This committee think that, under all the circumstances, she should be pensioned. If the son had not met his death he would have been pensioned long ago upon the record made by the Government as to his injury in the service. He did not get any pension; his mother should; and the committee therefore recommend the passage of the accompanying bill.

The CHAIRMAN. If there be no objection the bill will be laid aside to be reported to the House with a favorable recommendation.

Mr. CRISP. I object to that until I hear some other explanation. I desire to ask the gentleman who reports this bill why this pension should be allowed?

Mr. MATSON. The bill proposes to pension the mother of this soldier.

Mr. CRISP. Does not the report state that he did not die of any injuries or wounds received in the service?

Mr. MATSON. That is the fact. But the report shows that the injuries he received in the service contributed to his death. The fact is he received severe injuries while in the service, producing partial paralysis, caused by falling over a log while at work upon a road at the siege of Corinth.

Mr. CRISP. I am not inclined to be illiberal, but it does seem to me the committee is going a great length in this case.

Here is a man who it appears fell over a log and injured himself. I do not know what he was doing, whether he was there by order of his commanding officer or whether he was out on some nocturnal expedition; it does not appear. But he fell over a log and hurt himself, and years afterwards he fell under the cars and was killed, and the committee say that the original fall might have contributed to the injury of which he died.

Mr. MATSON. The gentleman misconceives the case.

Mr. CRISP. If I do, I should be glad to be corrected.

Mr. MATSON. The gentleman, of course, does not know anything about the facts. But here is a gentleman who sits by me now who does know. The certificate of disability upon which this man was discharged was given by order of General Rosecrans.

Mr. CRISP. I suppose he gave thousands of such certificates.

Mr. MATSON. And the certificate itself upon which he was discharged states that he received this injury while in the line of his duty; that he was carrying a heavy load of some kind, some piece of timber of which breastworks were being built, at the memorable siege of Corinth. The certificate given by General Rosecrans attests the fact that the injury was incurred in that way, and that this paralysis of one foot resulted from that fall. Very shortly afterward, while partially helpless from that injury, this accident on the cars occurred. Now it is not an unreasonable or far-fetched conclusion at all, but a reasonable one, to infer from the circumstances attending this case that the injury received while in the line of his duty contributed very largely, to say the least of it, if not directly, to the death of the soldier.

The other facts are very clearly proven, of the dependence of this mother on her son for support; she was entirely dependent upon him.

Mr. CRISP. What evidence is there that the ultimate death of this soldier was at all attributable to the injury he received while in service?

Mr. MATSON. That is supported by facts testified to by his neighbors and friends; that he was so disabled by that injury as to be almost helpless as regards one foot, and that at the time he fell under the cars it was from no other cause than that he was disabled in that foot. A person who saw him fall says that it was because of that injury that he fell under the train. I think the testimony is satisfactory on that point.

Mr. ROSECRANS. It is proper for me to say that when I assumed the command of the troops to which this person belonged I found their sanitary condition not at all good. I established what we called a convalescent hospital, to which all sick and disabled persons were transferred. I directed the surgeons in charge to carefully watch the cases, and when they were satisfied that there was no chance of recovery in any particular case to inform me of the exact facts, so that such incurables might be properly discharged. This man appears evidently to have been one of those cases. The facts were carefully ascertained in the convalescent hospital and brought to my notice by the physicians. I state this to show the precautions which were taken by me so that there might be no mistakes made.

Mr. BROWN, of Pennsylvania. I would like to ask the gentleman from Indiana a question.

Mr. MATSON. Certainly.

Mr. BROWN, of Pennsylvania. Is it not true that this soldier was receiving a pension at the time of his death?

Mr. MATSON. He was not.

Mr. BROWN, of Pennsylvania. I thought the report stated the fact that he was entitled to a pension.

Mr. MATSON. There is no doubt that if he had lived he would have received a pension long ago, for the record evidence establishes the fact that he was entitled to a pension; but he was killed before the pension was granted to him.

There being no objection, the bill was laid aside to be reported favorably to the House.

WILLIAM M'KEAN.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 5257) repealing an act entitled "An act for the relief of William McKean;" reported by Mr. BAGLEY from the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

The bill was read, as follows;

Be it enacted, &c., That chapter 97 of the laws of the Fortieth Congress, second session, approved June 25, 1868, entitled "An act for the relief of William McKean," be, and is hereby, repealed.

The report was read, as follows:

The Committee on Invalid Pensions, to whom was referred bill 5257, submit the following report:

By an act of Congress approved June 25, 1848, entitled "An act for the relief of William McKean," the Secretary of the Interior was authorized and directed to place the name of said McKean upon the pension-roll and pay him the pension allowed to persons having lost the sight of both eyes in the military service of the United States.

The Pension Bureau refused to grant a pension on the ground that the disability was not received in the service. McKean claimed that it occurred while he was engaged in recruiting for Company I, Ninety-second Regiment New York Volunteers, by a cinder getting in one of his eyes, and being much inflamed, involved the other, so that total blindness ensued. Application was made for a special act, which was passed and approved, as above stated. On the 5th of November, 1878, payment of pension was suspended, because of evidence discovered that the disability was occasioned by venereal disease, of which fact several affidavits of physicians are on file, taken at a special examination in October, 1878. The pensioner, however, declares on oath, emphatically, that he never had venereal disease. The proof seems to be against him. He never performed any services except recruiting for a short time. The committee think the act granting the pension should be repealed, and therefore recommend the passage of the accompanying bill, on the ground of fraud in obtaining the bill granting the pension.

There being no objection, the bill was laid aside to be reported favorably to the House.

ELLEN HORGAN.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 4164) for the relief of Ellen Horgan, reported from the Committee on Invalid Pensions with amendments by Mr. BAGLEY.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Interior is hereby directed to place on the pension-roll the name of Ellen Horgan, to be paid a pension beginning on the 30th day of April, 1874, and to continue during the remainder of her life.

The report was read, as follows:

The Committee on Invalid Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 4164) granting a pension to Ellen Horgan, having had the same under consideration, beg leave to submit the following report:

The petitioner, Ellen Horgan, mother of William Horgan, deceased, asks to be placed upon the pension-roll for reasons given in her memorial to Congress, and which are corroborated by the affidavits of good and reputable persons who have been acquainted with her for many years, and have known her circumstances during that time. She says substantially as follows: That she is the widow of Jeremiah Horgan and the mother of William Horgan, deceased; that her son William was enlisted and mustered in as major in the Eighty-eighth Regiment of New York Infantry Volunteers during the late war some time during the year 1862, to serve for three years; that at that time she was wholly dependent on her son for support, being a widow and deprived of all other means of obtaining even the necessaries of life.

On the 13th of December, 1862, her son was engaged in the battle of Fredericksburg, Va., where he received a gunshot wound through the head, which caused instant death. He left a widow and two children. The widow drew a pension for about ten months, when she died, and the children continued to draw the pension until they arrived at the age of 16 years, which occurred in 1875. The mother represents that since the death of her son she has been without the means of obtaining the necessary comforts of life; that she is in extreme old age; is dependent, and has no relatives who can afford to supply her with the relief her helpless condition demands. She is debarred from prosecuting her claim before the Pension Office by section 4707 of the Revised Statutes, now in force regarding such claims.

William Horgan's widow and children received a pension of $25 per month, commencing September 14, 1864, and ending December 22, 1875. The evidence in the case granting the pension to the widow and children was conclusive as to the services and manner of death of the soldier. The committee are of the opinion that as the mother was entirely dependent upon her son for support and that she is now entirely destitute, and of such extreme age that she is unable to maintain herself, she should receive some help from the Government, and therefore recommend the passage of H. R. 4164 with the following amendments, namely: Strike out all after the word "Horgan," in the fourth line, and insert, after the words "pension-roll," in the fourth line, the words "subject to the limitations and provisions of the pension laws;" and after the word "Horgan," in same line, the words "mother of William Horgan, major Eighty-eighth Regiment New York Volunteers."

The amendments reported from the Committee on Invalid Pensions were to strike out and insert so as to make the bill read as follows:

That the Secretary of the Interior is hereby directed to place on the pension-roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Ellen Horgan, mother of William Horgan, late major of the Eighty-eighth Regiment New York Volunteers.

The amendments were agreed to; and the bill as amended was laid aside to be reported favorably to the House.

ANN M'LAUGHLIN.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 3737) granting a pension to Ann McLaughlin, reported by Mr. BAGLEY from the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension-roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Ann McLaughlin, mother of Byron McLaughlin, late of the gunboat Southfield.

The report was read, as follows:

The Committee on Invalid Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 2737) granting a pension to Ann McLaughlin, having had the same under consideration, beg leave to submit the following report:

Bryan McLaughlin, son of the petitioner, enlisted January 4, 1862, in the United States naval service, and was engaged on the steamer Southfield as a first-class fireman. The Fourth Auditor reports as above, and also that he was borne on the roll March 31, 1864, the last roll of the Southfield, and that his account was paid to August 16, 1864.

Adjutant-General United States Army reports him as a seaman or fireman on steamer Southfield, and that he was admitted to prison hospital at Andersonville, Ga., August 26, 1864, where he died the next day of scorbutis.

The Southfield was sunk by the rebels April 20, 1864, at Plymouth, N. C., according to the report of the Secretary of the Navy for 1864.

Prior to his enlistment in the service Bryan contributed to the support of the family by his labor and earnings in a small express business, in which he was engaged with his father. The father being afflicted with rheumatism, and unable to perform heavy work, attended to the lighter part, such as looking up business and collecting the pay, while Bryan did the heavy work of driving the horse and handling the goods. The earnings from this source were used for the support of the family, the son receiving no specific wages. Hence, the results of his labor went into the common fund for the benefit of all.

After Bryan went into the service, the father, being unable to continue the business, earned a very precarious living with a hand-cart, frequently earning but 75 cents a day, and it is shown by medical evidence that the father has been much of the time an invalid, and is suffering from rheumatism and general debility. After enlisting in the Navy, letters from the son show that he contributed the most of his earnings to the support of his parents. One of March 27, 1862, indicates that he sent $20 to his father, directing him to give it "to mother, and tell her to buy some clothing for herself and brother Patrick." March 30, 1862, he sends $20 by express. July 17, 1862, he writes, "on the 1st of October, I will send you $50, if I am alive; I can get it no sooner." October 24, he sends $25 and says, "I tried to get fifty, but they would not give it to me." And on the 17th April, 1863, he says, "I have sent you the half-pay, and you will get it at the navy agent's the 1st of May. You will get $12 per month on the 1st of every month."

Fourth Auditor reports allotment-roll signed for $12 per month, on which $108 was paid to James McLaughlin, New York. This clearly indicates that Bryan McLaughlin contributed largely to the support of the family.

The petitioner filed her application for mother's pension December 14, 1874, which was rejected January 21, 1876, on the ground, "rejected, as the father was not unable to support his family at date of his death."

This position is sustained by two affidavits of persons who claim to know McLaughlin, but a number of affidavits, the family physician being one, show that he was disabled and unable to perform hard work.

The committee are satisfied that the son contributed largely to his mother's support, and that she is now destitute, and therefore recommend the passage of bill H. R. 3737.

There being no objection, the bill was laid aside to be reported favorably to the House.

WILLIAM J. BARKER.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 825) granting a pension to William J. Barker, reported from the Committee on Invalid Pensions by Mr. WINANS, of Michigan.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension-roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of William J. Barker, late of Company A, Eleventh Regiment Michigan Volunteers.

The report was read, as follows:

The Committee on Invalid Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 825) granting a pension to William J. Barker, have considered the same, and report:

That William J. Barker was private in Company A, Eleventh Michigan Volunteers. He claims a pension; disability, the effect of sunstroke incurred while in line of duty. The affidavit of Lieutenant Marsh states that claimant, about July 1, 1863, while on skirmish line near Elk River, Tennessee, was injured by sunstroke and carried to the rear by his order. Affidavit of Dr. Spalsburg shows physical soundness at enlistment, and Dr. Cashman shows treatment since 1866. Evidence of neighbors who have known said soldier the past sixteen years testify to his suffering from the effects of sunstroke. He was treated in hospital, but there is no record of the occurrence of sunstroke.

It would seem that Mr. Barker is entitled to relief, as he has furnished evidence of soundness before enlistment, of origin of disability in service and line of duty, of treatment from 1866, and testimony of neighbors for a longer period. The absence of the record of his misfortune is not his fault, but due to the negligence of his superior officers. Your committee therefore recommend that the bill do pass.

There being no objection, the bill was laid aside to be reported favorably to the House.

THOMAS CHESHIRE.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 5258) granting a pension to Thomas Cheshire, reported from the Committee on Invalid Pensions by Mr. WINANS, of Michigan.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension-roll the name of Thomas Cheshire, late a scout under General Burnside during the late war, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, as though he had been regularly mustered into the United States Army.

The report was read, as follows:

The Committee on Invalid Pensions, to whom was referred the communication of the Commissioner of Pensions in relation to the claim of Thomas Cheshire, late a scout under General Burnside in the late war, submit the same to the House, as follows:

DEPARTMENT OF THE INTERIOR, PENSION OFFICE,
Washington, D. C., January 30, 1884.

SIR: Under the provisions of the joint resolution of Congress approved May 29, 1830, I have the honor to transmit herewith the papers in the case of Thomas Cheshire, late scout under General Burnside during the late war (application 283049), to consider the propriety of placing his name upon the pension-roll by special act, inasmuch as it appears that his claim is a meritorious and deserving one, which can not be admitted under the general law.

The claimant alleges that he was enrolled July 2, 1863, as an independent scout, at Cincinnati, Ohio, by General Burnside, and that while in the line of duty at Tellico Plains, North Carolina, about September 21, 1863, he was taken prisoner, and was not released until October 16, 1864; and that while confined in prison at Danville, Va., he was afflicted with scurvy.

The claim has been rejected because the records of the War Department do not show that claimant was in the military service of the United States when captured.

The report of the Adjutant-General of the United States Army shows that Thomas Cheshire was paid as a scout on secret service from August 1, 1863, to December 10, 1864, by John Potts, esq., chief clerk War Department, on a letter of Maj. Gen. A. E. Burnside, a copy of which is embodied in the report, and which is to the effect that Thomas Cheshire was engaged by him at Cincinnati, Ohio, in the spring of 1863, to act as scout in Kentucky and Tennessee for the Army of Ohio, and was paid at the rate of $60 per month, and was taken prisoner about September 18, 1863, while in the performance of his duties, and was held fourteen months as a prisoner of war, when he escaped, &c. The testimony of Dr. Israel Wilson shows that claimant was suffering from scurvy and rheumatism when he returned from the Southern prisons; that he was sound and healthy prior to enlistment, and that since his return he has been about one-half disabled.

I therefore submit the claim to your consideration, with my opinion that the same should be allowed by special act of Congress, subject to the provisions and limitations of the general pension laws.

Very respectfully,

W. W. DUDLEY, Commissioner.

Hon. C. C. MATSON,
Chairman of Committee on Invalid Pensions,
House of Representatives.

Your committee have carefully considered the recommendation of the Commissioner, and likewise believing the claim to be meritorious, although not admissible under the general law, for the reasons set forth in his letter, recommend the passage of the accompanying bill.

The question was upon ordering the bill to be laid aside to be reported favorably to the House.

Mr. LYMAN. I should like to ask the chairman of the Committee on Invalid Pensions [Mr. MATSON] in regard to this bill what has been the custom of Congress in reference to such cases as this. If we grant a pension to this person, who was a scout, there will be a great many other cases which may come up for similar relief; for example, military telegraph operators who, as the members of the House know, were enlisted, just as quartermasters' men were enlisted, not in the military service proper, but as civil employés. Scouts were hired in a similar manner. Like the telegraph operators, they received higher pay than the common soldiers. It is true that both classes were exposed to great peril. Many telegraph operators were wounded during the war. But it is only lately that persons of this class have applied to the Committee on Military Affairs to be recognized as regularly belonging to the military service. They have now no military status.

I desire to ask, first, what has been the custom of Congress in cases of this kind; and, secondly, if we grant this man a pension do we not open the door for a great number of similar cases?

Mr. MATSON. In reply to the inquiry of the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. LYMAN], I will say that this question was thoroughly discussed in this House two weeks ago to-night, when the case of Lee was under consideration. It was then shown, I believe, that a large number of cases like this are already upon the rolls. I think it was shown in that discussion that these cases had been placed upon the roll because of the extreme peril to which these men exposed themselves in the service. In this respect they differed from other employés of the Government who were not regularly mustered in. I think it may safely be said that the duties performed by this class of men were the most hazardous in the military service.

Mr. MCMILLIN. Was not Lee's case passed over informally?

Mr. MATSON. It was.

Mr. MCMILLIN. Then I suggest it would be proper that this case take the same course.

Mr. MATSON. Before that action is taken, I wish to say that this case differs from that of Lee. This bill has been reported by the committee upon the recommendation of the Commissioner of Pensions. The bill to pension Lee was introduced here without any action on the part of the Commissioner. This case was brought to the attention of the committee because the man had applied to the Pension Office and his application had been rejected on the ground that he was not mustered into the military service.

Mr. MCMILLIN. In former Congresses and in this it has been, I believe, the custom that cases of this kind involving the question of admitting a new class of pensioners to the rolls should be laid aside to receive the action of a full House. I ask that this bill take that course.

Mr. HOUK. The gentleman is mistaken in saying that this bill creates a new class of pensioners. There are already numbers of this same class.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. MCMILLIN] moves that this bill be passed over informally.

The motion was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is now, Shall the bill be laid aside to be reported to the House with a favorable recommendation?

Mr. MCMILLIN. My suggestion a few moments ago was made, as I stated, because it has been the custom that propositions to pension persons who were never enlisted in the military service should at these evening sessions be passed over informally, that such questions should not be determined by a mere handful of members.

The CHAIRMAN. The bill can not be passed over except by a majority vote or by unanimous consent.

Mr. MCMILLIN. We will save time by it.

Mr. HOUK. If the gentleman means that he intends to insist on a quorum, we must of course agree to pass the bill over.

The question being put on laying the bill aside to be reported to the House with a favorable recommendation, there were—ayes 47, noes 17.

Mr. MCMILLIN. I have no disposition whatever to obstruct legislation here at any time, and I will not now raise the question of a quorum on this case. I want it understood, however, that hereafter, when there are no more than two or three dozen members present, we are not to be expected to dispose of cases of persons who were never in the military service.

Mr. GOFF. When are we going to pass upon such cases?

Mr. MCMILLIN. I draw a distinction——

The CHAIRMAN. Debate is not in order. The bill has been laid aside to be reported to the House with a favorable recommendation.

Mr. McMILLIN. The gentleman from West Virginia [Mr. GOFF] has asked me a question, and I hope I shall have unanimous consent to answer it. During my service here, as I now remember, I have never raised the question of a quorum against a bill pensioning any man who had been in the military service. But against bills proposing to pension those who had not enlisted I have made the point; and I give notice that I shall do so again.

Mr. HOUK. Can a man be engaged in any more perilous military service than when acting as a scout in the Army?

Mr. McMILLIN. As the discussion has gone thus far, I will say that probably no service in the Army is more perilous than that of a spy or a scout; but there is this distinction to be drawn: the person who acts in this capacity never places himself in such a position as to be continually subject to the command of superior officers; the duty he performs is one which he can avoid or take up at his option. If he wishes to place himself in such a position as to be entitled to a pension he can enlist. When he sees fit not to do this, he does so at his own peril.

Mr. HOUK. How can a person doing this duty avoid placing himself under command of his officers?

Mr. BROWN, of Pennsylvania. I rise to a question of order.

The CHAIRMAN. There is nothing before the committee. The bill has been disposed of.

WILLIAM L. SLOAN.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 3681) granting a pension to William L. Sloan.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension-roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of William L. Sloan, late a corporal of Company B, Third Regiment Minnesota Volunteers.

The report was read, as follows:

The Committee on Invalid Pensions, to whom was referred bill H. R. 3681, granting a pension to William L. Sloan, having had said bill under consideration, hereby report in favor of the same, recommend its passage, and ask that said committee be discharged from further consideration thereof.

Mr. BUCHANAN. No facts are given in the report showing why the pension should be granted, and I should like to have some explanation of it.

Mr. SUMNER, of Wisconsin. I will make a brief statement. The claim for pension was disallowed on the ground that the disease existed at the time of the enlistment. Such was the claim of the Pension Office. The report of the committee is unanimous upon the testimony presented to them in favor of granting this pension. After the case was presented to the Pension Office an examiner was appointed and sent to examine witnesses as to this man's disability, and on his report the claim was rejected. It was rejected upon the sole ground that the disability was not incurred in the service, but that the disease existed before.

Now, the testimony shows this soldier enlisted, and after his term expired re-enlisted, and that both times he was examined by Army surgeons, and that no disease was discovered which would prevent him from being mustered. But it was alleged by the Pension Office examiner that this man had sore eyes for three years when he was 17 years of age, that his sister had scrofula, and that his mother had sore eyes at the time of his birth. And that is the testimony upon which the claim was rejected. This man, having been twice examined and twice mustered into the service, and having served the country for four years, and nothing having been discovered during that time to prove he suffered from disease, and it further appearing that he is now blind, resulting from exposure, the opinion of the committee is that he should be granted the pension provided for in this bill.

Mr. RAY, of New York. Is there anything in the testimony to show the cause of this disability?

Mr. SUMNER, of Wisconsin. Yes; it appears in January, 1865, after a long march, he took a severe cold, which resulted in intermittent fever, and that he was sent to the hospital and treated therefor until the following April. I move the bill be laid aside to be reported favorably to the House.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. MATSON. I move that the committee do now rise.

The motion was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose; and Mr. McMILLIN having taken the chair as Speaker pro tempore, Mr. HATCH, of Missouri, reported that the Committee of the Whole House had, according to the special order of the House, had under consideration the pension bills on the Private Calendar, and had directed him to report back sundry bills with various recommendations.

BILLS PASSED.

Bills of the following titles, reported from the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar without amendment, were severally ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, they were accordingly read the third time, and passed:

A bill (H. R. 3238) granting a pension to Mrs. Ellen M. Flagg;
A bill (H. R. 3838) granting a pension to Theodore C. Hawkins;
A bill (H. R. 4717) for the relief of John Swearer;
A bill (H. R. 4188) granting a pension to William W. Day;
A bill (H. R. 433) to increase the pension of Simpson Harris;
A bill (H. R. 4718) for the relief of Caroline Sheward;
A bill (H. R. 3663) granting a pension to John T. Marshall;
A bill (H. R. 4981) granting a pension to Isabella I. Ramsdell;
A bill (H. R. 4431) granting a pension to Leroy C. Rankin;
A bill (H. R. 439) granting a pension to Bridget Sherlock;
A bill (H. R. 5257) repealing an act entitled "An act for the relief of William McKean;"
A bill (H. R. 3737) granting a pension to Ann McLaughlin;
A bill (H. R. 825) granting a pension to William J. Barker;
A bill (H. R. 5258) granting a pension to Thomas Cheshire; and
A bill (H. R. 3681) granting a pension to William L. Sloan.

Amendments reported to the following bills were severally agreed to, and the bills as amended were severally ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, they were accordingly read the third time, and passed:

A bill (H. R. 2252) for the relief of Christopher P. Davidson;
A bill (H. R. 1756) granting a pension to George Overmire;
A bill (H. R. 4697) for the relief of Rudolph John Marti;
A bill (H. R. 2267) granting an increase of pension to Samuel C. Wright;
A bill (H. R. 759) granting a pension to Patrick Droney; and
A bill (H. R. 2136) granting an increase of pension to Merlin C. Harris.

JOHN A. CROZIER.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. A bill (H. R. 1965) granting a pension to John A. Crozier has been reported back with an amendment.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. I move that bill and amendment be recommitted to the Committee on Invalid Pensions. The case is not what I thought it was, and I think it should be recommitted.

Mr. MATSON. I am perfectly willing to let it go over to be voted on when a quorum is present.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. This is the case where a man lost his arm in firing a salute. It is stretching our pension laws beyond all precedent.

Mr. BROWN, of Pennsylvania. I hope that will be done, especially in view of the fact that there was some misunderstanding as to what the vote was being taken upon when the question was submitted to the committee. The question was actually put twice, and it mixed matters somewhat. I hope, therefore, it will be laid over, as suggested by the chairman of the committee.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from Ohio to recommit the bill to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

Mr. MATSON. Upon that proposition I wish to say that the committee have considered this bill carefully and passed its judgment upon it. There can be nothing made by a recommittal of the bill. I have no objection to its going over.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Does the Chair understand the gentleman from Indiana to suggest that it be laid over informally?

Mr. BROWN, of Pennsylvania. I make that motion, if necessary.

Mr. MATSON. We are perfectly willing for that.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. I am quite willing that the bill be passed over informally, if that meets the concurrence of the gentleman from Indiana.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Without objection that course will be taken.

There was no objection, and it was ordered accordingly.

ELLEN HORGAN.

The next bill reported from the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 4164) for the relief of Ellen Horgan, with amendments.

The bill was considered, the amendments severally agreed to, and the bill as amended ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. MATSON moved to reconsider the votes by which the several pension bills were passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

And then, on motion of Mr. MATSON (at 9 o'clock and 55 minutes p. m.), the House adjourned.

PETITIONS, ETC.

The following petitions and papers were laid on the Clerk's desk, under the rule, and referred as follows:

Also, papers relating to the claim of John McDowell—to the same committee.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

SATURDAY, March 15, 1884.

The Clerk of the House, Hon. JOHN B. CLARK, jr., at 12 o'clock m. called the House to order and directed the reading of the following communication:

SPEAKER'S ROOM, HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,
Washington, March 15, 1884.

J. B. CLARK, jr.,
Clerk House of Representatives:

I hereby appoint Hon. J. C. S. BLACKBURN to perform the duties of the chair during this legislative day.

J. G. CARLISLE,
Speaker House of Representatives.

Mr. BLACKBURN accordingly took the chair as Speaker pro tempore.

Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. JOHN S. LINDSAY, D.D.

The Clerk proceeded to read the Journal of the proceedings of yesterday.

Mr. BELFORD. I move to dispense with the reading of so much of the Journal as applies to the pension bills passed yesterday and last night.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair will state that the motion to suspend the reading of the Journal is not in order. The Chair is also informed that there is but a small portion of the Journal remaining unread.

Mr. BELFORD. It has been customary to submit this motion.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. It can only be done by unanimous consent. There is no such motion recognized.

The remainder of the Journal was read and approved.

REPRINT OF A BILL.

Mr. LYMAN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to withdraw from the House Calendar the bill (H. R. 5670) to authorize a retired-list of privates and non-commissioned officers of the United States Army who have served for a period of thirty years and upward with a view to having it reprinted, there being a clerical error in the bill as it now stands.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair will state that this bill is in Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union and there is a clerical error in the printed text as it now appears. The gentleman from Massachusetts asks that an order be made for a reprint of the bill in a corrected form.

There was no objection, and it was ordered accordingly.

HORSE FOR ADDITIONAL RIDING-PAGE.

Mr. HANCOCK. Mr. Speaker, I wish to submit a privileged resolution from the Committee on Appropriations.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The resolution will be read.

The resolution was read, as follows:

Resolved, That the Clerk of the House be authorized to pay, out of the contingent fund of the House, to the Doorkeeper of the House the sum of $114, for the hire of one horse for the use of the additional riding-page for the remainder of the current fiscal year.

Mr. HANCOCK. I ask the adoption of the resolution.

The resolution was agreed to.

Mr. HANCOCK moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was agreed to; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. I demand the regular order.

Mr. MILLS. I ask the gentleman to permit me to have referred a resolution to the Committee on Rules.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. I regret that I am unable to accommodate gentlemen who are making such requests around me, but I must insist upon the demand for the regular order.

Mr. BELFORD. Will the gentleman from Illinois not consent to give us at least thirty minutes for the transaction of such business as can be done by unanimous consent?

Mr. TOWNSHEND. I would like to gratify the wishes of gentlemen by yielding further to these requests for unanimous consent, but the importance of the bill that is pending demands of me that I shall return an answer in the negative to all of them. If I yield to one member there will be thirty or forty demanding the same thing. I must therefore insist.

Mr. BROWNE, of Indiana. Is this debatable?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. It is not.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. Then I insist upon the regular order. I move that the morning hour be dispensed with.

Mr. BELFORD. I want to appeal to the gentleman from Illinois to give us thirty minutes to call up important bills for consideration before that order is insisted upon.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. I am unable to yield to the gentleman.

Mr. BELFORD. I give notice then that no business shall be transacted by unanimous consent.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The motion is not subject to debate. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from Illinois to dispense with the morning hour.

The question was taken. The House divided; and there were—ayes 90, noes 33.

So (two-thirds having voted in the affirmative) the morning hour was dispensed with.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. I move that the House now resolve itself into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union for the purpose of considering general appropriation bills.

The motion was agreed to.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Georgia [Mr. BLOUNT] will please take the chair.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. Before that I desire to say that I have reached an agreement with the gentleman from Michigan with reference to the debate on the pending paragraph of this bill—that we allow ten minutes debate on the pending amendment and on each substantive amendment to be offered thereafter, the whole debate on the paragraph not to exceed one hour. With that understanding I hope the announcement will be made.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. It is not within the power of the Chair after the order of the House to make such an announcement.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. Then I desire to ask unanimous consent that this arrangement be ratified.

Mr. BISBEE. I object.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. Then I move to reconsider the vote by which the House agreed to go into Committee of the Whole, in order to have the question fully and satisfactorily settled.

The motion to reconsider was agreed to.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. Now I move that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union for the purpose of considering general appropriation bills, pending which I move that all debate upon the pending paragraph and all amendments thereto be closed in one hour.

Mr. KEIFER. Will the gentleman allow a suggestion? If the gentleman will allow forty minutes for general debate and then ten minutes on each substantive amendment I think there will be no objection.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. We have reached an agreement which I believe to be satisfactory and any alteration of it will create confusion.

Mr. CANNON. If the gentleman from Michigan is satisfied with the agreement, I will make no objection so far as I am concerned.

Mr. HORR. The agreement is precisely this: that we go into Committee of the Whole on this bill; that we should take one hour for debate on this paragraph; that ten minutes on a side would be allowed on the pending amendment, and ten minutes thereafter on each substantive amendment to be offered to the bill; that there should be no pro forma amendments offered.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. And that the debate should not extend beyond an hour.

Mr. HORR. Yes, sir.

Mr. MILLS. All amendments to this paragraph?

Mr. HORR. Yes, sir.

Mr. KEIFER. This is a long paragraph.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. That is the agreement.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair will submit the motion to limit debate in accordance with the agreement stated by the gentleman from Illinois and the gentleman from Michigan.

The motion to limit debate was agreed to.

The motion that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union was agreed to.

POST-OFFICE APPROPRIATION BILL.

The CHAIRMAN. The House, in Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, resumes the consideration of the unfinished business, being the bill (H. R. 5459) making appropriations for the service of the Post-Office Department for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1885, and for other purposes.

The pending paragraph was that relating to the readjustment of compensation to be paid for transportation of mails on railroad routes.

The pending motion was that of Mr. HORR, to strike out the concluding proviso of the paragraph, which is as follows:

Provided, however, That all railroad companies whose railroads were constructed in whole or in part by a land grant made by Congress on the condition that the mails should be transported over their roads, respectively, at such price as Congress should by law direct, or on the condition that such railroad should be subject to such regulations as Congress might impose restricting the charges of Government transportation, shall receive only 50 per cent. of the compensation authorized by this act to the other railroad companies for corresponding service.

An amendment was also pending, offered by Mr. MILLS, to strike out, in line 70, the word "five" and insert "ten;" so as to provide that the reduction of compensation of railroad companies for transporting the mails shall be 10 per cent. instead of 5 per cent.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN] is recognized.

Mr. DUNN. I rise to a point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. DUNN. I desire to know what amendments are pending to the paragraph under consideration and what is their order. I understand there is a motion to strike out the proviso and that there is an amendment offered by the gentleman from Texas [Mr. MILLS].

Mr. HORR. That is all.

Mr. DUNN. I wish to know if there is any other.

Mr. HORR. One also has been indicated by the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. DUNN] and one by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. BINGHAM].

Mr. DUNN. I have not been able to get the floor to offer my amendment or even to have it printed in the RECORD.

Mr. HORR. The first thing, as I understand, is to debate the pending amendment to strike out and to dispose of it, receiving no other amendments till we are through with that.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN] rises to offer an amendment. That is in order.

Mr. DUNN. Regardless of the agreement entered into by the House before we went into Committee of the Whole?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair does not understand there was any agreement which interferes with that at all.

Mr. DUNN. I presume the clerks have the agreement, and I leave the question to be settled by their record of it.

Mr. HOLMAN. There was no agreement that there should be no amendments made to this paragraph.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair understood the agreement applied only to the time for debate, not to the number of amendments that might be offered. The gentleman from Indiana is in order and will proceed.

Mr. HORR. The distinct agreement was that we should proceed with and finish the first amendment, ten minutes a side being allowed for debate, and that thereafter on other amendments that should be offered there should be debate of ten minutes on a side.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair presumes the House did not intend by any such agreement to prevent amendments designed to perfect the bill being offered.

Mr. DUNN. Is the amendment of the gentleman from Indiana intended to perfect the bill or to change an amendment offered by somebody else?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair understands it to be in the nature of a substitute.

Mr. DUNN. The amendment I desire to offer is to perfect the bill.

Mr. HORR. If the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Indiana is in the nature of a substitute I submit that that is in violation of our agreement?

Mr. HOLMAN. If a substitute, is it not still an amendment? Is not a substitute an amendment?

The CHAIRMAN. The proposition of the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. HORR] is to strike out the whole of the proviso.

Mr. HOLMAN. Yes, sir; and now I move to amend by perfecting the portion proposed to be stricken out.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Indiana moves to amend by striking out all after the word "transportation," in line 116, and inserting other language, which is in the nature of an effort to perfect the bill, and is in order.

Mr. BELFORD. I rise to a question of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. BELFORD. The confusion in the House is such that it is utterly impossible for us at this end of the Hall to hear what the chairman says or what is said by the gentleman from Indiana or any other member of the House. I ask the Chair to bring the committee to order.

The CHAIRMAN. The point of order is well taken. The committee will be in order.

Mr. HORR. Does the Chair determine the amendment of the gentleman from Indiana has a right to come in at this time?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair has so decided.

Mr. HORR. I do not think the gentleman from Indiana intends it, but it seems to me the result or effect of this is to cut us out from debate on the pending amendments and those yet to be offered. I do not think the gentleman would introduce this for that purpose.

Mr. HOLMAN. No, sir. The gentleman from Michigan has made a motion to strike out. I move to amend that. That is all.

Mr. HORR. If you do not take any time to debate it it may be all right.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Indiana is recognized and will proceed.

Mr. HOLMAN. I offer the amendment which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Strike out from the word "transportation," in line 116 to the end of the paragraph, these words, "shall receive only 50 per cent. of the compensation authorized by this act to the other railroad companies for corresponding service," and insert as follows:

"Or whose railroads were constructed in whole or in part by subsidies, in bonds and lands granted and issued by the United States, under the provisions of the act entitled 'An act to aid in the construction of the railroad and telegraph line from the Mississippi River to the Pacific Ocean, and to secure to the Government the use of the same for postal, military, and other purposes,' approved July 1, 1862, and all acts amendatory thereof, shall receive only 50 per cent. of the compensation authorized by this act to be paid to the other railroad companies for corresponding postal service. And the above-entitled act, approved July 1, 1862, and the sixth section thereof, and the act amendatory of said act, approved July 2, 1864, are hereby amended to conform to the foregoing provisions fixing the rate of compensation to be paid to railroad companies whose railroads were so constructed in whole or in part by subsidies, in bonds and lands, under the provisions of said act for the transportation of the mails; and said acts and each of them shall be held to be altered and amended accordingly; and the foregoing provisions, and each of them, shall be subject to amendment as in the opinion of Congress shall be just and required by the public welfare. But no right now existing in favor of the United States in relation to said railroads or either of them, or in relation to said grants or either of them, shall be deemed impaired or waived."

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair recognizes the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN] for five minutes.

Mr. HORR. I wish to reserve all points of order on that amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state his point of order.

Mr. HORR. I desire to reserve it for the present until I can hear the gentleman.

The CHAIRMAN. The point of order must be made at this time.

Mr. HORR. My point of order is that the amendment proposes to change existing law, and I am clear that it will not save any money to the Government.

Mr. HOLMAN. In answer to the point of order I would state that it reduces the cost of transporting the mails upon a certain class of railroads 50 per cent., and that heretofore has been held to be in order, I believe.

Mr. DUNN. A word on the point of order. I am satisfied that the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN] is perfectly correct; I have no doubt that this amendment will reduce expenditures, and I desire to congratulate the gentleman from Indiana upon his graceful surrender, and the Committee on Appropriations upon their graceful surrender, at my suggestion made day before yesterday, and which I had formulated into an amendment that I had intended to offer at the request of very many gentlemen on the floor, and I shall, if permitted, offer a substitute yet.

Mr. HOLMAN. I am glad my friend from Arkansas [Mr. DUNN] congratulates the Committee on Appropriations for perceiving the propriety of this proposition. I will say to him that it is offered in some degree on my own responsibility, although in concurrence with the views of the majority of the members of the Committee on Appropriations, for the reason that it did not seem to be the will of this Committee of the Whole that the original idea should be adhered to, that this subject can be better controlled by the funding process under the Thurman act than by the instrumentalities proposed by my amendment.

I wish to say further that there can be no doubt whatever about the power of Congress to enact this provision, the Supreme Court in the funding cases having settled that beyond question. I took occasion the other day to call the attention of the Committee of the Whole to the fact that the Supreme Court has passed directly upon that point and decided that Congress had retained the unqualified power, both in the original act of 1862 as well as in the amendatory act of 1864, to alter, amend, or repeal those acts. It seems impossible that the Supreme Court could have decided otherwise than that under that power the sixth section of the act of 1862 or any other provision of that act might be altered, qualified, or amended.

The CHAIRMAN (interrupting). Is the gentleman from Indiana speaking to the point of order only?

Mr. HORR. I withdraw the point of order.

Mr. HOLMAN. I shall occupy but a moment further. I beg the pardon of the Chair for having, upon the point of order, indulged in some remarks touching the substance of the amendment I have offered. I was thoughtlessly led into doing so by the remarks of the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. DUNN].

It is very clear, laying aside the question of reaching the Union Pacific roads through the funding act, that this proposed amendment is very proper. I think no gentleman can question that as to the Union Pacific railroads, all of them, including the eastern branch of the Union Pacific as well as the Sioux City and Pacific——

Mr. DUNN. And the Kansas Pacific.

Mr. HOLMAN. That of course is embraced in the Union Pacific Railroads, six of them in all. There is no question that inasmuch as those roads were built by the Government (and more than built, for there was invested in those great roads by the Government more than they cost for construction) there is reserved to Congress, under the power to amend the sixth section of the act of 1862, a power to amend any provision of either the act of 1862 or the act of 1864; and it is eminently proper that Congress should either require the transportation of the mails and the property of the United States without charge or should pay therefor no more than is paid to other roads of the same class.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. HORR. I yield three minutes of my time to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON].

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Chairman, the amendment of the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN] proposes to pay the land-grant and bond-subsidy roads—known as the Pacific Railroads—one-half of the amount for carrying the mails that we pay other railroads. It makes no practical difference to the United States whether this amendment passes or not, under the facts and existing legislation the road will be thrown upon the hands of the Government at the maturity of the bonds in either event.

But I want to call the attention of the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN], the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. DUNN], and the gentlemen on the other side of the House to the fact that under the Thurman act, sustained as it is by the decision of the Supreme Court, the sinking fund will not yield a sufficient amount to indemnify the Government at the maturity of the bonds.

Mr. DUNN. And that is explained in the report of the Railroad Commissioner—it is because of knavery on the part of the roads.

Mr. CANNON. I can not yield time out of my three minutes. When these bonds shall mature, when the Government shall be entitled to be indemnified, the sinking fund proper will not be sufficient for the purpose. I wish to say that if you gentlemen on that side of the House, with your seventy majority, want to do a just thing and an effective thing, then, instead of amending the Thurman act and taking nothing by it, you will come into this House with an amendment increasing the sinking fund under wise provisions, so that when the bonds shall mature there will be a sufficient amount in that fund to indemnify the Government.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. CANNON. I would like to have a moment longer.

Mr. HORR. I will yield the gentleman another minute.

Mr. CANNON. I undertake to say that notwithstanding this cheap parade before the country as against the Pacific Railroads, a measure which, after you have adopted it, gives no substantial harvest, you will not be held blameless by the people for failing to suggest proper substantial legislation under which a sinking fund might be realized sufficient to indemnify the Government. You reduce the sinking fund in this way without keeping it up in any other way.

Mr. DUNN. Does the gentleman think the sinking fund ought to be supplied from the Treasury of the United States?

Mr. CANNON. Oh, no; but you have the power to come in here by legislation, and instead of taking 5 per cent. of the gross earnings of the roads, to take 10 per cent. and put it into the sinking fund. Instead of doing that, you clip the sinking fund to a paltry extent by cutting off half the compensation of these road for carrying the mails; and you fail to provide by apt and proper legislation for an increase of this sinking fund from the gross earnings of the companies. Therefore I say that in effect this legislation is a sham and a fraud—an attempt to deceive the country. You fail to do what is in your power by apt legislation, following the precedent set by the Thurman act, sustained by the Supreme Court.

You propose to decrease their mail pay, which amounts to but little, while you fail by substantial legislation to take 10 or 15 per cent., or whatever amount is necessary, of their gross earnings and hold it in a sinking fund to indemnify the Government at the maturity of the bonds. In other words, you set the machinery in motion but do not grind the grist.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. BELFORD. Mr. Chairman, one fact which must be kept in mind in our legislation on this subject is that the Government of the United States built the Union Pacific and Central Pacific Railroads. I declared the other day that land grants were made to aid in the construction of these roads, and the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. HORR] disputed that statement. I now assert again that the Government not only made land grants to aid these railroad companies, but indorsed their bonds to the amount of millions.

Mr. HORR. I call the gentleman to order. He has no right, in my time, to speak in favor of the proposition he is advocating.

Mr. BELFORD. I am not speaking in the gentleman's time; I am speaking in my own time as a Representative on this floor. I would like to know whether the Representative of a State here has a right in his own time to speak upon a great public question, or whether one man from Michigan can dictate the law to this council of the nation.

What I said the other day was that the Union Pacific and Central Pacific Railroads had received large land grants. I repeat that statement, and say further that the Government not only gave those companies large land grants, but indorsed their bonds.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. I rise to a question of order. I desire to know in what time the gentleman from Colorado [Mr. BELFORD] is speaking?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair understood that ten minutes on each side were to be allowed on any amendment.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. I rose, Mr. Chairman, to debate this question as representing the committee.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair did not understand that the gentleman from Illinois desired to speak, and recognized the gentleman from Colorado, not understanding that the time was under the control of any one. But the Chair has no objection to its being controlled.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. If this course be pursued the committee may not have a hearing.

Mr. BELFORD. I hope my friend from Illinois will allow me to make a few observations on this question.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair did not consider it his duty to ask whether any gentleman representing the committee desired to speak, but as the gentleman from Colorado claimed the floor he was recognized.

Mr. BELFORD. I want to say that these great transcontinental lines charge the people 10 cents a mile for transportation. How is it with the New York Central and Hudson River Railroads which have been referred to in this debate? The Legislature of the State of New York has taken control of this subject and reduced the rates charged by those corporations to at least 3 cents a mile. Yet while vast corporations are grinding and oppressing our people almost to death gentlemen stand up here to defend them on the ground that corporations which are charging 10 cents a mile for transportation can not take care of themselves!

I say that that amendment offered by the gentleman from Indiana, and which I offered a week ago as an original bill and which is before the Pacific Railroads Committee, ought to be passed. Is there a man connected with this great transcontinental railway system that has not become suddenly enriched? Enriched in what manner? Out of the profits of that great enterprise.

If you will permit me one more sentence I will say that the two political parties of this country are barren of issues, except the tariff. But there is one shining over the horizon that is to trouble the people in this country. It is the constantly growing and swelling power of these gigantic monopolies that this nation has called into existence and yet has not the courage to control.

Mr. HORR. I wish to say, Mr. Chairman, in the five minutes remaining on this side that the amendment of the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN], as I understand it, seeks simply to put the Union Pacific Railroads and the Northern Pacific road on the same basis with all of the other roads, and then to cut the whole series down 50 per cent. Am I right?

Mr. HOLMAN. That is the effect of it.

Mr. HEWITT, of New York. The steal is now made large enough to be an object.

Mr. HORR. I do not desire now, Mr. Chairman, to discuss the question as to the extent of our legal power over these roads or whether we have the authority to do what the gentleman proposes. I must admit, of course, that that amendment on its face is a fairer proposition than the way the bill first came into the House. But I do say to you that if you adopt that amendment and deprive the roads of that proportion of their earning to apply it to the sinking fund, you thereby destroy all the power of the Government to get its pay in that manner.

Now the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. DUNN] proposes an amendment much fairer in my judgment than this one, and I do hope that, whether the committee adopts the amendment of the gentleman from Indiana or not, you will then vote for my amendment to strike out this 50 per cent. business and leave the bill in such shape that you can insert an amendment of the character of that suggested by the gentleman from Arkansas, which I deem very just and very fair.

I do not consider this vital; but I wish to reply a word to the gentleman from Colorado, who seems to have, as usual, spoken and then run. No, I see he is behind me. [Laughter.] He seems yet to be in the dark with reference to this bill. He seems yet to think that the original bill included the Union Pacific and Northern Pacific roads.

Mr. BELFORD. I understand that it includes all the branches of the Pacific roads.

Mr. HORR. Very well. What was the figure of speech that the gentleman used in reference to this matter the other day? Was it "esoteric" or "exoteric?" What did you mean?

Mr. BELFORD. The gentleman from Michigan, who is so elegant on this subject, can probably comprehend what I meant.

Mr. HORR. Even to a mind which can be convinced by exoteric proof the bill does not include those roads; because in the very act and title of the act there is an omission as to the charters of the Union Pacific and Central Pacific and Northern Pacific roads. There was a clear distinction, and they were omitted.

Judge HOLMAN, with his shrewdness, draws this bill to cover the whole case. Now, if the gentleman is right, there is no reason for making his amendment.

Mr. BELFORD. That is a piece of jugglery.

Mr. HORR. It is not jugglery if a man's mind is clear and serene. [Laughter.]

The first bill was drawn on purpose to omit these roads; and I take it that the House will stop and consider well before, by this species of legislation, it will destroy the good effects of the Thurman bill to secure the nation with reference to its rights in these roads. And as I said, if you are to keep the 50 per cent. clause in, then I prefer that the proposed amendment of the gentleman from Indiana should go in, but on the principle only that it will make the whole bill so vicious that nobody will support it.

[Here the hammer fell.]

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the pending amendment proposed by the gentleman from Indiana.

Mr. HOLMAN. I ask permission to modify the amendment by inserting three or four words additional to the end of it which were omitted in making up the copy.

Mr. HORR. What are the words?

The Clerk read as follows:

This act or any provision thereof.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the modification of the amendment?

There was no objection.

Mr. HORR. Let the amendment be again read.

The amendment was again read.

The question was taken; the committee divided; and there were—ayes 85, noes 56.

So the amendment as modified was agreed to.

Mr. BINGHAM. I now send to the desk an amendment to strike out, after the word "roads," in line 68, down to and including——

Mr. KEIFER. Is it not in order now to amend this in another place before moving to strike out?

Mr. HORR. My motion to strike out the entire proviso is the pending proposition. I make that point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair understood the action of the committee to be to substitute the proposition of the gentleman from Indiana.

Mr. REED. It could not be a substitute.

The CHAIRMAN. An amendment in the nature of a substitute.

Mr. REED. It could not be a substitute for a motion to strike out.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair on examining finds that the gentleman from Maine is correct. The Chair will submit the motion of the gentleman from Michigan.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. The motion then of the gentleman from Michigan is open for discussion.

The CHAIRMAN. The motion of the gentleman from Michigan as amended by the amendment of the gentleman from Indiana is now pending and open for discussion.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. Let us have the debate on it.

Mr. HORR took the floor and yielded to Mr. CUTCHEON.

Mr. CUTCHEON. I would not ask for a moment of the time of this committee were it not for the fact that this proviso strikes a blow at one of the largest interests of the district which I represent, there being but one interest there that could be more seriously affected than this. Its importance to my district arises from this fact, that almost the entire railroad system of the district consists of two land-grant railroads: the Grand Rapids and Indiana Railroad, which runs through the entire length of my district, north and south, two hundred miles; and the Flint and Pere Marquette Railroad, which crosses it from east to west, one hundred miles.

When these land grants were made to these roads that entire part of the State of Michigan was an unbroken wilderness. These railroads by means of those grants were pushed forward into this wilderness, and they have left behind them civilization, they have left behind them large manufacturing towns, they have left behind them blooming farms and flourishing towns; and that which twenty years ago was an unbroken wilderness to-day constitutes two populous Congressional districts in the northern part of the Lower Peninsula of Michigan.

For this reason I stand here to protest against this proviso which strikes down those railroads, and for the reason given by my friend from Illinois [Mr. CANNON] that when you strike at the earnings of these roads by taking away from them the pay, the just, legitimate, and equitable pay, for the transportation of the mails they must and will lay the difference of rate over on the transportation of the freights of all the poor farmers, mechanics, and other people who live along the line of those roads. The estimates for railroad transportation made by the Second Assistant Postmaster-General have in this bill been cut down $2,035,000.

Mr. DUNN. May I ask the gentleman from Michigan a question?

Mr. CUTCHEON. Yes, sir.

Mr. DUNN. Have freights diminished or been increased since 1876?

Mr. CUTCHEON. They have diminished upon the whole, I think; but as the result of competition and the great increase of business.

Mr. DUNN. In 1876 the compensation of these roads for transporting the mails was reduced 20 per cent.

Mr. CUTCHEON. I hope the gentleman will not occupy the short time allowed me.

This cutting down of the estimates has been accomplished, first, by a general reduction of 5 per cent. and another reduction on the top of that of 50 per cent., leaving to these land-grant roads but 47½ per cent. of the compensation they have heretofore received. This is based upon the ground that these roads were constructed in whole or in part by means of land grants made by Congress. And it makes no difference whether constructed in whole or in part; if they were constructed in however small a part by means of land grants, this bill strikes them with the 50 per cent. reduction clause. If only one-tenth part was built by land grants, under the provisions of this bill they are struck by the 50 per cent. clause.

This is done, furthermore, without regard to the service performed, without regard to the earnings of the road, without regard to the equities of the case. I say, Mr. Chairman, with all due deference to the committee, that is highwayman's law. It is the road agent's demand, "Stand and deliver," simply because we have the power. It is putting the blunderbuss of the law at the head of these corporations and demanding they shall surrender their private property for public use without compensation. In other words, it is confiscation, pure and simple, of the property of these two roads. One of them—the Grand Rapids and Indiana—has I believe never yet paid one dollar to its original stockholders; and, according to the last official annual report published by the railroad commissioner of Michigan, it fell short $29,000 of paying their current expenses and the interest of their bonds on a capital of over $15,000,000 invested. The other railroad—the Flint and Pere Marquette—four years ago went through the hands of a receiver and was sold at the receiver's sale at about one-half its original cost, never having paid a dollar to its original stockholders. And to-day it only pays 6 per cent. on its preferred stock of six and one-half millions, which represents the original first-mortgage bonds, while its common stock pays nothing.

I say, then, if you have the right to strike these roads down to 50 per cent. you can reduce them 75 per cent.; and if you can reduce their compensation 75 per cent. you can reduce it 99 per cent. I say that is robber's law. It is highwayman's law, which says to these railroads, simply because we have the power under the letter of the statute, without regard to its spirit, without regard to equity, without regard to what is reasonable compensation, "We will rob you, we will take from you your just compensation." I say that is not law; I say it is not equity; and the courts never can sustain such legislation as that. The courts will infer that what the United States will pay for these services under the condition of the grants is to be a reasonable compensation. The very statement of the proposition that if you can reduce them 50 per cent. you can reduce them 99 per cent. is the only answer it seems to me is required to be given to it.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. HOLMAN. This railroad in Michigan to which my friend from Michigan [Mr. CUTCHEON] refers was built through one of the most fertile portions of the Northwest, except that portion of it which passes through the pine barrens, and that passes through one of the most valuable bodies of timber land on this continent. I think the gentleman will hardly deny that the land granted by the Government at a comparatively late day, it being one of the last grants made, was enough to build that road two or three times over. It has made fortunes for a few men. The Government reserved the right to fix the rate of transportation of its mails and property—upon what basis and for what purpose? It reserved the right to fix the rate of transporting the mails in consideration of the grant of land. Now, notwithstanding the Government made this magnificent land grant to these railroad corporations and reserved this right to fix the rate of transporting the mails, it is held by gentlemen to be robbery to insist that a road built by the bounty of the Government shall transport the property of the Government at a lower rate than is paid to other roads built by private enterprise and private capital. Now, the strongest argument which you can make on this subject is the mere statement of the facts; that is the most unanswerable argument that you can present. You have built these roads by your bounty; you have made a few men wealthy; you have given them overgrown fortunes; and you did that upon condition that they should transport your property on such terms as you might fix. And now it is said that the wealth thus granted, the favors thus extended, shall not be taken into account in determining what, under the circumstances, is a reasonable compensation for the services to be rendered.

Gentlemen get up here and indulge in brilliant generalities; speak of the wrongs which will be done to these corporations by this provision. The first time I ever passed over that road in Michigan to which the gentleman refers I stopped at a little way station in the woods early one morning. I found there a citizen complaining in bitter terms that land which he thought he was entering, long in advance of the location of the railroad, had fallen within the limits of the land grant, and he was threatened by the railroad corporation to be deprived of his property. It is not simply the wealth you have granted to these corporations; that is not the most important item to be considered. It is the wrongs which you have done to your people by this system. If you should require every one of these roads which have been built by your bounty to transport your property, troops, and mails free of charge you would not then begin to recompense the people of this country for the wrong done, for the injury inflicted upon them by depriving them ultimately of cheerful and prosperous homes.

Mr. BUDD. Will the gentleman permit me to ask him a question?

Mr. HOLMAN. Certainly.

Mr. BUDD. You have given this matter a great deal of study?

Mr. HOLMAN. Some little.

Mr. BUDD. Would a reduction of 50 per cent. upon the rates now paid by the Government leave the compensation less than the cost of transportation?

Mr. HOLMAN. Not less than the cost of transportation.

Mr. HORR. A great deal less.

Mr. HOLMAN. Not less than the cost of transportation. The controversy in connection with the right of the Government to fix the cost of transporting the property and troops of the United States went to the Court of Claims, from that court to the Supreme Court, and from the Supreme Court back to the Court of Claims, and it was there settled that 50 per cent. upon the amount which had been paid would be a reasonable compensation. This part of the bill is based on the same idea; I do not myself think it goes far enough.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN] has expired.

Mr. BUDD. I did not get an answer to my question.

Mr. HORR. I now yield two minutes to the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. CLARDY].

Mr. CLARDY. I have listened to the arguments for and against the amendment offered by the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. HORR] and those on the pending amendment of the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN] with a view of arriving at a conclusion just alike to the people and to the railroad companies to be affected by the proposed legislation. It appears to me that by the passage of this bill with that part which the gentleman from Michigan seeks to strike out in it, or if amended as is proposed by the gentleman from Indiana and then passed, we shall subject ourselves to the very just criticism of having not only countenanced the principle of unjust discrimination in rates for transportation by common carriers but of having put into practical operation that principle in its most odious form.

We are told that the power of Congress to compel certain railroad companies to accept one-half the amount paid to the other railroad companies of the country for the transmission of the mails of the United States grows out of a right reserved by Congress in the acts donating portions of the public domain to aid in the construction of railroads. I submit that it was foreign to the purpose of Congress in making donations of public lands to aid in the construction of railroads to require the owners of such roads to render to the Government an equivalent in services or to exact any service without paying a reasonable compensation therefor.

The object of the provision which is regarded as the source of our power to reduce the amount to be paid to the land-grant roads, as they are called, below that paid to other roads for the transportation of the mails was, in my opinion, first, to emphasize a right which would have existed in the absence of such provision—the right to compel railroad companies, as common carriers, to transport the property of the Government for a reasonable compensation; and, secondly, to put it in the power of Congress, in order to prevent unjust exactions on the part of the beneficiaries of the grant, even temporarily, to fix reasonable rates. It was certainly not the purpose of Congress to require the railroad companies to recompense the Government for what purported to be a donation. Now, the amount to be paid the railroad companies that have received no bounty from the Government has been determined by act of Congress upon the theory, I suppose, that the service to be performed by them is reasonably worth the amount to be paid. The service to be rendered by the land-grant roads is equally valuable, and there should be no discrimination against them.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. HORR. I now yield two minutes to the gentleman from Florida [Mr. BISBEE], reserving one minute for myself.

Mr. BISBEE. I do not desire to be considered in any sense the champion of railroad companies. But there are about three hundred and seventy-five miles of railroad in the State of Florida which will come within the operation of this proviso, and I think it will operate very unjustly upon them.

Those roads were built before the war, and built by the aid of a land grant. The roads were mortgaged, the lands were mortgaged, and the roads have been twice sold since then under foreclosure of mortgage, and the lands have also been sold, which were under a separate mortgage. The lands have been of no benefit to the roads except as a basis of credit to the companies to enable them to raise money for the construction of their roads.

The region of country through which the roads run embraces land that was not worth paying taxes on when the roads were built. Those lands are of more value now, but they are not owned by the people who own the roads at this time; they are owned by people scattered all over the United States, who have invested money in those lands within the last ten years.

It is in the interest of the people of my State that these railroad companies should not be discriminated against. What the roads will lose under this provision, if it shall become a law, in the way of compensation for carrying the mails, they will be obliged to make up in additional freight charges and charges for the transportation of passengers. And I presume what I say in regard to these roads is equally true in reference to several other roads in the Southern States. It is wrong, it is nothing else than an outrage, to say to those companies arbitrarily that because a company twenty years ago received a grant of land which was practically worthless, it should now receive just half the compensation which other railroad companies receive for carrying the mails.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. HORR. The point which I desire particularly to bring to the attention of the House in my brief time is that this proposed reduction of 50 per cent. on the rates for carrying the mails reduces the pay for this service 15 per cent. below its actual cost, according to the testimony of all experts. You propose to compel these companies to do this work at less than it actually costs.

Again, by this proposition you commit the Government of the United States to the policy of doing a dishonest thing. After you have fixed the rate of compensation for all other roads upon a fair and just basis, it is not honest to compel these poorer companies which received these lands, not with the view of reducing their compensation for carrying the mails but to enable them to build roads where otherwise none could have been built—it is not right or honest after fixing a fair rate for other roads to step in and compel these land-grant roads to submit to a horizontal reduction of 50 per cent. Sir, the Union Pacific Railroads are carried on under a contract. We can not violate that contract. To undertake to enforce this policy is simply dishonest toward those roads.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. HOLMAN. We do not intend to violate any contract.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. Mr. Chairman, I have but five minutes, and I hope I shall not be interrupted during the course of my remarks. We are now about to vote upon a proposition which will test the question whether railroad companies which have received from the Government subsidies of bonds or lands can exercise a stronger power and influence in this House than the interests and rights of the people.

The gentleman from Michigan [Mr. HORR] says that this proposition is not honest. Sir, we have precedent for it—precedent established by his own party when it was in power in the last Congress. They incorporated in the Post-Office appropriation act a provision for the exercise of this power reserved to Congress to fix just such rates of compensation on these roads as Congress might deem proper. In the last Congress the roads which had been subsidized by bonds were brought upon a level with the land-grant roads, and the right of Congress was asserted to fix just such compensation for those roads as Congress might deem proper.

The gentleman from Michigan [Mr. HORR] says that this measure will reduce the compensation for this service below the actual cost of transportation. I deny it. The railroad companies to-day are receiving in some instances for carrying the mails fifty times as much as they charge to private parties for ordinary transportation of freight. I assert that after this reduction of 50 per cent. shall take effect these railroad companies will receive for mail trainsportation more than they are receiving for carrying express matter. They incur no extra expense whatever in this mail transportation; they put no additional brakeman or conductor upon a mail-car. They simply supply steam to the engine to haul the mail-car, and there is no expense beyond that of handling the regular passenger trains.

Mr. HORR. If that is true——

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois has stated that he is unwilling to submit to any interruption.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. I have but a minute or two, and there is very much that I desire to say.

One gentleman talks about "robbery," and the term "highwayman" has been used. Yes, sir; there has been robbery committed—legislative robbery. By means of a subsidized lobby, by means of a political power which has ever oeen the willing tool of monopoly, laws have been passed here robbing the people of over one hundred millions of acres of the public domain. Land to the value of hundreds of millions has been voted by Republican Congresses to these land-grant roads. You have voted enough to the Union Pacific and the Central Pacific Railroads to build these roads and make them a free gift to the stockholders, leaving $26,000,000 of profit in their pockets in addition to a gift of the stocks of the roads. The lands given to all these railroads have been on the average sufficient to pay for the roads and make them a free gift to the stockholders.

In return for this grand bounty, for this empire which has been voted to these roads, we have simply reserved the right to fix the rate of compensation they shall receive for carrying the mails. This is all we get in return. But after the people have been plundered of their homesteads, and when we undertake to exact this poor return for the bounty of the Government, gentlemen come in here with specious arguments and plausible pretexts to prevent us from exercising this power which has been reserved to Congress. Gentlemen insist that we should allow the same rate of compensation to these roads that is paid to roads which never received one dollar from the Government. Sir, what might be a reasonable rate for a road which has never been subsidized would be an unreasonable rate for a road which has been built from the bounty of the Government.

I insist, sir, that we in fixing a reasonable rate should take into consideration—it is the solemn duty of the Representatives of the people—to take into consideration the bounties and vast sums that this Government has already given to these roads.

I will not stop, sir, to argue the question of our power. The power of Congress is admitted on every hand clearly and distinctly.

Mr. OATES (from his seat). It was a part of the contract.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. As my friend from Alabama reminds me it was a part of the contract, a part of the conditions imposed by the Government for granting its aid in the construction of these roads, that it should have the right to exercise that power.

[Here the hammer fell.]

The CHAIRMAN. The question now is on the amendment of the gentleman from Michigan as amended by the gentleman from Indiana, which is to strike out all of the proviso as amended.

Mr. HOLMAN. Mr. Chairman, the language to be stricken out was embraced in the original proposition, beginning with the words, "provided, however." That was what the gentleman from Michigan moved to strike out. My amendment was to substitute for the words stricken out the text of the amendment which has been already adopted.

Mr. HORR. I beg the gentleman's pardon. His proposition was an amendment to my original motion.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair has already so held.

Mr. HOLMAN. The gentleman's motion embraced the text of the bill from the words "provided, however."

Mr. HORR. The motion was to strike out the whole of that part, with the amendment of the gentleman from Indiana.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair thinks there is no difficulty about the matter. It is not debatable. The Clerk will report the words proposed to be stricken out by the amendment of the gentleman from Michigan.

The amendment of Mr. HORR was again read.

The committee divided; and there were—ayes 62, noes 92.

Mr. HORR. I call for tellers.

Tellers were ordered; and Mr. HORR and Mr. TOWNSHEND were appointed.

The committee again divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 79, noes 98.

So the amendment was not agreed to.

Mr. HOLMAN. I now move, for the purpose of perfecting this section——

Mr. BINGHAM. Mr. Chairman, I claim that I had a standing before the committee, my amendment having been set aside temporarily by the point of order of the gentleman from Michigan.

Mr. HOLMAN. I shall occupy but a minute, simply with a view of perfecting this section. After the word "eight," in line 77——

Mr. HORR. I insist that the gentleman from Pennsylvania should be recognized under our arrangement.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair states that the agreement contemplated the offering of other amendments. The gentleman from Indiana is clearly in order.

Mr. HOLMAN. My motion is to strike out, after the word "eight," in line 77, down to and including the word "acts," in line 108.

It is hardly necessary to explain that it is necessary to strike out this in order to make the amendment already adopted consistent.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. BINGHAM. I now offer the amendment which I send to the desk.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

The Clerk read as follows:

Strike out, after the words "railroad routes," in line 68, down to and including the word "miles," in line 71, the following words: "By reducing the compensation to all railroad companies for the transportation of mails 5 per centum per annum from the rates for the transportation of mails."

Mr. BINGHAM. Mr. Chairman, the entire debate covering this paragraph of the section has had reference to the land-grant or subsidized railroads and the compensation that is considered just and fair to them for carrying the mails. By the provision just passed you have reduced their compensation, according to the statement of the gentleman from Indiana, $1,100,000 per annum. By the first section of this bill you made a horizontal reduction of 5 per cent. upon every other railroad of the country in carrying the mail under the provisions as applied to the subsidized or land-grant roads. It is to the injustice and unfairness of that proposition that I desire to address my remarks.

It will affect the railroads carrying the mails $600,000 per annum in the reduction of their compensation. No gentleman in this debate, except the gentleman from Illinois who presented the bill, in his first speech, refers to the justice of this reduction, and he placed it upon this basis:

The railroads are at present carrying passengers, express, and freights far cheaper than they were carrying them at the period of the last reduction. The cost of material, of wages, and the ordinary expense of running railroads are cheaper than they were at that period. We feel, therefore, that Congress can, without being charged with injustice to the railways, reduce this rate of compensation to the extent provided here.

That is the only reason given in this debate why the railroad companies are to be reduced 5 per cent. I say to the gentleman and to the committee that there is a marked injustice in the proposition for this horizontal reduction of the compensation allowed to railroads. The mails are not to-day what they were in 1873, when you passed the law carrying the mails under absolute weight. The railroads to-day are carrying the mails with due frequency and speed, but under the statute of the last Congress, re-enacted in this appropriation bill, we find that they are to carry them on the fastest trains running out of their respective depots. Not only that, but they are running mail trains now from thirty-two to thirty-eight miles an hour. Then they were run at from twenty-two to twenty-five, and every facility that the Government has demanded has been generously increased and broadened.

Your entire postal-car service in that time has almost doubled, and the transportation that these great trunk lines give your railroad clerks, if placed upon the basis of a commutation of one and a half cent per mile of carriage, would amount to almost $3,000,000.

But the point I desire to make most distinctly before the committee is that the roads which give you the largest facilities you strike at most seriously. The remarks of the gentleman from Texas made two days ago were pertinent to this proposition. The roads that carry less than a ton per mile receive thirty-three, thirty-four, and thirty-seven cents per ton per mile. The great roads that carry your postal-car service, like the New York Central and the great Pennsylvania road, only receive a fraction over eight cents per ton per mile. Therefore, when you come to your horizontal reduction you strike roads like the Pennsylvania $25,000 to $30,000 per annum, and roads like the New York Central the same amount, the roads which give you the broadest and largest facilities; while the roads carrying less than a ton per mile you scarcely make any impression upon, for the reason that they receive four and a half times greater compensation than the great trunk lines. Now in 1873 you passed this law adjusting the compensation for inland mail transportation on your railroad routes. In 1876 you reduced it 10 per cent. In 1878——

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. TOWNSHEND] is recognized.

Mr. BINGHAM. If no other gentleman on this side desires to argue this proposition I should like a few minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. If it appears that other gentlemen on that side do not desire to be recognized the Chair will recognize the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. BINGHAM].

Mr. KASSON. If I can be recognized now I will yield my time to the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

Mr. HOLMAN. Do gentlemen on the other side propose to take their whole ten minutes at once?

Mr. KASSON. I yield to the gentleman from Pennsylvania so much of the time accorded to me as he requires.

Mr. BINGHAM. As I was saying, the roads that give the largest convenience and facilities, that transport your mails on the fastest trains, on the fast trains running from forty to fifty miles an hour, are by this horizontal reduction the railroads most severely and unjustly treated, while the smaller roads, giving you but limited facilities and conveniences, are scarcely or not perceptibly injured by your reduction.

You propose by this to strike these roads $600,000 in their annual compensation. What was the result in 1876 when you made the reduction of 10 per cent.? The New York Central Railway and the Pennsylvania Railway gave notice to the Post-Office Department that they would not transport the mails upon their fast trains. What was the result? Indignant petitions and remonstrances came up from all sections of the country, until at the next session of Congress you were forced to legislate for that which had before been unknown in your legislation with reference to mail transportation; and that was to increase the compensation of railroads for what was known as special mail facilities.

That went up from the first year, when it was $150,000, until two years ago it reached the appropriation of $600,000. To-day it is $175,000. Nothing is given in this bill as a provision for special mail facilities. But the committee submit this proposition without reason, without argument other than that given by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. TOWNSHEND], who states that because passenger and freight rates are reduced, therefore the cost of mail transportation should be reduced. I say to the gentleman that he has not given to this House any reason why 5 per cent. should be the standard of the reduction. Why could it not have been 10 per cent.? Why could it not have been the same in the provisions of this bill in reference to the general transportation roads as you have applied to the subsidized or bounty roads? Simply because you have felt that the great railroads without indignation or rebellion would accept this 5 per cent. reduction, whereas they would have rebelled and would have positively refused to carry your mails if the reduction had been larger.

I desire to say to the gentleman that already, in view of the presentation of this bill to this House, the great trunk lines have filed their protest with the Post-Office Department with reference to the treatment deservedly condemned and opposed by them that this House is asked to inflict upon them by carrying through this legislation.

The gentleman had before his committee a well-digested and carefully prepared plan, the result of a thorough and complete investigation of this entire subject. More than a million of dollars could have been saved under the legislation thus proposed. Your Post-Office Committee has submitted that legislation with a favorable report to this House, and when they come before this House and ask its approval it will be a request based upon information in every detail in contrast to the simple general declaration of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. TOWNSHEND] that because freight and passenger rates have been reduced, therefore the mail-transportation rates should be reduced.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. TOWNSHEND. We have got back now to the only point remaining in this provision, and that is to the question whether there shall be any reduction of the cost of general railway mail transportation. The cost of railway mail transportation has grown marvelously and astoundingly. Within the last ten years it has nearly doubled in cost. The cost of the railway mail transportation is nearly $19,000,000, and I warn this Congress now if another great scandal shall afflict the postal service of this country it will grow out of the very question that is now under consideration.

My friend from Pennsylvania [Mr. BINGHAM] seems to have grave apprehensions that these trunk lines will throw up the service of the Government; that they will refuse to carry the mails.

Mr. BINGHAM. They have given notice.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. I tell you that the Government or the mail can get along better without the railroads than the railroads can get along without the mail.

Their throwing the Government mail off their roads will affect the prosperity of those roads far more than it will affect the interest of the Government. No such idle threat as that ought to be allowed to influence the action of a single sensible member upon this floor. Is there any danger that these railroads will give up the most profitable traffic which they have to-day? Look at the facts. They are charging for ordinary freights from five-eighths of 1 cent to about 2½ cents per ton per mile. What are they getting for carrying the mails? The Postmaster-General tells you that they are receiving for transporting the mails, on the average, 10.45 cents per ton per mile, the compensation ranging from about 6 cents per ton up to as high as $2 per ton per mile. Yet the gentleman tells us that these railroads will protest and refuse to accept the most profitable portion of their traffic. It is idle to use such arguments here.

Does this House forget the fact that ten years ago the maximum cost for carrying the mails by rail was only about $300 per mile per year? What is it to-day? It runs up as high, in some instances, as $1,600 per mile. On the average the mail traffic is more profitable to the railroads than its freight, its express, and in many instances than its passenger traffic; yet the gentleman says that there is danger if we cut down the compensation for carrying the mails 5 per cent. that these railroads will throw off the mails. There are roads in this country that really are mainly sustained by the compensation paid them for carrying the Government mails.

Mr. CANNON. Will the gentleman permit me to ask him a question?

Mr. TOWNSHEND. I have not the time.

Mr. CANNON. Only a question.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. Very well.

Mr. CANNON. It is right in point. If the railroads receive so much more pay for carrying the mails than they do for carrying anything else, why is it that the gentleman contents himself with cutting down the mail compensation only 5 per cent.? Why not cut it down lower?

Mr. BINGHAM. That is it.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. I will answer the question. In 1876 the compensation for carrying the mails was cut down 10 per cent.; in 1878 it was cut down 5 per cent. At the present time, taking into consideration the higher cost of the service, the greater cost of materials for building the roads, and the greater compensation paid to employés, which at the time the former reductions were made were in the neighborhood of from 5 to 10 per cent. greater than at the present time—in other words, taking into consideration the fact that the cost of the railway service has been reduced over 10 per cent. since the last cut was made, I would have been willing to have cut them down now 10 per cent.; yea, I would have been ready to do so if I could have hoped that I would carry this House with me on the proposition. But we were moderate in our demand, feeling justified in asking that there be at least 5 per cent. reduction. We might have cut deeper without doing injustice.

We were willing to content ourselves with the reduction of 5 per cent. this session. Perhaps at the next session we may cut deeper, as we may see that we can justify ourselves in doing so. And in the next Democratic Congress, which I certainly believe will be sent here by the people at the next election, we will cut down to a point where the compensation for carrying the mails will be more reasonable than it is now.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. TOWNSHEND] has expired.

Mr. HOLMAN. I now yield to the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. DUNN].

The CHAIRMAN. How much time does the gentleman yield?

Mr. HOLMAN. I believe there is but five minutes of time remaining for debate, and I will yield that to the gentleman from Arkansas.

Mr. DUNN. Mr. Chairman, I thank my friend from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN] for his courtesy. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. BINGHAM] arraigns the committee for the proposed 5 per cent. reduction of the compensation to be allowed all railroads for transporting the mails. He has been well answered by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. TOWNSHEND] who has the bill in charge. In addition to what he said, however, I will call attention to the significant fact that there has never been any reduction in the charges for transporting the mails voluntarily made by the railroad companies. Every reduction of those charges that has ever been secured has been arbitrarily made by Congress. This circumstance is all the more significant when considered in connection with the steady and continuing reductions of freight and passenger rates that have been and are being voluntarily made by all the railroads throughout the country. These latter reductions in rates are made by reason of competition and steadily reducing cost of operating the roads. But they deny to the Government all the benefits of these considerations. There is no competition as to the business of the Government. They all unite and make common cause against the Government, which in this case is required to "stand and deliver." There is nothing left for the Government to do except to assert its power and enforce reductions in the compensation allowed for transporting the mails, troops, and public property.

Mr. Chairman, I am gratified to have this opportunity to explain my position as to the pending paragraph as amended, for I perceive that it is misunderstood by some. The objection that I took to the bill of the committee on day before yesterday was that the Pacific railroads were not included in and subjected to the provisions of the bill fixing the rates of compensation to be allowed to the other land-grant roads for transporting the mails. I made no other objection to the bill. I am very much gratified to observe that the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN], on the part of the majority of the committee, has this morning brought in an amendment, which has been adopted by the committee, to bring the Pacific roads under the operation of these provisions and subject them to the same conditions imposed upon the other land-grant roads. So understanding this amendment, I am satisfied with the paragraph and shall support the committee and their bill very cordially.

Knowing as I did that the Pacific railroad systems had received more of the Government's bounty than any other roads in the country, I naturally felt shocked to see that the committee had deliberately framed a bill for the revision and reduction of the compensation to be allowed for transporting the mails on the railroads, and should have exempted the land-grant and bond-subsidy Pacific roads from the provisions reducing that compensation. I could not understand why the Union and Central Pacific roads and their branches, which had received $64,000,000 in the bonds of the Government, now increased to over $100,000,000 by unpaid interest, and over 40,000,000 acres of its public lands, should be exempted from the conditions imposed upon roads that had received less. This provision of the bill as now amended is entirely consistent with the long-established policy of the Government and well founded in constitutional authority.

Section 4001 of the Revised Statutes provides that—

> All railway companies to which the United States have furnished aid by grant of lands, right of way, or otherwise, shall carry the mails at such prices as Congress may provide; and until such price is fixed by law the Postmaster-General may fix the rate of compensation.

Section 4002 fixes a scale of maximum rates, graded according to the average weight of the mails carried, according to which the Postmaster-General is authorized and directed to readjust the compensation thereafter to be paid for the transportation of the mails on said railroad routes.

This power was first exercised in 1850 (9 Statutes, 466) granting the right of way and public lands to the State of Illinois in aid of the construction of the Central Railroad, which is said to be the first land grant to aid in the construction of a railroad.

Prior to 1862 there seems to have existed a statute in the following words:

> The Postmaster-General is authorized to fix the rate of compensation to land-grant roads in the absence of a price fixed by law.

This was re-enacted in 1872 in "An act to revise, consolidate, and amend the statutes relating to the Post-Office Department," approved June 5, 1872 (17 Statutes, 309). From that act it was transferred into the Revised Statutes, as above quoted.

I first address myself to the subject of the power of the Government to regulate and fix absolutely the compensation to be allowed for transporting the mails upon the railroads.

Article I, section 8, of the Constitution confers upon Congress the "power * * * to regulate commerce with foreign nations, and among the several States, and with the Indian tribes; * * * to establish post-offices and post-roads," &c.

In the case of Munn vs. Illinois (94 United States, 130) Chief-Justice Waite, delivering the opinion of the court, said:

> Common carriers exercise a sort of public office, and have duties to perform in which the public is interested. Their business * * * is therefore affected with a public interest, within the meaning of the doctrine which Lord Hale has so forcibly stated. * * * Enough has already been said to show that when private property is devoted to a public use it is subject to public regulation.

In the case of the Pensacola Telegraph Company vs. Western Union Telegraph Company (96 United States, 9) the Chief-Justice, delivering the opinion, said:

> Since the case of Gibbons vs. Ogden (9 Wheaton, 1) it has never been doubted that commercial intercourse is an element of commerce which comes within the regulating power of Congress. Post-offices and post-roads are established to facilitate the transmission of intelligence. Both commerce and the postal service are placed within the power of Congress, because, being national in their operation, they should be under the protecting care of the National Government.

It is therefore manifest that there is ample authority for the exercise of this power to regulate and control this important branch of the public service. The power to absolutely fix the price which should be paid for transporting the mails upon railroads other than land-grant roads was not exercised prior to 1850, possibly not before 1872, but "the non-user of a power does not disprove its existence." (Kohl et al. vs. United States, 91 United States, 373.)

It is insisted that the railroad companies are entitled to reasonable compensation for this service, and that the companies or the courts must determine what is a reasonable compensation.

This assumption also is erroneous. In Munn vs. Illinois (94 United States, 133):

> It is insisted, however, that the owner of property is entitled to a reasonable compensation for its use even though it be clothed with a public interest, and that what is reasonable is a judicial and not a legislative question. As has already been shown, the practice has been otherwise. In countries where the common law prevails it has been customary from time immemorial for the legislature to declare what shall be a reasonable compensation under such circumstances, or perhaps, more properly speaking, to fix a maximum beyond which any charge made would be unreasonable. * * * If there are no statutory regulations upon the subject, the courts must determine what is reasonable. The controlling fact is the power to regulate at all. If that exists, the right to establish the maximum of charge as one of the means of regulation is implied. * * * Rights of property which have been created by the common law can not be taken away without due process, but the law itself as a rule of conduct may be changed at the will, or even at the whim, of the legislature unless prevented by constitutional limitations. Indeed, the great office of statutes is to remedy defects in the common law as they are developed, and to adapt it to the changes of time and circumstances. To limit the rate of charges for services rendered in a public employment or for the use of property in which the public has an interest is only changing a regulation which existed before. It establishes no new principle in the law, but only gives a new effect to an old one. We know that this is a power which may be abused. But that is no argument against its existence. For protection against abuses by legislatures the people must resort to the polls and not to the courts.

Again, in Peik vs. Chicago, &c., Railway Company (94 United States, 178), the court say:

> As to the claim that the courts must decide what [rates of compensation] are reasonable and not the Legislature, this is not new to this case. It has been fully considered in Munn vs. Illinois. Where property has been clothed with a public interest the Legislature may fix a limit to that which shall in law be reasonable for its use. This limit binds the courts as well as the people. If it has been improperly fixed, the Legislature and not the courts must be appealed to for the change.

In the Sinking Fund cases (99 United States 719), speaking of the Union Pacific Railroad, the court says:

This corporation is a creature of the United States. It is a private corporation created for public purposes, and its property is to a large extent devoted to public uses. It is, therefore, subject to legislative control so far as its business affects the public interests.

Undoubtedly that may also be said of all railroads, and perhaps no more accurate description of the extent of the power of regulation and control can be given. I therefore think it may be confidently assumed that we have control over this question as to all railroads independently of the specific reservations contained in the acts making grants of lands to the land-grant railroads, and independently also of the reserved right to "alter, amend, or abolish," the acts granting charters, public lands, and bonds of the United States to the Pacific roads.

In the exercise of this power Congress has steadily fixed maximum rates of compensation for the transportation of the mails upon all roads. When the general postal code was enacted fixing certain general principles and regulating the rates for railroads which had received no land grants or subsidy bonds Congress declared what they thought was at that time a reasonable compensation for this service, and they designated 80 per cent. of that as a just, reasonable, and proper compensation for the land-grant roads, making by that enactment no discrimination between the roads that had received grants of land only and those that had received grants of both land and bonds, and placing no additional burdens upon the latter on account of such additional subsidy.

The land grants were all made upon the condition that roads should always transport the troops and property of the United States free of toll or other charge, and the mails at such price as should be fixed by Congress.

The grants to the Pacific railroads were upon the condition that the companies should pay their bonds and interest at maturity, and build and keep their roads in repair, and transport mails, troops, munitions of war, and Government property whenever required to do so by any Department of the Government, giving at all times the preference to the Government in the use of the same, at fair and reasonable prices, not to exceed those charged to other persons for like services. These were the contracts, so to speak. The Post-Office Department, in the performance of its lawful duties, construed and put into effect the general postal code which I have before referred to, fixing and limiting the rates of compensation allowed to these different classes of roads for transporting the mails and undertook to enforce it.

All the railroads in the country accepted the terms and rates fixed by Congress except these Pacific roads which had received both lands and bonds. They appealed to the Supreme Court against the construction of the Department, and by the decision of the court they were relieved from the construction put upon the law by the Post-Office Department upon the naked ground that Congress had not in the act fixing the rates expressed the legislative intention to alter and amend their charters, which had emanated from Congress and constituted a contract between the Government and the companies which must stand as there expressed until "altered or amended" by the express intendment of Congress. The court held that they were land-grant roads, but sui generis, having received not only their land-grants but also their charters from Congress.

In the act granting these charters Congress reserved the right to "alter, amend, or repeal this act," so that the legislative authority over them rests not alone in mere assertion of constitutional power to regulate, but the Government expressly reserved to itself this right.

Now, sir, having declared by law, under the sanction of the authority that I have shown, what were reasonable rates for general railroads and what were reasonable rates for land-grant railroads and having enforced them without serious resistance, we now come to declare what are reasonable rates, in the light of the vast subsidies they have received in both lands and bonds for these Pacific roads, and it is this time put in the form of an express amendment of their charters, carrying with it the expression of the legislative intent to amend them in order to avoid the point of discrimination that was made and sustained by the Supreme Court.

We are now again met by two or three objections. We are told that we have no power to do it; that when Congress granted this charter to these railroad companies and gave to them the benefit of the munificent grants of land and bonds that I have mentioned, and expressly reserved to itself, for the public good, the right to "alter, amend, or repeal" that charter, there are vested rights in the companies which will prevail to prevent Congress from doing what it reserved the right to do. It would seem to be a sufficient answer to say that "there can be no vested right in a rule of the law," or in a constitutional power given alone to the Legislature.

There is no "vested right" in this case in the sense in which the term "vested right" is used by lawyers and in the courts.

The only "vested right" is that which is vested in Congress to regulate and control, and to "alter, amend, or repeal" at will.

This power is both inherent and reserved, and was reserved in the very charter granted to the companies. In the Sinking-fund cases (99 United States, 724) the court says:

The United States occupy toward this corporation a twofold relation—that of sovereign and that of creditor. Their rights as sovereign are not crippled because they are creditors, and their privileges as creditors are not enlarged by the charter because of their sovereignty.

In the same case the court says:

It is unnecessary to decide what power Congress would have had over the charter if the right of amendment had not been reserved; for, as we think, that reservation has been made.

In the act of 1862, section 18, it was accompanied by an explanatory statement, showing that this had been done "the better to accomplish the objects of this act, namely, to promote the public interest and welfare by the construction of said railroad and telegraph line and keeping the same in working order, and to secure to the Government at all times (but especially in times of war) the use and benefits of the same for postal, military, and other purposes," and by an injunction that it should be used with due regard for the rights of said companies.

In the act of 1864, however, there is nothing except the simple words (section 22) "that Congress may at any time alter, amend, and repeal this act."

Taking both acts together, and giving the explanatory statement in the act of 1862 all the effect it can be entitled to, we are of the opinion that Congress not only retains but has given special notice of its intention to retain full and complete power to make such alterations and amendments of the charter as come within the just scope of its legislative power.

Justice Field was even more explicit. In Tomlinson vs. Jessup he said:

The reservation affects the entire relation between the State and the corporation, and places under legislative control all rights, privileges, and immunities derived by its charter directly from the State. * * * Giving full effect to the principles which have thus been authoritatively stated, we think it safe to say that whatever rules Congress might have prescribed in the original charter for the government of the corporation in the administration of its affairs it retained the power to establish by amendment.

There can therefore be no doubt as to the power. Ought we to do it? If it is just and right to reduce the compensation of the railroads which have received only grants of land, it is certainly just and right to similarly reduce the compensation of these roads which have received both lands and bonds, and, too, more than twice as much land as any other railroads have received, except the Northern Pacific and Atlantic and Pacific roads. The same rule of justice by which the land-grant roads were required to take less than the non-land-grant roads for transporting the mails would justify the reduction of the compensation of these Pacific roads still below that allowed to the land-grant roads, making the measure of subsidy received by each the guide.

But when in addition to this consideration the further fact is considered that these favored roads now charge and receive twice as much compensation for carrying the mails as the roads that never received any land grants or subsidies receive, there would appear to be no longer a doubt as to our duty. It is said to be actually true and ascertainable by the figures that these lavishly subsidized Pacific roads that have received over one hundred and fifty million dollars' worth of lands, seventy-five million dollars' worth of which have already been sold, and $64,000,000 in bonds of the Government, now grown to a debt of over $100,000,000 and still increasing, do now actually receive twice as much for carrying the mails as the roads that have never received any land grant or other subsidy. They receive annually near $1,000,000 for carrying them, and yet their constant cry is for more.

I fully agree with the gentleman from Texas [Mr. MILLS] that their compensation, as now allowed, is unreasonably high, and every consideration of public duty and justice demands its immediate reduction as provided in this bill.

Another plea is that this reduction will take so much out of the sinking fund which the Thurman act provides for. I have already shown in my remarks on this paragraph day before yesterday that to allow them greater compensation than other land-grant roads is to give them additional and continuing subsidies in money never to be recovered. Nay, more; it will amount to a persistent and perpetual robbery of the Government, for the Commissioner of Railroads has shown in his report that these companies have entered upon a systematic method of robbing the so-called sinking fund, so that it has already ceased to be a sinking fund, and has become a mockery and a delusion. When we reduce their compensation one-half we will then have only brought them actually to what other roads receive if it is true, as said, that their pay is now double that of others.

The CHAIRMAN. The time for debate on the pending paragraph and amendments thereto has expired. The first question is on the amendment of the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. BINGHAM], which will be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Strike out after "railroad routes," in line 68, the words down to and including "mails," in line 71.

The amendment was not agreed to.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. I offer the amendment which I send to the desk, to come in after the word "receive."

The CHAIRMAN. That has been stricken out. This amendment may come in after the amendment of the gentleman from Indiana.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. Very well; let it be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Shall receive such per cent. of the compensation authorized by this act to other railroad companies for corresponding service as to the Postmaster-General shall seem just and equitable in view of the Government aid to said roads, but in no case shall the pay to such land-grant roads be less than 50 per cent. of the compensation allowed for corresponding service on other roads.

The amendment was not agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

For inland transportation by steamboat routes, $600,000.

Mr. HORR. I move to amend so as to increase the appropriation in this paragraph to $625,000. In my general remarks on this bill I explained the reason for this proposition. The steamboat service at present exhausts every dollar of the appropriation of $600,000. It is desired on the part of the people in Florida to have a fast-steamboat line on the Saint John's River from Palatka to Enterprise. They need it. Steamboat transportation is also needed upon a little route from Beaver Island, in Lake Michigan.

In addition to that the Postmaster-General tells us that he needs a small sum to draw upon in case of overflow. During the great overflow of the Mississippi he used several thousand dollars to enable people who were cut off from railroad transportation to get their mails by water. He was obliged to do the same at certain places on the Ohio River during the last overflow. The Postmaster-General says that without this little margin of $25,000 he will not have anything to go and come upon for purposes of this kind. I am not going to talk further on this amendment. I give the House the facts. I think the amendment ought to be adopted.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. Mr. Chairman, it is undoubtedly well known to the House that the steamboat service is steadily diminishing every year. As railroads are constructed they supersede steamboat service. I reside in a town on the Ohio River, and there is scarcely a month in the year in which I do not take notice of this diminution in the amount of steamboat service. The expenditures for the last few years demonstrate this reduction. In 1880 there was expended on this service $887,000; in 1881 the expenditure ran down to $753,000; in 1882 the expenditure was only $574,000. We propose to give in this bill $600,000—more than $25,000 in excess of the expenditure of 1882. Last year, by reason of some exceptional causes, the expenditure ran up to $607,000. But I am confident that the $600,000 proposed by the committee will be found ample for this service. I therefore oppose the amendment.

Mr. BISBEE. Mr. Chairman, the argument of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. TOWNSHEND] has in my judgment no application to this matter. The question is not how much has been spent in the past, but what is really necessary for the coming fiscal year. Now, the fact is that a railroad has been completed within a few weeks from Jacksonville, Fla., to Palatka, the time being about two hours. From Palatka to Sanford the distance is one hundred and thirty-five miles by water. From Sanford to Tampa the distance is about one hundred and twenty-four miles by a railroad recently completed, and it is about fourteen hours by steamer from Tampa to Key West.

Now, this service which the Department desires to put on from Palatka to Sanford, one hundred and thirty-five miles, is of more than merely local importance. It enables the Department, with the fast trains now running from New York to Florida, availing itself of these new railroads and a fast steamer on this river for a distance of one hundred and thirty-five miles, to put the mails into Key West from New York two days earlier than it is done now. Therefore it is a matter of more than merely local importance to the people living on the Saint John's River. It is important to the Government, it is important to the Navy Department, and is of special value to the underwriters of New York and other Eastern cities. I hope the committee will then so far forget its passion for economy as to allow this small appropriation for the continuation of this service.

[Here the hammer fell.]

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the adoption of the amendment just read.

The committee divided; and there were—ayes 33, noes 51.

So the amendment was not agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

For inland transportation by star routes, $4,600,000, together with the further sum of $1,000,000, which is hereby reappropriated, out of any unexpended balance of the appropriation for inland transportation by star routes for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1883.

Mr. HORR. I move to strike out the word "four," in line 123, and insert the word "five;" and then strike out all the paragraph after the word "dollars," in line 124; so that it will read, if adopted:

For inland transportation by star routes, $5,600,000.

Mr. HORR. Mr. Chairman, I ask the attention of the committee for a few moments while I proceed to show that the present provision of this bill is of no value as a practical measure, and in fact is utterly impossible. It can have no effect and is of no value. It means nothing.

I am very sorry that the gentleman from Illinois is not in his seat, but I perceive that the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN] is present, and I wish to direct his attention to this matter. Now, this attempts to appropriate precisely the amount of money needed for the star-route service. But in order to do that it appropriates $4,600,000, and then reappropriates $1,000,000 from the surplus that is claimed to exist in the year 1883.

Now, what are the facts? The appropriation for the Post-Office Department differs from the appropriations made for any other branch of the Government. We appropriate only the money that comes from the postal service so long as that money lasts. In 1883 we appropriated $2,000,000 more for this service than was used; that is, for the star-route service. But this bill is built upon the theory that the $2,000,000 stands to the credit of that fund and is actually in the Treasury. This is not true. Let me show you why. In the Post-Office Department your bills read as this one does, that you shall exhaust the money coming from the postal fund. When they open their books they open an account with each one of these different appropriations. They open an account with this star-route service. But they put to the credit of that service the amount that Congress gives to them. They also open a general account with the Post-Office fund. When the year ends you may have a certain item like this where there seems to be $2,000,000 standing to its credit, when in point of fact there is not a dollar of this money in the Treasury available for that purpose; not a dollar. That was the case in 1883. While this fund had a surplus of $2,000,000 the postmasters had a deficit of $1,515,000. Now, that deficiency was kept out by the postmasters themselves, and consequently when you went to the general fund it was all exhausted, although there seemed to be some money belonging to this item. In point of fact there was not a dollar of it in the Treasury. Let me illustrate it, for I do not think that even my distinguished friend from Indiana wants to have this House placed in a ridiculous position in making an appropriation of a fund which has not a cent in it.

Mr. Chairman, let me simplify it by supposing a case which is not involved with a large number of items. Suppose a man undertakes to establish a stage line between two points. He determines——

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. HISCOCK took the floor and yielded to Mr. HORR.

Mr. HORR. He determines that the receipts for that service from the stage line shall pay all of the expenses. He has bought all of the teams, all of the plant and equipments, and asks no interest on it, but he will run it for the benefit of the country. That is the way our post-offices are run. He proceeds to make his bargains, he hires his teamsters on the following terms: on each trip which the teamster shall make where the receipts are $1 or under, he is to have the whole of that; where the receipts are up to $2, he is to have the first dollar and 40 per cent. of the balance; where they are over $2, he is to have $1.40 on each trip and 20 per cent. of the balance. That is precisely the manner in which our postmasters are paid.

Now, then, he sits down and he says, "I will arrange to know how this business runs; I will allow for my teamster $375 for the year; I think he will get that much; I will allow for my teams, the feed of them, $500; I will allow for incidentals $50; I will allow for an agent to do the business $200." At the end of the year he comes in to settle up. He has opened an account with each of these items to see how it will stand. He finds he has received $1,120 in all during the year. But the postmaster—in this case it would be his teamster—under the agreement gets $420; he has retained that out of the moneys in his hands just as the postmasters do. He finds in looking at his feed account that there is $50 surplus there; on incidentals he has got $5 more.

Now, how does it stand? You find if you add them up there are only $5 left in that account. But this item of feed seems to have $50 in it. It has not got a dollar, because the original amount earned and the money which came in are not there. Now, what would you think if that man in making preparations for the next year should fix, as you have done in this bill, the amount needed for feed, $450, the amount used the year before, saying, "I will take $50 out of what was saved last year?" The man would say, "You can not do that; there is not any $50 saved; there was in the whole business only $5 margin."

Now, I will say to my friend from Indiana, you can not possibly get this money in the way you are proposing to do it. The only way you can do is to provide in your bill that you shall go to the Treasury of the United States, take a million dollars and place it back to the fund of star-routes for 1883, and then appropriate against it. It is a mere matter of book-keeping, but as it is now you utterly defeat what you try to do. They have not a dollar of this money at the credit of that fund. And when the time comes, when two years have elapsed, what takes place? Under the statute this money goes back into the Treasury.

But let me say to the gentleman from Indiana that in the post-office business not a dollar goes back. They simply credit up the fund and balance it, and there is not a shilling of money passes one way or another. You have simply by this bill attempted to draw against something where there is not a dollar in the Treasury to meet it.

With that explanation I do not believe there is a man here who will vote to retain that provision in the bill. I can see no earthly reason why we should do it anyway. Why not appropriate the amount we intend? Why attempt to do a thing simply to make your bill small? I know the gentleman from Indiana will not claim there is any sense or reason in that.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. HORR. Now I would like to hear the gentleman from Indiana reply to that if he can.

Mr. HOLMAN. I think the gentleman from Michigan has had enough of experience in public affairs to know that in ten minutes the fact of this balance not being available, if such were the fact, could have been shown to the House by the official authorities. In half the time indeed that he has occupied on the floor he could have ascertained from the Postmaster-General whether two and one-half millions of the appriations made for the last year are in fact available for this purpose. He could have ascertained that fact in ten minutes of time, and it has been some three weeks ago since this bill was reported to the House.

It appears from the reports made by the Postmaster-General that there were two and one-half millions of the appropriations of the last year unexpended and available to be reappropriated and applied hereafter, and the Committee on Appropriations simply appropriate a million of that. The committee will understand there is no difference as to the amount to be expended for the next fiscal year.

Mr. HORR. Not a bit.

Mr. HOLMAN. We all agree on $5,600,000. Finding a surplus remaining over from last year of two and one-half millions or a little more than that, we appropriated $4,600,000, and did what has been done a thousand times within my experience.

Mr. HORR. Never in an appropriation bill for the Post-Office Department.

Mr. HOLMAN. In my own experience it has been done over and over again. We simply reappropriated a part of that two and one-half million dollars to make it applicable to the expenses of the next fiscal year. If it shall appear in fact that there is no such fund available, it will be the easiest thing in the world to make the amendment. Why did not the gentleman come fortified by authority?

Mr. HORR. I took my statement right from the books of the chief of the Department. I knew there never had been such an appropriation in the Post-Office bill.

Mr. HOLMAN. Is the gentleman informed by the Sixth Auditor or any other officer of the Department that there is no such fund available?

Mr. HORR. I have been to the very man who makes all the entries, and I am informed there is not a dollar in that fund; that it has all been exhausted by the excesses of the postmasters, and there is not a shilling to draw against; and that the only way to get at it was the way I said.

Mr. HOLMAN. Who made that statement?

Mr. HORR. Mr. Smith, the officer in charge, who keeps the books.

Mr. HOLMAN. Did the Sixth Auditor make that statement?

Mr. HORR. Not the Sixth Auditor.

Mr. HOLMAN. He is the one who has charge of that department. We have the right to assume from the reports made to this House, and which have gone to the Committee on Appropriations, that there is a surplus from the appropriations made last year of $2,599,000.

We have done what has been very commonly done, what was done especially at the last session, and repeatedly done at former sessions; we have reappropriated what appeared to be unexpended balances of appropriations according to reports made to Congress. I will say this, that we do not differ about the amount.

Mr. BINGHAM. Why not give the benefit of safe legislation and change it?

Mr. HOLMAN. We do not differ about the amount. If it occurs that the Sixth Auditor shall report that there is not available that million of dollars, then the correction can easily be made. But I insist that the House shall for the present assume that the reports made to us are correct and that that balance is available.

Mr. HISCOCK. I suppose from the remark made by the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN] that this reappropriation in this bill of an unexpended balance is founded upon a precedent set by the last Congress; at least I understood him to say so.

Now, the fact is that when the pension appropriation bill came in here in the last Congress it provided for an appropriation of $100,000,000. I was dissatisfied with that amount; I thought it was too much. When the bill came up for consideration I think I made a motion to reduce the amount to eighty or eighty-four millions of dollars. I was called to account by gentlemen on the other side and charged with proposing a deficiency, with proposing to reduce the appropriations below the amount required for the service. I remember very distinctly what took place.

To meet that suggestion, knowing that there was for the current year an unexpended balance of appropriations for pensions, knowing also that there was no need for it, I put in the bill a provision that the unexpended balance might be used if necessary. It never has been used; and in giving $80,000,000 we gave more than will be used for this year. Our appropriation originally was excessive, but out of abundant caution, and to answer the criticism of gentlemen on the other side, I put in a provision that the unexpended balance should be reappropriated.

Now I desire to call the attention of the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN], and I wish the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. TOWNSHEND] were in his seat, so that I could also call his attention to the appropriation bill of last year and to the facts of the case as I understand them. The Post-Office appropriation bill of last year appropriated certain sums of money from the postal revenues of the United States. The appropriation from which it is now proposed to reappropriate the unexpended balance was made from the postal revenues for the year. I ask the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN] if he does not know that there will be a deficiency in the postal revenues for this year? I hope the gentleman is listening to me.

Mr. HOLMAN. Certainly I am.

Mr. HISCOCK. Will the gentleman answer that question to the House? Does he not know that there is a deficiency in the postal revenues?

Mr. HOLMAN. The report of the Postmaster-General shows that for last year, taking into account all the postal revenues and all the expenditures, the estimated surplus of revenue over the estimated total cost of the service for the year is $1,001,281.83. That is to say, there is remaining in the Treasury to the credit of the fund $1,001,281.83 surplus revenue for last year.

Mr. HISCOCK. I wish the gentleman would state those figures again. If he ciphers out a surplus——

Mr. HOLMAN. Estimated surplus of revenue.

Mr. HISCOCK. Oh, "estimated" surplus. Give the facts.

Mr. HOLMAN. Estimated surplus of revenue over estimated total cost of the service for the year, $1,001,281.83.

Mr. HISCOCK. From what report is the gentleman reading?

Mr. HOLMAN. From the report of the Postmaster-General.

Mr. HISCOCK. For what year?

Mr. HOLMAN. For the year 1883.

Mr. HISCOCK. When was it transmitted to Congress?

Mr. HOLMAN. It is dated November 19, 1883, and was transmitted to Congress at the commencement of this session.

Mr. HISCOCK. That is not the estimate for the year covered by the appropriations from which you are reappropriating what you claim to be unexpended balances.

Mr. HOLMAN. It is for the year 1883.

Mr. HISCOCK. The gentleman knows that that estimate is incorrect for this year. He knows that there is a deficiency.

Mr. HOLMAN. What is not correct?

Mr. HISCOCK. You know perfectly well that there was a deficiency in the postal revenues; that the postal revenues were insufficient to discharge the appropriations made last year.

Mr. HOLMAN. Let me read this again: "Estimated surplus of revenues over estimated total cost of the service for the year, $1,001,-281.83."

Mr. HISCOCK. Now let me settle that question. In the appropriation bill for last year we placed a provision that if the revenues of the Post-Office Department should be insufficient, then the sum of $1,201,-077.90, or so much thereof as may be necessary, should be appropriated from any money not otherwise appropriated in the Treasury.

Now, I understand the fact to be that this contingent fund is entirely exhausted.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. RYAN obtained the floor and said: I yield my time to the gentleman from New York [Mr. HISCOCK].

Mr. HISCOCK. And, mark you, Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, the last appropriation to which I have called attention was to be expended only if it should be found necessary. Not a dollar of it can be used unless there be a necessity for such use; and it being unnecessary to use the whole appropriation for the star-route service, it was unnecessary to draw upon this contingent fund.

Now, Mr. Chairman, there is only one purpose here, and I desire to call to it the attention of gentlemen on the other side. The object is in some way to reduce the amount of the appropriation, so that you may go to the country and say that your appropriation bill is so much less than the estimates. Upon your own theory, if you are correct, this money can be used; and you propose to cheat the people of the United States by making them believe that you have given $1,000,000 less for the support of the star-route service than you really have appropriated. Gentlemen certainly rise to the plane of statesmanship when they do this. Having made perfectly clear your intention in this matter, we shall invite you all to go between the tellers and emphasize it. Every one of you will be called on to indorse this cheat if you are willing to do so; for I have no doubt that there will be a sufficient number on this side to secure tellers on this question. And if you dare by your votes to keep the bill in this form, it shall go over to the Senate; and it shall be advertised that there is concealed in this bill this little cheat, this little trick. It shall be advertised that the gentleman from Illinois, who has brought in and championed this bill, a gentleman who has the interests of the people of the United States so near his heart, a gentleman who stands pre-eminent in advertising himself as so honest and moving upon so high a plane, has concealed within these lines this little trick. I am anxious, Mr. Chairman, to have him and the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN] defend it upon this floor. The case is one which, the more you emphasize it by defending it, the more patent you make it. I invite gentlemen on the other side to insist that this provision shall go through in this form.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. HOLMAN. I think that if the gentleman from New York [Mr. HISCOCK] had simply an honorable purpose to correct a mistake he would not have worked himself into such a fury; he would not have become so intensely excited. Why, sir, when my friend from New York was blandly and quietly reappropriating million upon million last year and the year before there was no excitement about it. He was "child-like and bland," not only in the expression of his face but in the tones of his utterances. Yet here, upon what is alleged to have been a mere mistake in an appropriation bill, the gentleman lashes himself into a fury.

Now, let us see what are the facts about this matter. If the gentleman will turn to page 608 of the report of the Postmaster-General for the last year he will find that $7,250,000 was the amount appropriated, $4,661,526.75 was the expenditure, and $2,588,473.25 was the surplus on the last fiscal year. This, it seems to me, speaks more loudly than the gentleman from New York can speak.

Now, how does the case stand when we come to the general application of the fund? Conceding just what has been said about the appropriations being applied to the current expenses of each branch of the Department, I desire to read from the report of the Postmaster-General:

Balance available for outstanding liabilities	$2,691,992 05
Deduct estimated amount of outstanding liabilities for the year	775,000 00
Estimated balance after discharge of outstanding liabilities	1,916,992 05
Deduct amount credited to the Pacific railroad companies for mail transportation for the year	915,710 22

Estimated surplus—

This is the estimated surplus of revenue on all accounts, a part of that surplus being upon appropriations for the star-route service—

Estimated surplus of revenue over total cost of the service for the year	$1,001,281 83

If there can be any possible question about this matter, I would simply suggest a single amendment to this paragraph by striking out the words "appropriated for the star-route service" and inserting "for the postal service for the last fiscal year;" for there is this balance, if the report of the Postmaster-General is correct.

Mr. HORR. It is not there.

Mr. HOLMAN. Well, the Postmaster-General says it is.

Mr. HORR. My friend from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN] is still mistaken, and I will show him why. This is a mere matter of book-keeping. In the last part of 1883 there was the amount left which he states, but the Post-Office Department keeps an account of its own receipts, and never goes to the general Treasury for a dollar so long as there is any Post-Office money in the Treasury.

At the close of 1883 that sum was left in the general fund for the next year and spent during the year, having been drawn against for the purpose to which I have already alluded within the terms of the law; and to-day every dollar of it is exhausted. You can not go to the general Treasury for any money to make up the Post-Office fund until the general fund of the postal receipts is exhausted. That fund is now exhausted, and, as I have stated, on an examination it will be found that there is not a dollar of that fund to-day to be reappropriated, although you undertake to reappropriate it. And you can not get any money for this item except by making an appropriation from the general Treasury and carrying it back to 1883.

I wish to say to my friend from Illinois [Mr. TOWNSHEND] that I do not want to go into the question of politics. You will all bear me out in the statement that during this debate I have left political matters entirely out of the question. I have not touched on politics except when driven to it by an interruption. I know my friend from Illinois in the general debate talked for half an hour or so about the corruption of the Republican party, making the same speech which some of us have heard so many times before. It has been delivered several times on this floor. I know there is a large number of new members here who never heard it; and I was glad to have him deliver it again for their benefit, although I could name several bills on which he has delivered this same speech before. Though so excellent at first, it is getting a little tame to some of us. Now I could say just about as many hard things about the Democratic party as he says about the Republicans, for I have been treating that party for years [laughter], but I will not do so on an appropriation bill; and I suggest to my friend from Illinois that he should not get into such political agony over a mere matter of book-keeping, an appropriation simply for the mail service. Besides, let me suggest that your speech lacks a little something. It is not quite the highest point of art. It would improve it to tone it up a little with accuracy and down a little in frenzy. [Laughter.] As you are in the habit of delivering it, it is difficult for an outsider, even though he be a skillful observer, to determine whether you are suffering from convictions or convulsions. [Great laughter and applause on the Republican side.]

Now, on an appropriation bill you should not attempt to get into such ecstasies. You should not get up such political spasms. It has no connection with the subject. This, as I have said, is a mere matter of book-keeping. You are simply trying to draw a million of dollars out of a fund that has no money from which to draw. I am not going in to expose you as to your object, for that would be entering the field of politics again, and I do not want to do that. But as to this little matter of arithmetic, the gentleman will find that all that is necessary to set him right in the matter is to take into consideration the ordinary rules of addition, subtraction, and multiplication. The rule of three will help you, my friend, out of your trouble. [Laughter.] You undertake to appropriate money out of a fund that has no funds.

How are you going to get it? At the end of the year 1883 the Postmaster-General said there was some money belonging to the Post-Office fund; so there was, but that has been drawn against from that time on, and the whole amount of it is now exhausted. The expenditures have exceeded the receipts so far this year. The payment of the postmasters' salaries has taken a large portion of this money, because you permit them to do so by law. This last year we have drawn the balance, so that to-day the general Post-Office fund is without any money, and it must come to the general Treasury to be replenished. You do not take this into consideration, though you may undertake to reappropriate a fund which is gone. And what do they do under your law? When you draw this money out of the Treasury that does not go into the appropriation for 1883, but they put it into the general fund; and there is not one cent to-day in the Treasury that belongs to that fund to meet this appropriation.

Now, Mr. Chairman, that is not a political question.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. TOWNSHEND. Mr. Chairman, when I go to the circus there is one individual with whom I never attempt to break a lance, and that is the clown. I give him unlimited sway in his folly. Now, the gentleman from Michigan indulged in a great deal of jest during the debate on this bill. But it seems to me that he has never risen to his true level until to-day. In the first place, the purest jest that he has made was a denial that he had indulged in any political discussion upon the subject or made any political reflections upon this side of the House. Why, sir, he was the first one who indulged in any political debate on this bill, and I appeal to the RECORD in support of what I have said. I had been discussing the question without the slightest allusion to politics whatever. I was rating the bill purely upon business principles, and had nothing to say of politics. But as soon as the gentleman from Michigan took the floor he set out almost in the beginning of his remarks with a denunciation of the Democratic party and of its policy, and to parade the virtues and beauties of the Republican party even while discussing one of the worst scandals that has ever afflicted this country, brought about by the maladministration of his own party.

Mr. HORR. You forced me to do that in reply to you. I was driven to it.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. The gentleman says that I do not understand the rules of addition, division, and subtraction, and that is one of the difficulties with which I have to deal in order to understand his view of this question. Sir, there is another rule of which we have heard a great deal lately, and with which his party friends are better acquainted than any one on this side of the House, and that is the rule of addition, division, and silence; and that is the rule that has been practiced pretty heavy upon this country in the items for the star-route service. This rule with reference specially to this service has been more prevalent on that side of the House in the administration of governmental affairs than with any other party that has ever been in existence in this country.

Then there is the gentleman from New York [Mr. HISCOCK.] I venture the assertion that that gentleman can better put on an air of assumed virtue without having any of it [laughter] than any other member on this floor. He is constantly coming in here and in a pathetic tone of voice, with an air of assumed virtue, excuses and pleads for the Republican party. Why, gentlemen, if there ever was a party on God's earth that needs pathetic appeals for forgiveness it is the party he represents.

Mr. EZRA B. TAYLOR. Will the gentleman allow me a question?

Mr. TOWNSHEND. Do not disturb me. I am not saying anything about the gentleman from Ohio.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois declines to yield.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. I want now to come to the facts and show the House how plain a tale can put these gentlemen down.

What are the facts? Facts relating to its administration always hurt that side of the House when mentioned When we came to consider this bill we found that the unexpended balance remaining over from 1883 to the credit of the star-route service was $2.588,473. Now, if you deduct from that amount the amount that is estimated as required to pay for contracts which had not been settled at the end of that fiscal year, you will find just what ought to be in the Treasury, unless the star-route thieves have gone again into the Treasury and stolen this money. When the Postmaster-General made this report in December last the money was there, as he has certified over his name. And I tell you now again the Postmaster-General is not that kind of a man——

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. REAGAN obtained the floor, and yielded his time to Mr. TOWNSHEND.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. I conceive that General Gresham would not certify falsely. What does he certify to? Let the Clerk read what I send to the desk. There is the statement of the Postmaster-General showing what was the revenue, what was the expenditure, and what was the surplus left over——

Mr. EZRA B. TAYLOR. Will the gentleman now yield to me?

Mr. TOWNSHEND. I will not answer any question whatever, for my time is rapidly slipping away.

The Clerk read as follows:

FINANCIAL STATEMENT.

The revenues of the Department for the fiscal year ended June 30, 1883, amounted to $45,508,692.61, as follows:

Ordinary postal revenue		$45,097,073 24
Net revenue from money-order business		411,619 37
		45,508,692 61
The expenditures on account of the service of the year, not including amount credited to Pacific railroad companies		42,816,700 56
Balance available for outstanding liabilities		2,691,992 05
Deduct estimated amount of outstanding liabilities for the year		775,000 00
Estimated balance after discharge of outstanding liabilities		1,916,992 05
Deduct amount credited to the Pacific railroad companies for mail transportation for the year		915,710 22
Estimated surplus of revenue over estimated total cost of the service for the year		1,001,281 83

Mr. TOWNSHEND. Mark that last statement:

Estimated surplus of revenue over estimated total cost of the service for the year, $1,001,281.83.

I ask whether the Postmaster-General or the gentleman from Michigan knows most about the facts.

Mr. BINGHAM. But that goes back into the Treasury.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. That is the statement by the Postmaster-General; and finding that surplus, we have reappropriated it.

Mr. HORR. I hope the gentleman will yield to me for a single moment.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. If you occupy my time I will require to have more.

Mr. HORR. I know the gentleman will permit me——

Mr. TOWNSHEND. If it does not come out of my time.

Mr. HORR. I will give you all my time, if necessary.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. The gentleman from Michigan has made his speech, and now I want to make my point.

Mr. HORR. I answered the gentleman's questions every time he addressed them to me.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. Do not make a speech, but ask your question.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Illinois yield?

Mr. TOWNSHEND. I yield for a question.

Mr. HORR. Do you not know that that amount stated by the Postmaster-General is carried, every dollar of it, right to the general fund for the next year and drawn against, and so is used up? Do you know that or do you not? I do.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. I will answer the gentleman from Michigan. This report of the Postmaster-General shows there was a surplus left over after the payment of the star-route service of over $2,000,000. Why was it left over? Because a reform had been inaugurated in that Department. Why was that reform inaugurated? Because a Democratic House had investigated the rascality of the star-route thieves. We forced an investigation, and after that investigation was completed the departmental officers saw they could save over $2,000,000 of the appropriations made for 1883. Those $2,000,000 remained there. When we came to prepare this bill we found those $2,000,000, and out of them we reappropriated this amount of $1,000,000.

The gentleman from New York would have us believe that it is a trick to reappropriate an unexpended balance. The same gentleman, as the record will show, came into this House in the last Congress with a bill reappropriating an indefinite amount of money to pay pensions. He said it would amount only to $15,000,000. But when the year's books were settled up it was found that in one or two lines of his bill he had reappropriated $39,000,000. Was that a trick, when you made an appropriation of $39,000,000 more than the face of your bill shows? The gentleman says it is a shameful trick for us to reappropriate this million of dollars. If so, was not his reappropriation a much more shameful trick?

Mr. HISCOCK. I shall spend no time in again explaining the appropriation or the reappropriation of an unexpended balance of the pension bill; I have been over that once.

Now I desire to call the attention of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. TOWNSHEND], the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN], and of the committee—I desire to call their attention to the provision in the Revised Statutes. I read section 4054:

The money required for the postal service in each year shall be appropriated by law out of the revenues of the service.

Not out of the revenues of that year, and it has never been the custom to limit it to the revenues of that year.

Now look at the Post-Office appropriation bill for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1883, and what do you find? It begins in this way:

That the following sums be, and the same are hereby, appropriated for the service of the Post-Office Department for the year ending June 30, 1883, out of any money in the Treasury arising from the revenues of said Department in conformity to the act of July 2, 1836, as follows:

It does not say "from the revenue of that year." As the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. HORR] well says, there is no division made between the revenues of one year and the revenues of another when you come to draw on the revenues of the Post-Office Department to pay the expenditures of that Department. That is the answer I make. If I was wrong in my statement that the revenues for that year were insufficient to meet the expenditures, that is a matter of no consequence. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. TOWNSHEND] in charge of this bill will not claim but what all of the revenues of the Post-Office Department up to date have been drawn upon and expended, as the Post-Office Department had the right to draw upon them.

Now I have one word to say in reference to this star-route matter. I saw a Democratic House day after day investigating the star-route frauds; I saw its Committee on Appropriations investigating them; I saw that committee bring in a bill here which would have remedied that evil and cut out that ulcerous sore; and I saw a Democratic House refuse to stand by that committee.

I was about to say, but I will not do so, however, that I was almost inclined to appeal to the RECORD in order to find out how the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. TOWNSHEND] voted in that Democratic House upon the report which was brought in by its Committee on Appropriations. I hope his record was right.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. My record is always right on this question.

Mr. HISCOCK. The Democratic House was unable to cope with those men and they abandoned the effort. Democrats here upon this floor stood forth as their champions, and the Democratic organization was insufficient to master and conquer this evil.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. What did the Republicans of that Congress do?

Mr. HISCOCK. And it was left to a Republican administration, unaided by Congress, by the force of its own power and by its own honest efforts, to correct that evil. No credit is reflected upon a Democratic House, none upon a Republican House, except that it supported, indorsed, and sustained the administration. The measures for correcting this evil were conceived by a Republican administration, were executed by a Republican administration, and reflect glory and honor upon that administration.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. After the Democrats had exposed the fraud.

Mr. HISCOCK. Oh, "Democrats exposed the fraud!" Do not talk to me about Democratic exposures.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. CANNON. I want to say that from what little examination I have been able to give to the matter of difference between the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. TOWNSHEND] and the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. HORR] I am inclined to agree with the latter, and therefore shall favor his amendment.

I want to say a word touching one other matter which I should have held my peace about had it not been that this is not the first nor the second but I believe the third time the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. TOWNSHEND] has taken special credit to himself and his side of the House for the exposure of the star-route frauds. In 1880, before the last Presidential election, a Democratic House and a Democratic Senate received an estimate for a deficiency appropriation of $2,000,000.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. Made by whom? Made by your Postmaster-General.

Mr. CANNON. Certainly; made by the Postmaster-General on the recommendation of the then Second Assistant Postmaster-General, Brady.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. Both Republican officials.

Mr. CANNON. Do not interrupt me now; you will have your time. That estimate came to a Democratic House and went to a Democratic Committee on Appropriations. I had the honor to be a member of that committee and so had the gentleman from New York [Mr. HISCOCK].

Mr. HISCOCK. Yes; we know all about it.

Mr. CANNON. That committee investigated the matter, and the members of that committee, Democrats and Republicans, stood as a unit in recommending that the service be cut down on one hundred star routes which had been let at $900,000 per annum in 1879 and 1880 and had been expedited to cost $3,000,000.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. By Republican officials.

Mr. CANNON. That was a unanimous report. I had the honor to stand here with the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. BLACKBURN], with the present occupant of the chair [Mr. BLOUNT], with General HAWLEY, of Connecticut, and others who were then members of this House, and denounced that estimate of the Second Assistant Postmaster-General and his action on these star routes.

A Democratic House and a Democratic Senate absolutely refused to follow the unanimous report and recommendation of a Committee on Appropriations. The service on those one hundred routes, let originally at $900,000 per annum and expedited to $3,000,000 per annum, was left as it was by the votes of a Democratic House and the votes of a Democratic Senate, be it said to the discredit of that House and that Senate which held their session in 1880.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. What were you Republicans doing in the House and the Senate at that time? You were supporting those routes.

Mr. CANNON. With many other Republicans I stood fighting it.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. You did; but your party did not.

Mr. CANNON. Now, then, the gentleman comes in and pleads the baby act. But you were responsible for legislation; you had control of the House and the Senate; you can not say that the minority was responsible. You had the earnest help of an undivided minority of the Committee on Appropriations to cut that ulcer out by the roots. You refused to do it. You gave the matter your indorsement, and the then Second Assistant Postmastmaster-General quoted the indorsement of a Democratic House and Senate to the discomfiture of Republicans who agreed with the Committee on Appropriations.

This ulcer remained with the practical indorsement of a Democratic House and Senate until General Garfield was inaugurated as President, when by his action and that of his successor the increase on these one hundred routes from $900,000 per annum to $3,000,000 per annum was cut off, thereby accomplishing by executive action what a Democratic Congress refused to do by legislative action in the spring of 1880.

Yet the gentleman, although he was here and knows these facts, gets up and in season and out of season airs himself, claiming that his party is par excellence the party of reform.

I should not have undertaken to post these books at this time—for it would require more than five minutes to post them completely—were it not that the gentleman has come here day after day and sought to appropriate to his party that which does not belong to it. [Applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. TOWNSHEND. Mr. Chairman, I did not until now suppose there was any man sitting on the opposite side of the House who had the boldness—I will not say the audacity—to stand up here and even discuss this loathsome ulcer which is the outgrowth of the maladministration of the gentleman's own political party, and at a time, too, when an investigating committee of this Congress is calling before it those who were the highest officers under a Republican administration, and who in their own language publish the infamy of that party in regard to these star-route frauds.

It is said, sir, that this infamous crime—perhaps one of the foulest stains upon the escutcheon of our country—has been more far-reaching than simply plundering the Treasury of millions. A gentleman who has held one of the highest places under a Republican administration—I believe it was Mr. James, who was Postmaster-General under President Garfield, or Mr. McVeigh, who was Attorney-General—went before that committee and swore that outrages perpetrated by this maladministration had gone further, had resulted in the murder of a President.

Mr. MILLIKEN. Will the gentleman allow——

Mr. TOWNSHEND. Do not interrupt me. I can not sit patiently here when I see the Treasury robbed, and the advocates of a party which is guilty stand upon this floor and defend this star-route business. Why, Mr. Chairman, the gentleman alludes——

Mr. MILLIKEN. Does the gentleman remember another President who was murdered? Does he remember who killed him? [Cries of "Order!"]

The CHAIRMAN (rapping loudly and drowning the voice of Mr. MILLIKEN). The gentleman from Illinois declines to be interrupted.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. Now, Mr. Chairman, the gentleman asks me, do I know who killed the President? Yes, sir; he was a "Stalwart" Republican; and he said he was forced to do it by the "Stalwart" element of his party.

Mr. BINGHAM. He said, "by the hand of God."

Mr. TOWNSHEND. Go to the sworn testimony of your own Cabinet officials; I assert here that which is supported by sworn evidence.

But, Mr. Chairman, coming down to the remarks of my colleague [Mr. CANNON], he has stated that in the Congress prior to the election of 1880 a Democratic House and Senate failed to sustain the Committee on Appropriations in exposing this star-route thievery and refusing to allow the deficiency appropriation which was asked for. How did the political parties stand in this House at that time? There was a Democratic majority of only five. Where were all the Republican votes? If you look at the RECORD it will be found that you can almost count upon your fingers all the Republicans who voted against that deficiency appropriation. It was recommended by your Postmaster-General, who based his recommendation upon that of the Second Assistant Postmaster-General; and it would not have passed Congress if your party had not stood up almost solidly in support of it, defeating, with the aid perhaps of a few Democrats, the action of the Democratic Committee on Appropriations. The Republican side of the House, which was nearly solid in support of the appropriation, had the assistance perhaps of a few members on this side who had been deluded and misled. By the votes of almost the entire mass of the Republicans on this floor the action of the Committee on Appropriations failed of support.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. HOLMAN. I think that there has been enough discussion on this proposition, and for the purpose of closing debate I move that the committee do now rise.

The motion was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose; and the Speaker pro tempore having taken the chair, Mr. BLOUNT reported that the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union having had under consideration the Post-Office appropriation bill had come to no conclusion thereon.

Mr. HOLMAN. I move that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union; and pending that motion I move that all debate upon this proposition and any amendments to the same be concluded in two minutes.

Mr. HORR. Oh, no; put it ten minutes on each side.

Mr. HOLMAN. Very well; I will accept the modification, and make the motion to close the debate in twenty minutes.

The motion was agreed to.

The motion that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union was agreed to.

The House accordingly resolved itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, Mr. BLOUNT in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. By order of the House all debate upon the pending paragraph and amendments thereto is limited to twenty minutes.

Mr. MONEY. Mr. Chairman, as to this item of the appropriation bill under discussion, I think it will be agreed on all sides that it has been exhaustively discussed. The amount, however, is not affected by the amendment, and it is only a question as to how it should be appropriated.

I do not agree with gentlemen on the other side that it is not within the authority of the Postmaster-General. It is within his right, and can be made available. But that is not here nor there. I think that there is no trouble about reaching the fund and making it available.

But this discussion has taken a very wide range. It has been the pleasure of some gentlemen to bring up the star-route investigation and the matter of the recommendation of the Second Assistant Postmaster-General with reference to the extravagant increase in the star-route service. I do not think the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON] can take any very great credit to his party out of that matter, whatever may be the fact as to his own action and his connection with the subject. I wish now to call the attention of this committee very hurriedly to a few facts connected with the matter. In the Forty-fifth Congress a subcommittee of the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads, of which I was the chairman, was ordered to investigate the question of these star-route expenditures. After pursuing the investigation for a while it was found to have such a wide range as to require the whole committee, and the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads, of which Mr. Waddell, of North Carolina, was then chairman, undertook the investigation. We published a report embracing a great volume of testimony, and I may be permitted to say that I made right here on the floor of this House the first speech that was made assailing the Second Assistant Postmaster-General on that contract basis and the increase of that service. And I recollect the fact that time and again I was called to order by the gentleman from Illinois because I was not, as he alleged, speaking to the bill in hand, but was assailing the system as administered by the Assistant Postmaster-General. It was only by the indulgence of my friends on this side of the House, who under the rules took the floor and yielded to me their time, that I could get time enough to discuss as I desired to do the question that was then presented. At that time this matter came to the attention of the House for the first time.

The subject was continued during the Forty-sixth Congress, and an investigation was started by the subcommittee of the Committee on Appropriations, and that committee went over the same track that had been gone over by the committee to which I have before referred. They had some new matter, which had transpired since the former investigation. But, gentlemen, when that appropriation came here, as stated by the gentleman from Illinois, the recommendation of the Committee on Appropriations was disregarded; and for what reason? Not for the reason stated by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. TOWNSHEND], but the fact that there was an order from Postmaster-General Key, an official order, telling the members of the House that the whole star-route service would be cut off by the 3d of March unless the amount was appropriated.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Mississippi has expired.

Mr. MONEY. I hope I will be permitted to occupy some additional time.

Mr. MILLS. I hope the Chair will recognize me and I will yield to the gentleman.

Mr. CANNON. I would like to say what I have to say on this subject after the gentleman from Mississippi has concluded.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Mississippi has exhausted five minutes——

Mr. TOWNSHEND. The gentleman can get in at the conclusion, after he has heard from the other side.

Mr. CANNON. I have only a single word to say now, Mr. Chairman. The gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. MONEY] in his remarks refers to an investigation made before General Brady was Second Assistant Postmaster-General, at least I am certain before the contracts were let on the one hundred routes spoken of at $900,000 in the aggregate and expedited to $3,000,000 per annum, and seeks to confuse an investigation made in 1878 with the one made by the Committee on Appropriations in 1880. The two investigations were about wholly different matters, made at different times.

I do recollect in 1880 that the gentleman then chairman of the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads voted against the legislation proposed by the Committee on Appropriations cutting off the expedition on these one hundred routes, amounting in round numbers to $2,000,000 per annum. I do not propose to read him a lecture on that account. He acted on his responsibility and is responsible to his constituents. I act on mine. I had not referred to him, and should not have done so if he had not sought to confuse these two investigations.

I yield the balance of my time to the gentleman from Maine [Mr. REED].

Mr. REED. Mr. Chairman, I think there are some of us here who have some desire to go on with the public business in some suitable way. The fact of the case is that a Republican Assistant Postmaster-General stands charged before the world and in the opinion of most of the world was guilty of crimes against the Government. It is also a fact that two Republican administrations have pursued that man with all the resources which the law of the land allows them to use against a criminal. Every time that we find a scoundrel within our ranks we punish him. [Derisive laughter on the Democratic side.] There is no question about that as a fact. You all of you know it.

Now the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. TOWNSHEND] arises in his place and makes attacks upon us. And for what purpose? He does it for the purpose of stirring up your partisan feeling. And why does he do that? It is to conceal his ignorance of the subject which is under debate. This is a question of book-keeping. It is a question whether this appropriation of a million dollars is really an appropriation at all. The facts and figures show that there is no million dollars to be appropriated.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. REED. Then I will now take the floor in my own right.

Mr. HORR. I will take the floor and yield to the gentleman from Maine.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. I raise the question of order. The debate was limited to ten minutes on each side. My colleague from Illinois [Mr. CANNON] occupied five minutes.

Mr. CANNON. Oh, no; I only occupied half of my time and gave the other half of it to the gentleman from Maine.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. I withdraw the question of order.

Mr. REED. Now, when the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. TOWNSHEND] undertakes to charge the Republican party with the improper conduct of any member of it, it is retorted upon him that a Democratic Congress stood by that man. Now, how did it happen? Was it because a Democratic Congressman or a Republican Congressman here believed in that rascality at that time? Not so. You all of you know that this Congress was surrounded by men who undertook to mislead us, and the vote shows they succeeded in doing it—the Democratic Congress, as well as some Republicans that were in it.

Everybody knows these facts. Every man whom I address knows that no party would sustain rascality of that kind if they knew it or believed in it; and the moment it was shown to the people of the United States, without distinction, with no distinction except that of common honesty and common dishonesty, the people rose determined to punish those men. Why, then, is this talk on the one side or the other about the responsibility for that? We all of us know we are ready to strike down that sort of thing wherever we find it. And I inquire again why is it that the gentleman from Illinois keeps repeating that speech of his about corruption. I say it is because he wants to distract your attention from the facts connected with this bill. He wants to disguise the unfairness, to disguise the unstatesmanlike character of it. He wants you to back him up in diminutions of the public service under pretense of saving the public money.

Now, I say to you you are just as much bound to rise up against that kind of dishonesty as you are to rise up against any other kind. You are bound to look after the public service and see you are not misled by any partisan talk to prevent you from doing justice to a deserving public service that comes home to the business and bosoms of the people of this country as no other service does. You ought not to allow yourselves to be led aside by this kind of discussion, which he perpetually and continually foments.

Think of a man in charge of a bill containing forty-six millions of the people's money, spent upon the subjects dearest to them of anything they have, entertaining this House day after day as he has done with these discussions. Nor can he plead the poor excuse that somebody else does it. That somebody else is not in charge of the business of this House. He ought to attend to that business above all other men, and yet he is, above all other men, engaged in fomenting this kind of discussion.

I ask you to stand by your duties as Representatives, and let us go on with the public business with reference not to charges of political feeling but with reference to our sense of public duty. [Applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. MONEY. Mr. Chairman, the disclaimer of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON] that he did not intend to impugn my motives was entirely unnecessary. I never suspected he was doing anything of the sort. But when he goes back as he did to charge a Democratic House and Senate with having passed a deficiency against the recommendation of the Committee on Appropriations for star-route frauds, the gentleman should be answered by one who knows something about it. I state on my responsibility as a member of this House that the vote which was passed here on the recommendation of the Committee on Appropriations was because of the fact that the Postmaster-General declared the whole star-route service would be cut off on the 3d day of March.

There was no consideration other than a desire on the part of Representatives to preserve the mail service of the country upon the star-routes. There was a universal condemnation of the rascality in that Department, which, as I said, was first brought to light in an investigation begun by myself, and I will state that the gentleman is at fault in his recollection. The committee to which he and I both belonged had under consideration the very contracts let by General Brady and no others; that was the subject-matter brought to our attention by the order of the House.

Mr. CANNON. Does the gentleman mean the contracts from the one hundred routes which were expedited and which gave rise to all this scandal?

Mr. MONEY. The gentleman made the statement that we investigated no matters with which General Brady had anything to do. I challenge that statement, and on the contrary assert that the very acts to which his name was appended were brought to our notice by the Post-Office Department and the House.

Mr. CANNON. Let us have no confusion about the matter.

Mr. MONEY. Allow me to proceed.

Mr. CANNON. The gentleman will not purposely misrepresent me.

Mr. MONEY. Not at all.

Mr. CANNON. I said that these one hundred star routes which had been expedited, and which were the routes I was speaking of, were investigated by the Committee on Appropriations in 1880, and they had not been let at the time the investigation was made to which the gentleman refers.

Mr. MONEY. My charge is that the whole system of the contract service, vicious and rotten from core to cuticle, had been investigated by two committees of this House, and that the officer whose recommendations you said ought to have been disregarded was the very man investigated by the committee of which the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. BLACKBURN] was chairman, and by the committee on the Post-Office of which the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON] and myself were members.

I simply wish to vindicate the members of this House in that Congress and the members of both Houses, who felt in duty bound to their constituents to preserve that service. They did it notwithstanding the recommendation of the Committee on Appropriations, and they insisted at the same time that the investigation should be pushed to its ultimate conclusion, and if anybody was guilty of wrong or corruption he should be punished.

The two questions are as far apart as the poles. The one was the question of prosecuting an executive officer for malfeasance and corruption in office, and the other was the question of appropriating money to preserve the star-route service in the country. And I say to-day that the men who voted to preserve that service are not to blame. All they did was to discharge their duty to their constituents as they conceived it to be. I have nothing to explain or to apologize for. I do not suppose the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON] or any other man will impugn my personal motives in any of my official acts here. But I have made this statement in justice to the members of the House and of the Senate, who voted as they did on that matter to preserve the star-route service in the country, and not to hinder or to prevent an investigation of the frauds in the Department.

I now yield the remainder of my time to the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. BLACKBURN].

Mr. BLACKBURN. How much time is there remaining?

The CHAIRMAN. Two minutes.

Mr. BLACKBURN. It is impossible in two minutes to answer the statements that have been made here. I had hoped that in the course of this debate I might have been allowed to make a statement, from which I am sure neither the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON] nor the gentleman from New York [Mr. HISCOCK] would dissent.

Mr. REED. I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman have time to proceed.

Many MEMBERS. All right.

The CHAIRMAN. If there be no objection the Chair will not interrupt the gentleman in his statement.

Mr. BLACKBURN. I thank the gentleman from Maine [Mr. REED] for his courtesy. What I desire to say is this: Whether it be germane to the question under consideration or not, this investigation of the star-route service as far back as 1878 has been lugged into this discussion; I will not pause to ask by whom or for what purpose.

I happened to be identified with that investigation. I chanced at that time to be the chairman of the subcommittee on appropriations charged with the preparation of the Post-Office appropriation bill. It happened that I was the man in this House who refused to recommend an appropriation for the postal service until the deficiency in the star-route service had been explained. We had appropriated for that service $5,900,000; every dollar of the estimate of the Department had been granted; there was no cutting down of the estimate which had been made for that service; yet before six months of the fiscal year had expired we were confronted by a communication from the Post-Office Department informing us that there would be a deficiency for that service for that fiscal year of over a million of dollars.

Mr. CANNON. Of two and a quarter millions.

Mr. BLACKBURN. I accept the correction of my friend from Illinois [Mr. CANNON], of two and a quarter millions of dollars. A committee of investigation was raised; it consisted of members of the Committee on Appropriations, and I chanced to be the chairman of that committee on investigation. On that committee was the honored gentleman from New York [Mr. HISCOCK] and his distinguished colleague, the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON].

We entered upon that investigation and it stretched over weeks and over months. We brought a report into this House, and in the advocacy of that report, to the honor of that committee be it said, not a single, solitary member, Republican or Democrat, failed by his vote and by his voice upon this floor to give it support. An honored Senator in the other wing of this Capitol, then a member of the Committee on Appropriations and of the subcommittee and of the committee on investigation, spoke the sentiments of every member of the committee when he declared upon this floor, and it has passed into ineffaceable print, that that officer of the Government had either been guilty of deliberate, willful, wasteful extravagance in the handling of public money, or, what was worse, he was himself a plunderer of the public Treasury.

It was the conviction reached by that committee; and I am borne out in this statement by the utterances and votes of every Republican member of the committee at that time, and I see several of them sitting before me now. That the funds of this Government were not economically, carefully, or honestly administered by that official was an open secret known to all men who belonged to that committee.

It is late in the day for the gentleman from New York [Mr. HISCOCK] or the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON] to make any point on party lines now. When the Senate amendment came back to this House proposing to eliminate the remedial legislation which we had offered sixty-five Republicans voted for concurrence and only twenty-six Democrats. I find by the RECORD that sixty-six Democrats voted against giving the shield and protection of the law to this public malefactor and only seventeen Republicans were found in their places to aid us in that honest effort. The members of the Committee on Appropriations stood together. Not only by their votes but by their voices they declared that this public official had been guilty of criminal waste in the disbursement of the public money, profound ignorance in the discharge of his duties that amounted to crime, or what was still more flagrant, an absolute assault upon the revenues of this Government in the interest of thievery. That that man should have been in the penitentiary instead of in the place of the Second Assistant Postmaster-General of this country not a member of the Committee on Appropriations, without regard to politics, entertained a reasonable doubt.

The CHAIRMAN. The time allowed for debate on the pending paragraph and amendments thereto has expired. The question is first on the amendment of the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. HORR], which will be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

In line 123, strike out "4" and insert "5," and strike out all following the word "dollars," in line 124; so that the paragraph will read:
"For inland transportation by star routes, $5,600,000."

Mr. HOLMAN. I offer the amendment which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Strike out, in line 127, the words "inland transportation by star routes" and insert "the postal service;" so that the paragraph will read:
"For inland transportation by star routes, $4,600,000, together with the further sum of $1,000,000, which is hereby appropriated, out of any unexpended balance of the appropriation for the postal service for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1883."

Mr. HISCOCK. Will not the whole difficulty be remedied by the adoption of the amendment of the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. HORR]?

Mr. HOLMAN. I think not.

Mr. BINGHAM. Suppose there is no unexpended balance?

Mr. HORR. There is none; not a dollar.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. In this provision we give every dollar estimated by the Department.

Mr. HORR. But there is no unexpended money to draw upon; not a dollar.

The question being taken on the amendment of Mr. HOLMAN, it was agreed to; there being—ayes 101, noes 67.

The question recurring on the amendment of Mr. HORR, it was not agreed to; there being—ayes 75, noes 106.

The Clerk read as follows:

For railway post-office clerks, $4,000,000.

Mr. MONEY. I move to amend the paragraph just read by making the appropriation $4,295,000, thus bringing it up to the estimate of the Department. I wish to state some reasons for this motion. I hope there will be nothing political injected into this little discussion. This is a matter of pure business, affecting the whole mail transportation of the country, a vast percentage of which goes upon railroads. As the House will understand, a great deal of money is saved annually by this expenditure, without which more than this amount would be consumed every year in separating offices. But the whole system of the separation and delivery of the mails has been changed by the traveling post-offices of the country. The appropriation made last year for this service was $3,970,000. The appropriation bill at present under consideration increased that amount only $30,000.

Mr. BINGHAM. Twenty-three thousand dollars.

Mr. MONEY. Twenty-three thousand dollars. It is evident, Mr. Chairman, and must be to anybody, that that is not sufficient to meet the increased service of the country, both the increase of the business and the increased railroad mileage. There is scarcely any necessity for a discussion of the matter. It is self-evident. I hold in my hand a letter from the superintendent of this service, and he tells me:

Referring to our conversation, permit me to say that at the close of business February 29, 1884, there were 4,025 railway postal clerks, the annual cost of the same being $4,026,141.

The mails are much lighter in summer than in winter; consequently when the appropriation becomes available (July 1) it is the practice to withhold as much of the appropriation as possible to increase the force during the winter months when the mails are very heavy, which will account for the present aggregate expenditure being greater than the appropriation ($3,977,120) for the present fiscal year.

He tells you it will be seen that the annual cost of the railway postal clerks is $4,026,141. That is the present annual cost, leaving out any provision for increase. It is a sum greater than that which the Committee on Appropriations recommend for the service by this bill. That leaves every consideration of increase of the service out of view.

The superintendent goes on to say:

The good of the service at the present time requires three hundred and sixty-eight additional clerks, of which number one hundred and forty-three should be appointed to new lines on which there are no postal clerks. I could have given the lines in detail, but I did not think you would care to be burdened with it.

Now, we are told in the report of the Postmaster-General for the last year:

The estimate was based on an increase of 7.20 per cent., which experience has demonstrated was hardly sufficient to meet the rapid extensions and growth of the service. This year I have estimated the increase at 8 per cent., which increases the appropriation $318,169.60. The increase in the mails handled is 15.96 per cent., and the increased number of miles of railroad service is 9,264. While this may seem large, I am clearly of the opinion that it is none too much so, and that the amount will be absolutely necessary to properly maintain, extend, and continue the wants of a rapidly growing service.

Here it is seen that at the date of this report there were 9,264 miles added to the railway mail service, and yet the committee does not report as much as the service actually costs now, notwithstanding that increase. Further than that, 2,000 miles have been added since this report was prepared, making about 11,000 miles of new service which must be supplied. In addition to that, you must also take into consideration the increased growth of the service. Will this House deliberately attempt to cripple this service? Will they use such means here as will defeat the ends for which it was created? These men, by their employment and in the distribution of the mails while in transit, actually save, as can be readily shown, a great deal of money to this Government. It is important to give for the service all that it requires, and it is impossible to continue it unless the appropriation is brought up to the requirements of it. Now, I have been seeking for some time to have the service put on two roads in my State of Mississippi which have recently been completed, but have been always met with the answer that the appropriation is gone.

Mr. KASSON. Will the gentleman from Mississippi allow me to state that there is a road in my own district which is in that same condition? We can not get the service for the reason that he states.

Mr. MONEY. Certainly; and here, in this same book, the report of the Postmaster-General, you will find appended a table giving the number of miles of increase and the roads where this service has been put on during the last year, and it shows an enormous increase. It has been distributed all over the country, from Maine to California, in sections that have not before enjoyed it. My own State built last year over four hundred miles of railway, and the people are asking that the service shall be placed upon it. They are justified in demanding it. It is not true economy to refuse it. I think the Committee on Appropriations have made a mistake in appropriating only the amount that they specify here. It does not, as I have said, come up to the actual present expenditures, and makes no provision whatever for increase. You allow nothing for the new roads or the increase of service on the old roads; and you succeed only, in my judgment, in crippling the business if you fail to appropriate the amount necessary.

I know of my own personal knowledge, after traveling thousands of miles upon these postal cars, that the force even now for distributing the mails upon them is insufficient. I have seen the mails carried by towns for the reason that the force allowed on the train was not sufficient to distribute the mail in time to deliver it.

In view of all these facts, Mr. Chairman, which I have thus hurriedly stated, and which can not be contradicted, facts which appear from the reports of the Post-Office Department, this House will not be justified in giving for this service less than the amount estimated. It is money well expended, and I hope the committee will support the amendment.

Mr. HOLMAN rose.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair has recognized the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. RYAN]. [Cries of "Vote!" "Vote!"]

Mr. RYAN. If a vote is wanted I will yield for that purpose heartily. But if there is to be further discussion I want to make some remarks has spoken in behalf of the amendment, and the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN] ought to be permitted to speak in defense of the committee.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. The gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. MONEY]

The CHAIRMAN. If no gentleman desires to be recognized——

Mr. HOLMAN. I want to be recognized on behalf of the committee.

Mr. RYAN. I only yield the floor if the committee is disposed to vote.

Mr. DUNN. I want to hear the explanation of the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN] before I vote.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Kansas [Mr. RYAN] will proceed.

Mr. RYAN. If the Chair will recognize me subsequently, I will give way to the gentleman from Indiana, that the House may hear his side of the case.

Mr. HOLMAN. Let the gentleman from Kansas proceed.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. The committee is opposed to this amendment, and I think in justice they ought to be heard in reply to the gentleman who offered it.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair has no purpose to do injustice to anybody, and an opportunity will be afforded to present the other side of the question.

Mr. WILLIS. Will an opportunity be afforded at any time to vote finally on this bill? [Laughter.]

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Kansas [Mr. RYAN] will proceed.

Mr. RYAN. I heartily concur in the remarks made by the gentleman from Mississippi. I am in favor of economy in the public expenditures, and, whether in the committee-room or on this floor, I shall always advocate what I believe to be a just and rational economy in all the appropriations that are made by this House. But an economy which is arbitrary, an economy which is irrational, which ignores the needs of the public service and disregards the public welfare, is, to say the least, unpatriotic.

The fact is, that this item as reported in this appropriation bill is less than what is absolutely required to maintain the service as it is, ignoring all increase whatever. This arises from the fact that about four hundred of those now employed in this service are in their probationary period of $400 per annum; very soon their probationary period will expire and they will go on at a salary of from $900 to $1,000. In making an increase above the expenditures of the present year of but $26,000, our committee have failed to meet the demands on the present footing of the service with the force at present employed.

In addition to that there are many new lines of railway now upon which service ought to be placed, and could be placed with economy and advantage to the public service, reducing the star-route service to that extent. I believe one hundred and forty-three men are required for that immediately; and yet there is no available money, no provision in this bill for even that increase without taking into consideration the increase otherwise that must follow in the service for the next year, which I believe is estimated to be above 8 per cent.

Mr. HOLMAN. I wish simply to say this: You appropriate for compensation of clerks in post-offices, in all the post-offices of the country, less than $5,000,000. For the post-office clerks on the postal cars by this bill you appropriate $4,000,000, being an increase of $322,000 over last year, and $23,000 over the appropriation for the present year. The Committee on Appropriations have examined this subject quite carefully and are thoroughly convinced that the amount recommended will maintain that department in all of its efficiency even beyond its present condition.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. I move that the committee rise for the purpose of limiting debate.

The motion was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose; and Mr. BLACKBURN having taken the chair as Speaker pro tempore, Mr. BLOUNT reported that the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union had had under consideration the bill (H. R. 5459) making appropriations for the service of the Post-Office Department for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1885, and for other purposes, and had come to no resolution thereon.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. I move that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the Post-Office appropriation bill; and pending that motion, I move that all debate upon the pending paragraph and amendments thereto be closed in one minute.

Mr. SKINNER, of New York. Make it ten minutes.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. The gentlemen on the other side have already had ten minutes of debate.

Mr. WELLER. I move that the House do now adjourn. It is now late on Saturday afternoon, and I think we will resume the consideration of this bill in a better spirit after having passed through the salutary influences of the Lord's day.

The motion to adjourn was not agreed to.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question recurs on the motion of the gentleman from Illinois that when the House in Committee of the Whole House resumes the consideration of the Post-Office appropriation bill all debate on the pending paragraph and amendments thereto be limited to one minute.

Mr. SKINNER, of New York. I move to amend by making the time ten minutes.

The amendment was not agreed to.

The motion to limit debate was agreed to.

The motion that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union was agreed to.

The House accordingly resolved itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, Mr. BLOUNT in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union resumes consideration of the Post-Office appropriation bill. By order of the House all debate on the pending paragraph and amendments thereto is limited to one minute.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. In that one minute I desire to say that the other side have had ten minutes and we have had only two or three of these minutes.

Mr. J. D. TAYLOR. I object to the gentleman's division of the time. The gentleman has had several hours while many gentlemen on this side have not had any time.

The CHAIRMAN. That is not a question of order.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. I wish merely to say that the committee have allowed $23,000 more than was appropriated last year; and in the judgment of the committee every dollar has been appropriated that is needed for this service. The expenses for 1883 were but $3,688,032; we have given $4,000,000, being nearly $400,000 more than was expended for the year ending June 30 last. Now I ask for a vote.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will again report the pending amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

In line 124 strike out "$4,000,000" and insert "$4,295,000;" so that it will read: "For railway postal clerks, $4,295,000."

The question being taken, there were—ayes 95, noes 76.

Mr. HORR. I call for tellers.

Tellers were ordered; and Mr. TOWNSHEND and Mr. HORR were appointed.

The committee again divided; and the tellers reported that there were—ayes 95, noes 108.

So the amendment was not agreed to.

The Clerk read the following:

For mail messengers, $900,000.

Mr. SKINNER, of New York. I move to amend the paragraph just read by striking out "$900,000" and inserting "$1,000,000." [Cries of "Vote!" "Vote!"] I am as anxious for a vote on this bill as any other gentleman here. But when the liberal time of fifteen or twenty minutes has been apportioned out for the consideration of an item involving $4,000,000 and affecting the mail service in every part of the country, I think we can afford to stop a few minutes at this point.

My principal purpose in rising at this time is to take notice of a remark made by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. TOWNSHEND] on Thursday last, which I think deserves some attention, at least from a representative of the State of New York. He said that we had on our side abandoned the proposition that the free-delivery service is self-sustaining. He planted himself upon the ground that it was not self-sustaining.

Let me point to the record. We have not receded from our position. We say that the free-delivery service is self-sustaining, because last year it yielded a surplus revenue of over a million of dollars. We say that the Post-Office Department is self-sustaining, because last year it yielded a surplus revenue of over $2,000,000.

We would say that the business of a private individual was self-sustaining, even if he lost $50,000 on calico but made $100,000 on silks. So it is a very weak argument to point the finger of scorn at Representatives on this floor living in free-delivery cities and say that their local postage amounts to so much, while the expense of the free-delivery service in their cities is three or four times as much. I tell you that we have a right to consider the grand total in regard to the free-delivery service, as much so as the grand total in regard to the receipts and expenses of the Post-Office Department.

I care very little for the ridicule which the gentleman endeavored to throw upon some of the cities in my State. I know that the free-delivery service in my own city is not of itself self-sustaining, but I do know that the total service in that city yields a revenue to the Government of $24,000 a year. Every single city which he named yields a revenue from ten to twenty times as much as the cost of the free-delivery service. When he struck at the city of Troy, N. Y., he said that the free-delivery service there cost $118,000, while the income was only $12,000. Let me quote from his remarks just what he said:

My friend here from New York on my left thinks this must be a mistake and that the figures must be at fault. But, Mr. Chairman, I read from the report of the Postmaster-General, which gives the figures, and I am satisfied on examination that they are correct.

Now, on pages 116 and 117 of the report of the Postmaster-General he will find the table giving the figures which he undertook twice to reproduce in his remarks. But if he will look at page 746 of the report of the Postmaster-General he will find a detailed statement of the costs and receipts of the free-delivery system which will reduce the expenditures of that office $100,000.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. One word only in reply.

Mr. SKINNER, of New York. I desire simply to finish my statement.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. I will yield to the gentleman for that purpose.

Mr. SKINNER, of New York. All right. By that statement on page 746 it will be found that the expenses of the free-delivery service in Troy, N. Y., is $18,000; an error of only $100,000 in the calculation of the gentleman. When the gentleman says that he prepared that statement in bed before he got up, I submit that with his books and estimates which he took to bed with him he ought to have had an "eye-opener" at the same time. [Laughter.]

Mr. TOWNSHEND. I simply say that we have in this item given $50,000 increase over the appropriation for last year, and the appropriation last year was $50,000 more than the appropriation for the year before; we have kept up the same ratio of increase. We have given nearly $140,000 over the expenditures of the previous year.

Now, I desire to say that when we shall have passed two or three more items we will get down to the part of the bill making appropriations for the office of the Third Assistant Postmaster-General. In that portion of the bill we have given the full amount estimated for by the Department, and there will be no contest over that whatever. If gentlemen will remain here only a short time after the usual hour of adjournment we can finish this bill and have a final vote upon it to-night. I ask the House to remain until that is done.

Mr. BINGHAM. I want to say a few words.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. I have made no speech on this item.

Mr. BINGHAM. But I want to speak on it.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. I move that the committee rise for the purpose of closing debate.

Mr. HORR. If the gentleman thinks that by cutting off ten or fifteen minutes of debate he will gain time——

Mr. TOWNSHEND. We have occupied but two minutes on this matter; but I am willing to give the gentleman five minutes.

Mr. HORR. I submit to the gentleman——

Mr. TOWNSHEND. Go ahead.

The CHAIRMAN. Debate upon the pending amendment has been exhausted.

Mr. BINGHAM. I move to strike out the last word. I think it is necessary to an intelligent consideration of this paragraph of the bill that the House should know what services the mail messengers perform. By your own act, not by a general appropriation, but by a horizontal reduction of the 5 per cent. on inland mail transportation, you have given to the Post-Office Department exactly what they asked for railroad transportation. You give exactly what has been asked for steamboat transportation. You recognized the growth of the service in those two respects for the next fiscal year. In order that those appropriations may be fully and completely applied, you must make a corresponding appropriation in the mail-messenger service. Let me tell you what these mail messengers do. I read from the regulations of the Department:

In connection with railroad and steamboat routes, mail messengers are designated to carry the mails to and from post-offices not at the termini of routes, when such post-offices are more than eighty rods (one-quarter of a mile) from the steamboat landing or railroad station.

In the appropriation for railroad service you have recognized the growth of postal business; but in this appropriation for carrying the mails from the point of delivery by steamboat or railroad to the post-offices you have failed to make a corresponding increase. The appropriation for the present fiscal year was $900,000. The Postmaster-General asks for the next year $1,100,000. Gentlemen on the other side have lauded his estimates. Now will they listen to what he says in his report?

The rapid growth of the railway service has added largely to the expenses of this service—

The mail-messenger service—

so that the average cost of new service during the last four months has been at the rate of $100,000 per annum. This rate of expenditure will make necessary a deficiency appropriation of $75,000 for the current year.

The Postmaster-General tells you that there is now a deficiency of $75,000, and he asks for the next fiscal year an appropriation of $1,100,000. You have made appropriation to carry your mails on railroads and steamboat routes; now you must appropriate the necessary amount to carry the mails from terminal points on such routes to the post-offices. The appropriation proposed in this bill will not suffice. Unless you make the appropriation asked for by the Postmaster-General for carrying the mails from the points where they are deposited by the railroad companies and steamboats to the post-offices the mails must be left just where the steamboats and railroads dump them.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. We will not consume time by discussion on our side. We want to vote.

Mr. HORR. I will occupy but a moment. I desire to emphasize what my friend from Pennsylvania [Mr. BINGHAM] has said. This messenger service is subject to variations. It is not done, as is the star-route business, by contract. The bulk of it has to be hired by the postmasters. They are getting it done now at very low rates. The Postmaster-General tells you that the service will be crippled unless an appropriation of $1,100,000 be made; but we propose in the pending amendment to allow only $1,000,000, instead of $900,000, as proposed in the bill. Any man who will inform himself as to the work done by these messengers must come to the conclusion that $1,000,000 will be too little rather than too much.

There is no use, however, for me to talk to you gentlemen about it. You seem inclined to vote simply for the crippling of this service, and what I say seems to be of no use. I will repeat, however, that any reasonable man who will sit down and examine these reports, as I have done, can not fail after such examination to recognize the necessity of making this appropriation at least $1,000,000. [Cries of "Vote!" "Vote!"]

The question being taken on the amendment of Mr. SKINNER, of New York, to strike out "$900,000" and insert "$1,000,000," it was not agreed to; there being, on a division—ayes 77, noes 100.

Mr. BISBEE. I move to amend by inserting after line 130 the following:

For special facilities on trunk lines, $600,000.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. I rise to a point of order. This amendment increases expenditures, and there is no law authorizing it. No estimate is made for this service at all.

Mr. BISBEE. There is now on the statute-book an appropriation for this very purpose. For this service Congress appropriated for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1883, $600,000. At the last session $185,000 was appropriated for the same service for the present year. If I remember correctly, when the proposition to appropriate money for this service was made one year ago the point of order was made upon it and overruled on the ground that there was a law authorizing the expenditure.

Mr. HISCOCK. The gentleman will allow me to correct him. It was in the Forty-sixth Congress that the point of order was overruled by a Democratic chairman of the Committee of the Whole.

Mr. BISBEE. Then I am correct as to the fact, but not as to the time.

Why, Mr. Chairman, this is an appropriation for the postal service of this country; and it is no more subject to a point of order than any other appropriation embraced in this bill. It is for the mail service and a very important branch of the mail service. Under the appropriation made by the last Congress a large portion of the country is now enjoying a service which I do not believe this House, if it understands the matter, will refuse to continue and extend from Maine to Texas.

I understand from the gentleman from New York that when the point of order was made it was in the Forty-sixth Congress, but was overruled by a Democratic chairman. I think, therefore, that it will hardly be sustained now.

Mr. CALKINS. I desire to say a word on the point of order. I do not think it is subject to the point of order, for the reason that it is the law now. The appropriation bill passed several years ago made provision for special mail facilities, and it has been recognized in every one since. In the last Congress there was a fight made, as perhaps the chairman of the committee will remember, by the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. ROBINSON], which finally prevailed, but I do not recollect exactly the points that he made against it or the precise appropriation. I do, however, recollect that in the Forty-sixth Congress the same point was made against the mail facilities and overruled; and I do not now recall an instance since I have been a member of this body where the point of order was made and sustained.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. For this service there has been no estimate whatever submitted by the Department. There is no law authorizing it. I can not imagine how gentlemen can expect to bring it in order in the face of the rule, which expressly and emphatically declares that no amendment shall be in order unless authorized by law or that retrenches expenditures.

Now the gentleman said further that this point had been overruled, I think, in the last House——

Mr. CALKINS. No; in the Forty-sixth Congress.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. In the Forty-sixth Congress, and that there was an estimate.

Mr. CALKINS. That makes no difference.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. Now I do not care whether a former member of this committee decided it to be in order or not. I put the question simply to the Chair, who is familiar with the rulings and practice of this House upon the subject, whether this is authorized by any law in existence; and since it does not retrench expenditures, whether it can be held to be in order?

Mr. CANNON. I wish to say simply a word, to call the attention of the committee to clause 3 of Rule XXI. It provides:

No appropriation shall be reported in any general appropriation bill, or be in order as an amendment thereto, for any expenditure not previously authorized by law, unless in continuation of appropriations for such public works and objects as are already in progress.

Now, there was an appropriation made last year and for several years prior for these special mail facilities, and this point of order has been raised before. The ruling of the Chair has been uniformly, according to my recollection, that an amendment such as this now proposed is in order, because it is only a continuation of the objects for which the prior appropriation was made, and of which the Chair will take official notice.

Mr. REED. It seems to me that the point of order can not be sustained against such an amendment, and that it can be put upon broader grounds, because it is a part of the very work or business of appropriating money to carry on the mails in which we are now engaged. In making such appropriations we have the right to appropriate the money for any purpose deemed necessary to carry the mails, unless of course such appropriations shall be in contravention of some existing law. Nothing of that sort can be said by any possibility in opposition to the proposition made here.

Mr. HOLMAN. The point of order can be decided in a moment by reference to a single fact. It can not be denied that an increase of the appropriations for the postal service by railroads would be in order, for that is in continuance of an established public service or public work, so to speak, under the rule.

But here is an independent proposition, appropriating a sum of money with a view, not to the general transportation of the mails in the ordinary way, but by other and different facilities. I concede that if there had been original legislation upon the subject, and independent, such an appropriation might be made if in the pursuance of existing law. But I submit this is not properly in continuance of a public work already authorized, but of a new and independent public service in connection with the Post-Office Department. In that sense it is not authorized by law.

Mr. CALKINS. It is in pursuance of a recognized rule which has been established for years by law. You may say that you can not increase the appropriations for carrying the mails in mail-cars, as well as to say that you can not increase the appropriations for special mail facilities. You might as well say that you can not increase the appropriations for the star-route or railroad service on the same ground. The carrying of the mail is the very purpose of this bill, and it is for you to determine the method.

Mr. HISCOCK. I suppose, Mr. Chairman, that this item, the proposed amendment, would come within the rule which has been adopted with reference to a great many appropriations; for instance, we will take other appropriations specified in this bill, or, as you will readily recollect, appropriations which are frequently made in connection with the Indian service. There is no treaty obligation to make it necessary to appropriate the money. There is no statute which renders it obligatory upon you to appropriate it, but it is an appropriation in continuance of a policy already adopted. It is a part of the great sum which is to be appropriated for the running and carrying on the affairs of the Government. Take, for instance, this bill. There are other items in it to which I have referred, where the statutes do not require you to make the appropriation. You have here an appropriation for mail locks and keys of $25,000. I am not aware of any general law providing for the purchase of mail locks and keys. But in pursuance of the purpose which you have in view in making appropriations for carrying the mails, it must be appropriated for the care and safety of the mails while in transit.

Take, again, this item:

For mail-bags and mail-bag catchers, $230,000.

Now, I do not understand there is any general statute that provides a certain number of mail-bags and mail-bag catchers shall be appropriated for every year. I do not understand there is any law upon the subject, but each annual appropriation bill carries a sum of money that may be devoted to that purpose. And thus it is with reference to this item. It is a part of the postal service of the country. It has been adopted as such. When it was first adopted there might have been some question raised; this point of order might have have been urged then with far more propriety than now. The point of order was first raised in the Forty-sixth Congress, and it was then very fully discussed. I do not know who presided, but it was doubtless a gentleman of recognized ability. And then the work commenced. And this is now but a continuation of what is well recognized as a branch of the postal service. It seems to me it is not subject to the point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is inclined to sustain the point of order, and has very little difficulty in coming to this conclusion. The legislation of Congress provides for the transportation of mails. It prescribes that the railway companies shall be paid so much by weight for their transportation. Provision has already been made in another part of the bill for that purpose. The proposition now is to give in addition to that a sum of money for special facilities. There is no law providing for special facilities. It is urged by gentlemen that it should be allowed under the idea that it is a continuation of some public work or object. The Chair does not understand that part of the rule to apply to this case. In the case of a public building, in the case of barracks, in the case of fortifications, where the work was commenced the Chair would understand it would be competent to appropriate to complete the work.

The gentleman from New York [Mr. HISCOCK] says that there is no law in the case of mail locks and keys, yet we continually appropriate for this. That is true; but in the case of the transportation of the mails the law expressly provides how much shall be paid to the companies for that purpose, and that excludes the idea of their being paid in any different manner.

The gentleman from New York alleges that during the Forty-sixth Congress this question was ruled on otherwise. The Chair does not so remember. The recollection of the Chair is that the question came up in a different form and was disposed of on a mere technicality. But the Chair remembers that in prior Congresses it had been ruled otherwise; and even if it had not, the proposition is so clear to the mind of the Chair that he would be forced to the conclusion to sustain the point of order.

The Clerk read the following paragraph:

For mail locks and keys, $25,000.

Mr. WHITE, of Kentucky. I offer the amendment which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

At the end of line 131 insert as follows:

"For suitable furniture and for safes for separating offices of the third and fourth classes, $263,500."

Mr. TOWNSHEND. I make the point of order on this amendment. There is no law authorizing furniture for third-class offices; and if there was, the amendment is offered at the wrong part of the bill. We have passed from that portion of the bill relating to this subject. And the same amendment was offered by the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. MOREY] and was ruled out.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair sustains the point of order.

Mr. WHITE, of Kentucky. I move to strike out the last word of the paragraph.

There are in the United States 2,193 first, second, and third class post-offices. For the compensation of postmasters by this bill as reported by the committee we appropriate $10,000,000. For that purpose during the last fiscal year there was appropriated $10,315,394.46, an average of $4,710.16⅔ to each one of those first, second, and third class post-offices. In the United States there are 45,956 fourth-class post-offices. To those post-offices there is no allowance made except to 927 of them for even clerk-hire. There is no appropriation for safes in which to lock up the registered packages. There is no appropriation made for furniture, even of the simplest kind. There are in the United States of the third and fourth class post-offices but 2,108 that receive allowance for clerk-hire.

Now, sir, I think the committee ought to do something for this class of men. They ought to do something for the public service that is intrusted to them. They have to guard these registered packages, and yet they have no safes provided. They are compelled to distribute the mails, and yet there is no allowance for tables—no allowance for any furniture that is necessary.

We make an appropriation, Mr. Chairman, every year for the first and second class post-offices of this country. We fail every year to hear the appeals of these 46,000 fourth-class postmasters. They can not come here, and if the members on this floor who represent them in a general way present their case the committee will not give attention to them.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. TOWNSHEND. I call for a vote.

Mr. WHITE, of Kentucky. I withdraw the amendment.

The Clerk read the following paragraph:

For mail-bags and mail-bag catchers, $230,000.

Mr. WHITE, of Kentucky. I move to strike out the last word.

I want to call the attention of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. TOWNSHEND] to the fact that we have made appropriations for special steamboat service. If he would go before the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads he would find that in times past—I do not speak for the present—it has not been unknown to the Department that an officer in the Sixth Auditor's Office would contract with a man who owns steamboat lines to give mail service not in the ordinary way but in consequence of his lobbying in that Department. These fourth-class postmasters have no chance to get any part of the appropriation. I will not say the item is put in this bill for the benefit of the men who own steamboat lines. But I do assert that in times past there have been found willing tools in the Sixth Auditor's Office to get the service for the owners of those steamboat lines.

We have put in this bill all that has been asked for that service. We have given to the men who do service on the railroad trains, not only to the men who own the trains but to the clerks on those trains and to the mail messengers, the largest amount of compensation asked for them. But for the 46,000 fourth-class postmasters we give only the small pittance which they will receive by the allowance for the amount of stamps canceled.

Now we owe it to ourselves, we owe it to the Post-Office Department, we owe it to our constituents, we owe it to these men to make an appropriation which will give to each one of these fourth-class postmasters whose offices are designated as distributing offices a safe in which to keep valuable packages and funds. We should give to every one of them a small amount for the necessary furniture to enable them to perform their duties properly. A man receiving $100 a year for doing a thousand dollars' worth of work does not want to spend $50 for the furniture necessary to enable him to properly perform his duties. [Here the hammer fell.] I withdraw the pro forma amendment.

Mr. HORR. I move to amend the paragraph just read by striking out "$230,000" and inserting "$250,000."

Mr. CANNON. I ask the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. HORR] to yield for a motion that the committee rise. We can not finish this bill to-night.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. I hope not. We can finish this bill in a few minutes. There is but one more item over which there will be any controversy; every other item is according to the estimates.

Mr. CANNON. I move that the committee now rise.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. I hope the committee will not rise.

Mr. MILLER, of Pennsylvania. There are a dozen men here who want to speak on this bill.

The motion that the committee rise was not agreed to, upon a division—ayes 62, noes 91.

The question recurred upon the amendment of Mr. HORR to increase the amount "for mail-bags and mail-bag catchers" to $250,000.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. HORR] desire to be heard on his amendment?

Mr. HORR. I do; not for the purpose of delay, but because I think it is an amendment which should be adopted. I hold in my hand a letter from the Post-Office Department, sent to the Committee on Appropriations since the preparation of this bill and since it was reported to the House. In this letter he tells us that the Department needs the entire amount of $280,000 in order to have bags sufficient to provide for the necessities of the service.

I have not from the start moved an amendment to this bill which I did not think was justified on good, sound business principles. The Department informs us that the supply of mail-bags on hand is now almost exhausted. It is a habit of the Department to keep a supply on hand. It is impossible to have these articles made up in a month or in two months, because they are made from a peculiar material, and the contract has to be given out in advance, so that the material may be manufactured.

The Postmaster-General informs us and the House that the supply of mail-bags on hand has been constantly decreasing for the last few years, until now it is well-nigh exhausted, and he is liable at any time to receive a requisition for this important article in the service which he will not be able to fill. He sends to us here an itemized account showing just every dollar that he needs and what he needs it for, the kind of bags needed in the service, the whole amount for this item being estimated at a little over $249,000. He insists that the good of the service and the safety of the mail matter demand that we should give him the full amount that he has asked for.

I do not want to take up time unnecessarily, but I state these facts, which the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. TOWNSHEND], who I know has received the same communication, will admit to be a correct statement from the Department. I think the House ought to heed this statement and that we ought as business men to give the amount asked for.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. I want to say only one word. [Cries of "Vote!" "Vote!"] Well, I will let the vote be taken.

The question was taken upon the amendment moved by Mr. HORR; and it was not agreed to.

The Clerk resumed the reading of the bill, and read the following:

For the manufacturing of postal cards, $268,000.

Mr. HORR. Mr. Chairman, I wish——

Mr. TOWNSHEND. I rise for the purpose——

Mr. HORR. I do not know but what the gentleman from Illinois wants to move the same amendment that I do. The Postmaster-General recommends a decrease in this item, and I suppose the gentleman is going to move that decrease, though I must say I fear it will be a dangerous step for him to take. [Laughter.]

Mr. TOWNSHEND. The Postmaster-General recommends a decrease in this item of $36,000; that is, to reduce the amount named in the bill to $232,000. I wish to say while I am on my feet that every estimate for the Third Assistant Postmaster-General's Office has been given by the Committee on Appropriations without reducing it one cent. In this instance the Department itself asks for a reduction.

Mr. HORR. I want to say a word on this item. [Cries of "Vote!" "Vote!"] Oh, gentlemen, be quiet. I am in perfect good nature, but I am not to be choked down. [Cries of "Go on!"]

I want to say to my friend from Illinois [Mr. TOWNSHEND] that this is the first item in this bill where, since the bill has been framed and reported to the House, the Postmaster-General comes in and tells us that he can get along with less money than his first estimate.

Mr. HOLMAN. That is very remarkable.

Mr. HORR. He does so in this instance, and you now seem to have perfect confidence in him; you are willing to take his word. Yet in the item just before this he told you that the safety of the mails and the good of the service demanded an increase of a few thousand dollars, and you ignored his recommendation.

What I wish to say is that I fear you are about to tread on dangerous ground. It does seem to me that you should stand by the bill as originally reported from the Committee on Appropriations, for I have as yet seen no evidence of any desire on your part to reform or improve this bill. [Cries of "Vote!" "Vote!"]

Well, when I get through you will vote, and not before; I am talking now. It is so difficult to vote when a man is speaking, you know. I wish to say that I am in favor of the amendment which the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. TOWNSHEND] proposes, because I believe the Postmaster-General honestly recommends it and that the service will bear the proposed reduction of this item. But I claim that you ought to have exercised just as good judgment on previous items, and followed the recommendations of the Department just as cordially.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. I merely wish to say, Mr. Chairman——[Cries of "Vote!" "Vote!"] I will not sit down until I have made myself heard.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair desires to remind members that business will proceed much faster if order is preserved.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. I wish to say that I have sent an amendment to the Clerk's desk—— [Cries of "Vote!"] I will wait until members on the others side learn better manners. [Laughter.]

Mr. WHITE, of Kentucky. As it appears that the other side of the House does not propose to hear debate, I move that the committee rise.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman is not in order.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. I have sent to the Clerk's desk an amendment proposing an alteration of the bill in strict accordance with the recommendation of the Postmaster-General, and I ask that the amendment be read.

Mr. WHITE, of Kentucky. I insist on my motion that the committee rise.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. I have not relinquished the floor, and until my amendment is read the gentleman can not make that motion.

The Clerk read as follows:

In line 149 strike out "sixty-eight" and insert "thirty-two;" so as to make the appropriation for the manufacture of postal cards $232,000.

Mr. WHITE, of Kentucky. I now move that the committee rise.

The motion was not agreed to.

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

For engraving, printing, and binding drafts and warrants, $2,500.

Mr. WHITE, of Kentucky. Mr. Chairman, I move to amend by striking out the last word. I desire to resume the statement in which I was interrupted when last on the floor. During the fiscal year ending June 30, 1883, there were 2,139 postmasters of the first, second, and third classes, receiving compensation amounting to $10,315,394.96—an average of $4,710.16. And to this aggregate compensation there should be added about $7,000,000 for expenses. Postmasters of the fourth class numbered 45,717, receiving compensation aggregating $2,006,568.31—an average of $175.56. The postmasters of the second and third classes collected revenue amounting to $33,535,253.95, while those of the fourth class collected $11,614,746.05.

Mr. Chairman, I hope that I have shown to the committee—— [Cries of "Vote!" "vote!"] Mr. Chairman, I call for order. I have been trying to show to the Democratic side of the House that they are in no state of mind to hear argument. What they need is stimulation. [Laughter.] What they require is something to strengthen their nerves. [Cries of "Vote!" "Vote!"] Mr. Chairman, I do not propose to proceed without order.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair appeals to gentlemen to preserve order.

Mr. WHITE, of Kentucky. I want to call attention to another matter. I find by section 739 of the postal laws and regulations for 1879——

Mr. VALENTINE. I hope we may have order so that the remarks of the gentleman from Kentucky may be heard.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair trusts that order will be preserved so that the business of the Committee of the Whole may proceed.

Mr. WHITE, of Kentucky. I hope this confusion will not come out of my time. [Laughter.]

Mr. HORR. It is utterly impossible for gentlemen on the other side of the House to hear the gentleman from Kentucky.

Mr. WHITE, of Kentucky. Mr. Chairman, I am satisfied that if those gentlemen on the other side had had their dinners they could listen with patience.

Under the section to which I have referred the railroad companies are required to take the mails from and deliver them to terminal post-offices and all intermediate post-offices located not over eighty rods from the line of the road. But do we not know that these railroad companies do not do this? They have deliberately gone to work in scores of cases, and it is a part of their business, to have their surveyors locate every one of those post-offices——

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. VALENTINE obtained the floor and said: I yield my time to the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. WHITE].

Mr. TOWNSHEND. I wish to know whether the gentleman from Nebraska can yield his time to the gentleman from Kentucky as he proposes? They are both on the same side.

Mr. WHITE, of Kentucky. I hope the gentleman from Illinois will learn some manners. [Laughter.]

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Nebraska can take the floor and yield his time, provided he is recognized as entitled to the floor. Under the rule, unless the amendment of the gentleman from Kentucky is withdrawn, the Chair must recognize some gentleman in opposition.

Mr. VALENTINE. I desire to yield my time to the gentleman from Kentucky, and I want to know if it is the ruling of the Chair at this late hour that I can not take the floor and yield to him.

The CHAIRMAN. It is perfectly competent for the gentleman to reach his purpose by making a pro forma amendment. The rule is that an amendment must be debated five minutes on either side. The Chair does not think it would be proper, however, to entertain a pro forma amendment while there is one pending.

Mr. WHITE, of Kentucky. Then I withdraw the pro forma amendment.

Mr. VALENTINE. I move to strike out the last two words, and yield my time to the gentleman from Kentucky.

The CHAIRMAN. That is perfectly competent.

Mr. WHITE, of Kentucky. I thank the gentleman from Nebraska. I was about to call the attention of the committee to a clause in the postal laws; and I want to say furthermore that the committee has already made a specific appropriation to pay for the mail-messenger service which is in the future to be put on these routes between the terminal points or between the roads and the post-offices adjacent to them. In other words, we make an appropriation to relieve the railroad companies of that which they are required to do by the regulations.

Mr. BINGHAM. Does not the gentleman from Kentucky know that there is no law on the statute-books that requires the railroad corporations to deliver the mails in the manner he suggests? [Cries of "Vote!" "Vote!"]

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Kentucky is entitled to the floor, and the Chair hopes he will not be further interrupted.

Mr. WHITE, of Kentucky. I hope that this will not come out of my time. I shall answer the gentleman. But there are some gentlemen over on the other side who do not desire this discussion to proceed and could not hear his question. I am aware that the whisky bill wants to come up directly. You had just as well have adjourned an hour ago; you are not going to get that up. [Laughter.] Now, in answering the gentleman from Pennsylvania I will say to him that I am perfectly well aware of the fact that there is no such law on the statute-books; but I ask him this question: Will he deny that there is a regulation to that effect?

Mr. BINGHAM. That is a different question.

Mr. WHITE, of Kentucky. Does not that regulation of the Department have the effect of law?

Mr. BINGHAM. It does not.

Mr. WHITE, of Kentucky. That is the opinion of the gentleman.

Mr. BINGHAM. It has the effect of law upon the Post-Office officials and not upon the people who carry the mails under a general statute.

Mr. WHITE, of Kentucky. The gentleman is helping me out. He contends that you have done for the railroad companies what they had a right to before.

Now let me read the law:

> Railroad companies are required to take the mails from and deliver them into the terminal post-offices and to all intermediate post-offices located not over eighty rods from the line of road, and the distances from the terminal depots to the post-offices where the railroad companies deliver the mails are paid for by the Department as a part of the length of the road.

Will the gentleman from Pennsylvania get up and say that there is no "law" in view of that regulation? Here is the postal regulations, which have all the force and effect of law; and what I want to show is that this bill relieves the railroad companies and not the employés.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Kentucky has expired.

Mr. COBB. I move to strike out the three last words, and will yield my time to the gentleman from Kentucky. [Laughter.]

Mr. WHITE, of Kentucky. I thank the gentleman from Indiana. I knew, sir, that he would be with me on this proposition against the railroads. [Laughter.] If there is anything in the world that the railroads want that the gentleman from Indiana is not opposed to I do not know what it is. [Laughter.] I go this far, however, against the railroads, that when they take a mail contract it is their duty to perform the service just as honestly as it is that of the man who proposes to carry the mails on a horse or stage-coach or on a steamboat. But under this bill, as I have said, you propose to relieve the railroads. I now, Mr. Chairman, ask a vote on the amendments.

The CHAIRMAN. There are two pro forma amendments pending which would be first voted upon unless they are withdrawn.

Mr. COBB. I withdraw mine.

Mr. VALENTINE. I withdraw the pro forma amendment.

The Clerk resumed the reading of the bill and read the second section, as follows:

> SEC. 2. That section 4002 of the Revised Statutes of the United States be, and the same is hereby, amended as follows: In line 21 of said section strike out the word "less" and in lieu thereof insert the word "more."

Mr. TOWNSHEND. I now move that the committee rise. I think there is nothing now left in the bill that will give rise to debate.

Mr. CANNON. I rise to make a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. CANNON. If a motion is not now made to strike out section 2 will it be in order when the committee resumes the consideration of the bill to make such a motion? If necessary I will enter that motion now, and will then yield to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. TOWNSHEND] for the motion that the committee rise.

Mr. HISCOCK. I have not examined closely the provisions of this section, and desire to reserve points of order.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. Then the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON] can not enter his motion.

Mr. HISCOCK. But the point of order can be reserved.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. If there is any point of order to be made I hope it will be made now and decided.

The CHAIRMAN. If there is any point of order to be made the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. TOWNSHEND] insists that it shall be made at this time. The gentleman has the right to do so.

Mr. HISCOCK. Let it go over until Monday.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair desires to know whether or not consent is given that points of order on this section are reserved until the committee resumes its sitting.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. I am willing to agree to that.

Mr. BINGHAM. And the right, of course, to offer amendments.

The CHAIRMAN. Of course.

The motion that the committee rise was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose; and Mr. BLACKBURN having taken the chair as Speaker pro tempore, Mr. BLOUNT reported that the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union had had under consideration the bill (H. R. 5459) making appropriations for the service of the Post-Office Department for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1885, and for other purposes, and had come to no resolution thereon.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. WELLER. I move that the House do now adjourn.

Mr. HENLEY. I desire to submit a privileged report. [Cries of "Regular order!"]

Mr. WELLER. I withdraw the motion to adjourn for the present.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair recognizes the gentleman from California [Mr. HENLEY] to submit a privileged report, the motion to adjourn having been withdrawn.

FORFEITURE OF RAILROAD LAND GRANTS.

Mr. HENLEY, from the Committee on the Public Lands, reported a bill (H. R. 5897) to declare forfeited certain land grants to aid in the construction of a railroad from the Central Pacific Railroad in California to Portland, in Oregon; which was read a first and second time, referred to the House Calendar, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

Mr. OATES. I desire to submit the views of the minority, including an amendment to the bill, and desire to have them printed with the report of the majority.

There was no objection, and it was so ordered.

SEMINOLE INDIAN LANDS.

The SPEAKER pro tempore laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of the Interior, in answer to a resolution of the House of Representatives of March 8, 1884, transmitting report of Acting Commissioner of the General Land Office in regard to survey of lands purchased of the Seminole Indians; which was referred to the Committee on the Public Lands.

TIMBER DEPREDATIONS.

The SPEAKER pro tempore also laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of the Interior, transmitting a copy of a letter from the Acting Commissioner of the General Land Office asking appropriation to supply deficiencies in the appropriations for depredations on public timber and for salaries and commissions of registers and receivers for 1884 of $8,500 and $2,700 respectively; which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed.

MISSISSIPPI RIVER FLOODS.

The SPEAKER pro tempore also laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of War, in response to a resolution of the House of Representatives adopted March 5, 1884, requesting him to furnish the House from time to time with information of the progress of the floods in the valley of the Mississippi, and to report if at any time in his judgment there exists such suffering in consequence of such floods as to justify measures of relief by Congress; which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

By unanimous consent, leave of absence was granted as follows:

To Mr. ADAMS, of New York, for one day;

To Mr. EVINS, of South Carolina, for ten days, on account of sickness in his family; and

To Mr. HOBLITZELL, for the remainder of this day, on account of sickness.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. BROWN, of Pennsylvania. I move that the House do now adjourn.

The question being taken,

The SPEAKER pro tempore stated that the "ayes" appeared to have it.

Mr. HATCH, of Missouri. I demand a division. I have here a communication from the Secretary of the Treasury which I desire to have printed.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 41, noes 36.

So the motion was agreed to; and accordingly (at 5 o'clock and 30 minutes p. m.) the House adjourned.

SENATE.

MONDAY, March 17, 1884.

Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. E. D. HUNTLEY, D. D.

The Journal of the proceedings of Friday last was read and approved.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATIONS.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate a message from the President of the United States; which was read, and, with the accompanying report, referred to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed, as follows:

To the Senate and House of Representatives:

I transmit herewith for the consideration of Congress a communication from the Secretary of War, of the 12th instant, and accompanying papers, requesting an appropriation of $230,869.44 for the erection at the Presidio of San Francisco of additional buildings at headquarters military division of the Pacific, rendered necessary in consequence of the proposed increase of the garrison by removal of troops from points in San Francisco Harbor.

CHESTER A. ARTHUR.

EXECUTIVE MANSION, March 14, 1884.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate a communication from the Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting, in compliance with the provisions of section 194 of the Revised Statutes of the United States, a list embracing the names of the clerks and other persons employed in the several bureaus in that Department during the calendar year ended December 31, 1883, and showing the time each was actually employed, and the sums paid to each.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The letter will be printed if there be no objection, and with the accompanying list—the Chair does not feel authorized to direct the printing of the names of these persons—be referred to the Committee on Finance. If the committee think it desirable to print the list, they can report accordingly.

He also laid before the Senate a communication from the Secretary of War, transmitting report of the Chief of Engineers, submitting a report from Maj. W. R. King of the results of surveys made to ascertain the cost of placing locks and dams on the Cumberland River from Nashville, Tenn., to the Cincinnati Southern Railroad in Kentucky, made in compliance with the requirements of the river and harbor act of August 2, 1882; which, with the accompanying papers, was referred to the Committee on Commerce, and ordered to be printed.

He also laid before the Senate a communication from the Secretary of War, transmitting a report from the Chief of Engineers, submitting a report from Maj. A. N. Damrell of the results of a survey of the harbor at Cedar Keys, Fla., and of the shoal between Dauphin Island and Cedar Point, Ala., made with a view to the improvement of navigation between the waters of Mobile Bay and other places on the Gulf of Mexico, to comply with the requirements of the river and harbor act of August 2, 1882; which, with the accompanying papers, was referred to the Committee on Commerce, and ordered to be printed.

He also laid before the Senate a communication from the Secretary of the Interior, transmitting, in answer to a resolution of the 14th ultimo, a letter of the Acting Commissioner of the General Land Office, with copies of the principal reports and correspondence on file in his office upon the subject of the unauthorized fencing of the public lands; which, with the accompanying papers, was referred to the Committee on Public Lands, and ordered to be printed.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. SAWYER presented resolutions of the Chamber of Commerce of Milwaukee, Wis., in favor of repealing the law authorizing the coinage of silver dollars; which were referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. ALLISON presented a joint resolution of the General Assembly of Iowa; which was read, and referred to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry, as follows:

[Joint resolution No. 7.]

Memorial and joint resolution of the General Assembly of the State of Iowa, relating to the prevention and suppression of pleuro-pneumonia in neat cattle.

Whereas the disease in neat cattle known as pleuro-pneumonia or lung-plague has been shown by the experience of foreign nations to be a virulent poison of the most contagious character; and

Whereas it has destroyed the business of cattle production and desolated the cattle interests in Australia, the Cape of Good Hope, and other British possessions, as well as in many European nations from which it has not been excluded by the most stringent police regulations; and

Whereas this disease is known to have gained a foothold in several of the States east of the Alleghany Mountains, and to-day threatens, through the commerce in cattle between the Eastern and Western States, not only the cattle ranges of the Western Territories, but the millions of capital involved in the stock business of the West: Therefore,

Resolved, That our Senators in Congress be instructed and our Representatives in Congress be requested to do their utmost to secure legislation to prevent and supress pleuro-pneumonia in neat cattle in the United States, and especially to prevent its spreading from districts now infected to the cattle-producing fields and ranges of the West.

Resolved, That the secretary of state be requested to furnish a copy of this memorial to each of the Senators and Representatives of the State of Iowa.

Approved March 6, 1884.

I hereby certify the foregoing to be a true and correct copy of the original on file in this office.

Witness my hand and the great seal of the State by me affixed.

[SEAL.] JAS. HULL, Secretary of State.

Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin, presented resolutions adopted by the Chamber of Commerce of the city of Milwaukee, Wis., in favor of the passage of the pending bill to promote the efficiency of the Revenue-Marine Service; which were referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. MILLER, of California. I present a petition of the Citizens' Association of Sacramento, praying Congress to instruct the Secretary of War to expend the $250,000 already appropriated for the improvement of the Sacramento and Feather Rivers, California. I desire to ask the attention of the chairman of the Committee on Commerce to this petition, and I would suggest, as it is a matter of considerable importance, that it would be well perhaps for the committee to confer with the Secretary of War and to know his reasons for not expending the sum which has already been appropriated. I merely make that suggestion. I move that the petition be referred to the Committee on Commerce.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. DAWES presented the petition of B. G. Boardman, George D. Dodd, Henry J. Lazor, and others, merchants and representatives of varied commercial interests in the city of Boston, Mass., representing the alarming condition and extent of the coinage of silver at the present time, and praying for the repeal of the law in relation thereto; which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. McMILLAN presented a petition of Warin A. Sutherland, M. E. Collins, Mrs. E. D. Chapman, Mrs. E. R. Brace, A. B. Gordon, and others, 42 citizens of Minnesota, praying for the passage of a sixteenth amendment to the Constitution of the United States prohibiting the States from disfranchising citizens on account of sex; which was referred to the Select Committee on Woman Suffrage.

Mr. MILLER, of New York, presented a petition of nearly 200 citizens of Albany, N. Y., praying for the suspension of the coinage of the standard silver dollar; which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. PALMER presented the petition of Mrs. R. M. Young, Phœbe Cole, Mrs. Sarah Richardson, William Richardson, B. C. Sargent, Mrs. R. M. Kelly, and 366 others, citizens of the State of Michigan, praying for the passage of a sixteenth amendment to the Constitution of the United States prohibiting the States from disfranchising citizens on account of sex; which was referred to the Select Committee on Woman Suffrage.

Mr. GARLAND presented a petition of 700 citizens of Eureka Springs, Ark., and a petition of members of the Grand Army of the Republic, at Eureka Springs, Ark., praying for the establishment of a soldiers' home at that place; which were referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. VEST presented resolutions of the Merchants' Exchange of Saint Louis, Mo., and of a meeting of bankers, capitalists, and others, citizens of that place, in favor of legislation extending the bonded period on whisky; which were referred to the Committee on Finance.

He also presented a petition of public officers and citizens of Jackson County, Missouri, praying that a pension be granted by act of Congress to Robert Baxter, an ex-Union soldier; which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

He also presented a petition of Samuel A. Ballard, of Gentry County, Missouri, praying for legislation extending the time for filing claims for arrears of pensions; which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. VOORHEES presented a petition of William H. Corbaley and 64 other ex-Union soldiers of Indiana, praying for the equalization of their bounties and other measures of relief; which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

He also presented resolutions adopted by the Charles W. Heath Post, No. 109, Grand Army of the Republic, of East Enterprise, Switzerland County, Indiana, and resolutions adopted by the George W. Rader Post, No. 119, Grand Army of the Republic, of Middletown, Ind., in favor of the equalization of the bounties of the soldiers of the late war and other measures for their relief; which were referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. MANDERSON presented the petition of Mary A. Kendall, Mattie J. Campbell, Laura H. Lewis, F. F. Campbell, and others, 78 citizens of Arlington, Nebr., praying for the adoption of a sixteenth amendment to the Constitution of the United States prohibiting the States from disfranchising citizens on account of sex; which was referred to the Select Committee on Woman Suffrage.

Mr. BLAIR presented the petition of George Tilden and other citizens of Keene, N. H., praying an appropriation for education in Alaska; which was referred to the Committee on Education and Labor.

Mr. CONGER. I present the petition of Mary A. Darling, of Vicksburg, Mich., praying for the adoption of a sixteenth amendment to the Constitution of the United States prohibiting the States from disfranchising citizens on account of sex. This petition is from a lady of Michigan who represents the views of a considerable number of my constituents on this subject. I move that it be referred to the Select Committee on Woman Suffrage, and ask that it may have early consideration.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. COCKRELL presented the petition of Virginia L. Minor, Fannie M. Bagby, E. S. Fish, Rev. Joseph H. Foy, Dr. H. Tyler Wilcox, Dr. M. Adelaide Greennan, Dr. E. U. Scott, J. B. Merwin, Margaret A. Merwin, Mrs. E. P. Johnson, and 310 other citizens of Saint Louis, Mo., praying for the adoption of a sixteenth amendment to the Constitution of the United States prohibiting the States from disfranchising citizens on account of sex; which was referred to the Select Committee on Woman Suffrage.

Mr. BROWN. I present resolutions unanimously adopted by the Georgia State Agricultural Society. At its late session at Savannah the society resolved unanimously:

That this convention of delegates, representing the agricultural associations of the State of Georgia, with an earnest desire to elevate the pursuit of agriculture on a full and recognized equality in civil and political character with any and all honorable callings and professions of high order, do hereby most respectfully and earnestly petition Congress, now in session, to take such action as may be necessary to place the Department of Agriculture on an equal footing with each and all of the Executive Departments of the Government.

I move that the resolution be referred to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry.

The motion was agreed to.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. HOAR. I am directed by the Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the bill (S. 214) for the relief of Maria E. Warfield, to report adversely thereon, and I ask that the bill be indefinitely postponed.

Mr. BECK. I should like to have that bill placed on the Calendar.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It will be placed on the Calendar, objection being made to its indefinite postponement.

Mr. VEST. Let the bill go on the Calendar.

Mr. BECK. I made a mistake. I thought I introduced the bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be placed on the Calendar with the adverse report of the committee.

Mr. HOAR, from the Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the bill (S. 663) to pay to Julia A. Nutt, widow and executrix of Haller Nutt, deceased, the amount of money reported by the Quartermaster-General to be due her, submitted a report thereon, accompanied by a bill (S. 1851) for the relief of Julia A. Nutt, widow and executrix of Haller Nutt, deceased; which was read twice by its title.

Mr. HOAR. I am directed by the Committee on the Judiciary, to which were committed sundry bills raising and readjusting the salaries of the judges of the United States district courts and sundry petitions and communications in regard to the same subject, to report an original bill.

The bill (S. 1852) fixing salaries of the several judges of the United States district courts at $5,000 per annum was read twice by its title.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be placed on the Calendar.

Mr. HOAR. I desire to say before the bill is disposed of that from a large majority of the judicial districts of the United States there have been petitions and letters and other communications, addressed either to the Senate or to individual Senators, in regard to the matter of the judges' salaries. In the last Congress the Judiciary Committee caused letters to be addressed to the various judges in the United States, with a view of learning the amount of business, the number of cases, and the number of days occupied by the judges in their several courts; and when that information came back the committee reported a bill which was based on the theory of raising to $5,000 the salaries of those judges who seemed to be occupied in the labors of their office substantially the whole year and leaving untouched nearly or quite all the others. In one or two instances there was an increase of salary proposed from $3,500 to $4,000. The present salaries are all at the rate of $3,500 or $4,000 a year, with the exception of the district judge in California, who receives $5,000 a year. The judge of the southern district of New York, where there is a vast admiralty jurisdiction, where if there should be a war the prize jurisdiction would be chiefly exercised, and the judge in Boston and in Philadelphia and in New Orleans each receives only the sum of $4,000 a year.

The committee, having reported a bill on the principle which I have stated, receive from a good many districts from which no information had come additional information, and it turns out that in certainly thirty-four of the fifty judicial districts of the United States the judges employ substantially the whole year and in a great many of them the assistance of judges of other districts is imperatively required. There are two or three districts in regard to which the committee have not information which would justify them in declaring that the judges are occupying their whole year; still from those districts there comes a pressure for an increase. So there are only about thirteen or fourteen districts which do not seem to require on the principle stated the increase of salary to $5,000. Now, in regard to those districts it is urged with great force on the part of the judge that he is liable at any time to have cases of great magnitude, interest, and intricacy, requiring the same judicial capacity and independence, weight, confidence in the community toward the judge which is required in those districts where the judges employ the whole year, and these judges are also under the law liable to be called upon to go to other districts to aid judges who are fully employed all the year round and who are not able to dispose of their business themselves.

Then in addition to that the district judge is always expected to engage in no other business. Of course he can not practice law; and it would be considered a great impropriety for him to engage in any manufacturing, commercial, or other business; so that his life is set aside and sequestered for this particular duty.

It has seemed therefore to the committee, there being so small a number of judges now unemployed any part of the year, that it was proper to raise the salaries of all the district judges to $5,000 per annum. That is the bill which has been reported, and I understand that in another legislative body for whose determination we have great respect the Judiciary Committee have come to the same conclusion.

I thought it proper, as there was so general an interest in the subject, to make this explanatory statement at this time.

Mr. MCMILLAN. I am instructed by the Committee on the Judiciary, to whom was referred the bill (S. 504) for the relief of John Silsby and others, purchasers of the "Weaver tract" lot of land in the city of Selma, State of Alabama, to report it adversely and move its indefinite postponement.

Mr. MORGAN. I ask that the bill go on the Calendar.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be placed on the Calendar.

Mr. DOLPH, from the Committee on Public Lands, to whom was referred the bill (S. 1303) to grant the right of way over the public lands of the United States to the Lost Lake and Mount Hood Improvement Company, reported it without amendment.

Mr. HILL, from the Committee on Public Lands, to whom was referred the bill (S. 1695) relating to lands in Colorado lately occupied by the Uncompahgre and White River Ute Indians, reported it with amendments.

Mr. PLUMB, from the Committee on Public Lands, to whom was referred the bill (S. 1543) for the relief of Wilbur F. Steele, reported it with an amendment.

Mr. JACKSON, from the Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the bill (S. 1331) making appropriation for the relief of the First National Bank of Newton, Mass., reported it with amendments, and submitted a report thereon.

Mr. GARLAND, from the Committee on the Judiciary, to whom was referred the bill (S. 1472) to permit the owners of certain vessels and cargoes to sue the United States in the Court of Claims, reported it with amendments.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (S. 1076) granting to the district judge of the eastern district of Virginia specific compensation for specific services rendered by him, reported adversely thereon; and the bill was postponed indefinitely.

Mr. GARLAND. I am also directed by the Committee on the Judiciary, to whom was referred the bill (S. 1320) for the relief of Mrs. Emily Miller, to report it back adversely. I ask, in the absence of the Senator who introduced the bill [Mr. LAMAR], that it may go on the Calendar. This report is made in accordance with reports on the same matter heretofore made, but if the Senator can show any reason why the case should come out of the rule, we are willing to hear it. I ask that the bill be placed on the Calendar.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It will be placed on the Calendar with the adverse report of the committee.

Mr. GARLAND, from the Committee on the Judiciary, to whom was referred the bill (S. 1312) providing for two additional associate justices of the supreme court of the Territory of Dakota, reported adversely thereon; and the bill was postponed indefinitely.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (S. 1096) for the relief of Daniel H. B. Davis, reported adversely thereon; and the bill was postponed indefinitely.

Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin, from the Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the following bills, submitted adverse reports thereon, which were agreed to; and the bills were postponed indefinitely:

A bill (S. 542) for the relief of John Fletcher;

A bill (S. 831) for the relief of Dr. Robert Carter; and

A bill (S. 758) for the relief of William L. Nance.

Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin. I am also directed by the Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the bill (S. 381) for the relief of William R. Testerman, to report it adversely.

Mr. COCKRELL. Let that be placed on the Calendar until I can examine the report.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be placed on the Calendar with the adverse report of the committee.

Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin, from the Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the bill (S. 1397) for the relief of George Maxwell, asked to be discharged from its further consideration, and that it be referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs; which was agreed to.

He also, from the Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the bill (S. 401) for the relief of the Protestant orphan asylum of Natchez, in the State of Mississippi, reported it with an amendment, and submitted a report thereon.

Mr. PIKE, from the Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the bill (S. 896) for the relief of Pearson C. Montgomery, of Memphis, Tenn., reported it with amendments, and submitted a report thereon.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (S. 492) for the relief of Sallie Jarratt, executrix of Gregory Jarrett, deceased, reported it with an amendment, and submitted a report thereon.

He also, from the Committee on the District of Columbia, to whom was referred the bill (S. 754) in regard to the convevance and devise of real estate in the District of Columbia, reported it with amendments, and submitted a report thereon.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (S. 1625) for the relief of William Bowen, reported it with an amendment, and submitted a report thereon.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (S. 1485) to amend the laws relating to land titles in the District of Columbia, reported adversely thereon; and the bill was postponed indefinitely.

Mr. INGALLS, from the Committee on the Judiciary, to whom was referred the bill (S. 1326) to compel the prosecution of proceedings in bankruptcy to a final decree, reported it with an amendment.

Mr. VAN WYCK, from the Committee on Public Lands, to whom was referred the bill (S. 1047) for the relief of Wesley Montgomery, reported it with an amendment, and submitted a report thereon.

AMENDMENTS TO THE RULES.

Mr. HARRIS. I am directed by the Committee on Rules, to whom was referred Miscellaneous Document No. 61, being a resolution to amend the rules, to report it with a recommendation that it be adopted, and I ask for its present consideration.

The Chief Clerk read the resolution, as follows:

Resolved, That the seventh rule of the Senate be amended by adding thereto the following words:

"The presiding officer may at any time lay, and it shall be in order at any time for a Senator to move to lay, before the Senate any bill or other matter sent to the Senate by the President or the House of Representatives, and any question pending at that time shall be suspended for this purpose. Any motion so made shall be determined without debate."

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Tennessee asks for the present consideration of this resolution. Is there objection? The Chair hears none. The question is on agreeing to the resolution.

The resolution was agreed to.

Mr. HARRIS. I am directed by the same committee to report back with a recommendation for its adoption the following resolution:

Resolved, That the eighth rule of the Senate be amended by adding thereto the following words:

"All motions made before 2 o'clock to proceed to the consideration of any matter shall be determined without debate."

I ask for the present consideration of the resolution.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection?

Mr. HOAR. I think that is an amendment to the rules. I hope it will lie over one day.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It will be placed on the Calendar.

Mr. HOAR. It is a very important matter.

Mr. HARRIS. I am directed by the same committee to report the following resolution:

Resolved, That the tenth rule of the Senate be amended by adding thereto the following words:

"And all motions to change such order shall be decided without debate."

I ask the consent of the Senate to consider at this time this resolution, if there be no objection.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of this resolution?

Mr. ALLISON. Why not have that go over?

Mr. HARRIS. Let the Chief Clerk read the last clause of Rule X and then read the amendment made by the resolution.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection?

Mr. COCKRELL. Let it be reported first.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It will be read for information.

The CHIEF CLERK. If amended as proposed the last clause of Rule X would read:

2. When two or more special orders have been made for the same time they shall have precedence according to the order in which they were severally assigned, and that order shall only be changed by direction of the Senate; and all motions to change such order shall be decided without debate.

Mr. HOAR. I understand that one of the proposed changes in the rules was agreed to without debate.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The one in reference to laying papers from the President or the other House before the Senate at any particular time was agreed to.

Mr. HOAR. I should like to have them all go over one day. I have no doubt they are all right, but there may be some addition suggested.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. This resolution will go over. Does the Senator from Massachusetts move to reconsider the vote agreeing to the first resolution?

Mr. HOAR. No; I can make the motion to-morrow if it is necessary.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Mr. BECK introduced a bill (S. 1853) to consolidate the present collection districts in the United States, and for other purposes; which was read twice by its title.

Mr. BECK. I desire to say a word in relation to this bill, to carry out what was recommended by the Secretary of the Treasury in his last annual report. After a careful examination of that report, and after consultation with the chairman of the Committee on Commerce, the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. MCMILLAN], and also the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations, the Senator from Iowa [Mr. ALLISON], the Department was sent to for information as to the best mode of accomplishing the object. A proper officer was sent by the Secretary, and after a good deal of examination by the Senator from Iowa and myself we determined to ask the Department to draw such a bill as was thought competent to accomplish the purpose. The Senator from Minnesota, the chairman of the Committee on Commerce, believed that all such bills went to his committee. We thought so too. All I desire to say now is, and I am requested to say that by the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations, that we hope prompt action will be had by the Committee on Commerce in regard to the bill, because until some law is passed, if it is thought best to pass any, nothing can be done by the Committee on Appropriations to provide for the changes here made until the districts are fixed by the Committee on Commerce.

I move the reference of the bill to the Committee on Commerce. It has been prepared at the Treasury Department, as I have stated.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. PLUMB introduced a bill (S. 1854) granting a pension to William D. Esley; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

He also introduced a bill (S. 1855) granting a pension to John F. Hickey; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. GORMAN introduced a bill (S. 1856) for the relief of Francis J. Wheeler, assignee of William Schafnagle; which was read twice by its title, and, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. INGALLS introduced a bill (S. 1857) appropriating one mounted brass field gun to the city of Wyandotte, Kans., in lieu of one taken by the United States Government in the year 1861; which was read twice by its title, and, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. BLAIR introduced a bill (S. 1858) to increase the pension of Henrietta A. Lewis, widow of Capt. Robert F. R. Lewis, United States Navy; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. HOAR introduced a bill (S. 1859) granting a pension to Clarinda S. Hillman; which was read twice by its title, and, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. MANDERSON introduced a bill (S. 1860) for the relief of Richard Phœnix; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

Mr. ALLISON introduced a bill (S. 1861) for the relief of the Atlantic Alcohol Company, of Atlantic, State of Iowa; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Finance.

He also introduced a bill (S. 1862) for the relief of the heirs of John W. West; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin, introduced a bill (S. 1863) for the relief of Robert C. Murphy; which was read twice by its title, and, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Claims.

AMENDMENT TO AN APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. VOORHEES submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to the bill (H. R. 7314) making appropriations for the naval service for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1884, and for other purposes; which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed.

CREDENTIALS.

Mr. WILLIAMS presented the credentials of JOSEPH C. S. BLACKBURN, chosen by the Legislature of Kentucky a Senator from that State for the term beginning March 4, 1885; which were read, and ordered to be filed.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. CLARK, its Clerk, announced that the House had passed the following bills; in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate:

A bill (H. R. 433) to increase the pension of Simpson Harris;

A bill (H. R. 439) granting a pension to Bridget Sherlock;

A bill (H. R. 759) granting a pension to Patrick Droney;

A bill (H. R. 3663) granting a pension to John T. Marshall;

A bill (H. R. 3681) granting a pension to William L. Sloan;

A bill (H. R. 3737) granting a pension to Ann McLaughlin;

A bill (H. R. 3838) granting a pension to Theodore C. Hawkins;

A bill (H. R. 4164) for the relief of Ellen Morgan;

A bill (H. R. 4188) granting a pension to William W. Day;

A bill (H. R. 4431) granting a pension to Leroy C. Rankin;

A bill (H. R. 825) granting a pension to William J. Barker;

A bill (H. R. 1389) for the relief of Myron E. Dunlap;

A bill (H. R. 1756) granting a pension to George Overmire;

A bill (H. R. 2136) granting an increase of pension to Merlin C. Harris;

A bill (H. R. 2252) for the relief of Christopher P. Davidson;

A bill (H. R. 2267) granting an increase of pension to Samuel C. Wright;

A bill (H. R. 3238) granting a pension to Mrs. Ellen M Flagg;

A bill (H. R. 4697) for the relief of Rudolph John Martí;

A bill (H. R. 4717) for the relief of John Swearer;

A bill (H. R. 4718) for the relief of Caroline Sheward;

A bill (H. R. 4981) granting a pension to Isabella I. Ramsdell;

A bill (H. R. 5257) repealing an act entitled "An act for the relief of William McKean;" and

A bill (H. R. 5258) granting a pension to Thomas Cheshire.

UNDISPOSED OF PENSION CLAIMS.

Mr. HOAR. I ask for the present consideration of the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Interior be directed to report to the Senate the names of all pending applications for pensions in which the original applications have been pending for more than two years, with the condition of the same, and reasons why the same have not been finally disposed of.

Mr. INGALLS. I think that had better lie over until to-morrow.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The resolution will lie over.

Mr. HAWLEY. Will the Senator who offered that resolution have it referred to the Committee on Pensions? I should like to hear their opinion on the subject.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The resolution will come up to-morrow, objection being made to its consideration to-day.

Mr. HAWLEY. I will make the suggestion to-morrow.

Mr. INGALLS. I withdraw the objection if it is desired to refer the resolution.

Mr. HOAR. It seems to me the resolution might as well be dealt with at one time as another. I suppose there is no member of the Senate, and probably but few members of the House, whose mail is not filled—I have sometimes half a dozen or a dozen a day—with applications for information in regard to the condition of old pension claims. We have relieved that somewhat; but still the applications come. A man says, "I filed my application ten years ago and I have not heard of it for three years," or "I did what I was directed by the office to do two years ago, and since then I have heard nothing;" and so on.

I know this will be a matter of some cost to the Department, but not a great deal. It seems to me that there should be made this list of pending applications, all those which are more than two years old. The statement simply "awaiting further evidence," or whatever brief statement the Commissioner will find necessary to convey to us why the matter is not disposed of, will give great relief to the Senate, great relief to the Department, and great relief to the pension applicants. If the Senator from Connecticut will see that his committee deals with it at once——

Mr. HAWLEY. I am not upon the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. HOAR. Or if any member of the Pension Committee will attend to it, I have no objection to the reference.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the resolution? The Chair hears none.

Mr. HARRIS. I should like to ask the Senator from Massachusetts if in his opinion it would not be well to refer the resolution to the Committee on Pensions in order that that committee may inquire and ascertain at least an approximate estimate of the amount of clerical labor that would be involved in answering his resolution, in order that we may determine whether or not we can better afford the inconvenience of the inquiries he suggests than to require that report to be made by the Pension Office.

Mr. HOAR. I have no objection to that fact being ascertained and inquired into if any Senator thinks best. In my judgment it is not at all necessary to do that, because every Senator must know there is some limit to the expense. But it makes no difference what the expense is; it would be cheap at $50,000, and it certainly can not cost $5,000 to have this thing done. Then all the applicants for pensions whose applications are more than two years pending will know the condition of their particular claim by sending to us and getting a copy of this document, and a Senator can at once answer by looking at the document. If it were to cost $25,000 the salutary effect and relief to the Senate and relief to the pension claimants would be very great.

There are few things in this world more tragical than the history of these pension cases. There is not any tragedy which can be put upon the stage which ought to move the feelings of a right-minded man, and especially of an American legislator, like the stories which come to us day after day and week after week and month after month and year after year, of the hope deferred, of the poverty, the sorrow, the agony of those men and the widows and orphans of the men who have given their life and health and strength and the best part of their manhood to the safety of this country.

We have done something to relieve this pressure in the Pension Office, but it still continues, and it is a reproach and disgrace to American legislation and American administration that it does continue. I impute no fault to the Commissioner of Pensions or to the Secretary of the Interior; but whether this cost $50, or $50,000, or a million dollars, it ought to be done, in my judgment. If any Senator thinks he will be prepared to vote more intelligently by knowing whether it will cost $5,000 or $7,500, I make no objection to the reference.

Mr. HARRIS. For one I would prefer the resolution going to the Committee on Pensions and being investigated by that committee, but I shall make no motion if the Senator who moves the resolution prefers that it should not be referred.

Mr. SHERMAN. I think it had better be referred.

Mr. BLAIR. What the Senator from Massachusetts says is very true that this is a subject of national disgrace and it is in fact and emphatically a system of prolonged murder inflicted by the nation by a process of slow starvation upon these people. That is very true; but the resolution which he has introduced here calling on the Pension Office for an account of the status of all the claims filed more than two years ago will I think delay the adjudication and adjustment of the pending cases. The resolution must cover at least two-thirds, probably three-fourths, of the pending cases—225,000 or 250,000 cases at least. It would I was about to say prevent the adjudication of existing cases by a delay of several months, in my belief.

I think if the Senator has observed the replies which the Pension Bureau makes to the letters of inquiry which are so touching and to which he alludes, he will have seen that very considerable time is necessarily expended in reviewing the condition of each case and writing with that precision which is necessary if any good is to be done its exact condition. It is no use for us to send out in a big book that can be published probably in the course of a year a general statement of the condition of these cases, because nothing is of any service to anybody unless it gives to each specific applicant concerned that sort of information which will enable him to remedy the deficiencies of testimony which delay his case; that is, so far as the applicant is concerned. But then there is the amount of labor that would be imposed on the office. I think it would employ their entire clerical force for three months to prepare this information if it was to amount to anything, and it could not be circulated throughout the country in less than six months or a year beyond that.

But, Mr. President, the real trouble is in our legislation and in the provision which we have made for the adjudication of pension claims. Some years ago an effort was made in the Senate to radically change the method of investigation, which becomes more and more indispensable if we are ever to perform this duty as time wears on, in the kind of evidence which we rely upon and in the methods of its collection and consideration. In the adjudication upon questions of fact as they arise there is so much that is radically wrong, so contrary to the spirit of the common law and to those great principles which are applicable everywhere to the just investigation of questions of fact, that for my own part I have no patience whatever with the system.

Those who are charged with the administration of this system are able men. The personnel of the office is of a very superior quality. It is, as I think, indefatigable in its labors. There is no more competent gentleman in the country than the one who is now at the head of this bureau. He and his assistants do the uttermost that can be done with the system which they administer and with the difficulties which they encounter and with the amount of help which is provided. In order to relieve the Senator and other Senators from these piteous appeals, in order to do half justice to those who have legal claims under the pension laws against this Government, it would be necessary with the existing system to at least treble the force, and then thousands of these people would die from the effects of pain, starvation, and disease before their cases would be adjudicated. The resolution that is before the Senate, however, would make everything worse, if we adopt it and call upon the existing Pension Office force to comply with the request or demand of the Senate.

I do not believe there is any advantage in sending it to the Pension Committee for consideration, because the difficulties are patent to one who knows anything whatever about the system. But as it is suggested, I have no objection to the reference. As a member of the committee I think we might as well act on it at the present time.

Mr. DAWES. I have no doubt we have all experienced the trouble alluded to by my colleague and are all disposed like him to do what we can to meet the demand upon us by impatient and wearied applicants for pensions; but I think the great difficulty in which these applicants find themselves arises from the existence of claim agents about the city of Washington, who have gathered the applications by the thousands into their control, thousands and thousands. There are offices in this city that employ dozens of clerks and occupy large suites of rooms. They have sent out circulars all over the country to applicants for pensions or to those who thought possibly they might have a claim for pension, and have gathered them in and got control of more than they can manage, more than they can look after, and they have disappointed the applicants by the necessity which is upon them to put them off with general statements until at last they send out printed circulars to them telling them to call upon their member of Congress and ask him to go personally to the office or make personal application in some way, and intimate to them that the member of Congress can not decline their application. Thus they roll the work which they have assumed and for which they have received the legal fee upon the member of Congress, and the member of Congress is very glad to do it, and would be very much more willing to do it if he had been permitted to do it from the beginning. But the applicant has been led along by these generalities and professions of interest in his case into complex and conflicting and embarrassing statements of his claim, until the agent here, overwhelmed with his work, finds himself arraigned in the district court or before the Secretary of the Interior for malfeasance or negligence, and his work comes upon the member of Congress.

I do not know how practicable this measure of my colleague is, but I wish we could condense if not obliterate this system of claim agencies here in the city, and let the applicants for pensions, as those who have just and proper claims to press, understand and realize that they have a right to claim that their member of Congress can attend to such matters better for them than any claim agent who advertises for their patronage.

Mr. SAULSBURY. Mr. President, I do not see that the resolution of the Senator from Massachusettes [Mr. HOAR] will accomplish any good. Suppose the status of these claims is made public on the 1st day of April. Within three months the status of a great many of these claims will have been changed. The information we get will be simply the present condition of the claims, whereas in the course of two or three months there will be an entire change in a great many of the claims.

I have not found any difficulty when I have been written to in reference to these claims. I simply refer the letter of inquiry to me to the Commissioner of Pensions, and then I receive from him invariably a full statement in reference to the condition of the claim, which is inclosed to the petitioner, and it has never been a great deal of trouble to me. I do not have to run to the Pension Office to do that. I simply refer the letter I receive. I then get a response to that, which I mail to the party, giving him full information in reference to his claim.

But if we pass this resolution and expend this $25,000 or more or less, as it may require, it will accomplish no good except for the present moment, because the clerical work of that office will change the status and condition of many of these claims within thirty days thereafter, and then you will not have to know exactly what is the condition of the claim at that subsequent date. So I do not think anything good is to be accomplished by this.

I concur with what was said by the Senator from Massachusetts who last addressed the Senate [Mr. DAWES], that much of the difficulty has originated from the claim agents and pension agents, who want to use the members of Congress to facilitate the business in their hands. I agree that if we could dispense entirely with these claim agents in reference to pensions there would be less difficulty. I want to say, however, that so far as I have had any business with the Pension Bureau under its present management or under its late management I have always found the officers courteous and obliging, and when I have made an inquiry they have as promptly as they could replied to it and given me all the information necessary, which information I have transmitted to the party interested, and he is then put in possession of the status of his case fully.

Mr. CULLOM. Mr. President, I do not know that I have any serious objection to the resolution, but I think the more important thing for Congress to give its attention to in connection with the pension business is to make an appropriation that will enable the Commissioner of Pensions to more rapidly dispose of the cases that are now appealing to him for decision. I believe it is true that he has already called upon the Congress of the United States to make an appropriation sufficient to give him one hundred and fifty additional special examiners in the field. In my opinion we can do nothing better than to make a sufficient appropriation to give the Commissioner all the force that he needs, that he can work to any advantage, so that these cases may be disposed of, not only the cases which are in the hands of the claim agents scattered about the country, but there are hundreds and thousands of persons who are appealing to members of Congress directly from their homes in the different States and are not depending upon their employed agents, because in their opinion they have done as much for them as can be done.

The important thing is that we shall make a sufficient appropriation to enable the Commissioner of Pensions to send out into the field hundreds of men capable of disposing of these cases, to take the proof and make the examination, so that they can be disposed of, and whoever is entitled to a pension may get it without further delay. It is true that there are hundreds and thousands of these people who have been appealing for years for what they believe to be their due from the Government; and yet the Department here is so overwhelmed with the work that it is necessary for it to do that the Commissioner is not able to immediately send out an agent to make the examination, so as to determine whether the claimant is entitled to a pension or not.

It seems to me that the resolution offered by the Senator from Massachusetts would involve the office in a vast amount of work, and as the Senator from Delaware has said, it would amount to very little except for a very brief period of time. These things would come back again. The claimants would again appeal, after they had seen what the condition of their cases might be, after the report was made, and substantially it would be no benefit to the members of Congress in getting rid of the work that is imposed upon them by the claimants for pension.

I insist, as a member of the Committee on Pensions, that it is the duty of Congress, without delay, to make such an appropriation as will give all the people who are entitled thereto a hearing and an examination, so that they can have their pensions allowed if they ought to be.

Mr. INGALLS. I move to refer the resolution to the Committee on Pensions.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. SHERMAN in the chair). The Senator from Kansas moves that the resolution be referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. INGALLS. I do this, Mr. President, in absolute friendliness to the object that the Senator from Massachusetts avows, and, as it is not necessary for me to say, to the pensioners whose claims are pending.

In the first place, this information, if it could be obtained, would constitute a volume so bulky and inconvenient as to be practically inaccessible. A vast amount of time would be consumed in its preparation, great expense would be required to have the volumes printed and distributed, and when they were ready for distribution they would be worthless, because the condition of these cases is changing day by day. It is probable that in some of them additional information, evidence, affidavits, reports from agents in the field, are added to the files, so that to have any value as an authentic record of the condition of the cases it must be changed from day to day, like the Calendar of business before the Senate.

In this connection I wish, as one member of this body, in behalf of Congress and in defense of the Commissioner of Pensions, to absolutely disavow and repel the allegation that in consequence of the neglect or omission or carelessness or indifference of Congress or the Commissioner large numbers of those who deserve to receive pensions are starving and going to their death without a pension. No nation on earth has ever been so extravagantly generous in every particular connected with the pension-list as the Government of the United States. No nation ever had a pension-list on which was such a number of pensioners. No government ever had a pension-list that required such a vast annual distribution. To my knowledge the Commissioner of Pensions has never made a demand upon Congress for an appropriation no matter how large, for additional help in his office no matter to what extent it might go, that Congress has not immediately and actively responded with generosity and with alacrity. If the Commissioner of Pensions in his report recommends additional help, I have not the slightest doubt that if the Committee on Appropriations would submit to-day an appropriation for that purpose it would be promptly acted upon by Congress.

It is unjust, sir, it is without foundation, to allege that in consequence of the neglect of Congress thousands of men who are entitled to pensions are starving to death because we do not make the necessary appropriation. It creates a wrong impression in the mind of the country. It creates a wrong impression in the mind of applicants. It is within the recollection of many upon this floor that within the last two years we made an annual appropriation for the payment of pensions that was forty or fifty million dollars more than could be expended under the increased force of the Commissioner of Pensions. So far as that officer is concerned I believe I am justified in saying that the current work of the office where the evidence has been furnished is practically not delayed; that there is not a case pending where the demands of the office for evidence have been complied with that can not be disposed of and either rejected or allowed within a space of one week thereafter.

The truth is that the great bulk of the original pension claims that are undetermined remain in that condition from the failure of the applicants to furnish the necessary evidence to support their claim and in consequence of the character of the evidence that is furnished through the various agencies which are soliciting pension claims for allowance here in this city and elsewhere. Such has been the extent to which this action has gone that the Commissioner of Pensions has been compelled, in sifting out and examining the evidence that has been furnished in order to ascertain whether it is entitled to confidence or not, to send out from the office a large number of men into the field to the locality or neighborhood where the pension applicant resides and where the witnesses are examined, to ascertain whether or not the facts justify and warrant the application that is on file. But in all the cases where the evidence has been furnished, where the affidavits and testimony that are required in support of the claim have been sent forward and placed on the files, there is no delay, and I trust that these allegations as to the ingratitude of this Government, as to the insufficiency of appropriations and the inefficiency of the Commissioner, will not be repeated, because they are without foundation and unjust.

Mr. BLAIR. Mr. President, the Senator's experience, obtained by way of correspondence and his observation, is very different from mine if he is not aware that thousands and thousands of applications, just applications, too, for pensions have failed to be allowed during the lifetime of the applicant. His knowledge upon this matter is different from mine if he does not understand that thousands of cases are pending now before the Pension Bureau five, ten, and even fifteen years old. It is a matter of every-day occurrence that applications for a pension, either for an invalid pension or a widow's or dependent mother's pension, simply fail to secure an allowance by reason of the death of the applicant pending the effort to furnish the evidence or to comply with the rules of the office.

I do not think that the Senator means to be understood that the evil and the suffering among the pension applicants (I mean those who have a just right to pension, to the bounty of the Government) does not exist. I sympathize fully with him in all that he says in vindication of the efficiency, the faithfulness, and zeal of the force which is employed; but I do say that upon the country (whether upon either branch of Congress particularly) does rest the onus of the principal difficulty in the case. When by law we provide these people with a legal right to the bounty, if you choose so to call it, of the Government, though I think it is but a just compensation for services rendered to the Government, we are bound to give them a practical system by the administration of which they can secure that right. We have not done that.

In the first place, alluding to the matter of the claim agents, their congregation in this city and in other large places, and their gathering to themselves to a great extent, massing in their own hands the control of these applications largely, that is primarily the fault of the Government, because we have denied to every one of these applicants the right of counsel; and how have we done that? We have said to the applicant, "You shall pay compensation," and to the counsel, "You shall receive compensation," only to a certain and a limited amount, such as will not give to any bona fide and competent assistant of these people in the locality where they live 25 or 50 cents per diem for the labor necessary to be expended as an agent of the applicant in the preparation of the case. Very many of these pension cases come to be as intricate and difficult of prosecution as ordinary lawsuits, and yet we say to them practically, "You shall have no counsel." Large numbers of them are an ignorant class of people, utterly incapable of complying with the requirements of the office which are necessary, as they deal only with written testimony, and oftentimes of a technical character, in order to secure, as far as they can, reliability in the testimony. They are utterly incapable to prepare their cases, and we say to them practically, "Unless you can get assistance in the way of charity from local attorneys you shall have none whatever." In that way we lay the foundation of the primary difficulty. I see that my time has about expired, and therefore I shall not go on to other points.

Mr. HOAR. There is not any limit of time.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair will remind the Senator from New Hampshire that he is not limited in time by rule.

Mr. BLAIR. I supposed that the five-minute rule was applicable.

In depriving these people of their constitutional right to counsel, which I say we do practically when we say that they shall not compensate their counsel properly, we lay the foundation for the first great serious difficulty, and we pave the way for the putting of these claims in the hands of irresponsible agents, as they are practically in the great cities. There is the real evil. They publish these circulars. These people get no help at home because they can not pay competent attorneys, and they become at once the victims of the firms who perpetrate their frauds at large upon this immense and poor clientage.

But to leave that point, and it is capable of very full elaboration and elucidation and it is one of the primary difficulties I think of the whole case, the system itself is very faulty. By reason of the lapse of time, and for many other reasons that might be enumerated, it is exceedingly difficult for the applicant to comply with the requirements of the office in obtaining proof for the establishment of his claim.

Then, again, the tribunal which has to pass upon the questions of fact is located in this city. Almost every one of these cases is of double the importance of the average litigation of the country. For the litigation of the country we have thought it essential to provide some home tribunal, some tribunal before which the parties themselves can appear, and the witnesses can appear and can be subjected to the test of cross-examination and the ordinary methods of ascertaining the truth of allegations of fact. We have made no such provision as that in this case, and the result is that occasionally a fraud is perpetrated upon the Government. When that fraud is perpetrated, by reason of the minute machinery that is employed it is almost absolutely sure of detection and it is published, heralded all over the country as a most extraordinary thing that in the prosecution of a pension case there should have been some fraud and some wrong, and the imputation is cast upon the whole body. Thus there grows up a strong popular suspicion of this class of applicants for justice from the Government. It is an entirely unwarranted suspicion, in my belief. The Commissioner of Pensions, I think, told me that at least four-fifths, two-thirds certainly, of the applications after the most accurate and thorough examination are allowed. It is not a fact that plaintiffs recover two-thirds of their cases in our ordinary courts, and there is more reason to charge upon the common litigants of the country fraud in the setting up of their claims than there is to make a similar charge upon the applicants for pensions.

There is an absolute and almost impassable inherent difficulty in ascertaining the truth when the tribunal relies simply upon written evidence coming from all parts of the country, unable to see the applicant, unable to judge as between conflicting testimony or affidavits. Hence it comes to pass that the office itself considers the evidence filed before it with a sharpness and circumspection which often leads to the perpetration of injustice on the part of the Government. I solemnly believe that the Government to-day perpetrates upon applicants for pensions vastly more wrong by the rejection of claims which are in themselves just than do the applicants for pensions inflict upon the country in the establishment of claims which are unjust, and that out of no fault on the part of the tribunal. Oftentimes the worst case is the best prepared; the most formal affidavit is often the most false; and the ignorant applicant, unable to obtain counsel at home, sends in the best case supported by the most informal, and therefore the most likely to be rejected, evidence. Oftentimes the evidence comes in the form of a letter which the applicant supposes is sufficient. The office rejects it. In the press of business it is impossible for the applicant to find out sometimes, I had almost said for years, what the difficulty is with the case, and when the applicant gets a letter it simply specifies, and the office does all that it can, a series of almost insurmountable propositions, insurmountable to him, because he is more helpless in view of the necessary work and preparation of his case than is a common client in a court of law.

We shall never reach justice in these matters unless we provide a local tribunal to pass upon the questions of fact, some tribunal like an auditor, like a judge of probate, possibly a jury; certainly some tribunal should be established such as I first indicated, that can go from town to town and from place to place, and can learn from personal contact with witnesses, with the applicants, with the substantial citizens who know the reputation that has surrounded the applicants themselves from the time they rendered service down to the present time, and in those ways that a man of common sense takes to find out the truth when he goes into a community for any purpose whatever. We shall never do justice until we provide some such method of investigation as that. It is entirely practicable and feasible to do so. The main questions of fact are to be settled where the applicant himself lives. There are certain examinations of record which are made here at Washington, and an applicant should be dealt with, in my belief, in this way: The matters of record are in the possession of the Commissioner, and he should examine the case and should specify the propositions of fact which must be established by ordinary evidence. Those should be sent to the local tribunal, to the agent of the Department, if it be an agent (we have a few of those, and they are doing excellent work, and they are carrying out this idea to a certain extent), or it should be sent to the local court or whatever local tribunal is provided, and they should investigate and report upon those questions of fact, and their finding should in ordinary cases be final; at all events, the appeal should be made to some tribunal which will review with that effort and with that capacity to attain justice which appertain to ordinary boards or courts of review provided in other cases. Whenever the facts thus found are brought to the home office the Commissioner has his whole case. He has the matters of record already in his possession, with the finding of the local tribunal upon the propositions of fact necessary to be established; he has the whole case, and he would be likely to decide it right.

We have as yet done nothing of this kind. As to the machinery that we have provided the Senator from Kansas is entirely in fault when he says we have provided a sufficiency of it. If we have done so, what is the reason these cases have not already been decided? The truth is that if these cases are to be decided within a reasonable time there should be a threefold increase of the existing force. Even then the system would be faulty, and the wrong and the suffering would continue. I am not inclined to acquiesce, however pleasant it might be, in the assertion that there is no fault on the part of the Government in this matter.

Mr. HOAR. Mr. President, I did not introduce this resolution for the sake of relieving Senators or relieving myself from any labor. I feel as every other member of the body no doubt does feel, that we can never be more usefully or more pleasantly employed than in accomplishing something for the benefit of a soldier or his widow or orphan. It is not to relieve the members of this body from any labor, and certainly I do not impute to the Government or any branch of it any indifference to the just claims of the pensioners. It is true that the American people have been generous in dealing with their soldiers beyond any other historic example. It was said by a great Frenchman that when France had done with her soldier she left him to perish like a weed by the wall, and that no improvement had been made in the method of dealing with the soldier in the French service for more than a hundred years. That was said about five years ago.

What the nation has done the States have supplemented. My own State has expended a sum nearly equal to $19,000,000 in supplementing by State aid the pension system of the United States. Her whole present State debt and more is represented by what she has paid out in aid to her own soldiers in the war.

But still the fact remains that, twenty-one years and more on an average having elapsed since these pensions were due under the promise of the Government, when I ask that the Senate may be informed as to the reason for not disposing of the pension cases now two years old, the answer is made to me by the most experienced member of the Pension Committee that it will take the entire force of that office more than three months and cost nearly a quarter of a million dollars to do it. The Senator from Kansas may talk as he pleases about this matter; it is not a question of elegant phraseology; it is not a question of sentiment; it is a question of hard fact which these pension claimants and their widows and orphans feel, that when we ask to have the information furnished twenty-one years after the promises were made, twenty-one years on an average after the military service has been performed and the military disability encountered, and when we ask why it is that claims more than two years old are not disposed of, we are answered that there are more than 200,000 of them, and that it will take the Pension Office more than three months to make up a list of them and give the reason why they are not disposed of.

I know that the present Commissioner of Pensions is a humane and most intelligent man, and I have no doubt a most efficient and admirable officer. I have heard nothing to the contrary. The fault is not with him, but the fault is somewhere unless the statement made by the Senator from New Hampshire be totally wild and untrue; and it is a statement which is supported by my own experience.

The Senator from Delaware, with a State not equal in population to a single Congressional district elsewhere, may find that there is no considerable difficulty with his State, near as it is to the seat of Government, but it is not true of Massachusetts and it is not true of other States. There are cases, a vast number of them, where the petitioner has done all that he can on the best information that he can get to comply with the requisitions of the Pension Office, and where his application has been pending for years without his hearing from it. I get frequent letters, and I presume I should not exaggerate if I asserted that the Senator from Illinois, with his relation to the soldiery of this country, must get them sometimes by the dozen in one mail.

Mr. LOGAN. By the hundred, you mean.

Mr. HOAR. The Senator corrects me and says by the hundred I mean. There is a fault somewhere, and if the ascertaining what the fact is and the reason for the fact is not the first step in the legislation of this country in correcting the fault, I wish somebody would tell me what is the first step. I think that such a list would be of large service to the applicants for pensions and would be of great service to the Pension Office itself in turning the attention of Congress to the evil and the remedy, and would lead to the proper appropriation. If the multiplying the force in the Pension Office by three or by ten is the proper remedy, let us apply that. Let us at least know what the fact is and what the reason for it is.

Now, I consent, as far as my consent will go, that the matter be referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. MITCHELL. Mr. President, I have no purpose of detaining the Senate, but I desire to present a few figures which the Senate will find in the last annual report of the Commissioner on Pensions that are to my mind satisfactory on this question. The reason given by the Commissioner and set forth upon pages 9 and 10, in connection with a table given in the latter part of his report, satisfies me that there is no blame to be cast upon the Commissioner of Pensions.

Mr. HOAR. Nobody casts it.

Mr. MITCHELL. I did not state that any one had cast any blame upon the Commissioner, but I was about to follow that by showing that the blame properly rests upon the claimants themselves, according to the statistics in this report. The Commissioner went over this matter very carefully by an actual examination of all the claims on file in his office, and it must be borne in mind that the number is very large. Since 1861, 886,137 claims for pensions have been filed, and 510,938 had been allowed at the time this report was presented. Therefore there were pending at the time this report was prepared, according to the statement which is made upon page 10 of the report, 244,505 cases undisposed of. If Senators will examine it they will find that of this number, according to the report and a careful examination under the direction of the Commissioner, the blame rests upon the claimants in 204,299 cases; the delay results from the want of proper reply in the Adjutant-General's office in 9,935 cases; from delay in the Surgeon-General's office in 2,902 cases; from the delay of affiants to answer office letters in 3,846 cases; and delay to be attributed to the office itself in 23,523 cases. Then the Commissioner goes on to explain why the delay in these 23,523 cases has occurred, and it appears that 14,391 of those cases have been referred to special examiners, who have gone into the neighborhood where the claimants reside, under the act of Congress, to make examination. It also appears that other cases are delayed for want of answer to letters sent to postmasters and others in order to get information from the localities where the claimants reside. This is thought to be necessary in order to a proper determination of the cases; and the Commissioner says at the conclusion of the subject in this report:

This showing demonstrates that the Pension Office is practically up with current work, and that further delay in the settlement of pension claims will be properly chargeable to the laches of the claimants in producing the necessary evidence called for, but not yet filed, or to the inability to produce said evidence, and not to the Pension Office.

Mr. President, I think it would be very unwise in us to pass this resolution for other reasons than appear in this report of the Commissioner. When Congress authorized the publication of the list of pensioners a year or so ago and the list was published, the pension attorneys, as they are sometimes called, took it upon themselves to write to the claimants for pensions all over the country and to soldiers very generally, saying to them that they were entitled to pensions, or, if they were drawing pensions, that they were entitled to an increase of pension, and if they would forward a dollar or two they would secure an allowance for them in this behalf. The Commissioner informs me that immediately after that list was published these letters were sent out by the thousands and hundreds of thousands. I talked to a printer in this city and he stated to me that he printed, I think, over 100,000 of these circulars for one firm in this city. The Commissioner said that the applications for increase multiplied so rapidly that they came in for several months at the rate of 5,000 a month after the publication of that list.

I have no doubt that these pension sharks, as they ought to be called, instead of pension attorneys, for they are causing the great difficulty to this Government and the claimants for pensions, are responsible for this condition of affairs more largely than anybody else by imposing upon the Department in this and in other respects. If we pass this resolution and delay the work of the Pension Office in order to make out this report they will have another good opportunity to present such false claims, to the misleading of honest claimants for pensions.

I trust the resolution will not be passed, and that if the Senate is disposed to consider it further it will be referred to a committee, who shall inquire of the Commissioner of Pensions on the subject and get his views. I know that all Senators desire expedition in this work, as I certainly do, and I believe that the operation of this resolution would be to retard the work very greatly, and that the result of it would be to ascertain what the Commissioner of Pensions has set forth sufficiently to satisfy me fully that the delay now is chargeable not to the Pension Office, not to the law for the settlement of pension cases, but to the claimants themselves in being slow in presenting the evidence required in their cases.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the motion to refer the resolution to the Committee on Pensions.

The motion was agreed to.

POSSESSION OF PUBLIC LANDS BY FOREIGNERS.

Mr. VAN WYCK submitted the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Committee on Public Lands be directed to inquire in what manner large quantities of public lands become transferred to, or possessed by, foreign corporations or syndicates, and what, if any, legislation is advisable to prevent such transfers or possession.

PRINTING FOR COMMITTEE ON APPROPRIATIOMS.

Mr. ALLISON. I ask that the following order be made:

Ordered, that the Committee on Appropriations have authority to print for the use of said committee such papers and documents relating to the several appropriation bills as may be necessary for the proper consideration of said bills.

It is important that it should be done now in connection with the naval appropriation bill, which we are now considering.

The order was agreed to.

COURT OF ALABAMA CLAIMS.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. If there be no further resolutions the Calendar, under the eighth rule, is now in order. The first bill in order will be stated.

The bill (S. 573) amending an act re-establishing the Court of Commissioners of Alabama Claims, and for the distribution of the unappropriated moneys of the Geneva award, approved June 5, 1882, was announced as first in order.

Mr. INGALLS. There is an adverse report in that case. I suggest that the bill go over.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Objection being made, the bill will be passed over.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (S. 247) to extend the duration of the Court of Commissioners of Alabama Claims, and for other purposes.

Mr. GARLAND. Although the Senator who reported the bill [Mr. LOGAN] is not in his seat I think we can dispose of it in a short time.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendments reported from the Committee on the Judiciary will be read.

The first amendment reported by the Committee on the Judiciary was, in section 1, line 10, to strike out "eighty-five" and insert "eighty-four;" so as to read:

That the existence of the Court of Commissioners of Alabama Claims, re-established by the act entitled "An act re-establishing the Court of Commissioners of Alabama Claims, and for the distribution of the unappropriated moneys of the Geneva award," approved June 5, 1882, be, and the same is hereby, continued and extended to the 31st day of December, in the year 1884, with the same effect, and no other, as if said last-named day had been named in the said act for the termination of the powers of said court; and said act is hereby continued in force during the period of extension hereby authorized.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, after the word "authorized," in line 14 of section 1, to strike out the following words:

And should it be found impracticable to complete the work of said court before the day last named, the President, in his discretion, may extend, by proclamation, the time of the duration thereof to any period not exceeding one year beyond the extension hereinbefore authorized; and in such case all the provisions of the acts of Congress applicable to said court shall be taken and held of like force and effect as though the continuance of said court had been originally fixed by this act at the limit to which it may be then extended.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in section 3, after the word "award," in line 10, to strike out "and interest;" so as to read:

And as soon as the said court shall be satisfied that the aggregate of all the judgments of the first class, with interest added at 4 per cent. from the time the loss occurred to the 31st of March, 1877, will not exceed the unappropriated amount of the Geneva award remaining in the Treasury after the deduction of all lawful expenses, the said court shall report a list of the several judgments of the first class then rendered, to the Secretary of State, who shall thereupon transmit the same, or a copy thereof, to the Secretary of the Treasury.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in section 3, line 16, after the word "shall," to insert "out of the unexpended balance of said award;" so as to read:

And the Secretary of the Treasury shall, out of the unexpended balance of said award, without unnecessary delay, proceed to pay the said judgments of the first class so reported and transmitted, with interest as aforesaid, upon such notice and in such manner as he shall prescribe.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in section 3, line 29, after the word "Treasury," to insert "received from said award;" so as to read:

And so much money as may be necessary to pay said judgments of the first class, with interest thereon as aforesaid, is hereby appropriated out of any moneys in the Treasury received from said award not otherwise appropriated.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. COCKRELL. I should like to hear a little statement of the object of the bill.

Mr. GARLAND. Under the last bill that was passed in reference to the Court of Commissioners of Alabama Claims that court will soon expire by limitation, and a great many cases have not been acted upon at all. Further time is deemed by the judges necessary to accomplish the business, and this bill simply extends it until next December—December, 1884. We amend the law by extending it now to the end of the current year. Congress will be in session then and will be the best judge of whether it is necessary to extend it further. It is absolutely necessary to pass something of this sort so as to finish the pending business that is unsettled.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

The bill (S. 140) to establish a bureau of statistics of labor was announced as next in order.

Mr. INGALLS. Before we proceed with that I would suggest whether Order of Business 139 might not be disposed of by indefinite postponement.

Mr. GARLAND. I suppose so.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair calls the attention of the Senator from New York [Mr. LAPHAM] to Order of Business 139, being Senate bill 573.

Mr. COCKRELL. The Senator from Arkansas [Mr. GARLAND] introduced the bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from New York was understood to have expressed a desire that no action should be taken on it until his attention was called to it. If no motion is made it will retain its place on the Calendar.

Mr. INGALLS. Unless some Senator desires it to be retained, I would move its indefinite postponement, so as to clear the Calendar.

Mr. LAPHAM. I hope not.

Mr. INGALLS. Very well.

Mr. LAPHAM. It is a bill that can not be discussed under the five-minute rule.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair would call the attention of the Senator to the fact that Order of Business 140, being Senate bill 247, has just been passed by the Senate. Does the Senator desire to have the preceding bill remain on the Calendar?

Mr. LAPHAM. Yes, sir.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The hour of 2 o'clock having arrived, it closes this order of business, and the Chair, under the new rule, submits to the Senate bills from the House of Representatives.

HOUSE BILLS REFERRED.

The bill (H. R. 1389) for the relief of Myron E. Dunlap was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

The following bills were severely read twice by their titles, and referred to the Committee on Pensions:

A bill (H. R. 3238) granting a pension to Mrs. Ellen M. Flagg;

A bill (H. R. 3838) granting a pension to Theodore C. Hawkins;

A bill (H. R. 4717) for the relief of John Swearer;

A bill (H. R. 4188) granting a pension to William W. Day;

A bill (H. R. 433) to increase the pension of Simpson Harris;

A bill (H. R. 4718) for the relief of Caroline Skeward;

A bill (H. R. 3663) granting a pension to John T. Marshall;

A bill (H. R. 4981) granting a pension to Isabella I. Ramsdell;

A bill (H. R. 4431) granting a pension to Leroy C. Rankin;

A bill (H. R. 439) granting a pension to Bridget Sherlock;

A bill (H. R. 5257) repealing an act entitled "An act for the relief of William McKean;"

A bill (H. R. 3737) granting a pension to Ann McLaughlin;

A bill (H. R. 825) granting a pension to William J. Barker;

A bill (H. R. 5258) granting a pension to Thomas Cheshire;

A bill (H. R. 3681) granting a pension to William L. Sloan;

A bill (H. R. 2252) for the relief of Christopher P. Davidson;

A bill (H. R. 1756) granting a pension to George Overmire;

A bill (H. R. 4697) for the relief of Rudolph John Marti;

A bill (H. R. 2267) granting an increase of pension to Samuel C. Wright;

A bill (H. R. 759) granting a pension to Patrick Droney;

A bill (H. R. 2136) granting an increase of pension to Merlin C. Harris; and

A bill (H. R. 4164) for the relief of Ellen Horgan.

CATTLE DISEASE.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair will now lay before the Senate the unfinished business, being the joint resolution (S. R. 75) making an appropriation to eradicate the foot-and-mouth disease.

Mr. BLAIR. The President will perhaps remember that the bill (S. 398) to aid in the establishment and temporary support of common schools, the first of the special orders, was placed before the Senate on Friday, and laid aside informally in order that this resolution No. 75 might be considered. I ask unanimous consent that the special order be now laid before the Senate and then laid aside informally as before, in order that the Senator from Kansas may proceed with his resolution.

Mr. PLUMB. I do not think there is any necessity of going through any process of that kind. This resolution is entitled to come up as the unfinished business, and it is a matter of immediate importance. I do not mean to depreciate the value of the measure proposed by the Senator from New Hampshire.

Mr. BLAIR. The Senator does not understand me.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from New Hampshire yield to the Senator from Kansas? The Chair assumed that he did so.

Mr. BLAIR. I wish to correct the misapprehension that the Senator is evidently laboring under. I merely wish that the special order retain its position, and that it be laid aside informally as before, in order that the discussion may go on upon the Senator's resolution, as I understand he desires. I merely wish to save my rights, that the bill may be in order as soon as the resolution is disposed of. That is all.

Mr. PLUMB. The understanding was, if I remember, that the bill which the Senator from New Hampshire has an interest in should be laid aside to come up when this resolution was disposed of. I do not understand that any further order is necessary; but I do not care what is done about it so that the present order is not displaced either now or at any other time until it shall have been completed.

Mr. BLAIR. I have not the slightest idea of that.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair understands that when the unfinished business is disposed of, the first special order will be laid before the Senate, being the bill to which the Senator from New Hampshire has referred.

Mr. BLAIR. Does the Chair understand it is in precisely the same situation as though laid before the Senate at this time and then informally laid aside in order that this resolution may be disposed of?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. In precisely the same situation. The President pro tempore informed the Chair that that was the order of business, and he is now acting on that information. Senate joint resolution No. 75 is now before the Senate as in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. BAYARD. I ask whether there is an amendment pending to that resolution?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. There is a motion pending to indefinitely postpone it and another motion to postpone it for a week.

Mr. BAYARD. I thought the motion for indefinite postponement had been withdrawn.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair did not so understand.

Mr. BAYARD. The Senator from Tennessee [Mr. HARRIS] was about withdrawing it, I am sure.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Tennessee intimated that he would withdraw it, but he did not actually withdraw it, as the Chair understands.

Mr. INGALLS. The RECORD of Saturday, at the foot of page 2023, shows the condition of that motion:

> The PRESIDENT pro tempore. No amendment is at present in order, as the motion pending is to postpone the bill indefinitely.
> Mr. HARRIS. I will withdraw the motion to indefinitely postpone if the Senator from Delaware desires.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerks inform the Chair that the motion was not withdrawn according to the Journal as it stands. There was merely a proposition to withdraw. The Journal shows that the motion to postpone indefinitely is still pending. The question is on that motion.

Mr. BAYARD. Is a motion to indefinitely postpone debatable?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It is.

Mr. BAYARD. Mr. President, there is a more extended measure than this resolution immediately to follow, I think what is called the pleuro-pneumonia bill, and as I hold that the resolution now before the Senate is open to very much the same character of objection that the general bill placing the cure or the eradication of these formidable diseases in charge of the Commissioner of Agriculture, it is a matter of indifference to me whether my objections are expressed upon one measure or the other. I would not care to repeat them upon both; but I suppose that, the motion to indefinitely postpone being debatable, I may as well say what I have to say on the subject on that motion.

The magnitude of the interest involved in this question must grow upon the mind of any one who duly considers it. The sketch given by the Senator from Texas [Mr. COKE] the other day as to the spread of this disease, its communication by cattle not apparently themselves infected by it, that by a kind of physical paradox they are the agents to communicate a disorder which they do not themselves possess, and yet the fact remains, I believe, true that animals not subject to pleuro-pneumonia or Texas fever can communicate it to those who are sound, and create great disaster without being victims to the disease themselves.

Mr. President, I believe this is the first time in the history of the legislative precedents of this country that the assumption of such powers over the internal condition of a State has been proposed to be committed to the agencies of the General Government. Any definition of the police powers of a State will be found to include the care of the health of its inhabitants, the prevention of the spread of disease, as any other, or more than any other, one head of jurisdiction known in the constitution of what are known and recognized as the police power of the States. There is not a decision of any court known to me, either State or Federal, that does not commit the quarantine power, whether it be over animals or over persons, to the discretion and control of the State that supposes itself to be in danger. There is no power imaginable calling for more diligent, careful, and summary execution than the power controlling health regulations, and the definition and limitation of those powers is as difficult as any imaginable. How you shall deal with disease, what you shall do to arrest or eradicate it, is a question that experience day by day must dictate; and one thing is certain, it must be dealt with in a most unquestionable, summary, and oftentimes arbitrary manner in order to be efficient.

It will be seen, therefore, that in considering this power we are approaching one of great difficulty, and what strikes me on the face of this resolution is the utter inadequacy of the appropriation proposed to the object in view.

I have read with a great deal of interest and apprehension the accounts from the cattle-raising districts in the West and of the alarm they have excited, and justly, among all persons owning such property there and all persons owning property of a similar character everywhere in the country, for the contagion may spread and be equally fatal in one district or in all. But to talk of the sum of $25,000 in connection with the eradication of an epidemic disease or a disease of the dangerous character and the contagious nature, affecting the thousands and tens of thousands of heads of these animals, the millions and the tens of millions of dollars invested in their ownership—the mere suggestion of the vastness of the interests involved and to be considered and the petty nature of the appropriation proposed will show that even if Congress is authorized in making it such an appropriation is not worthy of being made at all! It is a mere drop in the bucket in proportion to the necessary expenses and the still more enormous responsibilities.

But the truth is, sir, that so far from having $25,000 appropriated Congress may as well now recognize that upon the most reasonable calculation the $25,000 that may be spent in the "eradication," as it is called, will be followed by an appropriation of $2,500,000 to pay for the results of the eradication. Why, sir, a more dangerous opening for governmental liability was never, in my mind, made before Congress. This resolution, relating to a subject so vast and important as this, proposes nothing but the discretion of a single officer, a most respectable gentleman, the Commissioner of Agriculture, and a very competent man I doubt not to deal with the subject—gives to him alone the authority to cause to be killed (for that is the meaning of it), to be "eradicated" by slaughter, such cattle as are affected by these diseases or as he may suspect or think liable to be affected by these diseases, as may be necessary to prevent the spread of the disease. Such a range of jurisdiction, such a scope of responsibility is scarcely calculable, and I think the Senate will pause long before they enter upon such a field of pecuniary responsibility, not to say of the dangerous assumption of the powers of local self-government heretofore vested solely in the States and never vested in the Government of the United States which this measure involves.

Why, sir, to meet this case official machinery ought to be provided, as any man will see, whether it is to be State or Federal machinery. First, medical and scientific experts must be chosen competent and fit to ascertain the cause of disease and instructed in its pathology. Then you must have a corps of traveling and informing agents who shall by inquiry and observation tell you where and in what quarter disease is to be found, and thus information having been brought to the knowledge of the medical experts, they shall after due examination order the destruction of the infected cattle. One thing must precede this authorized slaughter of the animals. There must be a board of appraisal, a board of assessment, who shall take in invitum the private property of the citizen and condemn it for public use; and how must that be done under our law? Only upon rendering just compensation to the private owner for the value of the property of which he is thus deprived for public use.

So that you here have now proposed a crude and entirely new scheme, a new field of governmental operation requiring a vast and unascertained expenditure, the assumption of most indefinite and peculiar powers of government, and dealing summarily with a matter that is after all a mere experiment as to its success. Upon that ground alone I should say this money was thrown away to start with $25,000 in this way without having something like proportion of means to the end. This resolution provides nothing of that sort. I have prepared an amendment which I will send to the desk showing how far I would be willing to go, how far I think wisely and practically the Senate can go in this direction, and I shall presently show how far I think Congress has the constitutional power to go in the direction of assuming care over the flocks and herds of the people of the different States of this Union.

I propose to strike out, on lines 6 and 7, the words:

And in co-operation with the proper authorities of the State of Kansas in eradicating.

And to insert:

To obtain and disseminate information in relation to the treatment, cure, and prevention of.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin, in the chair). The amendment is not now in order, but can be read for information.

Mr. BAYARD. I will therefore simply say that I shall propose this when it is in order.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The proposed amendment will be read for information.

Mr. BUTLER. May I inquire of the Senator from Delaware whether his amendment confines the inquiry to the State of Kansas alone?

Mr. BAYARD. No; I strike out the name of the State of Kansas. The words I strike out are: "And in co-operation with the proper authorities of the State of Kansas in eradicating," so that my amendment if adopted will let the resolution read thus:

That the sum of $25,000, or so much thereof as is necessary, be, and hereby is, appropriated, to be used under the direction of the Commissioner of Agriculture, to obtain and disseminate information in relation to the treatment, cure, and prevention of a contagious disease popularly known as the foot-and-mouth disease.

There will be also a slight verbal amendment there to make my amendment applicable to cattle anywhere in the United States, because we are not legislating for the benefit of the State of Kansas alone, but to assist in the procurement and dissemination of information that shall enable the people of the United States everywhere to prevent the spread of these various diseases, whatever they may be, which are dangerous not only to animals but so largely to the health of the inhabitants who use them as food.

Now, Mr. President, I have said all I care to say in regard to the incompleteness of this measure to reach the end designed. It will be a waste of money as I think, to spend so much as $25,000, but if you mean to make it efficient and have the power to make it efficient, it must take a far wider range and be presented in a much more specific and determinate manner. But there is something much beyond that. This assumption of power by the Government of the United States of what may be called the quarantine laws, the laws of the protection of the health of the various communities embraced within the Union is now being claimed for the first time. I have here a decision of the Supreme Court made some four or five years ago reiterating something like a definition of the police powers and to what they refer. That these powers were always held subject to State control is a historic and constitutional fact. There is no exception to that. That has been the line of decision and the accepted opinion of all legislatures and courts:

Whatever differences of opinion may exist as to the extent and boundaries of the police power, and however difficult it may be to render a satisfactory definition of it, there seems to be no doubt that it does extend to the protection of the lives, health, and property of the citizens, and to the preservation of good order and the public morals. The Legislature can not, by any contract, divest itself of the power to provide for these objects. They belong emphatically to that class of objects which demand the application of the maxim salus populi suprema lex, and they are to be attained and provided for by such appropriate means as the legislative discretion may devise. That discretion can no more be bargained away than the power itself. (Boyd vs. Alabama, United States—7 Otto, 33.)

And that legislative power and legislative discretion is the legislative discretion and power of the several States of this Union. It is essential for them, or else local self-government must wither and die, and without local self-government I take it there can be no such government in this country as is worthy the name of a free and constitutional government. I know the Senator from Kansas [Mr. INGALLS] said on Friday that——

The doctrine of State rights and State sovereignty dies hard, but I think it is moribund and in the course of time will eventually be buried. If any Senator upon the opposite side of the Chamber can tell me what power a majority of Congress can not exercise under the Constitution according to the recent decision of the Supreme Court in the legal-tender case, I shall be very much instructed.

I do not hold that it is the part of Senators on this side of the Chamber or the other to answer political conundrums, but rather to meet with constitutional reasons and objections assumptions of power which they believe to be dangerous and fatal to the principles of our Government. If the doctrine announced by the Supreme Court goes to the extent that the Senator from Kansas has indicated, the promulgation of their opinion to that effect can not be limited to the mere decision of a single case, but it would be in effect a proclamation of revolution that completely overturns and ends the Government of the United States as it was originally designed by the written charter of its powers, as it has up to this time been judicially and legislatively defined, and as it has been interpreted and construed by every one known to me who has undertaken to write or speak or vote in relation to its nature, constitution, and powers.

Sir, I am not prepared to accept so fatal and disastrous a definition of a decision of so respected a tribunal. It is perfectly plain that according to every theory of the construction of plain words, read in the light of their historical use, either on the theory of liberal construction or of strict construction, under the definition of either or of those holding either view there was always the fundamental acceptation that the residuum of powers not delegated by the Constitution was reserved to and belonged not to the Government of the United States but to the States respectively or to the people of the States; and that in seeking authority to enact Federal legislation it was incumbent to show affirmatively that the power either was granted expressly or was included by necessary implication from an express grant, and that if it was not so to be discovered it was forbidden to be exercised and it was usurpation to attempt to exercise it.

And, sir, when that fundamental rule shall be departed from, when that rule shall be abandoned, then the true and only government of this country has been forsaken, has been abandoned by those who owe it at all times their allegiance, their obedience, and their steady support. If this nation is to be, as I pray God it may be, an indestructible union of indestructible States, then the plain and manifest principle must be applied and the test put to every law proposed to Congress. All just power is delegated and granted expressly or by necessary implication; for if it be not, it is reserved to the States respectively or to the people, and Congress can not lawfully assume it. This was the difference between the Government founded by our ancestors, and under which it has been our good fortune to be born and live, and other governments. Most of them claim to exercise all powers not withheld or reserved from them, but the United States Government, on the contrary, is founded upon a different principle. It can exercise no power not conferred by the Constitution expressly or by necessary implication.

Mr. President, it seems a strange thing, and it certainly is a sad thing, that at this day, at this point of our history, the assertion or the reassertion of such manifest truths and such essential and admitted principles should be made necessary in the American Congress; and while I make them, it is from a sense of simple and ever-abiding duty, but not without a feeling almost akin to despair.

Other interpretations have been heard in this debate of a most latitudinarian description guided by an illusory benevolence to be exercised in behalf of "the general welfare," as it is termed. I never knew that there was even a school of constitutional constructionists who claimed that in the mere preamble of the Constitution and a recital accompanying one of the grants of enumerated powers delegated to the Congress of the words "the general welfare" there was contained a grant of substantive or distinct power. According to the reasoning we have heard lately, the fact that these two words are found in the preamble to the Constitution and afterward found accompanying the grant of the power to lay taxes and collect them, the mere presence of those words in the text being established, the rest of the Constitution with all its provisions and inhibitions was mere mocking superfluity, having no power to restrain the unlimited grant that is supposed to be contained within the phrase "provide for the common defense and general welfare."

But, sir, I aver that it is and has been almost the only opinion of men who have dealt with the construction of the powers of this Government that these words as found not only in the preamble of the Constitution but in the eighth section of the first article were and are a mere statement of the object for which Congress shall have power to lay and collect taxes, duties, imposts, and excises.

It was a mere statement of the object for which taxes were to be laid. To pay the debts, to provide for the common defense and general welfare of the United States; it was for that purpose that these powers were given and the object is stated, but it is not the grant of a distinct and substantive power, and to admit that it was would at once loosen and remove every limitation upon power of which the Constitution is so full, and which were intended to preserve in this country the great and essential school of liberty and of American citizenship, local self-government by the people and the control of their home affairs.

Why, Mr. President, the quarantine power affecting the health of the citizen, no matter from what cause and in what way health may be endangered, whether it was from the immigration of human beings contaminated by disease or of cattle or of clothing or of any article calculated to spread pestilence, the power to quarantine was always left to the State. And when it was provided that no State should lay any imposts or duties upon imports or exports it was also expressly provided that its inspection laws should be executed, and that that power should remain to the States. What is the definition of "inspection" as commonly applied to articles of merchandise? Applicable, reasonably so, to the importation of cattle or merchandise, alive or dead. So that when it is sought to empower the Federal Government to deal with this class of internal powers of the States, you can discover in the Constitution no power express or implied that they should exercise it, but you do find by this exception in the inhibition to the States of the power to lay duties on imports and exports express power to pass inspection laws; therefore by express grant of power to the State governments, as well as by the reservation to the States, you find at once a want of authority in the Federal Government to enter on the subject of power indicated by this resolution, and also manifest indication that it belongs to the States respectively.

Mr. President, I think I have said enough to indicate the general views I held which would restrain me from voting for this measure, beneficent as is its design. I am heartily anxious to assist so far as in my power not only the people of Kansas but the people of any other State in that kind of aid and protection to their interests which it is within the power of the Federal Government to bestow; but I am certain that not only does this resolution fail to provide practical machinery for the purpose, even conceding the right to pay its cost from the Federal Treasury and to assume control of it, that there is nothing in this resolution at all in proportion with the importance of the trouble we are considering, and as I said before not $25,000 but a fund probably amounting to two and half million would be a moderate and reasonable estimate to begin upon.

But suppose the Federal Government had the power and coupled with the power the duty to arrest this disease where it could, either by skillful prophylactics or by absolute destruction and eradication by killing all the animals supposed to be infected or in danger of being infected, I would still prefer greatly that the local machinery, that the State governments should have the power to put the remedy in force. I have never yet known a question of the execution of the public power that was not more efficiently and more economically performed by the State than by the Government of the United States. I do not care to what question the test may be applied, whether it be public education or public benefit in any form that may be devised. There are some things of course in which not only is the power of the General Government paramount, but it is exclusive, and must be so, simply because there is no function and no machinery in our system for a local government to extend its operations over the entire Union; but I mean to say that practically, wherever you can commit the execution of a power involving judgment and economy to the machinery of State law and State control, you secure its performance more efficiently and at a much less rate of expense to the people than you do where you confide it to Federal power.

There is not a branch of public expenditure in which I can not demonstrate that fact to be true, whether it be the judiciary of the country, the Legislature of the country, the performance of any of the public duties consigned either to State or Federal power. A comparison of the figures and of the outlay of the taxation required to support it—the whole taxation of all the States—would be found to amount to about one-eighth of the taxation by the Government of the United States and that without considering the more important question of incidental taxation which arises under the form in which taxes are now collected by the laws of the United States.

Why, Mr. President, consider for a moment the practical operations of this law. If the Government of the United States shall authorize the eradication of this disease by the slaughter of herds, any animal either suffering from the disease, or which the Commissioner or his agents may think likely to suffer from the disease, is under this law subject to his control. All through the Eastern States—for the law would be applicable to them as well as to the Western States—countless herds of what are known as fancy cattle exist, Jerseys, Alderneys, Herefords, and shorthorns all held at the most fabulous and in my judgment imaginary prices by their owners. Look at the report of auction sales; thousands of dollars paid for a single cow, I believe one as high as $47,000 in the State of New York.

Mr. MAXEY. Eight thousand dollars paid by Alexander for one.

Mr. BAYARD. The prices are fabulous, and the fact is that there is a cattle mania, just as much so as the tulip mania in Holland about a hundred years ago. Yet this disease is no respecter of costly and highbred cattle. It is just as apt to fall among them as those of a lower grade, and these prices are fabulous, and it may be that a great many gentlemen in possession of these herds would be only too happy to have the disease break out among them, that they might find a ready market, to be paid for out of the United States Treasury. I think you would find it very hard to obtain such a discretion from any State Legislature. Bring this matter home to the people of the State, who when they are asked to pay their tax-bills can inquire for what those taxes were laid, and not pay them, as they now do, in the increased cost upon all that they consume, and therefore with a kind of unconsciousness. But looking at this question, at the vast field of power it would open, at the unlimited expense to which the Treasury may be subjected by it, I would say that we have no proper ascertainment of the extent to which this power can be exercised or of the cost to the public at which it may be exercised.

I hesitate, therefore, until I know more. But independent of that, for the reasons I have stated, I hold that there is no power under the Constitution in Congress to pass such a measure as this. Hereafter, and perhaps very soon, there may be in this Chamber, and must be among the people of this country, a realization of the necessity and a reassertion of the rights of local self-government. There must be an examination of the foundations upon which our Government stands, and when that comes I shall endeavor, with a preparation worthy of the subject, to speak upon those limitations of power under which I am well satisfied civil liberty alone can find refuge and protection.

I can not vote for this measure, not only as incomplete and inefficient for the end for which it seems to have been designed, but I believe it to be unwarranted under the Constitution which we are all solemnly bound to support.

Mr. PENDLETON. Mr. President, I should like to be advised by the Chair what has become of the amendment offered by the Senator from Texas [Mr. COKE] to the amendment offered by my colleague now in the chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. SHERMAN in the chair). The Chair will state the order of the questions as they will be presented. First on the motion of the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. HARRIS] to indefinitely postpone the joint resolution; next upon the motion of the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. HOAR] to postpone it for a week; third upon the amendment to the amendment proposed by the Senator from Texas [Mr. COKE], and fourth upon the amendment proposed by the occupant of the chair.

Mr. PENDLETON. I ask that the amendment offered by the Senator from Texas may be reported.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment of the Senator from Texas will be read.

The CHIEF CLERK. At the end of line 5, after the word "Agriculture," it is proposed to insert "with the consent of," and in lines 6 and 7 to strike out "State of Kansas" and insert in lieu thereof the words "in the State in which it may be used;" so as to read if amended:

That the sum of $25,000, or so much thereof as is necessary, be, and hereby is, appropriated, to be used under the direction of the Commissioner of Agriculture, with the consent of and in co-operation with the proper authorities of the State in which it may be used, in eradicating a contagious disease popularly known as the foot-and-mouth disease.

Mr. PENDLETON. Mr. President, I dislike very much to vote against the amendment offered by the Senator from Texas, and yet I have not been able to bring my judgment clearly to the conclusion that it is wise to insert it in this resolution. I do not object to the language of the amendment; I do not object to its substance in one view of its effect and meaning. I think it might be very well to have the assent of the State in which this money is to be used to operate by way of estoppel of any complaint that may hereafter be made by the State, in case of a disappointing result of the effort about to be made to mitigate the evils which seem to be upon us. If that were the only view that could be taken of the amendment I should give it my cordial approbation.

But I think I have discovered during this debate a suggestion stated with more or less distinctness by several gentlemen, that the assent of the State to the expenditure of this money in the way proposed by the resolution will eke out an insufficient power given by the Constitution to the Government of the United States. I think I see a suggestion that there is an absence of ample power to do fairly and fully the thing contemplated by the resolution, and that if the assent of the State or of many States in which the Commissioner is to act can be gotten there will be a supply of the deficiency of that power as it exists under the Constitution.

Now, sir, to any suggestion of that kind I enter my entire dissent. I protest against it. It is because it seems to me that this amendment taken in connection with the views expressed by several gentlemen on the floor may become a precedent in the direction I have just indicated that I find my difficulty in voting for it. Either the Congress of the United States has authority to pass this resolution and enter upon this course of action or it has not. If it have the power, the assent of the States to the exercise of it within their boundaries is entirely unnecessary; and being superfluous, it seems to me a subject of very great doubt whether it is wise to suggest or ask the assent of the States. It seems to me there is no doubt that we ought not to let our action depend in any degree upon whether that assent is given or not. If, on the other hand, the Government has not the power to do what this resolution contemplates, then no assent of a State, no assent of any number of States given in this way, can supply the deficiency. It is absolutely inefficient in that direction.

There are but two cases under the Constitution where Congress is required to ask the assent of the States to the exercise of any of its powers. They are, first, the case in which Congress shall seek to exercise exclusive legislation over places within the limits of a State purchased for the erection of forts, magazines, arsenals, dock-yards, and other needful buildings. There the assent of the State to the purchase is essential to the acquisition of the power of exercising exclusive legislation.

And, second, the case where new States may be admitted into the Union by Congress. If they are to be carved out of any other State or are to be formed by the junction of two or more States then the assent of the States interested is essential. But these are the only two cases in which the assent of a State is required for the exercise within its own boundaries of the powers conferred by the Constitution upon Congress. I should be glad to have the assent of the States to every act that is passed by Congress even within the sphere of its undoubted powers, yet I am opposed to asking that assent, I am opposed to suggesting that it be given, I am opposed to doing anything which recognizes in any degree the assent of a State as essential to the exercise by Congress of any of the powers clearly given to it by the Constitution.

It would be a very good thing to have in all cases the co-operation of the States with the action of the Government of the United States; but when that co-operation is effected, it must be by the States and the Federal Government acting as independent bodies, exercising undoubted powers each within its own sphere of power and action; they must each exert a complete and independent function, having no dependence on each other, except only so far as co-operation to a common end would give greater efficiency to their separate means.

I am too good a State-rights man, too strict a constructionist to admit that in any case the action of a State other than in the prescribed form of ratifying amendments to the Constitution and in the two cases expressly provided in the Constitution can enlarge the powers of the Federal Government. If there be authority in the Federal Government to pass this legislation and to enter upon this course of action, then the assent of the State is unnecessary. If there be no such authority, then the assent of the States is entirely valueless. I would not willingly do anything which could be tortured into a precedent or even into an argument for its efficiency, and therefore I have had much doubt whether it would be wise to insert the provision indicated by the Senator from Texas, although I am in entire sympathy with the motive which I know prompted its presentation.

In this discussion we have heard a good deal said, and it has seemed to me in a spirit of rather querulous complaint, of the interposition by States to prevent the consummation of the wishes of the majority of the people. The honorable Senator from Kansas [Mr. INGALLS] stated the other day that the question is whether the nation, whether a majority of the people of all the States is supreme, or whether one State can negative and veto the expressed wish of the majority of the people. He stated that the question is whether in measures involving the great interests of a large number of people, or perhaps a majority of the people, a single State could interpose successfully against the accomplishment of the national will.

I submit this is not the question. I submit that this statement is a great misuse of terms, if it is not a confusion of ideas. I submit that it is an illustration of the art of putting things of which the Senator is an accomplished master; and that by a subtle and not entirely fair use of that art he has sought to draw an argument in favor of the views that he entertains rather from the passion than from the reason of his hearers. I submit that this is not a question whether the States shall interpose their authority, whether the States shall interpose an obstacle to the action of the Federal Government. Under the provisions of the Constitution and within the limits from which revolution is excluded there is no such power in a State, and there can never arise an opportunity or a necessity for the exercise of such power by a State.

A State may lie perfectly quiet; it may be perfectly inactive; it may do nothing; it may not interpose the least possible obstacle; and yet the accomplishment of the national will and the wishes of the majority of the people, as the Senator expresses it, can not be accomplished.

The United States have no power except that which is granted to them by the States and expressed in the Constitution. They have no original power, no inherent power, no power arising from necessity, however stringent that necessity may be. The argument ab inconvenienti ab necessitate, even though the alternative be its life or death, has no place in the just consideration of the powers of the Federal Government.

"This Constitution, and the laws of the United States which may be made in pursuance thereof, and all treaties made, or which shall be made, under the authority of the United States, shall be the supreme law of the land; and the judges in every State shall be bound thereby, anything in the constitution or laws of any State to the contrary notwithstanding." These are the supreme law. There is no other supreme law. There is no other valid law. There is no law except that which is made in pursuance of the grants to the Federal Government contained in the Constitution.

This was the Constitution submitted by the convention to the States for their ratification. It had passed the conventions of Delaware, New Jersey, Pennsylvania, Georgia, and Connecticut. It came to Massachusetts. Massachusetts had always been fearful of the power of the throne. She had always been jealous of her colonial rights; she had always been sensitive to the least danger, even afar off, to the liberties of her people. She remembered the causes out of which sprung Concord and Lexington. She had been trained in the school of the stamp act and the non-importation act and the incident of the tea in Boston harbor. Feeling as much as any State all the necessity for the establishment of a federal government, she ratified the Constitution in the full faith that the amendments she suggested would be adopted, lest, to use her own language, "undue administration" should enlarge the powers given by the Constitution to the Federal Government and pervert the purpose for which those powers were given. It was on her suggestion, under her lead, that the ninth and tenth amendments to the Constitution were passed, which from the mere abundance of caution defined more accurately and strictly the nature and scope of the powers of the Federal Government. The tenth amendment declared "the powers not delegated to the United States by the Constitution nor prohibited by it to the States, are reserved to the States respectively, or to the people."

The Constitution contains grants to the Federal Government and limitations upon the powers of the State governments. It contains nothing else, except possibly those amendments which were in the nature of a bill of rights, and they were limitations upon the powers of the State governments. In form, in substance, in spirit, by affirmation, by negation, by contemporaneous construction, the Constitution contains the grants of powers to the Federal Government, to the United States. It is not in any sense, by any interpretation, in any word, in any clause, either in its spirit or in its letter, a limitation upon the powers of the Government of the United States acquired or possessed otherwise than by virtue of the Constitution itself.

We call this a government of limited powers, and we call it so with entire accuracy, but its powers are limited only because other and larger powers were not given to it. The Constitution is an instrument of grant and not of limitation. Every limitation contained in the ninth section of the first article of the Constitution is an exception carved out of antecedent grants of larger powers made by the Constitution itself. Every limitation contained in that ninth section refers to other and larger powers already granted to the Federal Government by the Constitution.

If the Federal Government seeks to establish a policy, or to pass a law, or to do an act, search must be made amid the grants of the Constitution, and if no grant can be found, if none exist, either express or by implication, then there is no power; then the Government fails; the policy can not be carried out; the law can not be passed, or if passed can not be executed; and the act can not be performed.

The States do not move; they take no action; they interpose no objection; they throw in the way no obstacle; they negative nothing; they veto nothing; they are perfectly quiet—acquiescent if you please; but the United States can not move, not because an obstacle is interposed, but because of an inherent defect of power to move in that direction. If a man has no eyes he can not see; not because there is an obstruction placed in his line of vision; not because some one extinguishes a light or immures him in a dungeon; but because of inherent defect of power to exercise the faculty of sight. If a man has no legs he can not walk, not because some one prevents him from walking, but because the power of locomotion does not exist in himself. An engine without steam does not move, not because some one obstructs its way, but because the motive power does not exist. So it is with the Federal Government; it does not fail in its operation by reason of an obstacle interposed by the States, but because under the Constitution it has not the power even if no obstacle exists.

If gentlemen wish the Federal Government to do something and can not find the authority in the Constitution to do it, let them cease to impute the inability on the part of the Federal Government to obstructions laid in its way by the States; let them turn their anathemas upon the fathers who did not give to the Government the larger powers which their descendants, wiser in their own conceits, think it ought to have. If gentlemen wish a particular line of policy to be pursued and can not find authority for it in the Constitution, let them cease their maledictions of States' rights; let them cease to invoke the spirit of States' rights which always affrights their timid souls, and boldly declare that, with authority or without authority, they will obey not the supreme law of the Constitution, but the will of the nation. If the Federal Government has the power it performs its functions throughout the limits of the States. If it has not the power it is not prevented by the States, but by an original and inherent defect of constitutional authority.

Mr. President, I am a strict constructionist in the straightest sense. I believe that it is wise and expedient and safe to limit the powers of the Federal Government within the narrowest lines consistent with the purposes of its formation. I know that there are precedents in another direction. They were read to us by the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. GARLAND] the other day. He might, as he well knows, have cited many others. In the main the precedents which he cited and others of a cognate character answered appeals to the generosity of Congress and the people. They responded to prayers, that out of the superfluity which a beneficent Providence and a bounteous nature had given to us something might be spared to relieve the suffering poor whom that same Providence had afflicted. They satisfied appeals to help those who were suffering from earthquake in Venezuela, those who were suffering from famine in Ireland, those who were overwhelmed by fire and flood in our own country. They were acts of that charity which makes all mankind akin. These do not come within the strictest line of constitutional power as I read the Constitution. They stand as great exceptions; I prefer that they shall stand as exceptions rather than that by a loose and a forced construction of the Constitution we shall make them the rule; I prefer they should stand as the exceptional, and, if you please, the unconstitutional results, which we can not in strictness justify, of appeals to aid our fellow-men in the phenomenal emergencies of their extreme suffering, over which, as we could not prevent them, at least "One human tear shall drop and be forgiven."

I am, as I said, in favor of a strict construction of the Constitution. I believe in State rights, and State powers, and home rule. I believe in this framework of government as I think our fathers made it, leaving with the States separately the administration of all the matters which concern their domestic interest, and uniting them only in so far as is necessary to their existence among the nations of the earth. I am in favor of confining the Federal Government to the fewest possible subjects necessary to preserve peace at home and respect abroad, and to the least possible powers consistent with the accomplishment of those purposes.

In this system alone there is safety; in this system alone there is hope for a continuance of our Government and the maintenance, ay, and the indefinite expansion of our territory. In this system alone there is the hope for that prosperity of material interests and that fraternal peacefulness of relations which constitute us one people. Whenever for the few and simple powers to be sparingly administered, vested by the Constitution in the simple and severe government of a confederation of republics, there shall be substituted the powers, the duties, the excessive revenues, the lavish expenditures, the splendors, the corruptions of a consolidated imperial republic, there will have struck the hour which announces its incipient disintegration—to be consummated through the successive agonies of despotism, oppression, war, separation; there will have struck the hour of our doom as a peaceful people and as a free government.

Mr. CULLOM. Mr. President, I shall detain the Senate but a few moments. What I shall say will be applicable perhaps as much to the bill which has been before the Senate as to the pending resolution.

As I view it, if we have the power under the Constitution to pass the joint resolution now before the Senate, we have the power to pass the bill reported by the chairman of the Committee on Agriculture.

The resolution provides for an appropriation of money, to be used under the direction of the Commissioner of Agriculture, in co-operation with the authorities of the State of Kansas, in eradicating the foot-and-mouth disease in that State. It should be amended, as I think, so as to extend to all portions of the United States, and to include not only the disease specified in the resolution, but any other of the contagious diseases among the stock of the country.

The chief opposition to the resolution, as also the bill, is on the ground that it interferes with the domestic affairs of a State government, and that it is unconstitutional. While I do not desire to be understood as favoring every measure that comes up that would seem to take charge of, or in any way to interfere with, the affairs of a State government, yet I think there are instances where it is the duty of the Congress of the United States to take some responsibility, if the Constitution will permit it.

While I do not feel absolutely certain that my view of the power of Congress under the Constitution is correct, yet, after the remarks of the gentleman from Arkansas last Friday, and after the references by him to the views held by Hamilton, Monroe, Story, and other great men in the earlier history of this country, I feel much more free to support this measure than before.

It seems to me that under the provision of the Constitution providing for the general welfare and other provisions giving Congress authority to regulate commerce among the several States, we are justified in going as far as the exigencies of the times demand in our efforts to extirpate, if possible, the contagious diseases that afflict the cattle and hogs of the country.

These contagious and communicable diseases, as I look at it, can not be extirpated by any action that is likely to be taken by local governments.

It seems to me to be utter folly to suppose that this country now, according to reports, suffering from pleuro-pneumonia or lung-plague in several of the States of the East and in the District of Columbia, and with foot-and-mouth disease developing among cattle in two or three of the Western States, with constant trade going on, moving stock from one section of the country to another—to suppose that contagious diseases will ever be extirpated by the action of State or Territorial governments. Hence, in my judgment, it is the unquestionable duty of Congress to provide means for its immediate extinction.

Agriculture is the foundation of all the material interests of this country. The farmer feeds the people, and hence all other interests are dependent upon that. No nation has so large a relative portion of its wealth in domestic animals as the United States. We have in this country, according to the report of the Commissioner of Agriculture for 1884, 42,547,302 head of cattle, valued at $1,106,715,703; of horses and mules, we have 13,083,809, valued at $994,949,396; of hogs and sheep, 94,827,519, valued at $366,203,845, making a total of value of horses, mules, cattle, sheep, and hogs, $2,467,868,924. These four classes of animals aggregate in value an amount of wealth which is almost fabulous to compute.

All these animals, according to authorities of this and other countries, are subject to contagious diseases, and it seems to me that they represent such vast interests in the aggregate that the Government of the United States would be negligent of its duty if it did not do whatever it has power to do, under the Constitution, to protect these interests from being destroyed by diseases which can not be controlled by local authority.

We have to-day about 120,000 miles of railroad, affording facilities for transportation and commercial intercourse from one section of the country to another daily. The people of this country are not in the condition that they were twenty-five or fifty years ago, before the days of railroads and before the days in which importations of stock had begun in this country. These contagious diseases among stock could have been easily dealt with by the local authorities of the nation thirty or forty years ago. It has not been long since cattle, horses, and sheep were brought into this country from other nations to any considerable extent; it has not been long since the transfer from one section of the country to another of large herds of cattle and sheep was engaged in; so that in those early times the stock of the country was in the main kept where it was raised until sent to the markets of the country for sale.

An entirely different state of affairs exists now. Men and companies are engaged in bringing stock into this country from abroad. They are engaged in bringing it into one portion of the country and shipping to another constantly, so that this disease has gained a foothold in this country to such an extent that it seems to me impossible to control it or get rid of it except by the power of the National Government. With our thirty-eight States and eight or ten Territories acting independently of each other, and each without reference to the action of the other and largely necessarily so, how can the desired result be reached?

The Senator from Ohio [Mr. PENDLETON] says that he would not ask the State; and then he says that the Constitution of the United States gives us no power. I should like to know of him (for if he stated his views on that point I did not catch them) how he proposes that this evil which is destroying so much property in this country is going to be gotten rid of. Here are thirty-eight States and eight or nine Territories, each with its separate government, each acting for itself; one acting to-day, another to-morrow, and another next month or next year. While these irregularities of action are going on, this disease, which is beginning in one State and going from State to State and from Territory to Territory, will have spread all over this country and our property by the hundreds of millions will be destroyed; and we sit here and say that we have no power under the Constitution to help it.

It seems to me that we have the power under the Constitution of the United States to do whatever is necessary to protect the people and the property of this country from this dire disease. It is like a common enemy, as I believe some of these reports state. I say it is like a common enemy going into the different States and destroying our property, and we are sitting here as Senators of the United States and say we have no power under this Constitution of ours to do anything to prevent it. If we have not the power, it seems to me it is high time that the Constitution should be amended so that Congress shall have the power.

This is not an ordinary disease that breaks out in one community and there stops. It is a contagious or communicable disease that will sweep over the land if it is not checked at the outset. Look at my own State. Illinois is not here asking anything of the Government to-day. Chicago is the great grain and product market of the world, I may say. Cattle, hogs, horses, and grain of all kinds, all the food products of the country, center in Chicago. Car-loads of cattle, calves, and animals of all sorts and ages and sizes are coming there by the tens of thousands almost every day, not only to be marketed for beef or pork but to be distributed throughout the length and breadth of the Western States especially.

It is no small affair to undertake to institute a system of inspection and quarantine in the State of Illinois that will protect the people of this country. As I said the other day, when I had the honor of occupying the position of governor of the State there was a law passed giving us some power over that question, and I instituted a sort of quarantine, a sort of inspection, but it was the merest trifle with all that we could do. Cattle would come through. We could not interfere with the commerce of the country sufficient to protect the interests of our farmers.

I submit to the gentlemen who are especially opposed to these measures because of their constitutional scruples whether one State has the right to set itself up and say that in the case of those train loads of stock that are moving from one portion of the country through the State of Illinois, for instance, whether that State has the constitutional power under the Constitution of the United States to stop those trains and inspect the cattle and hogs and horses that may be in them? I do not believe we have it. It is true we have a sort of quarantine power, I believe it has been so decided, but one State has no right to interfere with the traffic going on, the commercial intercourse, between the several States of the Union. I submit whether we are not standing here splitting hairs upon this question while the property of our people is in great peril from these contagious diseases referred to.

The Senator from Ohio says that we occupy the position of a man without legs, who can not walk, not because nobody is willing to help him, but because he has not got the legs to walk. If we have not got legs enough to walk on in this country, so that we can protect the property of the country, we had better find some as soon as we can.

The Senator from Ohio says that it is true we have voted measures under an inspiration of generosity and sympathy for different people in this and other lands. I say that it was all right that the Congress of the United States should manifest a little generosity once in a while toward people who are suffering, but while we are doing it may it not soon occur that the people of this land, suffering as the result of the loss of their property from these contagious diseases, will be calling upon him then to vote appropriations to keep them from this destructive evil that is liable to spread over the country?

So far as I am concerned I want the Government of the United States to extirpate, if possible, these diseases at once and protect the people of this land from having their property destroyed. The longer we higgle about it the more expensive it will be, and my word for it the time will come when the Congress of the United States will be compelled to do it if they are unwilling to do it to-day. It is but a drop in the bucket to-day. This pleuro-pneumonia or lung-plague, as it is called, is breaking out in a few places in the country. It has not reached the West yet. The disease referred to in the resolution of the Senator from Kansas, the foot-and-mouth disease, has broken out in two or three places in the West, we are told. If we will take prompt measures to-day and make such appropriations as are necessary, we can get rid of all these contagious diseases. In my judgment it is the duty of the Congress of the United States to pass such laws as will prevent the recurrence of it by the importation into this country of cattle and animals of all sorts without the most thorough inspection before they are landed upon our shores. If you let it go on from day to day, or month to month, and year after year, it will be but a little while before every State in this Union that has cattle in it will be complaining and appealing to the Congress of the United States for relief.

If every State in the Union and every Territory could by some sort of joint action agree that they would do whatever is necessary to promptly stamp out these diseases I would say that Congress had better leave it alone, because I am not in favor of interfering or taking hold of measures where it is not our bounden duty to do so. But they are not going to do that. Illinois, as I said, might be willing to do it; Kansas might be willing to do it. Massachusetts might or might not be willing to do it. Massachusetts has been doing something in that direction, I believe, already. Whether they have got rid of pleuro-pneumonia entirely I do not know, but it is absurd, in my opinion, to suppose that all the States and Territories are going to act conjointly and promptly together for the purpose of stamping out these contagious diseases. Let this thing go on until springtime comes, until grass upon the plains begins to grow and the herds begin to spread over them, and then allow these contagious diseases to get among the cattle upon those plains, and instead of requiring $500,000 as an appropriation to get rid of it, it may cost us hundreds of millions of dollars.

There is another view still, Mr. President, which I will merely allude to before I take my seat. We have to consider during this Congress the action of foreign governments with reference to certain exportations from this country. We are complaining of England, France, and Germany on account of the action of those governments with reference to the hog products of this land, and, as I think, complaining with great cause on account of the interdiction by those governments of American pork. I do not believe myself that those nations have any substantial ground for the course that they have pursued with reference to our products, based upon the allegation that it is unsafe to the health of their people to permit the use of pork in those countries.

I think it has been shown beyond all doubt that the pork and beef exported to foreign nations have been in as healthy and pure condition as that of any country in the world. But it is a fact that the existence of these contagious diseases among cattle and hogs gives an excuse to those governments to exclude these animals, and the trade of our people in those products with the people of foreign nations is much reduced on account of the condition here. I see by reference to a pamphlet placed in my hands that the exports in 1880 and 1881 were 368,463 animals; those of 1882 and 1883 were 212,254; a reduction in the number of the last year below the former of 156,109 animals and in value $11,506,000, in two years. The exports of fresh beef for two years were less by 40,076,167 pounds and in value by $2,191,190.

The value of pork decreased in the same time $3,563,993. This reduction of the amount of exportation of beef and pork is largely due to the action of Germany and France and the belief on the part of the people of those and other countries that our meats are in an unsound condition and not fit to be used.

So, Mr. President, in any point of view in which this subject can be considered, it seems to be of great importance to the people of this country that something be done immediately that will get rid of these contagious diseases and that will result in such action as will prevent the reappearance of such diseases and as will satisfy other governments of the fact that our pork and beef and live-stock are as sound and as safe to be used as are those from any other portion of the world.

Mr. President, I shall not detain the Senate further than to say that while I desire to keep within the purview of the Constitution as closely as any Senator on this floor, I am not willing to throw myself behind technical constitutional provisions and say that we can not do anything for the relief of the people of this country in this emergency. I think we have the power to do what is proposed, and I am in favor of doing it without delay.

Mr. GARLAND. Mr. President, I shall detain the Senate but a very few minutes. I wish to state some things that I deem necessary to go in the RECORD with the remarks made a while ago by the Senator from Delaware [Mr. BAYARD] and the Senator from Ohio [Mr. PENDLETON]. I have said, so far as I am concerned, upon all the points involved in this measure all that I desire. I stated on Friday that when the bill properly called the pleuro-pneumonia bill shall again come before the Senate I may have something further to say, and I will cite some instances in the action of Congress of a more recent date, that I did not take the time the other day to detain the Senate with—instances that were not purely matters of sympathy any more than were the centennial exhibition and the Yorktown celebration. The Senator from Ohio seemed to plant himself upon the matter of appeals to sympathy, if not as a vindication at least as a plausible excuse for the precedents that have been cited. Those are two that did not appeal to any particular sympathy that I know of. Nobody was suffering for an exhibition of either sort. But I have some precedents of recent date which will be more practical and more applicable and that it will be refreshing to the Senate to hear, and when the bill relating to pleuro-pneumonia comes up I will detain the Senate by calling attention to them.

I am a State-rights man myself, but I understand State rights in a very different way from the Senator from Delaware and the Senator from Ohio as applied to this particular question. There is where the difference is. They complain of the latitudinarian or loose construction that I have put upon the Constitution. My judgment is that the construction that they put upon it as applied to this particular subject and kindred subjects is entirely too constipated, and it would bind Congress up so that it never could do anything for the good of the people if that doctrine was carried out.

But the purpose that I rose specially for was to call attention to what the Senator from Delaware cited as a decision of the Supreme Court. The Senator from Delaware would have made a complete citation if he had read a little further and cited the whole opinion of the court. The question was about stopping the sale of liquor in a State. The Supreme Court held very properly that that was a police regulation, and it was something that the party who suffered under could not appeal to the Supreme Court of the United States to reverse as being against the Constitution of the United States, for the Constitution of the United States had nothing to do with it. But, now, what do the court say? After stating what the Senator from Delaware very properly cited, the court proceed:

Of course—

Said the court in the case of Beer Company vs. Massachusetts, (97 United States Reports)—

Of course we do not mean to lay down any rule at variance with what this court has decided with regard to the paramount authority of the Constitution and laws of the United States relating to the regulation of commerce with foreign nations and among the several States or otherwise.

They cite Brown vs. Maryland, (12 Wheaton, 419, the old case); the License cases, (5 Howard, 504); the Passenger cases, 7 Howard; Henderson vs. Mayor of New York, (92 United States Reports, 259); the Chinese case from California, Chy Lung vs. Freeman, (92 United States Reports, 275); and what is the next case they cite?—the Railroad Company vs. Husen (95 United States Reports, 465), which I read to the Senate the other day, in which they said that while they did not undertake to interfere with any police regulations, yet the matter of commerce between the States (and it was cattle in that case) it would interfere with, and so they repeat that and cite it as the last case in the opinion that the Senator from Delaware read to the Senate. That leaves the proposition exactly where I left it last Friday.

I do not desire to detain the Senate any longer. The Senator quotes from Wharton's new work on American law. He commends the course there based entirely on this decision and the others, running back to the case of Gibbons vs. Ogden, in 9 Wheaton, in which the question is exactly as I left it. Police regulation is one thing; commerce is another. It is the whole discussion that we had upon the yellow-fever quarantine here, when we not only interfered with the States, but sponged out, obliterated, and destroyed State authority; and that act was passed by a very large majority after a long discussion through the month of May and a part of June.

Mr. BAYARD. Mr. President, so far as I can understand the position of the Senator from Arkansas, he does not differ from me or from that portion of the case I cited decided by the Supreme Court as to the police powers of the States; but he does now undertake to place the power in Congress to pass the resolution under consideration upon the power to regulate commerce between the States. I take it that the power to regulate commerce between the States given to Congress is the same precisely, in the same frame of words and in the same association, as the power to regulate commerce with foreign nations. The clause reads:

The Congress shall have power * * * to regulate commerce with foreign nations, and among the several States, and with the Indian tribes.

I take it that the grant of power in the same words, in the same association, is equally broad to regulate commerce between the States. But what is the power of Congress to regulate commerce? Like all other powers, it is to be considered with others that are granted or withheld. There is no such thing as the grant of absolute power from the beginning to the end of this delegation of powers. They are all limited, all relative, and they are all to be construed as a general whole to produce a consonant result. While Congress is given the power to regulate commerce with foreign nations and among the several States, it is not an absolute power, but it is coupled with this provision:

But all duties, imposts, and excises shall be uniform throughout the United States.

And further, that—

No tax or duty shall be laid on articles exported from any State.

No preference shall be given by any regulation of commerce or revenue to the ports of one State over those of another; nor shall vessels bound to, or from, one State, be obliged to enter, clear, or pay duties in another.

What is the effect and what is the natural result of the power now claimed? That there is to be a discrimination between the States; that there is to be a local imposition of check and obstacle upon the exports and traffic of some States that is not imposed upon others.

When the Congress of the United States passes a law regulating commerce it must apply to every State alike and it must be uniform. If it were not so, sectional aggression, sectional preponderance would necessarily occur. The weight of population, the weight of property would soon render this what it never was intended to be, a Union of unequal States, with favoritism as to locality; and how long would that endure? How long among American freemen ought it to endure? No, sir; this resolution and this proposition is not founded and it can not be proposed to be founded under the regulation of commerce between the States, simply because it is not, in the first place, a regulation of commerce. The States necessarily have, the communities necessarily have, that first power, essentially the power of self-preservation, and it is for that reason that the quarantine power was given originally, or rather reserved, and has been always exercised in the history of this country by the localities to be affected by it.

Who shall judge of the condition of disease and of health but the community to be affected by it? Who can judge of the danger? The very nature of things requires, the very distances of this great territory over which our National Government extends require, local self-government for the purpose of local self-protection. There can not be wise legislation without knowledge; and mere space in this country alone, the vastness of space, prevents the acquisition of that knowledge necessary for the purpose of meeting the case with justice and with efficiency.

Therefore, I submit with due respect to the Senator from Arkansas that the power to regulate commerce between the States would be defeated by a proposition that would create unequal regulations in regard to this, that, or the other State. It would act on the State of Texas, which is the great fountain-head from which so much of the food supply of this country emanates; it would act on that State and not on those to whom by the natural course of demand and supply this great body of animals moves. Therefore we should have an utterly impracticable condition of things, the apparent necessity of the case demanding regulations not uniform in character and the Constitution of the United States forbidding that they should be imposed.

So, therefore, I submit that there is nothing in the authority or nothing in the decision just read or the part that I omitted to read. It has nothing to do with the point for which I cited the case. I cited it merely to show that by a late expression of the Supreme Court of the United States, reviewing the period of decision of nearly one hundred years, defining as well as they could define the meaning of the words "police" and "police power," they had adjudged, as all their predecessors without exception had adjudged, that the police power of the State, essential to the State and capable only of being exercised by the State and unreservedly deposited with the State, included among other things and chiefly the health of the people. If anything can be more directly connected with the health of the people of the State than the food which the people are to consume, I am at a loss to imagine it.

There can be no illustration affecting the health of a people more strongly than infected, unwholesome, unmerchantable meats. It is punished in every State I know of; it was punishable by the common law of England; it is punishable in every State of this Union to sell food that is deleterious to human health or what is termed unmerchantable. What power there exists which has always been exercised must exist, and can in the nature of things only exist and be reposed in the local power of self-government of the people, and can not be exercised under the name or by the pretense of regulating commerce between the States, or by assuming a power for which the Federal Government has no warrant in the Constitution and which it never can competently, economically, or justly exercise.

Mr. HAWLEY. Mr. President, I do not propose to rehearse the well-known doctrine in relation to the State and Federal Governments any further than to state my view in two or three sentences.

The United States Government has all the powers that are granted to it. All the other powers are reserved in the hands of the people or the States. A State may exercise all powers, rights, and duties that are not forbidden to it by the Constitution of the United States, and its Legislature, as representing the people of the State, may do this unless it be further restrained by the State constitution, and under that, as the Senator from Delaware has said, work of the description we are talking about begins primarily with the States.

One distinguished Senator has asked us what we can do if we can not pass bills like those that have been under consideration in this and previous Congresses. If he will kindly give me his attention I think I can show very briefly what we can do.

A statute of the State of Connecticut providing for a State board of agriculture is contained in ten sections. I will read sections 6 and 7:

SEC. 6. For the purpose of preventing the spread of contagious diseases among domestic animals, said board may, when in its judgment public safety demands, prohibit the introduction of any such animal into this State.

That the State has a right to do.

When any contagious disease exists in the State the board may quarantine all infected animals or such as they suppose have been exposed to contagion; prohibit any animal from passing on or over any of the highways near the place of quarantine, enter upon any premises where there are animals supposed to be infected with any disease, and make all investigations and regulations necessary for the prevention, treatment, cure, and extirpation of such disease.

SEC. 7. The board may appoint suitable persons to inquire into and report to it all violations of law and of any regulation made by it, and may also appoint three commissioners on diseases of domestic animals, who shall have all the powers of the board in regard thereto.

That act was supplemented a few years afterward by this one, directly applicable to the case in question:

SECTION 1. The State board of agriculture, or in case said board have or shall appoint commissioners on diseases of domestic animals under the provisions of section 7 of the act to which this is an addition, then said commissioners may, when in their judgment the public good shall require it, cause to be killed, and to be disposed of afterward as in their judgment may be expedient, any animal or animals which in their judgment are infected with or have been exposed to and are liable to communicate to other animals any contagious disease.

SEC. 2. The said board of commissioners, after notice to the owners of such animals, or, if the owner does not reside in the town where such animals are, to either the owner or keeper of such animals, shall cause all animals, before being killed under the provisions of the preceding section, to be appraised at their assessed value in their respective towns by the assessors, or a majority of them, of the town where such animals are kept; and it shall be the duty of the assessors of the several towns to make such appraisal upon the request of said board of commissioners, and two-thirds of such appraised value of such animals, if killed, shall be paid to the owner thereof by the State, upon the approval of the governor.

Mr. President, that covers, within the limits of Connecticut, the whole case. It prevents the bringing in a diseased animal; it takes care of the diseased animal after it is brought in; if need be it kills it and pays the owner two-thirds of the appraised value, it being proper enough that he should lose something of it for various reasons, that he may be cautious for himself, that he may have not a motive to impose upon the State, &c.

This having been done, what else remains for the protection of the State? Certain work that is clearly and indisputably, by the assent of both sides and every Senator, within the Federal jurisdiction; and that is to watch over all diseased animals upon the navigable waters and upon vessels coming from abroad and guard their transportation between the States.

There is not a lawyer here who will disagree upon the provisions of a bill embracing only these points that I have referred to, because they are clearly provided for in the section of the Constitution concerning commerce with foreign powers and between the States. Therefore my answer to the Senator who asked what we shall do if we can not pass these bills is simply this: Let each State do what I am happy to say my own State has done, and then we shall agree upon the pending bill concerning these diseases with one section out of it, and the whole subject will be completely and satisfactorily covered.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. HARRIS] to indefinitely postpone this joint resolution.

Mr. PLUMB. I shall discharge my duty on this measure in a very brief way. When I drew the resolution, as I did somewhat hastily at my desk, I thought it was a very incomplete paper; I thought it contained a very innocent proposition, one that I did not conceive would be the subject of any extended debate in the Senate as involving any question of the exercise of doubtful power. It has led to a discussion which has been very instructive and learned, but which, it seems to me, has been apart from the true issue in this case.

I am not competent to enter upon that branch of the discussion with anything like authority, but to negative the idea contained in this resolution is to say that the Federal Government must remain absolutely powerless, although all the cattle and sheep and hogs of this country should be actually decimated. No matter how inadequate the local authorities might be, the Federal Government, according to the theory advanced by the Senator from Delaware and the Senator from Connecticut, is absolutely estopped from doing anything whatever. So long as the disease exists in any State there can be no power in the Federal Government anywhere to do any single thing which shall even tend to the protection of the public interests by way of eradicating the disease or preventing its spread.

When, a few years since, there was a suggestion of yellow fever at New Orleans or Memphis, the Senate, under the leadership of the Senator who made the motion to indefinitely postpone this resolution, passed a measure designed to and giving to the President of the United States and to a national board of health created by national law arbitrary power, with or without the consent of the States in which that disease might be found, to take effective measures to stamp it out. It was no more a national question if it existed in two States than if it existed in one. There can be no umbilical cord connecting two localities and sections. There can be no connection between the disease existing in one State and another State which gives it an interstate character which it does not possess if it exists in one State alone. The character of the disease, the liability to its spread, the general consequences of destruction, the great fears to be suggested by its spread, are the consequences of the emergency which make it a national question, or it never can be made so.

The State of Connecticut has stamped out certain diseases, as we have been informed, in that State, and paid the damages out of its own treasury. It has done all this by a machinery which it has itself provided, and we are invited to follow that example. Mr. President, this is not a question that now affects the State of Kansas any more nearly than it does the State of Missouri, the State of Illinois, the State of Iowa, or the State of Texas. The circumstances existing west of the Mississippi River, and in fact west of the Alleghany Mountains, in all the great States where cattle-raising is a business, and where it is the means of livelihood of a large proportion of the people, and where it is one of the greatest interest not only there but by reason of its great importance to the entire country, are entirely different from what they are in Connecticut.

There the cattle are few in number. The man who owns fifty head of cattle is a man of note. The cattle are usually kept in confined quarters, in stalls, in small pastures, in stables. They are domestic cattle, kept for milking purposes. They do not come in contact with other cattle; they are not driven hither and yon; they do not find their way to distant markets; they are kept at home, and they lack giving a full supply of meat to the people of that State; but the cattle of Kansas are to-day on the prairies of Kansas and to-morrow they are in Missouri, and the next day in Illinois, and the day after that perhaps they are in New York, and so with all the cattle of all that country.

At the time when the grass springs up and cattle are turned out upon the ranges they range five and ten and fifteen and twenty and fifty miles, coming in contact with other cattle belonging to different persons, and those in turn go ten, fifteen, or fifty miles farther beyond, frequently driven across half a continent; and the existence of disease among herds of cattle thus bound to be widely dispersed is an entirely different thing, and constitutes an emergency far different from what the outbreak of any disease could be in States in which the circumstances are such as they are to-day in the State of Connecticut.

After the first alarm it is to the interest of the people in the locality where the disease occurs to belittle it. It is to their interest to belittle it until they can get rid of their cattle, until they can send them away. So the very moment the disease is well defined in any locality the men ship the cattle off. The men in Kansas send their cattle into Missouri, getting them away not only for the purpose of sale but, even if they design to continue their ownership, to get them out of the reach of infection. In so doing they may save the cattle or they may not. Instead of saving their cattle they carry the infection in among other herds, and this very dispersion, the very cessation of the disease in the locality where it springs up, is a suggestion of added danger everywhere else where the cattle may go.

The situation, as I regard it, is not the only serious cause of the outbreak of this disease, but on account of the time of year. Within the next thirty days these cattle will be on the ranges. They will go into the Indian Territory, they will go into Texas, they will go into Nebraska and Missouri and Colorado, and in all that great space west of the Mississippi River wherever this contamination extends and gets among the cattle on the ranges there will be an absolute physical inability to eradicate it.

That this subject has received consideration at the hands of the officials of the Government is evidenced by the report of the United States Treasury Cattle Commisson made to the Secretary of the Treasury on the 21st of July last, in which, after stating the susceptibility of cattle to the disease and the great interests at stake, the commission go on to say:

> In this connection it may be well to state that the invasion of the foot-and-mouth disease that swept from Canada over Northern New York and New England in 1871 created something closely approaching a panic. The agricultural papers were full of the subject, State boards of agriculture convened and discussed the question, a convention of delegates from different States met at Albany, N. Y., and it was the engrossing theme for every local farmers' club along the line of infection. This invasion, imported into Montreal with two English cows, fortunately occurred in autumn, and the long seclusion of the herds during the ensuing winter virtually stamped it out, the infection not having extended beyond herds in inclosed pasturages or buildings. Most of our farmers are as ignorant of the disease to-day as they were in 1871, and any new invasion could not fail to produce a similar excitement and consternation.
> It should be added that our connection with the States, as well as the United States, brings us constant complaints of diseases supposed to be contagious, but we have not found any evidence of the actual existence of the foot-and-mouth disease at any point among our home herds.

That occurred in the fall and winter. This occurs at the very season of the year when the damage is liable to be the greatest, when the opportunity for its spread is the most considerable, and consequently when the opportunity for stamping it out is at the minimum.

Now suppose that in a given case the State can stamp it out. The National Government can do it easier and better and more effectually. It is not simply that it shall be stamped out, but it is the absolute knowledge so far as that can be imparted by any human agency that it has disappeared. The moment the State of Kansas, for instance, spends a little money and goes through some performance designed to stamp this disease out and notifies the world that it is done, at once there would be a cry of incredulity; men would say at once "that is the suggestion of self-interest; they do not want to be embargoed."

The other day when the governor of Illinois caused it to be announced that he would probably quarantine cattle from the State of Kansas, at once dispatch was sent to him that the disease was not as bad as it was supposed to have been. There at once interest comes in, the interest of the individual, the interest of the locality, and the interest of the State, to so prevent interruption of trade in cattle, to so prevent quarantine against cattle from that locality as to enable the men owning infected herds to get rid of them.

The little finger of the General Government in a matter of that kind is thicker than the loin of the State. It needs a power that can not only go to the locality itself, but can follow the infected herd across the line of the State. Every herd that has left the State is infected. They can seize upon it if it is infected everywhere that it may manifest itself, and while one State is acting the disease is communicating itself to the cattle of another, and so on all the way round, until State action will be futile, because as fast as it may be stamped out in one State or thought to be stamped out the contagion existing in other regions will be communicated again, and there is no possibility of joint action which will be absolutely effective.

It has been suggested by the Senator from Delaware that we are laying the foundation for expending two and a half million dollars or perhaps more. As the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. WILLIAMS] suggests, suppose we do; if the emergency is equal to the expenditure, the expenditure ought to be made. But that was coupled with the ungenerous suggestion which I understood to have been drawn out of the statement of the Senator from Texas [Mr. MAXEY] that behind all this was some covert idea or expectation on the part of cattle-men undertaking to sell their cattle to the Government. That was unworthy of the Senator who made it, if I understood him aright, and especially unworthy as I think of the Senator from Texas, representing as he does the cattle-men of that State, who have looked to him so long as their able representative on this floor. He knows they do not need any Government purchase of their cattle, that they are as good as gold in the market of the world as long as they are healthy, and nobody would prefer the Government as a purchaser of his cattle. There is no basis or foundation for an insinuation of that kind.

But, Mr. President, there is no necessity even for the Government to be committed to a large expenditure. If this thing is taken now in its infancy, in its first stages, a few thousand dollars will do what some hundreds of thousands would probably not do in the next month or two. The agent of the Commissioner of Agriculture, or the Commissioner himself, can go to the place where the disease exists; he can direct the segregation of infected cattle in various ways, putting them into stables, in herds and pens, enforcing simply by his suggestion, by his command, perhaps, but a command which he will not need the authority of troops or any other physical force to enforce, whereby there can be absolute non-intercourse with the infected districts. Any suggestion that he will make will be heeded and carried out; he will not need to purchase the cattle, perhaps not a single head of them. The men will themselves submit to have the cattle which he, in his judgment, will say are necessary to be destroyed, and will submit to losses of that kind gladly rather than stand there and wait until they have to submit by the spread of the disease to greater losses. It is not committing to him a dangerous power. As we do not give the machinery, so we do not put it in his power to exercise that power which some would imply.

So far as concerns the question of the creation of claims against the Government hereafter, I propose hereafter, if we shall ever come to that point, to move an amendment expressly excluding anything of that kind, amounting to a direction, to a notice that the General Government is not to be responsible beyond the amount appropriated in the resolution. The amount is small, I know. That is made the subject of complaint. It can be enlarged. I think it ought to be greater, because since this debate began there is notice here of the outbreak of this disease in Illinois, notice of the outbreak of the disease in Iowa, and if I am not mistaken a Senator on this floor has a dispatch from the governor of Missouri calling the attention of that Senator to what he supposes to be an outbreak of the disease in that great State. I know dispatches were published in the newspapers of yesterday stating that the disease had broken out in one of these States, and if this debate shall continue for a few days longer I think the necessity for it will become more and more apparent; and as the necessity grows so also does the responsibility for delay.

What is the interest which is represented by the hundreds of millions of dollars involved? It is of immense consequence not only to a few States but to the nation in the aggregate. It is a question which involves the dependence, the independence of the people of the United States. While I would not for that reason have Congress enter on doubtful or dangerous ground, certainly in view of the precedents we have, those we have ourselves made, it can not be that the investment of a comparatively small sum of money to be used in co-operation with the authorities of such States as may feel the need of that co-operation in any way violates the Constitution of the United States. If it is lawful by the Federal authority to destroy and stamp out the yellow-fever in the city of Memphis and the city of New Orleans, it is as lawful for the General Government to enter into its sacred precincts and in company with the State itself stamp out any disease which by its spread threatens the vital interests of the people of the United States.

Mr. VEST. Will the Senator accept an amendment to strike out "the State of Kansas" and insert "the States in which the same may be used?"

Mr. PLUMB. Certainly, so far as I can accept it. I said the other day, I said from the beginning, that I was entirely willing to have its scope extended. I did not want in drawing it to make the suggestion, or be responsible for it, that the disease existed elsewhere. I left that to be made by the parties interested. I am not only willing but anxious that it shall extend everywhere. As I said, it is not to-day a question that concerns the State of Kansas any more than it concerns the State of Missouri, and it no more concerns the State of Missouri than it does the State of Connecticut, because of this interest which builds up the great commercial interests of the country and feeds the people. While we may all be too suspicious, and this may not prove as serious as has been anticipated, it may prove a great deal more serious; and the mere suggestion, however faint it may be, that the herds of this country are threatened with this disease, or with any other contagious disease, and that there is not one single line of authority on the statute-book of the United States authorizing anything to be done and not one single dollar of money that can be applied, ought to be enough of itself to cause Congress to hasten, not delay, to the adoption of every measure that may be necessary, and which is consistent with a fair judgment as to what the power is, to put in motion the machinery to stamp it out and arrest the evil.

But, Mr. President, I believe the danger is greater than any anticipation that has yet been formulated about it. I have a letter in my pocket from one of the most intelligent cattle-men of my State. He says it is impossible to get a quarantine while every man wants to get his stock away, disregarding the public safety and everything but his own interest. It seems to him that the danger is greater than can be estimated or imagined, and he fears that no machinery that will be applied from the single standpoint of the immediate locality in which the danger exists will ever meet the case. As I said the other day, we want a national government that can equalize this, that can say whether Illinois shall quarantine against Kansas and New York against Illinois, and when it shall be said authentically that the disease has disappeared, that it has been stamped out, it should convey that news in an authentic manner to every place where it is material to know the fact.

Mr. President, one of the reasons why Great Britain is legislating against our meats has been the fact that it has been understood there, or at least it has been assumed to be understood, that the foot-and-mouth disease existed in the United States. The report of this same cattle commission contains the orders of the privy council of Great Britain on this subject, orders based upon the alleged existence of foot-and-mouth disease in this country. It is a question that affects our foreign commerce.

It affects the ability of the people of the United States to export their cattle to the markets of Great Britain. We are liable at any time on account of this to have an entire embargo upon all this great interest; not merely an embargo on the part of one State against the cattle of another State, but an embargo against our export of cattle by the entire civilized world. And in view of these great interests possibly to be affected, probably to be affected, nay, affected now directly, as we ourselves know, it seems to me that we ought to hasten at once to the remedy that we can provide, in order, first, that the truth may be known; in order, second, that the cure may be applied, and in the next place that the world may be advised of what we have done and its effect upon this great interest, in order that our commerce may once more go along, as it has heretofore, unquestioned.

Mr. HARRIS. Mr. President, I certainly should not have troubled the Senate with a single word in respect to this measure if it had not been for the allusion made by the Senator from Kansas [Mr. PLUMB] a moment since to the fact that the motion to indefinitely postpone was made by myself, and to the fact that a few years since a bill that I had the honor to introduce and which was passed into a law, known as the act of the 2d of June, 1879, he seems to regard as a precedent for the legislation sought by his joint resolution. I only rise now for the purpose of calling the attention of that Senator to the fact that they are by no means similar or kindred propositions. The bill to which he refers had but one single object and purpose, and that was to so regulate commerce as to prevent the introduction of contagious or infectious diseases from foreign countries into this country or from one State into another—simply and wholly a regulation of commerce with foreign nations and among the several States. Not a single feature of the bill to which the Senator referred as introduced and advocated by myself proposed to authorize the National Board of Health to go into a State and deal with a disease confined to the limits of that State, except so far as the dealing with it might become an absolute necessity to prevent its introduction into other States from the particular State infected.

Mr. PLUMB. That is precisely what this measure intends to do, eradicating it so that it can not be imported elsewhere. It is not for the relief of the persons who are particularly interested in the sense of having cattle infected. There is nothing plainer than that, I think.

Mr. HARRIS. The difference, as I think, between the bill to which the Senator refers and the pending measure is this: One, as I have already explained, simply proposed to regulate commerce so as to prevent the introduction of contagion from foreign countries into this or from one State into another, while if I understand the resolution of the Senator from Kansas it is a distinct proposition to take from the Treasury a sum of money for the purpose of dealing with a disease that is described as existing in a single State, and not to the matter of its transmission from one of the States to another State. In other words, the bill to which he refers as advocated by myself was purely intended to be no more nor less than a regulation of commerce. I can hardly think the Senator from Kansas will treat his resolution as a commercial regulation.

But I do not propose to go into the discussion of the merits of the question. Believing, as I believe, that we have no power to take money from the Treasury of the United States and appropriate it to dealing with this disease in a single State, I shall vote to postpone indefinitely the Senator's resolution, and if that motion shall not prevail, when it comes upon the question of its passage I shall vote against it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the motion of the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. HARRIS] to postpone the further consideration of the joint resolution indefinitely.

Mr. CONGER. On that motion I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered; and the Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. BOWEN (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from Florida [Mr. JONES]. If he were present, he would vote "yea" and I should vote "nay" on this motion.

Mr. HAMPTON (when his name was called). I am paired generally with the senior Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. ANTHONY]. I do not see his colleague here and I do not know how he would vote on this proposition. I therefore refrain from voting. If at liberty I should vote "yea."

Mr. VAN WYCK (when Mr. MANDERSON'S name was called). My colleague [Mr. MANDERSON] would vote "nay," but he is paired with the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. BUTLER].

Mr. MORGAN (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from New York [Mr. LAPHAM]. If he were here, I should vote "yea."

Mr. SLATER (when his name was called). On this question I am paired with my colleague [Mr. DOLPH]. If he were here, I should vote "yea."

The roll-call having been concluded, the result was announced—yeas 15, nays 32, as follows:

YEAS—15.

Bayard,	Colquitt,	Jackson,	Ransom,
Brown,	Farley,	Maxey,	Saulsbury,

So the Senate refused to indefinitely postpone the joint resolution.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question recurs on the motion of the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. HOAR] to postpone the further consideration of the joint resolution until Friday next.

Mr. HOAR. I made this motion last week, in the absence of any authentic information, in order to gain some brief postponement. That has already happened. That is, three days of the seven contemplated in the original motion have already expired; and while I am not myself informed as to the necessity of this matter sufficiently, yet the Senators representing the States affected claim to be, and I withdraw the motion.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The motion to postpone is withdrawn. The question recurs on the amendment of the Senator from Texas [Mr. COKE] to amend the paragraph proposed to be stricken out by the motion of the Senator from Ohio [Mr. SHERMAN].

Mr. SHERMAN. I desire to renew the motion of the Senator from Massachusetts, merely to state briefly why I should vote for such a proposition if it was pending. I do not wish to consume time.

I am not troubled at all by the constitutional scruples which have been stated on the other side of the House. I do not care to discuss them, although I could no doubt repeat old arguments and answer old arguments again that have been discussed time out of mind. My objection to this resolution and the reason why I should like to have it postponed is that it is totally inadequate and impracticable; that we ought to deal with this question, not by piecemeal, not in small sums like this, not with undefined powers, but by some practical measure of legislation which will enable effective action to be had to stamp out infectious diseases among domestic animals. I am yet in hopes that the Senator from Kansas, seeing that this debate on his little resolution of $25,000 has drawn out all the fire of the adversary, will allow the real question, the real bill, to come up, and if he chooses to ingraft this proposition on that bill, I would vote for it with the greatest pleasure.

But for us now to have wasted one or two legislative days in considering a measure so imperfect as this, when we have before us a proposition so important as the pleuro-pneumonia bill, it seems to me is a wasteful loss of time and making a needless controversy with the House. They have sent us a bill which, imperfect as it is, is an important one, and can be made vastly more important by suitable amendments that I hope the House will agree to; but now if we, having their bill on our table reported to us, send them a joint resolution involving only a single disease, much less important than pleuro-pneumonia, and appropriating only a small sum, without defining the powers of the Commissioner of Agriculture, it seems to me we are trifling with a great and important subject.

Mr. President, my hope is that, the Senator from Kansas having made his demonstration, and it appearing that there is really no pressure now in Kansas, in Missouri, or in Illinois that can not be dealt with by the local authorities, he will allow this resolution to stand over a while and take up the more important question of the general bill.

Let me state one or two practical objections to this measure. This authorizes the Commissioner of Agriculture to spend $25,000. What is he to do with that money? If it is merely wanted to inquire into the fact whether or not the foot-and-mouth disease exists in Kansas he has already $25,000, appropriated last year, now in the Treasury, for that very purpose, and the same provision is made in the bill this year. Last year there was $25,000 appropriated to enable him to investigate into the causes and all about these diseases, and that money is still unexpended, available at this moment for investigation. What more can he do under this resolution now pending than is authorized to be done under the existing annual appropriation that is made for this purpose? Nothing, unless he has the power to go in and kill diseased cattle. It is confined now; it ought to extend to sheep and hogs, because they are subject to this foot-and-mouth disease as much as cattle. Is there power under this provision as it stands for the Government of the United States to seize the private property of individuals? How can he act in the absence of all law defining the mode of seizing on this property, the mode of paying for it, the mode of ascertaining its value, and all the various particulars that are essential to a practical measure? It is impracticable. All he can do if this resolution passes is to inquire into the existence of the alleged disease in Kansas and when it is extended to the other States, but he dare not seize and kill a man's cattle, because he has no legal authority to do it unless some provision is made for payment for the cattle, because the Constitution in its plain provisions does come in and declare that private property shall not be taken for public use, to prevent the extension of the disease into other herds, unless it is paid for. Unless some provision is made for its payment it would be a usurpation on the part of the National Government to seize a man's private property. It can not do anything with it at all until some provision is made to pay for it. How shall it be ascertained? How far would $25,000 go to stamp out an infectious disease in a herd of cattle? How many cattle would that kill? One thousand, perhaps, at $25 a head.

This shows that the measure is totally inadequate for the purpose; that it has not the necessary provisions to carry it into effect. There is a still graver feature in regard to these infectious diseases. Cattle may be imported from all the countries of the world now under the provisions of the existing law, subject only to be put in quarantine, but I very much doubt whether the quarantine, although it was established on my order, is authorized by the existing law. I doubted it at the time. There is very grave doubts of it when you come to examine the power conferred by Congress, until the last two or three years, to establish quarantine. Now, there is no power in this Government to kill or destroy any animal imported into this country although it has the mouth-and-foot disease. The Secretary of the Treasury and the proper officers of the Government have communicated to Congress over and over again that he is in that dilemma; that if a herd of infected cattle are brought into this country there is no power given to that Department or to any Department of this Government to destroy those cattle, although they are plainly covered with disease. There is no law authorizing it. He may put them in quarantine, but where an imported herd is brought here and put into quarantine it does disseminate the disease. There is no power to destroy the herd or a single head of the herd.

With this imperfect state of the law on the subject of quarantine on the subject of contagious and infectious diseases, why is it not better to take up the bill sent to us by the House and ingraft on it such additional provisions as will enable the measure to be effective, and in the two days we have wasted on this debate we might probably have passed a law that would stop the terrors that now threaten the whole Western country.

Under its quarantine the Treasury Department prevented the extension of pleuro-pneumonia across the Alleghany range. It has existed for many years; it has been imported into this country, and ever since 1866 it is admitted that pleuro-pneumonia has existed in the District of Columbia, in Maryland, Pennsylvania, and all along the coast. Massachusetts is the only State that seized upon it and stamped it out, as they say. Connecticut no doubt has passed very wise laws on the subject. But the pleuro-pneumonia has existed now for sixteen years in all these States, but it has never crossed the Alleghany Mountains. Suppose it should cross that mountain range, suppose a single herd, yes, a single ox or a bull or one of these valuable cows that are brought over from Europe should be affected with pleuro-pneumonia which prevails in almost every country of Europe, and convey by contact that disease to our herds in Ohio and Kentucky, which, although not so numerous as the Western herds, are immensely more valuable per capita, because they are more highly bred and much more valuable in many respects. Suppose you get pleuro-pneumonia into that region, nothing in the world would prevent its extension westward. Why? Because the regular course of merchandise is for the Western dealers to go to Ohio and Kentucky and all these high-breeding States and take out cattle to improve their stock; and if we should once get this disease into Ohio it would be carried into Indiana, Illinois, and so on to the Western plains; and once get a single herd in the plains diseased, and there is no power under heaven except the destruction of vast herds that could stop that terrible evil.

Mr. President, I say therefore that we are wasting time in considering this resolution, because it does not reach the magnitude of the evils that threaten our country, although it is just as natural as can be for the Senator from Kansas to seize upon a single diseased herd in probably a single county in the State of Kansas and rush here to ask us for $25,000 to help stamp out this foot-and-mouth disease which, although probably worse in some respects than the pleuro-pneumonia, is not so dangerous, is not so destructive. According to the English authorities it has never carried away 10 per cent. of any herd, and usually not more than 2 or 3 per cent. It is a disease that expires in six days. It is like comparing the chicken-pox with the small-pox, when you compare the foot-and-mouth disease with pleuro-pneumonia, which destroys immense herds and has actually made it impossible to raise cattle in certain parts of Australia.

It seems to me that we ought to deal with the greater question, and then we can by simple provisions of law prevent the importation of diseased cattle and provide for their destruction. There can be no question of authority upon that subject, because that is plainly a regulation of foreign commerce, and we can prevent the dissemination of the disease through our own ports. There can be no question about it. Although I do not see any reason why I should not vote for this resolution if it shall be pressed to a vote and sent to the House because I am in favor of a stronger measure, at the same time I am in hopes the Senator from Kansas will allow us to take up the other bill and proceed with that and finish it. I hope in that way we shall get a practical measure in a safe form to send to the House, and we shall probably have a law passed much sooner than it will be if passed in the form of the present resolution.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Ohio [Mr. SHERMAN] moves that the further consideration of the resolution be postponed until Friday next.

Mr. SHERMAN. I will say for one week.

Mr. PLUMB. Let me ask the Senator from Ohio, if we can not get all we want, must we not have anything? I do not claim that this is adequate to a great emergency or perhaps equal to the emergency that is on us now; but we have had notice filed upon us here that the bill of which he speaks and which he thinks ought to be passed, as I do, will be debated at great length. There is no probability that the bill will become a law inside of three weeks. It may not become a law inside of a month or six weeks, and perhaps even not at all, as is suggested from the other side.

This resolution is at least a step in the right direction. If it does not do all that is required, it must be remembered that it commences at the incipiency of the disease. If it does not meet the emergency in the State of Kansas where the disease has broken out in the most virulent shape, it may eradicate it in States like Missouri and Illinois where it is just getting a foothold. It can not do any hurt.

If the Senator from Ohio thinks the amount appropriated is not large enough, I am sure the Senate will listen to him while he moves to make it larger. If we do not give the Commissioner of Agriculture the power which he says he ought to have, we at least give what many gentlemen on the other side of the Chamber hold to be an unconstitutional power, and we put him in the field to do what he can do and what now he can not do. We shall at least have added something, and that too immediately, to what now exists, or rather we shall have put in the place of nothing something which can not but give the Commissioner the authority to do something at least to alleviate the danger and to prevent its further spread.

In addition to that, Mr. President, the bill which the Senator mentions provides elaborately for the drawing up of rules and that they shall be submitted to the State authorities, and nothing can be done under that bill until all this machinery has been provided, and that will take months longer. Certainly we shall not under ordinary circumstances get into operation under that bill before next fall.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Will the Senator from Ohio state whether his motion was to postpone until Friday or for a week?

Mr. SHERMAN. For one week.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair understood the Senator to renew the motion of the Senator from Massachusetts. The Senator from Ohio moves that the resolution be postponed for one week.

Mr. HAWLEY. I intend to vote for that motion, but before doing so I wish to explain that it is because I am quite willing to vote to take up instantly the general bill and proceed with all haste to perfect it and adopt it. I will do anything within reason to prevent this evil from spreading.

Mr. SHERMAN. In order to test the sense of the Senate, I will move, without desiring at all to take charge of the bill, to take up the House bill at this time. That is perfectly in order.

Mr. INGALLS. I raise the point of order that that motion can not be made at this stage of parliamentary proceedings.

Mr. SHERMAN. To postpone this resolution and take up the House bill?

Mr. INGALLS. That was not the motion.

Mr. SHERMAN. But that was the motion I designed to submit. I do not desire to antagonize this measure; but this is an imperfect measure, and I think it would be wise for the Senate to do what I propose. I therefore submit the motion.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair is under the impression that this bill, not being a special order, a motion to take it up comes under the provisions of motions under Rule IX. He intimated a different opinion the other day; but he is satisfied on further examination that on the suggestion of the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. HOAR] the Chair was in error strictly on that point.

As this measure is not a special order, and as it is now after 2 o'clock and the bill is on the Calendar, the Chair thinks Rule IX does apply to it; and if it does, then the second provision of the rule that "a motion to proceed to the consideration of any other bill on the Calendar may be made" applies, and such a motion has all the privilege of a question of order, so that the motion is to be decided without amendment and without debate. The Chair will entertain the motion of the Senator from Ohio.

Mr. BLAIR. It does not seem to me that the pleuro-pneumonia bill can at this time, as a matter even of good faith, be brought before the Senate for discussion, certainly not without the opposition of every friend of the pending measure.

The bill relating to common schools was before the Senate for discussion as a special order and laid before the Senate. It had the right of way. The Senator from Kansas [Mr. PLUMB] had introduced this resolution and it was being discussed in the morning hour, at least prior to 2 o'clock. By an explicit arrangement and understanding between ourselves I assented to the informal laying aside of that bill in order that his resolution might be disposed of, he saying that if that was done the pleuro-pneumonia bill proper might be postponed without any opposition from the friends of this resolution, and in fact they would aid in securing the immediate consideration of the school bill. Now that being the fact, the matter went on under this order of the Senate made by unanimous consent:

The PRESIDENT pro tempore—

At 2 o'clock on Friday—

The hour of 2 o'clock having arrived, it becomes the duty of the Chair to lay before the Senate the special order, being the bill (S. 398) to aid in the establishment and temporary support of common schools.

The Senator from Arkansas [Mr. GARLAND] was then speaking. I rose and said:

I have no desire to interfere with the remarks of the Senator from Arkansas. In fact it would, of course, appear to be a discourtesy to him, and after a conference with the friends of the pending joint resolution I have consented that the special order be laid aside informally, to be taken up when the pending measure is disposed of—

It might be during that day, or it might be during to-day, but whenever the pending measure was disposed of the school bill was to be taken up—

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to laying aside the special order informally for the further consideration of the resolution which has been before the Senate? The Chair hears no objection.

Contrary to the expectation of the friends of the resolution, or I think any one else, it consumed the entire day in debate, but with the understanding on my part, and I think it must have been on the part of everybody, that the school bill was simply laid aside informally, the matter went over until to-day. To-day at 2 o'clock, while the honorable Senator who has made this motion was in the chair, I called up the matter again and stated the circumstances; he placed the school bill before the Senate and it was put in that way, that by declaration of the Senate, unanimous consent of the Senate, it stood the same as though again informally laid aside, and it has now the right of way, and by a single objection I suppose the further consideration of this resolution could be prevented and the school bill become at once in order.

I hope under these circumstances the Senator from Ohio will not press his motion. I do not think it would be an act of good faith under all the circumstances.

Mr. SHERMAN. In consideration of the fact that the Senator from New York [Mr. MILLER] who has charge of the pleuro-pneumonia bill states that his purpose is to bring it up as soon as possible before the Senate I withdraw the motion to postpone, and shall make no further opposition to what I regard as an insufficient measure.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Ohio withdraw his motion to postpone for a week?

Mr. SHERMAN. Yes, sir; I withdraw the motion.

Mr. HOAR. I hope the Chair's intimation will not stand as a ruling of the Chair, because I would desire to call the Chair's attention to some considerations connected with it if it were to be a question of order. Of course I shall not take time to do so now.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Texas [Mr. COKE] to amend the paragraph proposed to be stricken out by the motion of the Senator from Ohio [Mr. SHERMAN].

Mr. MORGAN. Let the amendment be read.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It will be read.

The CHIEF CLERK. After the word "agriculture," at the end of the fifth line, it is proposed to insert "with the consent of;" and, in lines 6 and 7, to strike out "of the State of Kansas" and insert "of the State in which it may be used."

Mr. DAWES. Is that all one amendment?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It is strictly two amendments in two different places.

Mr. DAWES. I ask for a division of the question. There seem to be two independent propositions. I should be very glad to vote for the latter one but not for the former.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair thinks the Senator has a right to have the question divided, as there are strictly two separate amendments.

Mr. DAWES. I ask for a division of the question. I do not want any such State-rights doctrine as is implied in the first part of the amendment.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair will then put the question on the first amendment proposed by the Senator from Texas, which is to insert after the word "agriculture," in the fifth line, the words "with the consent of."

Mr. MORGAN. Mr. President, I regret very much that the Senator from Massachusetts should be compelled to express himself on any occasion in favor of the rights of the States against the Federal Government, for I have no doubt that the Senator from Massachusetts, representing an ancient Commonwealth, has brought himself to the conclusion that there is nothing that the United States may desire to do in respect to the matters which rest properly in charge of the States that it may not do.

Mr. DAWES. I do not consent to concede to any other Senator any more solicitation for the just rights of the States than myself. No Senator here will go further than I will go to defend the States in all the rights they have, but I do not propose by any action of mine to set a State up above the United States.

Mr. MORGAN. The State of Massachusetts will not be set above the United States, nor will the State of Kansas, by my consent, except in respect to those powers that belong peculiarly and exclusively under the Constitution to the States; and within those powers I have no doubt that I have the sympathy and the concurrence of all the real, well-instructed publicists in this body when I say that the States are just as supreme within the line and limit of their own sovereignty as the United States is within the limits of its sovereignty.

But the alarm which the Senator from Massachusetts seemed to take at the language which the Senator from Texas desires to strike out of the resolution and incorporate in lieu thereof was based on the idea that it contained some suggestion of State rights. This measure, Mr. President, has undergone a considerable investigation upon questions of constitutional law that are supposed to be involved in it. I do not propose to review the grounds that have been taken, or to undertake to vindicate either of the opinions of Judge Story in his commentaries as expressed on both sides of this question, as he has I believe on both sides of almost every question that he ever indulged in a commentary upon. So far as his authority goes it is certainly very high, very eminent. It leaves every man who is to follow him in discussion and in making up his opinion to his own right of private judgment upon every constitutional question. Perhaps that is the best disposition he could have made of it after all, for I do not think any set of jurists have ever existed in this country who could arrogate to themselves the absolute right of defining in advance and for all coming generations what should be the construction of the Constitution and its application in every particular to the emergencies as they might arise in the course of national administration or State administration in the United States.

I am very glad that our Constitution has an opportunity of growth, something similar to that which has taken place in the constitution of England, predicated upon the solemn judgment of the people as they progress from stage to stage and from year to year in civilization and in the remarkable development of science, of energy, and of prosperity. The words of the Constitution were left purposely to a large extent indefinite, so that we might find in their subsequent application, as I think, that there was not too much friction in any portion of it, but that we were left to a just and fair interpretation of its powers according to the general intent and purpose as expressed in the instrument at large, all its parts being taken together.

While, therefore, I am a strict constructionist of the Constitution in those parts particularly which define the jurisdiction of the two governments which we have to deal with here, the State governments and the National Government, I still am not disposed to deny to the Government of the United States those inherent and necessary powers which belong to it as a government. I find that inherent and necessary power to exist for the purpose of defeating an invasion of an enemy, and for the purpose also under some conditions of providing for the general welfare and common defense, and many other matters which might be defined if I chose to take time to do so.

We have, however, two governments here, one a State government, with its peculiar jurisdiction, another a National Government, with its peculiar and separate jurisdiction; and the difficulty that seems to be presented in this case is whether we are bringing these two governments into collision as to their respective powers by the language of the resolution that we propose to adopt. To my apprehension we are doing this; we are undertaking to usurp and to execute through an act of Congress powers that belong exclusively to the States. I would not go to the extent of saying that the Government of the United States can not appropriate money for the purpose of arresting or, as it is said, of stamping out some great existing or threatening danger to the food supply of this great country; but I would say that the execution of the power of stamping out, repressing, or preventing this disease and its spread is undoubtedly in my opinion confided to the States as a police or, if you please to say so, as a quarantine regulation.

Being thus confided to the States, it is the duty and is the right of the State to take charge of the subject, as has been done in the State of Connecticut so clearly, so forcibly, in its statutes, and in Massachusetts, and also in other States of the Union. Let the States provide the means by which this disease is to be arrested, provide for the condemnation and destruction of whatever property it may be necessary to destroy in order to reach the evil, and then let the United States come in, as it has a perfect right in my opinion to do, and vote a subvention to the States to enable them to pay the part of the expense of this operation which ought justly to be defrayed by the people at large in consideration of the benefits they receive.

I would not object to that; and although my State owes $10,000,000 and is severely crippled by the results of a terrible civil war, and although we have an enormous population to educate in Alabama who have no property and scarcely the means of earning anything of that sort, and although we feel the burdens of local government upon us perhaps very much more severely than the splendid young State of Kansas, which owes but a million of dollars, and has had very large and splendid contributions from the Government of the United States of public lands, &c., I still would vote to tax my people to raise a subvention for the benefit of the State of Kansas if it can be made to appear here that the State of Kansas needs the Government aid of the United States to the extent of raising $25,000. If that does appear here, I will vote it; if it does not appear here, I can not justify myself in giving that vote, for all I can do in my judgment of my constitutional powers and rights is to vote the money of the United States to aid a State which is incapable of aiding herself to the extent required by the calamity that is presented.

Mr. COKE. Will the Senator from Alabama yield for a motion to adjourn?

Mr. MORGAN. I did not expect to speak longer than a moment. I do not care about detaining the Senate further. I have stated as far as I have a right to go. I hold no commission here to legislate for Kansas, and I have no right to go into that State and have cattle killed, and therefore I do not want to do it. I want the Legislature of Kansas, that I understand is about to be in session, to take entire charge of this matter. It is said here that the resolution requires that that shall be done, because what we do here is to be done in co-operation with the State of Kansas. Why, sir, we have no more right to co-operate with the State of Kansas than we have to legislate for her in a matter that belongs to her jurisdiction.

When we send out our Commissioner of Agriculture into Kansas to co-operate with that State we send him out perhaps as a servant, a subordinate, of the State of Kansas to do what? If he does co-operate with the State, only to pay over the money. That is all he can do. He can not co-operate in passing a law to buy cattle at the great prices suggested by the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. WILLIAMS] as being paid for Kentucky cattle. That would soon exhaust the appropriation. There is only enough to pay for three Kentucky bulls in this bill. When he gets there with his $25,000, what will he do? He will first, in order to co-operate with Kansas, find out what Kansas has done. Well, Kansas has not done anything as yet on this subject, because it seems she has no law like Connecticut has, and therefore we must wait until Kansas legislates. If you were to send your Commissioner of Agriculture to Connecticut to co-operate with the State authorities there with $25,000 he would understand precisely what he had to do. The sovereign Commonwealth of Connecticut having enacted her laws on this question, and having a full corps of officials for the purpose of executing them in a lawful and proper way, the co-operation of the Commissioner of Agriculture in that State would be simply to hand over $25,000 to the Connecticut authorities to be expended according to the Connecticut laws.

Now, it is precisely the same case or will be the same case in Kansas, because if Kansas does nothing we can not co-operate except in doing nothing. If she does something by the enactment of a law we co-operate and enable her to carry that law into effect.

Mr. HAWLEY. Allow me to remind the Senator that the Legislature of Kansas will meet to-morrow.

Mr. MORGAN. That is the very proposition I had in view. She has no system as yet. To-morrow she will meet to make a system. After we learn what her system is and what her necessities are, then if it is necessary and proper we can vote a subvention to Kansas to help her to do this thing; or we might pledge her in advance now that we will assume such a portion of this expense as may be properly put to the national account, if there is any portion of it that should go properly to that account. That is the whole case as I understand it.

Now, Mr. President, I am opposed to this calamity legislation. I have been worried to death almost listening here every time a tornado passed over one portion of the country or a rain-storm over another, a hurricane somewhere at sea, or a cattle disease, hog-cholera, trichinosis, or the like, and finding Senators rising in their places and proclaiming to the world that their country was laboring under a great calamity, and that it was necessary for us to hurry up and vote money very quickly in order to stop the invasion of some disease or some great evil about the country.

Mr. MAXEY. Suppose that when the Legislature of Kansas meet to-morrow they should assume that the repression of this cattle disease fell within the police power or police regulation of the State of Kansas, and were to proceed to make laws regulating that, would this Government have any control over those laws or could we interfere with that right of the State?

Mr. MORGAN. Not a particle in the world; and if she were to make such regulations it would only establish, so far as Kansas understands it and as we all must understand it, that she has a right to pass those regulations; and if she have the right to pass these police regulations I do not see where we get the power to do it. We can aid her with money, but we can not aid her with legislation. We can furnish her any supply of money that is in the Treasury of the United States that may be necessary, but we can not furnish her with any law to manage the thing within her own borders. That is the point I make.

About three or four weeks ago there was sent to the Committee on Foreign Relations a very just series of resolutions relating to the fact that our meats had been excluded from foreign countries because they were alleged to be diseased with trichinosis. That committee have had that subject under consideration, and I hope will be very soon able to report upon it. The Senate debated that subject for a day or two—a very important question. The legislation that was proposed here was upon the hypothesis that we had not been fairly dealt with in foreign countries in respect of the estimate those countries put upon meats we shipped abroad; that there was a false clamor over there about this business. I should like to know, after the debate that has been carried on in the Senate for two days upon this new calamity, how much injury have we inflicted upon the actual value of the cattle that are to be exported to foreign countries. Why, sir, it will rate by millions of dollars necessarily; and yet while we are doing this one of the Senators from Kansas informs us that he believes the whole subject is much overstated; he believes that there is not any great ground for apprehension as to the exigency or the extent or the importance of this invasion of disease among the cattle in Kansas. I hope that that Senator is correct about it, and I am very strongly inclined to believe that he is.

Twenty-five thousand dollars is sought to be appropriated by this resolution to stamp out this enormous national calamity. Why, sir, the nations abroad will laugh at us if they believe that we are in earnest in assuming that there is such a calamity visiting the cattle of this country when we stop the appropriation at $25,000. They, I hope, will come to the conclusion that a good deal of this clamor has originated in an earnest desire on the part of Senators to express themselves favorably to the interest of a very powerful voting population in the United States—the farmers. I hope they will come to that conclusion, for if they should not I think our steamships—not ours, but some other body's steamships—that have been loaded with cattle across the Atlantic for years past will not have cargoes to foreign countries after a while.

If we had let this matter alone and allowed the State of Kansas or Missouri or wherever else this disease may exist to deal with it as the people of Alabama deal with the cotton-worm and as the other visitations upon the crops of the country are dealt with by the States, we should have served our country very much better than to bring in a resolution for $25,000 to stamp out a disease which is said to be national in its importance. If this disease ought to be stamped out by Congress, this bill ought not to stop at $25,000. That is paltering with the subject. It ought to be a million dollars perhaps; it ought to be a sum large enough so that the whole resources of this Government as far as may be needed can be concentrated on the purpose of stamping out this disease and so that the nations of the earth will understand that that is exactly what we are doing.

The people of Alabama have no particular interest in whether the mouth-and-foot disease is in Kansas or not so far as the consumption of beef is concerned, for we get little or perhaps no supply of beef from that quarter; and so there are very few people outside of the large Northern and Northeastern cities that have any concern in this matter. The real concern about the existence of this disease after all, so far as it affects the particular market, is beyond the water.

Now, sir, if we allow these questions to go to the departments where they properly belong, the governments of the different States, and allow them to deal with these questions without continually hauling them up in Congress for the purpose of making the world understand how many calamitous visitations there are upon our cattle, we shall serve our country to a very much better purpose than we can possibly do by passing resolutions of this kind or assuming doubtful jurisdiction over questions of this kind.

I will not, Mr. President, stop now to debate the constitutional questions which have been involved in this controversy any further than I have; merely stated my personal opinion.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the first amendment proposed by the Senator from Texas [Mr. COKE], on which the yeas and nays have been ordered.

Mr. MCMILLAN. Let the amendment be reported.

The CHIEF CLERK. It is proposed to insert the words "with the consent of" after the word "agriculture," in line 5.

The Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. BECK (when his name was called). I am paired on all matters connected with this question with the Senator from Maine [Mr. HALE], who is necessarily absent.

Mr. DAWES (when his name was called). On this vote I am paired with the Senator from Delaware [Mr. SAULSBURY]. If present, he would vote "yea" and I should vote "nay."

Mr. HAMPTON (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. ANTHONY].

Mr. MANDERSON (when his name was called). On this resolution I was paired with the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. BUTLER]. If present, I understand that he would vote "yea" on this amendment. I transfer my pair, however, to the Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. ALDRICH], and vote "nay."

Mr. MORGAN (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from New York [Mr. LAPHAM].

Mr. VAN WYCK (when his name was called). I am paired for the day with the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. LAMAR]. He is opposed to the resolution and I am in favor of it.

The roll-call was concluded.

Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin (after having voted in the affirmative). I agreed to pair with the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. JACKSON]. I withdraw my vote.

Mr. MORGAN. My pair with the Senator from New York [Mr. LAPHAM] is transferred to the Senator from Louisiana [Mr. JONAS], who is absent. I vote "yea."

Mr. CAMDEN. I desire to announce that my colleague [Mr. KENNA], who is absent, is paired on all political questions with the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. MITCHELL].

The result was announced—yeas 18, nays 24; as follows:

YEAS—18.

Brown,	Colquitt,	Hawley,	Ransom,
Call,	Farley,	Ingalls,	Vest,
Camden,	George,	Maxey,	Williams.
Cockrell,	Gorman,	Morgan,
Coke,	Harris,	Plumb,

NAYS—24.

Allison,	Garland,	Miller of N. Y.,	Platt,
Bayard,	Hill,	Miller of Cal.,	Pugh,
Blair,	Hoar,	Mitchell,	Sawyer,
Conger,	Logan,	Morrill,	Sherman,
Cullom,	McMillan,	Pendleton,	Voorhees,
Edmunds,	Manderson,	Pike,	Wilson.

ABSENT—34.

Aldrich,	Fair,	Jones of Florida,	Sabin,
Anthony,	Frye,	Jones of Nevada,	Saulsbury,
Beck,	Gibson,	Kenna,	Sewell,
Bowen,	Groome,	Lamar,	Slater,
Butler,	Hale,	Lapham,	Vance,
Cameron of Pa.,	Hampton,	McPherson,	Van Wyck,
Cameron of Wis.,	Harrison,	Mahone,	Walker.
Dawes,	Jackson,	Palmer,
Dolph,	Jonas,	Riddleberger,

So the amendment was rejected.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question recurs on the second amendment proposed by the Senator from Texas [Mr. COKE], on which the yeas and nays have been ordered. The amendment will be read.

The CHIEF CLERK. In lines 6 and 7, after the word "authorities," it is proposed to strike out "of the State of Kansas" and insert in lieu thereof the words "of the States in which it may be used."

Mr. ALLISON. I do not understand that the yeas and nays have been ordered on this amendment.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The yeas and nays, as the Chair understands, were ordered on the whole amendment, which was treated as one at that time, of the Senator from Texas; but the matter being divided, the Chair supposes the order for the yeas and nays applied to both parts.

Mr. ALLISON. Then I ask unanimous consent that the order directing the yeas and nays to be taken on this amendment be rescinded.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the suggestion? The Chair hears none, and the order for the yeas and nays is rescinded. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question now recurs on the motion of the Senator from Ohio [Mr. SHERMAN] to strike out the words which will be read.

The CHIEF CLERK. The words proposed to be stricken out are:

And in co-operation with the proper authorities of the States in which it may be used in eradicating a contagious disease popularly known as the foot-and-mouth disease, now prevailing to an alarming extent among the cattle of that State; the expenditure of the above sum, or any part thereof, to be limited to the emergency now existing.

Mr. PLUMB. I think the object of the Senator from Ohio is accomplished by the adoption of the latter portion of the amendment of the Senator from Texas.

Mr. SHERMAN. And striking out in lines 8 and 9 the words:

Now prevailing to an alarming extent among the cattle of that State.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will report the part proposed to be stricken out on the motion of the Senator from Ohio.

The CHIEF CLERK. In lines 6 and 7 it is proposed to strike out "and in co-operation with the proper authorities of the State of Kansas."

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. VEST. Mr. President——

Mr. SHERMAN. The words following ought to be stricken out by common consent:

Now prevailing to an alarming extent among the cattle of that State.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Missouri has the floor. Does the Senator from Missouri yield to the suggestion of the Senator from Ohio?

Mr. VEST. Yes, sir.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Then the question is on the amendment of the Senator from Ohio to strike out the words—

Now prevailing to an alarming extent among the cattle of that State.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. VEST. Now I move to insert, after the word "disease," in the eighth line, the words:

So as to prevent the spreading of said disease to other States or Territories.

Mr. PLUMB. I have no objection to that.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Missouri [Mr. VEST].

Mr. MORRILL. If the Senator from Missouri will withdraw the words "to other States or Territories" I think he will accomplish all his purpose.

Mr. VEST. I have no particular choice about the language. I do not believe Congress has the right to legislate as to a disease inside of a State except to prevent its spreading to other States or Territories. That is the whole of it. If that is the purpose of the resolution, as the mover says it is, I can see no objection to putting in this language, so as to put that construction beyond a doubt.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Missouri [Mr. VEST].

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. INGALLS. Now, Mr. President, as we have got through with the various amendments, it would be interesting to know precisely how the resolution reads at this time. I ask that it may be reported in full as it has been amended.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The resolution will be read as amended if there be no objection.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, &c., That the sum of $25,000, or so much thereof as is necessary, be, and hereby is, appropriated, to be used under the direction of the Commissioner of Agriculture and in co-operation with the proper authorities in the States in which it may be used, in eradicating a contagious disease popularly known as the foot-and-mouth disease, so as to prevent the spreading of said disease to other States or Territories; the expenditure of the above sum, or any part thereof, to be limited to the emergency now existing; and a full report of such expenditure and the result thereof to be made to Congress by the Commissioner of Agriculture at the earliest practicable date.

Mr PLUMB. I move to strike out "twenty-five" and insert "fifty;" so as to make the appropriation $50,000.

Mr. CULLOM. I hope that will be done.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Kansas [Mr. PLUMB].

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. BAYARD. I sent to the desk an amendment some time since that I should like to have now considered.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Delaware proposes an amendment which will be read.

The CHIEF CLERK. In lines 6 and 7 it is proposed to strike out:

In co-operation with the proper authorities of the States in which it may be used, in eradicating.

And insert in lieu thereof:

To obtain and disseminate information in relation to the treatment, cure, and prevention of.

Mr. PLUMB. That would destroy the measure.

Mr. BAYARD. I will state that I am perfectly willing that this amount shall be given for the purpose of gaining all the information that may be necessary (probably a great deal of which may be difficult to obtain by State means) to instruct the people of this country in the proper manner of arresting the disease and preventing its inoculation; but I am not willing, under this process of eradication, to commit the Treasury of the United States, as it will be committed by this resolution, not to the $50,000 appropriated; that will be but a drop in the bucket; it will be a mere flea-bite compared with the damages that must be paid out of the Treasury, should this amount of $50,000 or $25,000 or any other sum be appropriated as the entering-wedge to the responsibility of the Treasury of the United States for the destruction of cattle under the system of eradication which is proposed by this measure.

That is all I propose to say by way of explanation. I ask for the yeas and nays on my amendment.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. MANDERSON (when Mr. ALDRICH'S name was called). I announce the pair of the Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. ALDRICH] with the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. BUTLER]. I understand the Senator from Rhode Island would vote "nay."

Mr. BECK (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from Maine [Mr. HALE].

Mr. MITCHELL (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from West Virginia [Mr. KENNA].

Mr. MORGAN (when his name was called). I announce the pair between the Senator from New York [Mr. LAPHAM] and the Senator from Louisiana [Mr. JONAS]. I vote "yea."

The roll-call was concluded.

Mr. MITCHELL. My pair with the Senator from West Virginia [Mr. KENNA] has been transferred to the Senator from Indiana [Mr. HARRISON]. I vote "nay."

The result was announced—yeas 14, nays 28; as follows:

YEAS—14.

Bayard,	Colquitt,	Jackson,	Pugh,
Brown,	Farley,	Maxey,	Vest.
Camden,	Gorman,	Morgan,
Coke.	Harris,	Pendleton,

NAYS—28.

Allison,	Edmunds,	McMillan,	Platt,
Blair,	Garland,	Manderson,	Plumb,
Call,	George,	Miller of Cal.,	Sabin,
Cameron of Wis.,	Hawley,	Miller of N. Y.,	Sawyer,
Cockrell,	Hill,	Mitchell,	Voorhees,
Conger,	Ingalls,	Morrill,	Williams,
Cullom,	Logan,	Pike,	Wilson.

ABSENT—34.

Aldrich,	Frye,	Jones of Nevada,	Saulsbury,
Anthony,	Gibson,	Kenna,	Sewell,
Beck,	Groome,	Lamar,	Sherman,
Bowen,	Hale,	Lapham,	Slater,
Butler,	Hampton,	McPherson,	Vance,
Cameron of Pa.,	Harrison,	Mahone,	Van Wyck,
Dawes,	Hoar,	Palmer,	Walker.
Dolph,	Jonas,	Ransom,
Fair,	Jones of Florida,	Riddleberger,

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. PLUMB. I offer the following amendment, to come in at the close of the resolution:

Provided, That no action of the Commissioner of Agriculture hereunder shall commit the Government beyond the amount herein appropriated.

The amendment was agreed to.

The joint resolution was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments made as in Committee of the Whole were concurred in.

The joint resolution was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, and read the third time.

Mr. BAYARD. I ask for the yeas and nays on the passage of the resolution.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. HAMPTON (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. ANTHONY]. I should vote "nay" were he present.

Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin (when Mr. HARRISON'S name was called). The Senator from Indiana [Mr. HARRISON] has been called home by pressing professional business. During his absence he is paired with the Senator from West Virginia [Mr. KENNA]. He requested me to announce the pair.

Mr. MANDERSON (when his name was called). I was paired with the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. BUTLER], but the pair has been transferred to the Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. ALDRICH]. I vote "yea."

Mr. MORGAN (when his name was called). I announce the pair between the the Senator from New York [Mr. LAPHAM] and the Senator from Louisiana [Mr. JONAS]. I vote "nay."

The roll-call was concluded.

Mr. CAMDEN. I wish to state that my colleague [Mr. KENNA] is paired with the Senator from Indiana [Mr. HARRISON].

The result was announced—yeas 29, nays 14; as follows:

YEAS—29.

Allison,	Garland,	Manderson,	Sawyer,
Blair,	George,	Miller of Cal.,	Vest.
Call,	Hawley,	Miller of N. Y.,	Voorhees,
Cameron of Wis.,	Hill,	Mitchell,	Williams,
Cockrell,	Hoar,	Morrill,	Wilson.
Conger,	Ingalls,	Pike,
Cullom,	Logan,	Plumb,
Edmunds,	McMillan,	Sabin,

NAYS—14.

Bayard,	Colquitt,	Jackson,	Pugh,
Brown,	Farley,	Maxey,	Ransom.
Camden,	Gorman,	Morgan,
Coke,	Harris,	Pendleton,

ABSENT—33.

Aldrich,	Frye,	Kenna,	Sewell,
Anthony,	Gibson,	Lamar,	Sherman,
Beck,	Groome,	Lapham,	Slater,
Bowen,	Hale,	McPherson,	Vance,
Butler,	Hampton,	Mahone,	Van Wyck,
Cameron of Pa.,	Harrison,	Palmer,	Walker.
Dawes,	Jonas,	Platt,
Dolph,	Jones of Florida,	Riddleberger,
Fair,	Jones of Nevada,	Saulsbury,

So the joint resolution was passed.

AID TO COMMON SCHOOLS.

Mr. BLAIR. I ask that the regular order be laid before the Senate.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from New Hampshire calls for the regular order, which is the first special order, being the bill

(S. 398) to aid in the establishment and temporary support of common schools.

Mr. CONGER. I move that the Senate adjourn.

NAMING OF A PRESIDING OFFICER.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Before putting the question the Chair again asks unanimous consent of the Senate, if the Chair shall be obliged to leave town to-morrow, that the Senator from Ohio [Mr. SHERMAN] may preside for the next three days. Is there objection? The Chair hears no objection, and it is so ordered. It is moved that the Senate do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and (at 5 o'clock and 51 minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

MONDAY, March 17, 1884.

The House met at 12 o'clock m. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. JOHN S. LINDSAY, D. D.

The Journal of the proceedings of Saturday last was read and approved.

ANNA ROSELLA BRUMIDI.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of State, transmitting a dispatch from the consul-general of the United States at Rome in relation to the rights of Anna Rossella Brumidi, widow of Constantine Brumidi, fresco painter of the Capitol building, with inclosure accompanying the same; which was referred to the Committee on Claims.

CALIFORNIA AND OREGON RAILROAD.

Mr. BELFORD. I ask consent to submit my individual views as one of the minority of the Committee on Public Lands upon the bill reported last Saturday from that committee to declare forfeited certain land grants to aid in the construction of a railroad from the Central Pacific Railroad in California to Portland, in Oregon, and that it be printed with the report of the majority.

There was no objection; and the views were received and ordered to be printed with the report of the majority.

JEANNETTE ARCTIC EXPEDITION.

Mr. BUCHANAN. By instruction of the Committee on Naval Affairs I ask consent to submit for present consideration the resolution which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That the Clerk of the House of Representatives be directed to pay out of the appropriation for contingent expenses of the House all the expenses incurred by the Committee on Naval Affairs under the resolution to investigate the conduct of the Jeannette Arctic expedition upon vouchers approved by the chairman of said committee: Provided, That all such expenditures under this resolution shall not exceed the sum of $5,000.

Mr. HOLMAN. I hope there will be some explanation as to whether it is believed any further investigation is required.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will permit the explanation to be made subject to the right to object to consider the resolution at the present time.

Mr. BUCHANAN. On the motion of the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. WASHBURN] the House adopted a resolution directing the Committee on Naval Affairs to investigate the conduct and management of the Jeannette Arctic expedition, and that resolution was sent to the Committee on Naval Affairs. Nothing can be done in that investigation until an appropriation has been made to pay the expenses; not one single solitary step can be taken until this resolution or some other is adopted providing for paying the expenses of the investigation. That is the object of the resolution, and it limits the expenditures to $5,000.

Mr. CHACE. Is there any possibility that the expenditures can approach the sum of $5,000?

Mr. BUCHANAN. I do not know what the investigation will cost. The witnesses are scattered, and the expense of bringing them here will be great.

Mr. CHACE. There can not be many witnesses in the case.

Mr. BUCHANAN. We have notice already of fourteen or fifteen.

Mr. BROWNE, of Indiana. What is the necessity for making this investigation?

Mr. BUCHANAN. It is not for me to say anything as to the propriety of making the investigation; the House has already ordered it.

Mr. WASHBURN. I desire to say that I introduced the resolution referred to, and it was based upon a memorial of a very reliable and intelligent citizen of my own district. In that memorial he makes very grave charges, and states that the investigation which was undertaken by the Navy Department a year and a half or two years ago was a sham.

I think it but justice to the living and to the dead that this investigation should be made, and made thoroughly, and made at once. We are now about sending out another expedition to the Arctic regions, and I think it is well for the country to know how such expeditions have been managed in the past. I hope the resolution will be adopted and the necessary funds supplied to meet the expenses of the investigation.

Mr. HOLMAN. I would like to inquire of the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. WASHBURN] whether he himself has investigated the subject sufficiently to be satisfied that the investigation made by the commission appointed by the Navy Department was not thorough and able?

Mr. WASHBURN. I have.

Mr. HOLMAN. You think it was not.

Mr. WASHBURN. I think it was not; I think it was a whitewashing affair.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the resolution which has been read?

Mr. MILLER, of Pennsylvania. I object.

The SPEAKER. Objection is made, and the resolution is not before the House.

Some time subsequently,

Mr. BUCHANAN said: I ask that the resolution which I submitted in reference to expenses of the investigation of the Jeannette Arctic expedition may be referred to the Committee on Accounts.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. MILLER, of Pennsylvania. At the request of the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. WASHBURN] I withdraw my objection to the resolution.

The SPEAKER. Is there further objection to the present consideration of the resolution? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none, and the resolution is before the House.

The resolution was adopted.

Mr. BUCHANAN moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was adopted; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

ALASKA COMMERCIAL COMPANY.

Mr. HENLEY, by unanimous consent, submitted the following; which was referred to the Committee on Ways and Means:

Whereas on the 3d day of August, A. D. 1870, the Acting Secretary of the Treasury of the United States, under an act of Congress approved July 1, 1870, made and entered into a contract or lease with the Alaska Commercial Company, acting through its president and agent, General John F. Miller, whereby for a term of twenty years from the date thereof the Government of the United States leased to said company, for an annual rental of $50,000, the exclusive right to engage in the business of taking fur seals from the islands adjacent to the Territory of Alaska and pertaining thereto, limiting in said lease the number of skins to be taken to 100,000 annually, for which said company was to pay to the Government of the United States the sum of $2 per skin; and

Whereas from the contents of Executive Document No. 83, first session of the Forty-fourth Congress, and from a petition presented to the House of Representatives on the — day of March, A. D. 1884, and from the market reports of the prices of sealskins in London, the following facts seem to exist:

First. That said lease and contract in its operations constitutes a monopoly of the most odious character, and is therefore inconsistent with the spirit of American institutions and inimical to the interests of the United States Government.

Second. That the said Acting Secretary of the Treasury, in making said lease with said company, was guilty of favoritism and misconduct in that only twelve days' notice was given to those desiring to bid for said lease, the same being palpably insufficient to afford parties time and opportunity to make preparation to put in the bids required. That the terms upon which said bids were received were embraced in the memorandum of which the following is a copy:

"OFFICE OF THE SECRETARY, July 20, 1870.

"Memorandum in reference to bids for the exclusive right to take fur seals upon the islands Saint Paul and Saint George, read before the persons present at the opening of the bids at 12 o'clock noon, July 20, 1870:

"1. The successful bidder will be required to deposit security, within three days, to the amount of $50,000 in legal money or bonds of the United States, for the due execution of contracts agreeably to an act to prevent the extermination of fur-bearing animals in Alaska, approved July 1, 1870.

"2. It being apparent from the language employed in the act aforesaid that it was the intention of Congress to give a preference to the Alaska Commercial Company in the award of their contracts, I think it proper to state before the bids are opened that the contract will be awarded to said company if their proposals shall be not more than 10 per cent. below that of the highest bidder.

"3. No bid will be accepted unless made by a responsible party acquainted with the business or skilled in kindred pursuits to such an extent as to render it probable that the contract will be so executed as to secure the results contemplated by the lease."

Third. That said company made a bid for said lease of $65,000 per annum, which was the lowest bid out of fourteen which were made. That notwithstanding the fact that all of the fourteen bids were higher than that of the Alaska Fur Company, said company was awarded the said lease.

Fourth. That the cost of laying down sealskins in London, including the Government royalty, price of killing, salting, shipping, freight to Europe, &c., amounts to about $5 per skin. That the average value of raw, undressed sealskins is, at public auction, in London, about $24 per skin, leaving a net profit of about $20 per skin. These figures represent the profit of this company, providing the company in London put their skins up and sell them at public auction; but if they choose to pay for the dressing, dyeing, and general preparation of the skins and putting them in condition to be immediately fashioned into garments, the net profit per skin must necessarily be not less than $30. From the foregoing figures it will be seen that if the company has hitherto limited itself to the taking of the hundred thousand sealskins provided for in the lease, or has, in other words, dealt honestly by the Government, its net profits have annually been from $1,000,750 per year to $3,500,000 per year.

Fifth. That under the law regulating the supervision of this lease and the manner in which it is executed by said company there are only three agents of the Government in the Territory of Alaska; one on the island of Saint Paul; one on the island of Saint George, and one presumably visiting both islands periodically, whose duties are to count the skins which are taken and shipped by said company, each one of these agents being paid by the Government a small compensation; so that it will be seen that between any disposition on the part of this company to exceed the number of skins permitted to be taken under the lease and the rights of the Government there stands practically but one man, whose integrity is thus assailed by the temptation of millions of dollars.

Sixth. That from the allegations of the petition hereinbefore referred to and from current newspaper rumor it is alleged that said company does take as many skins as it chooses in excess of the number limited in said lease.

Seventh. That if it be consistent with American institutions to continue this character of monopoly, it is plain that the Government should be realizing at least $1,000,000 each year instead of, as at present, $250,000: Now, therefore,

Be it resolved, That the Speaker of the House of Representatives be, and he is hereby, authorized and instructed to appoint a committee of five members of the House, whose duty it shall be to inquire into the truth of the statements hereinbefore recited, and whether or not said lease is monopolistic in its character and was procured through corruption or favoritism, and whether such lease is conducive to the best interests of the Government of the United States, and whether it would be just and expedient for the Government to terminate the same and to take charge of said islands, and to take upon itself the care and custody of the seal life on said islands and of the waters of Alaska Territory; and that said committee shall, when so constituted, be authorized to employ a stenographer, with full power to send for persons and papers, and to sit during an interim between the first and second sessions of the Forty-eighth Congress.

EMPLOYÉS IN DOORKEEPER'S DEPARTMENT.

Mr. SHELLEY submitted the following resolution; which was referred to the Committee on Accounts:

Resolved, That the Committee on Accounts is hereby authorized to take into consideration the advisability of adjusting the salaries of the officers and employés in the Doorkeeper's department, House of Representatives, with the view of paying to them the same compensation now paid to the officers and employés in the Senate of the United States performing similar duties and responsibilities, and thereby place them upon an equality with the same, and to report to the House by bill or otherwise.

CONSTRUCTION OF PUBLIC BUILDINGS.

Mr. CONNOLLY submitted the following resolution; which was referred to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds:

Resolved, That the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds be, and they are hereby, authorized and directed to inquire into all matters pertaining to the preparation and furnishing of all material for the construction of public buildings, and the manner of constructing the buildings of the United States under the different systems adopted by the Government of the United States, and to report to this House by bill or otherwise what legislation is necessary to secure good material and good and suitable work; and said committee are further instructed to inquire into all expenses pertaining to the erection of the public buildings of the United States, and to make all such further inquiries as they may deem proper. And said committee are further authorized to send for persons and papers and to administer oaths; and said committee are further authorized to employ a stenographer, and to secure the services of one or more experts, and such clerical aid as may be requisite; and said committee are further authorized to appoint a subcommittee of its own members for the purpose of pursuing these investigations, said subcommittee when appointed to have all the powers conferred by this resolution; and said committee or its subcommittee may make its investigations either in the city of Washington, or at any other city or other place where public buildings are being erected, or where any material has been or is being prepared, if they may deem proper; and said committee or its subcommittee may sit during the sessions or recesses of Congress; and the expenses attending the carrying out of these investigations shall be paid out of the contingent fund of the House of Representatives, not to exceed $5,000, and the Clerk of the House of Representatives is hereby authorized and directed to pay the same.

MILITARY ORGANIZATIONS OF THE REVOLUTION.

Mr. SEYMOUR presented the following resolution of the Legislature of the State of Connecticut, relating to the history of the military organizations of the war of the Revolution; which was referred to the Committee on Pensions, and ordered to be printed in the RECORD:

GENERAL ASSEMBLY, January Session, A. D. 1884.

Relating to the history of the military organizations of the war of the Revolution.

Whereas the greater part of the original rolls and orderly books of the Connecticut officers and soldiers of the Continental army in the war of the Revolution are on file in the Pension Office, Department of the Interior, at Washington, D. C., where they are practically inaccessible to the citizens of this State, having been loaned to the General Government after the destruction of the War Department in 1800; and

Whereas the same is believed to be true of the Revolutionary rolls of all the thirteen original States; and

Whereas these rolls furnish the only official evidence in existence of the names, services, and military careers of the officers and soldiers of the Revolutionary war; and

Whereas it is a matter of great historic interest that these records should be preserved in a durable and accessible form, as well as a due measure of justice to the memory of the patriotic men who achieved our national independence: Therefore,

Resolved by this Assembly:

SEC. 1. That our Senators and Representatives in Congress be requested to use their best efforts to cause Congress to adopt the recommendation of the Commissioner of Pensions and make provision for collecting materials for and for publishing a complete history of the military organizations of the war of the Revolution.

SEC. 2. That the secretary of state be, and he is hereby, directed to forward a certified copy of this resolution to each of our Senators and Representatives in Congress.

House of Representatives, passed February 20, 1884.

Senate, passed February 27, 1884.

STATE OF CONNECTICUT, ss:

OFFICE OF SECRETARY OF STATE.

I hereby certify that the foregoing is a true copy on file in this office.

In testimony whereof I have hereunto set my hand and affixed the seal of said State at Hartford this 7th day of March, A. D. 1884.

[SEAL.] D. WARD NORTHROP,
Secretary of State.

Mr. WAIT presented a resolution of the Legislature of the State of Connecticut, relating to the rolls and record books of the State now in possession of the United States, that show the officers of the Revolution from Connecticut; which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

SPECULATION IN CORN, WHEAT, COTTON, ETC.

Mr. HATCH, of Missouri. I submit by request the resolution which I send to the Clerk's desk, and ask that it be referred to the Committee on Agriculture.

The SPEAKER. Is it a resolution of inquiry?

Mr. HATCH, of Missouri. It is a resolution calling upon the Commissioner of Agriculture for certain information.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will admit the resolution, although the Commissioner of Agriculture is not the head of a department. The Chair supposes the information would come to the House through the Secretary of the Interior, to whom the Commissioner would report.

The preamble and resolution, as follows, was received, and referred to the Committee on Agriculture:

Whereas it is publicly charged and almost universally known that the weekly speculative or option sales of wheat are largely in excess of the annual surplus amount of that cereal produced in this country; and

Whereas it is also charged that the effect of such sales of wheat, corn, cotton, and other products of industry have reached such an extent as to control their price in home and foreign markets, to compel farmers to compete with scores of crops each year, when but one is actually produced; to force consumers to pay unreasonable prices for such property after it has passed out of the hands of those who toil to produce it, to encourage a spirit of gambling, hazardous to business men, dangerous to youth, destructive to society, and otherwise demoralizing in its influence: Therefore,

Resolved, That the Commissioner of Agriculture be, and he hereby is, authorized and directed to examine into and report to this House at his earliest convenience all facts relating to the questions above referred to; also whether any combinations of home or foreign capital has been or is now being used to detain any of such property at certain points, through discriminating charges against its shipment or otherwise, calculated to convey a wrong impression regarding the amount on hand or its actual value before another crop is produced.

Second. Said Commissioner is further authorized to send for persons and papers and to do all things necessary to obtain information for this House and the country on the effect of such sales and combinations on the market value of such property and their influence on producers, consumers, and society.

SALLIE A. PALMER.

Mr. LE FEVRE introduced a bill (H. R. 6067) granting a pension to Sallie A. Palmer; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Invalid Pensions, and ordered to be printed.

JOSEPH ROMISER.

Mr. McCOMAS introduced a bill (H. R. 6068) to grant a pension to Joseph Romiser; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Invalid Pensions, and ordered to be printed.

THOMAS A. WESTON.

Mr. AIKEN (by request) introduced a bill (H. R. 6069) for the relief of Thomas A. Weston; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Patents, and ordered to be printed.

JAMES RYAN AND CORNELIUS O'CONNOR.

Mr. O'NEILL, of Missouri, introduced a bill (H. R. 6070) to amend the records of the War Department; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Military Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

CATHERINE MEHAN.

Mr. O'NEILL, of Missouri, also introduced a bill (H. R. 6071) for the relief of Catherine Mehan; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Invalid Pensions, and ordered to be printed.

LAND OFFICE MAP OF THE UNITED STATES.

Mr. O'NEILL, of Missouri, also introduced a joint resolution (H. Res. 208) providing for printing additional copies of the Land Office map of the United States for distribution by Senators and Representatives; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Printing, and ordered to be printed.

CATHERINE SULLIVAN.

Mr. RANNEY introduced a bill (H. R. 6072) to grant a pension to Catherine Sullivan; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Invalid Pensions, and ordered to be printed.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. WELLER. I call for the regular order.

Mr. HATCH, of Missouri. I ask unanimous consent to have an order to print in the RECORD, and as a document, for the information of the House, a letter from the Secretary of the Interior, transmitting a dispatch from Mr. Lowell, American minister at London, concerning measures which have been introduced into the British Parliament for the prevention of foot-and-mouth disease in the United Kingdom.

The SPEAKER. The Chair can not entertain the request of the gentleman from Missouri unless the demand for the regular order is withdrawn. Is the demand withdrawn?

Mr. WELLER. I insist on the regular order.

The SPEAKER. This being the third Monday of the month, the regular order is the call of committees for motions to suspend the rules. The call rests with the Committee on Claims.

No motion to suspend the rules was made by the Committee on Claims.

PRIVATE LAND CLAIMS.

Mr. MULDROW. I am instructed by the Committee on Private Land Claims to move that the rules be suspended and that the resolution which I send to the desk be adopted.

Mr. WELLER. Understanding now the nature of the request of the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. HATCH], I withdraw the demand for the regular order.

The SPEAKER. It is too late for the gentleman to do so. The regular order is now proceeding and there is a matter before the House. The Clerk will report the resolution sent up by the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. MULDROW].

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That Senate bill No. 19, to provide for ascertaining and settling private land claims in certain States and Territories, be made a special order for Tuesday,

April 15, after the morning hour, to continue from day to day until disposed of, not to interfere with regular appropriation or revenue bills, or the consideration of reports from the Committee on Public Lands, or prior orders.

The SPEAKER. Is a second demanded?

Mr. HOLMAN. I believe this order is confined to one bill?

Mr. MULDROW. It is.

The SPEAKER. No second having been demanded, the question is on suspending the rules and adopting the resolution.

The rules were suspended (two-thirds voting in favor thereof) and the resolution was adopted.

STANDING ASIDE JURORS.

Mr. OATES. I am instructed by the Committee on the Revision of the Laws to move that the rules be suspended and that the bill (H. R. 3346) to amend section 819 of the Revised Statutes of the United States and regulate the standing of jurors to the foot of the panel be taken from the House Calendar and passed.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That section 819, of title 13, chapter 15, of the Revised Statutes of the United States be amended so as to read as follows, namely:

"When the offense charged is treason or a capital offense the defendant shall be entitled to twenty and the United States to five peremptory challenges; and the United States in such cases, and in no other cases whatever, shall also, in conformity with the practice in any State, have the right in that State to stand jurors aside and not show the cause of disqualification or challenge until the venire be gone through. On the trial of any other felony the defendant shall be entitled to ten and the United States to three peremptory challenges; and in all other cases, civil and criminal, each party shall be entitled to three peremptory challenges; and in all cases where there are several defendants or several plaintiffs the parties on each side shall be deemed a single party for the purposes of all challenges under this section. All challenges, whether to the array or panel or to individual jurors, for cause or favor, shall be tried by the court, without the aid of triers."

Mr. HOLMAN. I call for a second.

Mr. SPRINGER. I ask unanimous consent that the second be considered as ordered, so as to avoid the necessity of a vote by tellers.

The SPEAKER. Is there unanimous consent that a second be considered as ordered?

Mr. JOHN S. WISE. I object.

The SPEAKER. The Chair appoints as tellers the gentleman from Alabama, Mr. OATES, and the gentleman from Indiana, Mr. HOLMAN.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 117, noes 57.

So the motion to suspend the rules was seconded.

The SPEAKER. Under the rules thirty minutes will be allowed for debate, fifteen in support of the motion to suspend the rules and fifteen in opposition to it. The gentleman from Alabama, Mr. OATES, has control of the time in support of the motion and the gentleman from Indiana, Mr. HOLMAN, if he is opposed to the bill, will control the time in opposition.

Mr. HOLMAN. I will not say I ought to control the time. My purpose in calling for a second was simply to obtain an explanation why so large a discrimination is made between the Government and the defendant in this matter.

The SPEAKER. The Chair then will give the control of the time in opposition to some gentleman who desires to oppose the bill.

Mr. CALKINS. I desire to oppose it.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Indiana, Mr. CALKINS, will control the time in opposition to the bill.

Mr. OATES. I ask for the reading of the report, which, if gentlemen will give attention to it, will fully explain to them the object and purpose of the bill.

The SPEAKER. The reading of the report comes out of the time allowed for debate.

The Clerk read the report, as follows:

Mr. OATES, from the Committee on the Revision of the Laws, submitted the following report (to accompany bill H. R. 3346):

The Committee on the Revision of the Laws, to whom was referred bill H. R. 3346, submit the following report:

The amendment of section 819 of the Revised Statutes proposed by the bill is in these words:

"And the United States in such cases, and in no other cases whatever, shall, also, in conformity with the practice in any State, have the right in that State to stand jurors aside and not show the cause of disqualification or challenge until the venire be gone through."

This standing of jurors aside is a sort of temporary objection to them, which does not preclude the prosecution from afterward accepting those once stood at the foot of the panel. The practice of standing aside jurors originated in Great Britain after the enactment of thirty-third of Edward the Third, which took away from the crown altogether the right of peremptory challenge of jurors, and it still prevails in some of the States of the American Union as common law. This rule, however, is applicable only in capital cases. The spirit and intent of the judiciary act were to require the courts of the United States to adopt, as far as practicable, the rules of judicial procedure in the States where such courts are held. The practice of standing aside jurors now prevails but in a small number of the States, and in these the rule is never applied except in the trial of capital felonies. In these States, however, the committee are unanimously of the opinion that the practice, if resorted to at all, should, with uniformity, be applied in the courts of the United States; but when thus applied or invoked it should be limited to the trial of cases of treason or felonies punishable capitally. To extend such a practice to the trial of misdemeanors and felonies not punished capitally in the courts of the United States, from whose judgments of conviction there is no appeal, would be in some cases tantamount to denying the defendant a fair and impartial trial by a jury of his peers.

The practice of standing jurors aside is one of limited and questionable utility at best, and the purpose of the bill is to so amend section 819 of the Revised Statutes as not to permit the district attorney to apply that rule in the trial of offenses of less magnitude than felonies punished capitally.

This is in the interest of the liberty of the citizen. Its tendency is to secure a fair trial. The powers and jurisdiction of the judiciary are for the protection and maintenance of the integrity of the Government.

The committee therefore recommend that the bill pass.

Mr. OATES. The practice which obtains in some of the States, the older States of the Union, of standing jurors aside—that is, for the prosecuting attorney, when jurors are called and are otherwise competent, to interpose a mere temporary objection and stand them aside for the time being—never did obtain except in the trial of capital offenses. Now, this practice has been adopted in the courts of the United States in some of these States and made to apply to misdemeanors. When a party is on trial for a misdemeanor they have gone through the venire and challenged jurors temporarily and stood them at the foot of the panel. It is a practice which is unwarranted, and this bill is merely for the purpose of regulating it and making the practice in the United States courts conform to the common-law practice, so that it shall only prevail in the trial of capital offenses.

Mr. REED. What kind of misdemeanors does the gentleman refer to?

Mr. OATES. That does not make any difference. If it is made to apply to misdemeanors at all it is not in accordance with the common-law practice.

Mr. REED. What harm has it done hitherto?

Mr. OATES. Its tendency in such cases is to give an unfair advantage to the prosecuting attorney.

Mr. REED. Will the gentleman be kind enough to specify in what class of cases that has occurred?

Mr. OATES. They have applied it to any class of cases.

Mr. REED. What particular class of cases has there been any complaint about?

Mr. OATES. I do not know that I can particularize the class of cases. I understand the practice is of general application in the courts where it prevails.

Mr. REED. This does not arise out of any particular kind of cases?

Mr. OATES. Not that I am aware of. I think the practice of the United States courts in this regard ought to be made to conform to the practice in the State courts, and that the rule, which I think is not a very good one, ought to apply only in the cases of capital felonies; and this is the sole object and purpose of the bill as I understand it. How much time have I left?

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. SPRINGER). Ten minutes. Does the gentleman desire to reserve his time?

Mr. OATES. I reserve that time until I hear from the other side.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair will now recognize the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. CALKINS] to control the time in opposition.

Mr. CALKINS. I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. BAYNE].

Mr. BAYNE. I think that the principle involved in this bill is an incorrect one, whether applied to the courts of the United States or to State courts. In the State of Pennsylvania our supreme court has decided that in all criminal cases the Commonwealth may stand aside one juror after another until a jury shall have been impaneled in each case which shall do justice not only to the prisoner but also to the Commonwealth. I think the principle as applied in Pennsylvania is a correct principle to be applied in any State court or in the United States courts.

I think it has a special application and force when you come to try cases of a political nature and involving political questions and political ideas. I say this, not as a partisan, not as representing any party, but in justice to both parties. We do not know what party will triumph in this country or what party may be represented by the prosecuting officer. The justice of the principle applies equally, whether the one party or the other be in power.

For instance, in some of the States South where political crimes, or rather crimes that involve political prejudices and opinions, are tried, if the Democratic party should be in power, if the prosecuting officer of the Government should be a Democrat, how would that prosecuting officer like to have a jury composed of persons wholly adverse to the Government in that prosecution, a jury adverse to the Government?

The interest of the prosecuting attorney is not that of a biased prosecutor, but according to the old traditions of the common law, and according to all the experience of courts of adjudicature throughout the world, the prosecuting counsel stands in a quasi-judicial capacity; and when he presents facts to juries he is presumed to present nothing but the simple truth, and to desire that nothing may influence the verdict of that jury but the simple truth.

Now, I contend and I believe that if this bill shall become a law justice can not be secured in the trial of many cases in many of the States of this Union, when it would be secured under the present law I suppose that this bill originated very largely from the fact that in the State of Georgia a number of men were tried and were convicted for violating the United States election laws, and in the trial of those cases a number of jurors were stood aside by the prosecuting officers of the Government.

Mr. BUCHANAN. Does the gentleman say that was done in Georgia?

Mr. BAYNE. In Georgia.

Mr. BUCHANAN. The gentleman is mistaken.

Mr. BAYNE. Probably it was in South Carolina. I refer to the cases that were tried by Hon. Emory Speer.

Mr. CALKINS. It was done both in Georgia and South Carolina, and that is what the bill strikes at.

Mr. BAYNE. Done both in Georgia and South Carolina.

Mr. DIBBLE. The gentleman is mistaken in reference to South Carolina.

Mr. BAYNE. To the credit of that community in South Carolina and to the credit of that community in Georgia which furnished these jurors men were convicted of offenses involving political prejudices. I have not seen or heard anything in the history of the country for many years past that did greater credit to the people of the communities interested than these convictions, for it is of interest to every citizen of those States as well as of the States north that men who violate the laws of the country shall be convicted and punished.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. BUCHANAN. I desire to say that the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. BAYNE] is mistaken as to jurors having been set aside in Georgia.

Mr. BAYNE. Not "set" aside, but "stood" aside until the panel was secured.

Mr. BUCHANAN. Neither in South Carolina nor in Georgia.

Mr. BAYNE. It is possible I may be mistaken as to the particular State, but I know there were such trials in South Carolina, and I thought the same rule was applied in Georgia, where jurors were set aside until the panel was obtained.

Mr. CALKINS. I do not want to occupy much time this morning, for I am not in a condition to be able to speak at any length. I want to ask my friend from Alabama [Mr. OATES] whether this bill is framed in reference to correcting a practice brought to the attention of the country by the late trials in South Carolina?

Mr. OATES. The bill was introduced by a gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. BENNETT], where the practice also prevails.

Mr. CALKINS. My question is whether this bill is not intended to rectify and correct that practice?

Mr. OATES. It is simply to do away with the practice which prevails of standing jurors aside under the common law, which in the United States courts in some of the States is applicable to capital felonies; I do not know that it is in all the States. The bill is to prevent the extending of the practice to misdemeanors.

Mr. CALKINS. But in the State courts they go right along under that practice and you would deny it to the Federal courts.

Mr. OATES. The State courts can go no further under this bill than the United States courts. If in the State courts jurors can be set aside in capital felonies, then under this bill it can be done in the United States courts.

Mr. REED. Will the gentleman be kind enough to state to the House why it is that this practice which he regards as just and proper in capital cases becomes unjust and improper in cases of misdemeanors?

Mr. OATES. Only because the administration of criminal law ought to be uniform.

Mr. REED. Yet you propose to permit this practice in capital cases.

Mr. OATES. Where the rule prevails in such cases in the State courts there is no objection to its prevailing in similar cases in the United States courts.

Mr. REED. Then there is no evil resulting from the application of the rule? All that the gentleman desires is to promote uniformity. Is that it?

Mr. OATES. There is an evil resulting from it.

Mr. REED. Will the gentleman state what it is? What called his attention to the matter?

Mr. OATES. The bill called my attention to it, and the committee has reported in favor of the bill.

Mr. REED. Is not this bill presented on account of late cases——

Mr. OATES. In the State courts this practice does not extend to cases of misdemeanor; and we think the United States courts ought not to extend the rule to such cases.

Mr. REED. What harm has been done? What is the evil?

Mr. OATES. In cases where the defendant has a very limited number of challenges it enables the prosecuting attorney to select just such jurors as he wants.

Mr. REED. And you allow that in capital cases?

Mr. OATES. There the defendant has such a number of challenges as will protect him.

Mr. REED. But the same thing is allowed in the State courts.

Mr. OATES. Where the practice in the United States courts conforms to that of the State courts it is satisfactory.

Mr. CALKINS. I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Florida [Mr. BISBEE].

Mr. BISBEE. Stripped of all disguises, the object of this bill is further to emasculate the power of Federal courts in the Southern States to try and convict men for stuffing ballot-boxes. That is the object, if this side of the House wants to understand it. That is the sole object. In the Forty-sixth Congress the Democratic party passed a bill stuffing the jury-boxes with politics, providing that a commissioner should be appointed of opposite politics to the clerk, and that these two officers should alternately select the persons from whom jurors are drawn. The result is that each of these persons—the clerk and the commissioner—believes that he represents a party, and selects pronounced partisans to serve as jurors.

The further result is that even in the most flagrant cases you can not to-day get a jury in the Southern States that will convict a man for stuffing ballot-boxes, though the evidence be such that the jury ought to convict without leaving the box.

Now it seems to me the Democratic party ought to be satisfied with the law as it is. But it appears that a case recently arose in the Southern States where the Federal Government availed itself of a local law to get a little better jury—one that would do justice between the Federal Government and the accused in the execution of the laws of the United States. There is no such thing known throughout the Southern States as a State court trying and convicting any one for the stuffing of ballot-boxes. Democratic frauds may run riot at each election. Half a dozen of the States in the South are honey-combed with fraud from one end to the other; and it is approved of, not condemned; and no man engaged in it has yet visited the penitentiary for it.

As I have remarked, the law enacted by the Forty-sixth Congress has emasculated the power of the Federal courts in the Southern States, and now, forsooth, because a method has been discovered by which the Government, availing itself of local statutes in some of the States, may perchance be able to try ballot-box stuffers with some prospect of conviction, this bill seeks to tear up that remedy by the roots.

[Here the hammer fell.]

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. SPRINGER). The gentleman from Indiana [Mr. CALKINS] has two minutes remaining.

Mr. CALKINS. I reserve that portion of my time.

Mr. OATES. I yield five minutes to the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. BENNETT].

Mr. BENNETT. Mr. Speaker, it is important that we should understand the present state of the law in order to obtain an intelligent comprehension of the matter now under consideration.

Section 819 of the Revised Statutes reads as follows:

When the offense charged is treason or a capital offense, the defendant shall be entitled to twenty and the United States to five peremptory challenges. On the trial of any other felony, the defendant shall be entitled to ten and the United States to three peremptory challenges; and in all other cases, civil and criminal, each party shall be entitled to three peremptory challenges; and in all cases where there are several defendants or several plaintiffs, the parties on each side shall be deemed a single party for the purposes of all challenges under this section. All challenges, whether to the array or panel, or to individual jurors for cause or favor, shall be tried by the court without the aid of triers.

This act was passed June 8, 1872. The measure now under consideration does not change in any particular the law regulating challenges, peremptory or for cause. Gentlemen here will please understand that if the pending bill reported by the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. OATES] should command the approval of this House, the law of challenges, peremptory or for cause, which obtains in the United States courts will remain identically the same as now.

The only change proposed by the pending bill is in these words:

And the United States in such cases—

That is, cases of treason or other capital offenses—

and in no other cases whatever, shall also, in conformity with the practice in any State, have the right in that State to stand jurors aside and not show the cause of disqualification or challenge until the venire be gone through.

That is the only change. I have nothing to conceal. The bill is my handiwork. The practice of standing jurors to the foot of the panel grew up in England after the passage of the statute of 33 Edward I. That statute took away entirely from the crown the right of peremptory challenge, and, therefore, when the crown was confronted with a subject charged with an offense against the law, the crown stood at this disadvantage, that it did not have the right of peremptory challenge, while the subject, standing for his life or his liberty, as the case may be, enjoyed that privilege. The judges who held their office during the pleasure of the crown and their own good behavior always inclined to give their official support to the power that appointed and fed them. To their eternal disgrace be it said that on great occasions, when the liberty of the subject trembled in the balance, those who should have held the scales of justice with unfevered hand, succumbed to the blandishments of power, and yielded to the sway of those who possessed the power of life and death over them.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from North Carolina has expired.

Mr. BENNETT. I should like to have a few moments additional time.

Mr. OATES. I yield two minutes more to the gentleman from North Carolina.

Mr. BENNETT. The origin, therefore, of this practice to which I have just alluded does not commend it to the philosophic student or the impartial lawyer.

The moving cause for the present bill is just this and nothing more: Unfortunately in the Southern States frequent prosecutions have been instituted for violation of the election laws of the General Government, and judges holding the court before which a party thus charged and confronted is on trial, if not native and to the manner born, have not hesitated to permit the attorneys who prosecute for the Government to stand jurors to the foot of the panel until they could assort the lot; and thus it is in some instances that innocent men have been convicted, and are to-day, or have been, undergoing punishment for offenses of which they were never guilty.

The practice in my own State confines the standing of jurors to the foot of the panel to capital offenses. The recent act, passed by Congress I believe in 1875, which regulates the practice in the courts of the General Government, requires that that practice shall conform to that which obtains in the State courts.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from North Carolina has expired.

Mr. OATES. How much time have I remaining?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman has three minutes.

Mr. OATES. I regret that I can not yield any more time to the gentleman from North Carolina as I have promised the remainder to the gentleman from South Carolina.

Mr. BENNETT. Then I shall ask consent to place in the RECORD that portion of my remarks which I had desired to make in this connection.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from North Carolina?

There was no objection.

Mr. OATES. I now yield the remainder of my time to the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. DIBBLE].

Mr. DIBBLE. I rise, Mr. Speaker, in the brief time remaining for this discussion, to correct some misapprehensions which would naturally arise from the remarks made by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. BAYNE] regarding the political cases recently tried in my own State. He is in error when he asserts that in South Carolina there were convictions for violation of the election laws. The truth of the case is merely this: That the panel was so constituted in those trials that members of the election committees of the party in accord with the administration were sworn as jurors upon the panel. In addition to that, the district attorney, exercising this right of standing aside jurors, postponed every one except those that were in alliance with his own political party to the foot of the panel. Further, the defendants' right of challenge was exhausted, and the juries were composed entirely of those who were in political sympathy with the prosecution. But so frivolous were the cases presented that in one instance, under instructions from the judge, the jury brought in a verdict of not guilty, and in the other cases, with juries packed by the prosecution in the manner I have stated, there was absolute failure to convict. There was not a single person belonging to the political party of the defendants upon either one of the juries. They were made up in the manner I have stated, from their political opponents.

I wish now further to correct a misapprehension under which the gentleman from Florida [Mr. BISBEE] seems to labor. Not a single one of these cases, Mr. Speaker, was for the offense of stuffing the ballot-box. No such charges were presented. There were no grounds for such charges; and the frivolous charges made were for other causes.

Now, the law of the State of South Carolina does not permit in cases of misdemeanor the standing aside of jurors. It is only in cases of capital offenses—felonies—and in such cases the protection of the defendant is that he has twenty peremptory challenges; and therefore the officers of the State control the presentation of the jury, the standing aside being equivalent to the twenty challenges on the part of the defendant. But in cases of misdemeanors, as under this act, the defendant has but three challenges; and to give to the prosecuting officer, in addition to three challenges, also the right to postpone jurors to the foot of the panel is equivalent to so many more challenges allowed to the Government.

I contend, Mr. Speaker, that such a preponderance of power in the prosecution in organizing juries is radically wrong, irrespective of any question of party or of politics. It is wrong in principle.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. REED. Mr. Speaker, the gentleman who spoke last but one treated us to some ancient history, but this question relates to modern history. There is a plain purpose in this bill, and it is in connection with other bills and actions which have developed themselves heretofore.

The jury has been politically divided, as has been stated by the gentleman from Florida [Mr. BISBEE]. Not content with that neutralization of juries in cases of this kind, an attempt was made in another committee of this House to divide in politics the deputy marshals who were to enforce these election laws. To-day the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. OATES], representing the Committee on the Revision of the Laws, has presented another insidious attack against the enforcement of the penalties for stuffing ballot-boxes at elections. And the gentleman was well chosen. He is so good a man himself that he never suspected what this was intended to effect. And nothing has influence in this House like a good man making a good statement in a good way.

Mr. OATES. Mr. Speaker——

Mr. REED. I have only two minutes.

Mr. OATES. What the gentleman states is wholly incorrect, and this is a unanimous report from the committee.

Mr. REED. I understand not. I say that this is a following out of the unjust attempts which are being made to destroy the very little power which the United States has to punish violations of election laws. Election laws are violated there continuously, and an attempt is being made now to take away the very little remedy we have. That is the secret of this matter. Of course the gentleman from Alabama did not know it. He did not understand the class of cases to which this referred. If he had he would not have been selected to present it. But the gentleman who spoke the one before the last did understand it, and unfortunately has let it out to the House.

The SPEAKER. The time allowed for debate has expired. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from Alabama to suspend the rules and pass the bill.

The question being taken, there were—ayes 110, noes 66; two-thirds not voting in the affirmative.

Mr. OATES. I call for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 153, nays 92, not voting 75; as follows:

So the rules were not suspended—two-thirds not voting in favor thereof.

After the second roll-call,

Mr. HEWITT, of New York, said: When my name was called I heard it on both roll-calls, but I thought I was paired with Mr. KASSON, of Iowa. It turns out he is paired with another gentleman. I desire to vote.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York states he refrained from voting because he thought he was paired with the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. KASSON], but has since learned that Mr. KASSON is paired with another gentleman. He asks unanimous consent to vote. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. HEWITT, of New York. I vote "ay."

On motion of Mr. LAMB, by unanimous consent, the reading of the names of members voting was dispensed with.

The following pairs were announced:

Mr. ELLIS with Mr. KELLOGG.

Mr. STOCKSLAGER with Mr. PEELLE, of Indiana.

Mr. WARNER, of Tennessee, with Mr. HAYNES.

Mr. MORGAN with Mr. MORRILL.

Mr. SNYDER with Mr. GOFF.

Mr. HOUSEMAN with Mr. WHITING.

Mr. SKINNER, of North Carolina, with Mr. SKINNER, of New York.

Mr. CARLETON with Mr. LAWRENCE.

Mr. COVINGTON with Mr. BREWER, of New Jersey.

Mr. MAYBURY with Mr. HART.

Mr. DUNN with Mr. RYAN.

Mr. KING with Mr. GEORGE.

Mr. ROGERS, of Arkansas, with Mr. WILSON, of Iowa.

Mr. NICHOLLS with Mr. KASSON.

Mr. EVINS, of South Carolina, with Mr. VALENTINE.

Mr. TAYLOR, of Tennessee, with Mr. HOWEY.

Mr. ADAMS, of New York, with Mr. LIBBEY.

Mr. GIBSON with Mr. BRUMM.

Mr. COX, of New York, with Mr. BAYNE.

Mr. KEAN with Mr. MCADOO.

The SPEAKER. On this vote the yeas are 153 and the nays are 92. Two-thirds not having voted in the affirmative, the motion to suspend the rules is not agreed to.

DEFICIENCY APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. RANDALL. The Committee on Appropriations have unanimously agreed upon a deficiency appropriation bill. I expected that upon the call of committees the Committee on Appropriations would have been reached to-day, when I would have reported the bill. It will give rise to very little debate. The necessities of the Government are immediate, and I ask consent to report it now.

The SPEAKER. The Chair understands the gentleman to ask consent to report at this time from the Committee on Appropriations a deficiency appropriation bill without waiting for the regular call of the committee; and the gentleman gives notice that he will move to pass the bill under a suspension of the rules.

Mr. RANDALL. That is the request. I have been instructed unanimously by the committee to report the bill, and I shall move that it be passed under a suspension of the rules.

Mr. KEIFER. That is right, and I hope there will be no objection on this side of the House. It is an important bill and should be passed at once.

Mr. WHITE, of Kentucky. I will ask the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. RANDALL] if it includes the deficiency for examining surgeons?

Mr. RANDALL. It does.

Mr. BUCKNER. Does it include the appropriation asked for by the Secretary of the Treasury for printing one and two dollar notes?

Mr. RANDALL. I does not.

Mr. BUCKNER. All right, then.

There being no objection,

Mr. RANDALL, from the Committee on Appropriations, reported a bill (H. R. 6073) to provide for certain of the most urgent deficiencies in the appropriations for the service of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1884, and for other purposes; which was read a first and second time.

The bill was read at length, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the following sums, or so much thereof as may be necessary, be, and the same are hereby, appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, for the objects hereinafter expressed, for the service of the fiscal year ending June 30, 1884, and prior years, namely:

PUBLIC PRINTING AND BINDING.

That from the appropriations for public printing and binding for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1884, the Public Printer is hereby authorized to transfer to the allotment of the Treasury Department an amount not exceeding $50,000, to the allotment of the Navy Department an amount not exceeding $20,000, to the allotment of the War Department $15,000, and to the allotment of the Post-Office Department an amount not exceeding $30,000; but the aggregate amount appropriated for the public printing and binding for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1884, shall not be exceeded because of the transfers hereby authorized.

TREASURY DEPARTMENT.

For the transportation of subsidiary silver coin as authorized by law, $5,000.

For fuel, lights, water, and miscellaneous items required by the janitors and firemen in the proper care of the buildings, furniture, and heating apparatus, exclusive of personal services, for all public buildings under the control of the Treasury Department, inclusive of new buildings, $105,000.

For furniture and repairs of furniture and carpets for all public buildings under the control of the Treasury Department, $100,000.

For pay of assistant custodians and janitors, including all personal services in connection with all public buildings under control of the Treasury Department outside of the District of Columbia, $56,000.

PUBLIC BUILDINGS.

For post-office and court-house at Philadelphia, Pa.: For completion of the building, $61,000.

For custom-house at Saint Louis, Mo.: For completion and furnishing of the building, $25,700.

For custom-house and post-office at Albany, N. Y.: For completion of the building, $55,000.

For custom-house and post-office at Cincinnati, Ohio: For construction of the building, $100,000.

For marine-hospital buildings at Memphis, Tenn.: For completion of approaches, fencing, terracing lot, heating and laundry apparatus, $30,000.

For heating, hoisting, and ventilating apparatus for public building, $16,000.

INTERIOR DEPARTMENT.

Expenses of the tenth census:

For current expenses, $20,000.

For outstanding liabilities, $5,000.

Contingent expenses of land offices:

For incidental expenses of the several land offices, $10,000.

For expenses of depositing public moneys, $5,000.

PENSIONS.

For fees and expenses of examining surgeons, $500,000.

For fees and expenses of examining surgeons, $253,538.11, being a deficiency on account of the fiscal year 1883.

For per diem when absent from home on duty for special examiners or other persons employed in the Pension Office detailed for the purpose of making special investigations of matters pertaining to the Pension Bureau, in lieu of expenses for subsistence, not exceeding $3 per day, and for actual and necessary expenses for transportation and assistance, $40,000.

That the Secretary of the Interior is authorized to transfer from appropriations for the Freedmen's Hospital and Asylum for the fiscal year 1884 any unexpended balances and apply the same to purposes for which the appropriations for said institution for the current fiscal year are exhausted; but the aggregate amount appropriated for the expenses of the Freedmen's Hospital and Asylum for the fiscal year 1884 shall not be exceeded because of the transfer herein authorized.

INDIAN OFFICE.

To enable the Secretary of the Interior to pay the employés temporarily employed and rendering service in the Indian Office up to and including July 15, $2,100.

And hereafter no Department or officer of the United States shall accept voluntary service for the Government or employ personal service in excess of that authorized by law.

NAVY DEPARTMENT.

Bureau of Equipment and Recruiting:

For expenses of recruiting, and for the transportation of enlisted men and boys at home and abroad, $15,000.

Bureau of Construction and Repair:

For preservation and completion of vessels on the stocks and in ordinary; purchase of materials and stores of all kinds; labor in navy-yards and on foreign stations; preservation of materials; purchase of tools; wear, tear, and repair of vessels afloat, and for general care, increase, and protection of the Navy in the line of construction and repair, and incidental expenses, namely, advertising and foreign postage, $234,000.

DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA.

That $1,200 of the sum appropriated by the act of March 3, 1883, be, and the same are hereby, transferred from the second to the third school division, without increasing the aggregate expenditure therein provided.

For janitors and care of the several school buildings, $3,900; for current repairs to school buildings, $2,500; one-half of said amounts to be paid from the revenues of the District of Columbia for the current fiscal year.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

To pay Mary E. Herndon, widow of the late Hon. T. H. Herndon, the amount of salary and allowance for stationery for the unexpired term of his service as a member of the Forty-eighth Congress, $8,875.

To pay the mother of the late Hon. W. F. Pool the amount of salary and allowance for stationery for the unexpired term of his service as a member of the Forty-eighth Congress, $7,737.66.

To pay the widow of the late Hon. E. W. M. Mackey the amount of salary and allowance for stationery for the unexpired term of his service as a member of the Forty-eighth Congress, $5,586.67.

To pay the widow of the late Hon. D. C. Haskell the amount of salary and allowance for mileage and stationery for the unexpired term of his service as a member of the Forty-eighth Congress, $6,715.97.

To pay the widow of the late Hon. M. E. Cutts the amount of salary and allowance for stationery for the unexpired term of his service as a member of the Forty-eighth Congress, $7,652.38.

To enable the Clerk of the House to pay Alexander B. Thomas and Wilson Grice for services rendered, under resolution of the House, from March 4 to December 3, 1883, at $60 per month each, $1,080.

Mr. RANDALL. I now move to suspend the rules and pass the bill. I ask for a second on that motion, so that any one who may desire to make inquiries about the bill may have an opportunity to do so.

The SPEAKER. If there is no objection the second will be considered as ordered.

Mr. BROWNE, of Indiana. I rose for the purpose of demanding a second myself, but I am willing to have it considered as ordered.

There being no objection, the second of the motion to suspend the rules and pass the bill as read was ordered.

The SPEAKER. The question is now upon the motion to suspend the rules and pass the bill which has been read.

Mr. BROWNE, of Indiana. In the last Congress I gave notice that in the future I should object, however ungracious that duty might appear, to the allowance to families or representatives of deceased members of any sum beyond the amount due at the time of their death. At that time there were several propositions of that character pending before the House, and I believe that on a vote of the House all such appropriations were stricken from the bill. I will inquire of the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. RANDALL] if that is correct.

Mr. RANDALL. I think not, but I will examine and see. I find by reference to the bill of last session that appropriations were made to pay certain allowances to the widows of Mr. Orth, of Mr. Lowe, and some others. I think the gentleman alludes to those cases. In the bill there were propositions to give $6,000 to the representatives of members-elect who had died.

Mr. BROWNE, of Indiana. And who had not entered upon the duties of their office.

Mr. RANDALL. I find in the appropriation bill of last year that there were appropriations for unexpired terms of service in the case of Mrs. Orth, Mrs. Lowe, Mrs. James Q. Smith, and Mrs. Shackleford.

Mr. BROWNE, of Indiana. And they received an amount beyond the sum due them at the death of the members.

Mr. RANDALL. I will read one of the clauses:

To pay Mary A. Orth, the widow of the late honorable Godlove S. Orth, the amount of salary and allowances for stationery for the unexpired term of his service as a member of the Forty-seventh Congress.

That is the exact language employed in this bill, except that we say "Forty-eighth Congress" instead of "Forty-seventh Congress."

Mr. BROWNE, of Indiana. Upon that point I have a word or two to say.

Mr. KEIFER. If the gentleman will yield to me a moment I will state that a few years ago in the cases of Mr. Schleicher, of Texas, of Mr. Fernando Wood, of New York, of Mr. Rush Clark, of Iowa—I think there were no others—the precedent was established of paying to the representatives of deceased members the salary for the term for which such members had been elected, but upon which they had not entered before the time of their death. In those cases Congress made appropriations of the salary for the whole term, although it had not been entered upon. That I think is what the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. BROWNE] has in his mind.

Mr. MILLS. And the policy began with the case of Mr. Schleicher, of Texas.

Mr. KEIFER. That policy was afterwards reversed and the rule established which is recognized in this bill, to pay the salary for the remainder of a term after it had once been entered upon, whether the member had been sworn in or not; in other words, if the member lived until the time for the commencement of the term had come, it was treated as though he had entered upon the term and the whole salary for that term was paid to his representatives. In the other cases which I have named we went one step beyond that. There is no such case in this bill now.

Mr. RANDALL. There was the case of Mr. Herron, of Louisiana, a member-elect to the Forty-eighth Congress, but who died before the beginning of his term. We do not include that case in this bill.

Mr. KEIFER. I am not sure whether we ought not to have appropriated something for that case, but we have left it out.

Mr. BROWNE, of Indiana. I desire simply to call the attention of the House to the character of appropriations of this kind as they now stand in this bill.

It has not been very long since the practice of paying the unearned salaries of deceased members began. What we now propose to do is to pay an unearned salary—to pay for services that have never been rendered and for a term that never began—I mean so far as the right to payment is concerned.

I do not doubt, and indeed as a legal proposition there can be no controversy about it, the right of the member or his family to receive salary up to the time of his death. But why is it on principle that a member having served a day or a week or a month or a year, if you please, in the Congress of the United States should receive the salary for the entire two years? Certainly if the employment were a private employment the heirs of the employed would not receive compensation from the employer for services which had never been rendered.

It has always seemed to me—I presume the notion is an "old fogy" one, antiquated now, and not entitled to the confidence or respect of anybody here—that the Congress of the United States ought to run the Government on business principles; that we are servants of the people entitled to so much compensation as we earn—no more than that. We have gone beyond that, however. I do not complain of the practice which has grown up of paying from the Treasury of the United States the funeral expenses of a member dying during his term, and paying those expenses without regard to the pecuniary condition of the family of the deceased and without regard to the expense incurred, if the expenditure be proper and the sum reasonable. These expenses are paid by Congress, I presume, as a testimonial of respect to the deceased member. It certainly is a precedent which has no reason behind it. Such legislation is only justifiable because it is in pursuance of a precedent.

Now I know it is ungracious, as I said in a former Congress, to raise these questions. I do not expect to raise the question again after it has been submitted formally to the consideration of the House and it has resolved upon this practice. But I assume as a representative of my people that the Congress of the United States ought not to pay an unearned salary, no more to a Representative in Congress than to any other Government contractor contributing his services under the employment of the nation, no more than to a clerk in one of the Departments, no more than to a messenger or a doorkeeper of the House. There is no more principle behind the one case than the other. These practices, pernicious in my opinion, have grown up and have passed into our legislation without challenge.

Now, if these allowances were confined to the families of members who were in such a pecuniary condition as to need the money, I should not object. But we have established the precedent of appropriating these sums to all, regardless of the circumstances of the persons to whom the money may go. I desire in this way, kindly and respectfully, to enter my protest against the continuance of this precedent. Ungracious as it may seem, I am willing to go before a generous constituency—a constituency that would contribute in charity as much as the constituency of any gentleman in this House—and stand upon the position I have taken.

Having said this much, Mr. Chairman, I repeat that it is the last time I shall bring the question to the attention of the House if it shall now establish the precedent that in all these cases we are to appropriate for the entire term, regardless of everything else, regardless of pecuniary condition, regardless of time served and all that. I think Congress acts generously when it appropriates to pay the funeral expenses of deceased Representatives, and it should stop there.

Mr. RANDALL. Mr. Speaker, in my judgment it is desirable that Congress should adopt some general law touching this subject; but the Committee on Appropriations, as I have stated, has in this matter conformed to the practice which has been established; hence the instruction under which I act to-day in reference to this matter.

Mr. BLANCHARD. I desire to ask the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. RANDALL] whether or not this bill includes any allowance or salary for the family of the late Andrew G. Herron, who was elected a member of this Congress from the State of Louisiana?

Mr. RANDALL. The bill does not contain any such allowance, and I will state to the gentleman the reason. Mr. Herron never entered upon his term at all. As has been stated, allowances in like cases were stricken out last year.

Mr. BLANCHARD. I wish to ask the gentleman further whether Mr. Haskell or Mr. Herndon, both deceased members of the House, ever entered upon the discharge of their duties?

Mr. RANDALL. They did not die until after their term of office had begun; they were both kept from their seats by illness.

Mr. BLANCHARD. Is it not a fact that they never entered upon the discharge of their duties as members of the House?

Mr. RANDALL. They drew their pay upon the Clerk's certificate.

Mr. BROWNE, of Indiana. The gentleman from Pennsylvania will allow me to say that upon the logic of this bill the case of the deceased Representative from Louisiana ought to be included, because the logic of the measure is that the shorter the time the member has served the greater the compensation given.

Mr. RANDALL. Mr. Herron never entered upon his term as a member of Congress and he never was sworn in.

Mr. BROWNE, of Indiana. I am aware of that; but the logic of this case is that if a man serves a week we should appropriate to his family $10,000, the salary for the whole term, but if he serves a year and eleven months the appropriation is only for a few weeks.

Mr. RANDALL. The gentleman has no right to draw any such deduction.

Mr. BROWNE, of Indiana. The more time a man serves the less money his family receives.

A MEMBER. Because he draws his own salary while he lives.

Mr. BLANCHARD. If it be in order I desire to offer an amendment.

The SPEAKER. No amendment can be offered. The motion is to suspend the rules and pass the bill.

Mr. RANDALL. I yield to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON].

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Speaker, I wish to say only a word in reply to the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. BROWNE]. As the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations [Mr. RANDALL] has well said, there is an absence of law touching these appropriations, except so far as we follow the precedents in like cases. For several years the uniform practice has been, where a member has had the misfortune to die during his term, to pay to his widow or legal representatives the salary for the balance of the term.

I do not apprehend that the House at this time is going to reverse those precedents. I do not think that it ought to reverse them. In my judgment they were right—right then and right now.

The gentleman says that it may work hardship in some cases to the Government. The gentleman must remember that there is no law or general practice that does not work hardship in some cases. Take the case of Mr. Haskell, or his widow, for instance; and I speak of that because I happen to be familiar with it. Here was a man who had served his constituency long and faithfully on this floor. He died leaving his family in straitened circumstances, with scarcely anything left to live upon, as I am informed; a man who absolutely worked himself to death in the public service, and doing valuable service to his constituency and to the country. He died within a year and a month after his election. He died nine months after his term commenced. In that case and in similar cases I believe that justly, honestly, and equitably his family ought to have the salary for the balance of the term. I believe that I have not a single constituent, and I do not believe that any other gentleman on this floor has one, who would not be willing to say that this is an equitable provision; that the salary was justly and fairly due and ought to be paid.

Mr. WELLER. Will the gentleman let me ask him a question?

Mr. CANNON. No complaint has ever been made because of this practice on the part of Congress. We followed the precedent of the last Congress and preceding Congresses, and I hope the appropriation will be made.

Mr. JOSEPH D. TAYLOR. Will the gentleman let me ask him a question before he takes his seat?

Mr. CANNON. Certainly.

Mr. JOSEPH D. TAYLOR. What I wish to ask is this: What equitable reason is there for paying a man his full salary who lived four days after the 4th day of March, which does not apply to the case of a man who died three or four days prior to the 4th day of March, both of whom had been duly elected, one dying shortly before his term begins and the other shortly afterwards?

Now I want to understand the "equity" to which the gentleman refers, and I would be glad to have an explanation.

Mr. CANNON. The gentleman puts a case that does not exist.

Mr. JOSEPH D. TAYLOR. It does exist.

Mr. RYAN. A hypothetical question.

Mr. CANNON. It is time enough to answer a question of that character when it comes up. It is not presented here.

Mr. JOSEPH D. TAYLOR. It is presented in this very case.

Mr. CANNON. It is a question with reference to a fact that does not exist. But further in reply to the gentleman from Ohio and to his question I will say that the Congress before the last did establish a precedent in Mr. Schleicher's, and one or two other cases—Mr. Fernando Wood and others who died before the Congress commenced to which they had been elected. The last Congress reversed that precedent after full and free consideration, and the Committee on Appropriations in recommending this appropriation adhere to the precedent set by the last Congress.

Mr. WELLER. Will the gentleman answer me a question?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Pennsylvania is entitled to the floor.

Mr. JOSEPH D. TAYLOR. I want to correct the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. WELLER. Will the gentleman from Illinois answer my question?

Mr. CANNON. Yes, sir; certainly. What is it?

Mr. WELLER. My question is this: If the rule has been wrong in the past and the precedent under the rule has been reversed, why not as well reverse the rule now as before?

Mr. CANNON. In the first place, I say it is not wrong. This appropriation is in the line of precedent, and the rule is right, not wrong, and I am going to vote for the appropriation.

Mr. WELLER. Is it any more fair to pay the representatives of a member of Congress who dies an unearned salary than it is to pay any other employé of the Government?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Pennsylvania is entitled to the floor.

Mr. BLANCHARD. Will the gentleman yield to me for a moment?

Mr. RANDALL. I will yield to the gentleman. How much time is there remaining?

The SPEAKER. Five minutes.

Mr. RANDALL. Five minutes of the entire half-hour?

The SPEAKER. Five minutes of the time belonging to the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

Mr. ROBINSON, of New York. I wish to make a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. ROBINSON, of New York. Is not this as unconstitutional as a gift to Mrs. Meikleham?

The SPEAKER. That is not a parliamentary inquiry.

Mr. BLANCHARD. Mr. Speaker, it appears from this bill that provision is made to pay the heirs of Mr. Mackey, deceased, the heirs of Mr. Cutts, deceased, and the heirs of Mr. Haskell, deceased, the full amount of the salaries to which they would have been, respectively, entitled had they lived their full terms as members of the Forty-eighth Congress, and the same provision has been made for Mr. Herndon, of Alabama. But for two other members of the Forty-eighth Congress, who went through all the expense and annoyance of a campaign, to wit, Mr. Updegraff, of Ohio, and Mr. Herron, of Louisiana, the Committee on Appropriations have made no provision and have left them entirely out of the bill. What I wish to say is that I can not regard this as fair. I say it is not fair to pay to these gentlemen, who were members of the Forty-eighth Congress, and who drew a part of their salary as such, the total amount that would have been due to them had they lived, and yet not provide a cent to pay those who were elected to the Forty-eighth Congress but had the misfortune to die before the term of service began.

That is the condition of things that is presented by this bill, and I would like to have any sufficient reason given by any member of the Committee on Appropriations or by any gentleman on this floor for this distinction and discrimination. I wish to know why it is that a man who died before his service commenced, after his election, is placed upon a different plane from the man who died afterward. All that they did in the world, I am reminded, was to draw their salaries—those gentlemen whose names were incorporated in this bill. Those gentlemen who died and whose names are not incorporated in the bill did not have the pleasure of drawing any portion of their salaries, but the Committee on Appropriations without rhyme or reason make this distinction between these classes of members, those who died after and those who died before the term of service began.

Mr. RYAN. Will the gentleman yield to me for one moment?

Mr. BLANCHARD. Yes, sir.

Mr. RYAN. Judging from my own experience a member has nearly as much work to do when Congress is not in session as when Congress is in session. I personally know that my late colleague, Mr. Haskell, labored assiduously in the discharge of his public duties from the time of the commencement of his term of office until he was finally prostrated.

Mr. BLANCHARD. I do not yield further. In view of the fact that this distinction and discrimination has been made, and made in my judgment unjustly and without sufficient reason, I will ask the unanimous consent of the House to incorporate a provision in the bill which will pay to the legal representatives of the late Andrew G. Herron, of Louisiana, and the late Mr. Updegraff, of Ohio, $5,000 in each case.

Mr. RANDALL. I have no instructions from the committee to consent to any amendment.

Mr. KEIFER. I am ready to vote for that proposition but can not do it on this bill.

Mr. RANDALL. The gentleman from Louisiana has the power himself to initiate a measure for that purpose at any time.

The SPEAKER. The question is upon the motion of the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. RANDALL] to suspend the rules and pass the bill.

Mr. BROWNE, of Indiana. Upon that question let us have the yeas and nays.

Mr. TURNER, of Kentucky. I rise to make a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. TURNER, of Kentucky. Do not the rules of this House require that without special order of the House the yeas and nays shall be called on this bill?

The SPEAKER. The rule requires that the yeas and nays shall be taken upon the passage of all general appropriation bills. This is a special deficiency appropriation bill.

Mr. TURNER, of Kentucky. A deficiency appropriation bill has been held to be one of the general appropriation bills.

The SPEAKER. And, besides, this is a motion to suspend the rules and pass the bill.

Mr. TURNER, of Kentucky. The rules have not yet been suspended. It is only a motion to suspend the rules and pass the bill, and the question is how the vote ought to be taken.

The SPEAKER. The Chair does not think this is a general appropriation bill within the meaning of the rule; nor has it been so held, so far as the Chair has been advised.

Mr. TURNER, of Kentucky. I think the Chair has always held since the adoption of the new rules that such a bill as this comes within the rule. If the Chair will look at the rule he will find it applies as much to this appropriation bill as to any other. I had the honor to offer the amendment to the rules requiring the yeas and nays to be taken on the passage of all bills making appropriations. That was restricted on the report of the Committee on Rules to general appropriation bills. But the Chair has uniformly held that a deficiency bill was a general appropriation bill.

The SPEAKER. A special deficiency bill is not a general appropriation bill, because it is a bill which may or may not be presented to the House, according to the necessities of the Government. The general appropriation bills are bills which require to be passed each year for the support of the Government.

Mr. TURNER, of Kentucky. Mr. Speaker, I can not agree that your ruling is correct. I think, with due deference, that the Chair is clearly in error, as I propose to show. I offered the amendment to the rules requiring the yeas and nays on appropriation bills on the 19th day of February, 1880, and made the only argument in favor of the amendment that was made. (See CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, second session Forty-sixth Congress, volume 41, page 1022.) Immediately after the argument, the House, being in Committee of the Whole, adopted the amendment which I offered by a vote of 103 yeas to 19 nays. Now, sir, what was the evil sought to be remedied by the amendment which I offered to the rules as reported by the Committee on Rules and what were the arguments used to induce the adoption of the amendment? Let the argument which I then made speak for itself. It was in these words:

Mr. OSCAR TURNER. I offer the amendment which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

"Amend Rule XXI by adding as a sixth clause the following: Upon all bills or resolutions appropriating money or creating a charge or debt upon the people the yeas and nays shall be taken on the final passage of such bills in the House and entered on the Journal."

Mr. OSCAR TURNER. Mr. Chairman, as I argued this question at the time I gave notice that I would offer this amendment, I do not feel again inclined to trespass upon the time of the committee; but as there may be some members present who were not then, I shall briefly refer to the points that strike my mind, showing conclusively that this amendment, or one embodying the same principle to some extent at least, ought to be adopted. Bills making appropriation of public money have for many years been passed by this House without the call of the yeas and nays. Indeed the journals show that they are rarely called unless there is some political rider upon the bills or extraneous legislation in them. The result of this is that frequently, in the hurry of legislation and the noise and confusion, although the attention of members is invited by the Speaker to these bills, very few vote upon their passage. It is a fact well known to every member of this House that many bills appropriating millions of the public money pass here by the votes of perhaps four or five members, it may be the votes only of those constituting the committee from which the bills come.

These are facts that no gentleman will deny. Now, sir, this is all wrong. No appropriation of money ought to pass unless the attention of members is drawn directly to the passage of the bill, and no such bill ought to pass without it is voted for by a majority of all the members elected. Now, how are you to effect this result? I know of no way except to require the yeas and nays upon all bills appropriating public money. It is no new idea. Look, Mr. Chairman, at the array of States in this Union that have adopted this provision in their constitutions. I referred in my remarks before to seven States; since then I find that the provision is incorporated in the constitutions of the following States, twenty-two in number: New York, Pennsylvania, Virginia, Maryland, Minnesota, Wisconsin, Alabama, Arkansas, California, Colorado, Florida, Illinois, Indiana, Kansas, Missouri, Nebraska, Nevada, New Jersey, North Carolina, Ohio, Oregon, Tennessee.

Kentucky requires yeas and nays on all bills appropriating over $100. Many of the old States had tried for over half a century to do without this safeguard of the people's money, but it would not do; they were forced to amend their constitutions and incorporate this provision in them. I will refer to the great States of New York and Pennsylvania, which adopted this provision in 1873, and Kentucky and Virginia in 1850 and 1851. Now, sir, if it is right in the State constitution why is it not right here? Are the taxes less burdensome on the people when imposed by Congress than by the States? Sir, there is greater reason for it here, for where the Legislatures of the States vote away hundreds of dollars we vote away millions, all coming out of the pockets of the toiling masses of the country.

I have heard but one member urge a reason against this amendment, and that was that it would take too much time. Are the people to be told by us that we have not time to call the yeas and nays upon bills appropriating their money? We are paid by the year; let us take the time. Why, sir, the yeas and nays are called hundreds of times every session upon unimportant questions, frequently even upon the question of daily adjournment. Yet we are told upon these important bills we have not the time. Mr. Chairman, this may be good logic here, but I apprehend men will find it bad logic on the stump before their constituents. But, sir, the truth is it would not take an unreasonable amount of time. There is too much special legislation here. It is bad enough in the State Legislatures, but it is worse here. Let us pass general laws providing remedies for claimants, and let them resort to the Departments and bureaus and courts, and bring their cases within those laws. If they can not, then let their claims fall, as they ought to, and not come here to get their claims through where we have not the time to investigate the proof and where they frequently pass as a sort of favoritism.

Mr. Chairman, this is all wrong, in my judgment. Why, sir, there are now over two thousand private bills for pensions before the Congress already; and God knows how many more will be offered, for they come in by hundreds every bill-day; yet we have a pension bureau and laws designating who are entitled to pensions and under what circumstances. If the general laws granting pensions are insufficient, let us change them and the grounds for pensions, but not sit here as a great pension bureau instead of attending to general legislation for the public good. If these views were carried out we would not have so many bills appropriating money.

I have made these remarks in no partisan spirit, and, sir, I appeal to gentlemen to support the amendment or offer a better one. Let the people know who it is that votes away the money. No man will shrink from it when it is a just appropriation, and if it is not the people have a right to know who voted for it. Mr. Chairman, if this amendment is adopted it will save millions of dollars. It has done it in the States and it will do it here. I hope the amendment will prevail. I am not afraid to put myself on the record on such bills. Special legislation and private bills are a curse in the State Legislatures and they are a curse here.

Now, Mr. Speaker, does it not clearly appear according to the rules of interpretation laid down by every law writer that the whole object was to guard the public money and fix the responsibility upon those who voted it out of the Treasury by recording their votes so as to show to the people who was responsible for malappropriations of their money, just as it has been done in the constitutions of twenty-two States, as I then showed, and, perhaps, in others since. This was my intention, clearly indicated, I think, in offering the amendment, and the intention of the House in adopting it. Afterward the Committee on Rules limited the amendment to general appropriation bills; and in doing this I think committed a grave error, almost destroying the intention of the amendment and of the Committee of the Whole as expressed when my amendment was adopted. Sir, why ought not this safeguard to be applied to this bill and the opportunity given to myself and others to put our names on record against it, containing, as it does, some bad precedents and items?

How does the fact of calling it "a deficiency bill" or "a special deficiency bill" change its character and take it out of the rule? If the items of this bill are right, ought they not to have been in the appropriation bills of last year? Clearly so. If they had been, then, under the ruling of the Chair, the yeas and nays would have been necessary to have taken this money out of the Treasury, amounting to millions of dollars; but because these items were left out and are now put in a bill called "a deficiency bill," we are told no yeas and nays are necessary to pass the bill; and all members voting for it are to escape responsibility, and those desiring to put themselves on record against it are denied that privilege.

Sir, the rule, limited as it is, is a good one, and in a case of doubt it ought to be extended instead of restricted in its operation. The bill appropriates a large amount of public money which of right ought to have been included in the last year's general appropriation bills. The fact of leaving it out ought not to exempt it now from the operation of the rule requiring the yeas and nays. Mr. Speaker, the amendment as offered by myself and adopted by the Committee of the Whole on the 19th of February, 1880, was in the line of retrenchment and reform and in the interest of the tax-payers of the country, and I hope may yet be adopted as it was first offered. It ought at least to be applied to all bills appropriating over $10,000.

Mr. BROWNE, of Indiana. I think there is a misapprehension on the part of members as to the condition of the question.

The SPEAKER. The question is on ordering the yeas and nays on the motion to suspend the rules.

Mr. BROWNE, of Indiana. The point I wish to make is this: There are some gentlemen who think that if the vote be taken on the suspension of the rules, that does not pass the bill, and that to pass the bill requires another vote.

The SPEAKER. If two-thirds vote in the affirmative the rules are suspended and the bill is passed by a single vote. The question is on ordering the yeas and nays.

Mr. BROWNE, of Indiana. Let us see how many are afraid to vote.

The yeas and nays were not ordered, only nineteen members having voted therefor—not one-fifth of the last vote.

The question being taken on the motion to suspend the rules, the Speaker stated that in the opinion of the Chair the ayes had it.

Mr. BROWNE, of Indiana. I ask for a division.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 157, noes 15.

So (two-thirds having voted in the affirmative) the rules were suspended and the bill was passed.

DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE.

The Committee on Expenditures in the Department of Justice was called.

Mr. SPRINGER. I am instructed by the Committee on Expenditures in the Department of Justice to move to suspend the rules and pass the resolution which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That the Attorney-General be requested to cause to be made such investigations by the examiners as may be desired by the Committee on Expenditures in the Department of Justice, provided such examination shall not interfere with the current business of the Department; and that such examiners while engaged in making the same shall be paid their usual per diem expenses out of the contingent fund of the House on vouchers to be approved by the committee.

Mr. HOLMAN. I demand a second.

Mr. CALKINS. I demand a second simply because I want an explanation.

The SPEAKER. A second has been demanded by the gentleman from Indiana on the right [Mr. HOLMAN].

Mr. SPRINGER. I ask unanimous consent that the second be considered as ordered.

There was no objection, and it was so ordered.

The SPEAKER. Under the rule thirty minutes are allowed for debate, fifteen in support of the resolution and fifteen in opposition to it. The gentleman from Indiana [Mr. SPRINGER] will control the time in support of the resolution.

Mr. SPRINGER. The resolution amounts to this, that the Committee on Expenditures in the Department of Justice having had some requests made to them from different localities for special investigations to be made in regard to court expenses have called on the Attorney-General to use the force in that Department for the purpose of making those investigations, and the proposition is that during the time they are so employed at the instance of the committee their expenses, the same as they get in the Department, shall be allowed them, to be paid out of the contingent fund of the House on vouchers to be approved by the committee.

Mr. REED. Is that agreed to by all the committee?

Mr. SPRINGER. It is the unanimous report of the committee.

Mr. CALKINS. Out of what fund are these officers to be paid?

Mr. SPRINGER. Out of the contingent fund of the House; the reason being that during the time they are thus employed they are attending to matters on behalf of a committee of the House.

Mr. CANNON. Do they not get their regular salary?

Mr. SPRINGER. They will not while being employed at the instance of a regular committee of the House.

Mr. CALKINS. Will the gentleman permit me further to inquire whether these men are being paid by the Department of Justice at this time?

Mr. SPRINGER. For the time that they will be engaged in performing service for the committee they will not get anything as employés of the Department of Justice.

Mr. CALKINS. Why should not the Department give us the information without our having to pay their employés out of our contingent fund?

Mr. SPRINGER. This resolution contemplates calling upon the Attorney-General for information and have him assign some one in his Department to make the investigations which the committee may desire to have made, and during that time these persons will be the employés of the committee and not of the Department.

Mr. CHACE. Do I understand that it is proposed that the committee shall employ the persons to be assigned to this duty?

Mr. SPRINGER. The committee will direct the character of the investigation to be made or request the Attorney-General to make certain investigations, and during the time his Department is making those investigations at the instance of the committee the expenses of the employés of the Department engaged in the investigations are to be paid out of the fund for the committee.

Mr. CALKINS. Why should not this resolution give the committee power to employ a sufficient force to make the investigation and let the persons making the investigation be the employés of the House?

Mr. SPRINGER. The House has appropriated a certain sum of money for this purpose. It would not be right to ask the Attorney-General to use the funds of his Department for this particular purpose at the instance of a committee of the House of Representatives.

Mr. CALKINS. That would be true in regard to every other Department.

Mr. SPRINGER. This question has been carefully considered by the committee, and I believe this resolution has received the concurrence of all the members of the committee after very mature consideration.

Mr. CALKINS. I think the resolution should be amended so as to direct the Department to give us this information through its own employés.

Mr. SPRINGER. I will yield to the gentleman from Maine [Mr. MILLIKEN] to make a statement.

Mr. MILLIKEN. I desire to say to the House that the Department of Justice has offered to place its examiners where the committee shall designate them to go, and while they are employed upon such service as the committee shall designate they are to be paid out of the fund which has been provided for the committee. The resolution covers simply that point.

The first proposition of the committee was that the Department of Justice should place these examiners under the charge of the committee; that the committee should have entire control of them. The Department of Justice did not seem willing to do that, but it was willing that the committee should designate them, and while so employed their services should be paid for out of this fund.

Mr. HEPBURN. Will the gentleman permit me to ask him a question?

Mr. MILLIKEN. Yes, sir.

Mr. HEPBURN. I understand that authority was given to the committee to expend $5,000 in pursuing the investigation they were charged with.

Mr. MILLIKEN. I so understand it.

Mr. HEPBURN. Now is it proposed to add to that $5,000?

Mr. MILLIKEN. No; it is proposed to pay these examiners out of the $5,000.

Mr. HEPBURN. Have you not authority to do that now under the resolution heretofore passed by the House?

Mr. CHACE. I understand that the proposition is to pay these men out of the contingent fund of the House, not out of the $5,000.

Mr. MILLIKEN. I do not so understand it.

Mr. CHACE. Will the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. SPRINGER] please state whether that is so or not?

Mr. MILLIKEN. I understand that the $5,000 itself comes out of the contingent fund, and the payment of these examiners is to be made out of that.

Mr. CHACE. Then this is in addition to the $5,000?

Mr. MILLIKEN. I do not so understand it; not necessarily so.

Mr. CHACE. I ask the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. SPRINGER] that question.

Mr. SPRINGER. What is the question?

Mr. CHACE. The gentleman from Maine [Mr. MILLIKEN] claims that the expense of these examiners is not to be in addition to the $5,000 which the committee is already authorized to expend.

Mr. SPRINGER. I will state to the gentleman that very little of the $5,000 already voted has been used; less, I think, than $500. When we shall have exhausted the $5,000 heretofore appropriated, if we have not then concluded our investigation we will come to the House and ask for more; and if the House does not want us to proceed it can refuse to grant any more.

Mr. CHACE. Why not go on and exhaust the $5,000 before you ask for more? You have $5,000 now, and yet you are putting your hand into the Treasury up to the elbow for more, when you have not yet spent $500 of the $5,000.

Mr. SPRINGER. I hope the gentleman will be patient. We are not going to put our hands into the Treasury in connection with this matter.

Mr. CHACE. You are asking us to do it.

Mr. SPRINGER. Whatever is done in the way of expenses in this matter will be for the purpose of purifying the service and not for the purpose of plundering the public Treasury.

Mr. REED. I do not think the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. SPRINGER] understands the question of the gentleman from Rhode Island [Mr. CHACE].

Mr. SPRINGER. I understand it perfectly.

Mr. REED. Will the gentleman permit me to repeat the question?

Mr. SPRINGER. This expense will be a part of the $5,000.

Mr. REED. That is not the effect of the resolution.

Mr. SPRINGER. I think it is.

Mr. REED. You should modify the resolution.

Mr. SPRINGER. I will state that when the $5,000 shall have been expended, if we desire more we shall come to the House and ask for more.

Mr. REED. Do you intend to take this expenditure out of the $5,000?

Mr. SPRINGER. We do.

Mr. MILLIKEN. I ask that the resolution be again read.

Mr. SPRINGER. I have no objection, if gentlemen desire it, that it shall be stated in the resolution that the expenditure to be authorized by this resolution shall be paid out of the $5,000 heretofore appropriated for this investigation.

The resolution was again read.

Mr. CHACE. Now, Mr. Speaker, it is clear that this resolution in its present terms will take an additional sum out of the contingent fund. I suggest to the gentleman from Illinois that he modify it.

Mr. SPRINGER. If there be no objection I will modify the resolution by adding the words, "which money shall be paid out of the sum heretofore appropriated for the use of the Committee on Expenditures in the Department of Justice."

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the proposed modification of the resolution? The Chair hears none. The question is now on the motion of the gentleman from Illinois to suspend the rules and adopt the resolution.

Mr. GEORGE D. WISE. I ask that the resolution be again read.

The SPEAKER. It has just been read. It will be read again if there be no objection.

Mr. DUNN. I object.

Mr. CHACE. I ask whether this committee has not now the right to spend for the purposes of this investigation the $5,000 already appropriated from the contingent fund and to employ whomever they please in making the investigation. If the committee has this right, is it not mere surplusage to reaffirm it by the adoption of this resolution?

Mr. MILLIKEN. If the committee has the right now to spend the money in the manner indicated by this resolution its adoption can do no harm. I understand, however, that the Department of Justice hesitates to employ its examiners at the designation of the committee without the power proposed to be given to the committee by this resolution. Any surplusage that there may be will not cost, if the resolution be adopted, so much time as to debate it if we attempt to contend about the matter. According to the statement of the gentleman from Rhode Island [Mr. CHACE] himself the resolution can do no harm.

The question being taken on the motion of Mr. SPRINGER to suspend the rules and adopt the resolution, it was agreed to—ayes 127, noes 6; more than two-thirds voting in the affirmative.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. MCCOOK, its Secretary, announced that the Senate had passed a bill of the following title, in which the concurrence of the House was requested:

A bill (S. 247) to extend the duration of the Court of Commissioners of Alabama Claims, and for other purposes.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. MILLS. I move that the House do now adjourn.

The question being taken on the motion, there were—ayes 67, noes 93.

Mr. WHITE, of Kentucky. I call for tellers.

Tellers were ordered; and Mr. MILLS and Mr. WILKINS were appointed.

The House divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 86, noes 96.

So the motion to adjourn was not agreed to.

CONGRESSIONAL LIBRARY BUILDING.

Mr. SINGLETON. By instruction of the Committee on the Library, I move to suspend the rules and adopt the resolution which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union be discharged from the further consideration of Senate bill No. 1139, an act authorizing the construction of a building for the accommodation of the Congressional Library, and that the same be made the special order in the House after the morning hour for Thursday, April 3, and from day to day thereafter until disposed of, but not to interfere with revenue and appropriation bills and reports and consideration of bills from the Committee on Public Lands and prior orders of the House.

Mr. HOLMAN. I call for a second on the motion to suspend the rules.

Mr. HOLMAN and Mr. SINGLETON were appointed tellers.

The House divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 149, noes 33.

So the motion to suspend the rules was seconded.

The SPEAKER. Under the rule thirty minutes are now allowed for debate—fifteen minutes in support of the resolution and fifteen minutes in opposition.

Mr. SINGLETON. Mr. Speaker, I had not supposed it would be necessary to say one word on this subject. I believe this House is ready to fix a day for the consideration of this bill. The resolution now presented does nothing more than allow the bill to come before the House for consideration on the day named therein.

It cannot be necessary for me at this late hour of the day to go into any discussion of the particular provisions of the bill. The simple question for the consideration of the House is whether we shall give reasonable accommodations for the Congressional Library, or whether we shall make a bonfire or otherwise dispose of the books which have accumulated and are still accumulating and for which at present there is no sufficient provision. The most potent argument which can be brought to bear upon the minds of intelligent men who desire to do justice to this subject is a visit to the Library itself. There is not a junk-shop in this city which is to-day in the same confused condition as we find the Congressional Library. Yet gentlemen here, from some false notions of economy, seem determined to destroy or at least to interfere with the usefulness of that Library by making no proper provisions for the books, periodicals, &c., which are so valuable and ought to be provided for.

We have now in the Congressional Library and in different rooms about this Capitol 513,000 volumes of valuable books, 170,000 pamphlets, 400,000 musical publications, 9,000 maps, and about 300,000 engravings. These are now lying about in almost every nook and corner of the Capitol. In the Library itself and attic over it there are now stored away a number of newspaper files, which are constantly endangering the safety of this building. A fire in the Library would entail the destruction not only of these books, pamphlets, periodicals, &c., many of which could never be replaced, but also the Capitol itself, at least the central portion of it. About 8,000 volumes of law books are annually added to the Library, and in all 30,000 come in each year. The stock of books yearly added must constantly increase in ratio. Where are you going to put them? Go into the crypt under the Rotunda and you will find nine rooms there stored with these books. Do you intend they shall remain there? Or shall we, like other great nations of the world, have a suitable Library building for their proper arrangement and accommodation, a Library which is to be a part of the glory of this country?

Why, Mr. Speaker, I need not consume more time upon this subject. If you have visited the Library, if you have examined its condition, you will agree with me that it is useless to waste time in the discussion of a question which represents a case of such urgent and absolute necessity as confronts us.

I will not undertake to discuss the location and general plan of the Library. That will come up properly when the House determines to proceed to the consideration of the bill. I will reserve the remainder of my time until I hear from the other side.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman has twelve minutes remaining.

Mr. NUTTING. Mr. Speaker, the resolution before the House is an important one. It is a request to the House that the bill for the erection of a library building be taken from its present place on the Calendar, where it now has little chance of being reached, and that a day certain be fixed for its discussion and consideration. Any measure which looks to the preservation and protection of literary works, any measure which has for its object the building of a great national library, is worthy of the attention of all who desire the advancement, education, and refinement of the people.

This proposition would be true in any government; but, Mr. Speaker, it is eminently true in the case under discussion. In governments managed by the few for the many books and literary productions are useful perhaps. But allow me to say that in a nation like ours, governed by the whole people, education begotten of the familiarity with books and papers and literature generally is absolutely necessary. It is necessary that a free people should be educated in order that free institutions be perpetuated. Ignorance is the father of crime. Ignorance of the masses is dangerous to the safety of our form of government. We must gather, protect, and distribute books. America, with all its great success, with all its grand achievements, must look to the intelligence of the people to maintain and perpetuate it and send it forward as it ought to go in the future. If a nation of 55,000,000 of people, if a nation that is noted the world over for its culture and intelligence, and which is rich beyond measure in the developments of the future, if such a nation is to be preserved and perpetuated it must give consideration to its libraries, to its educational facilities. The people are asking why we do not erect a building to protect the great Library which we now have. The people are demanding that the Congress give its attention to this subject. Heretofore they have asked in vain.

Mr. Speaker, our Library has already grown to large proportions; it has outgrown its present quarters; and it is a shame and disgrace to Congress that this subject has so long been neglected. This House ought to be willing, and I believe it is willing, to give this bill a day or days, that this subject so near the hearts of the people and so important to their welfare may have discussion and consideration. It will be an injustice to refuse this request, and the people will hold all who lend their votes or give their influence to an effort to bury this bill to a strict account for their action.

Who is so economical as not to blush when he visits the present Library quarters, when he sees valuable books piled on the floor, piled in corners, stacked in the cellar, and tucked away up in the attic? This question has not received the attention that it deserved.

I am not here to say this House ought to adopt the plan of the building or the site chosen by the committee, but I am here to ask that you give us a chance to be heard upon this important subject. If we continue to collect books and literary productions in the future as we have in the past it will be but a short time before we will be obliged to store books outside in other and separate places. Every man on this floor, every man in the city, and, in fact, every man, woman, and child in the land, and the coming generations are interested in this bill.

Is it true that the House of Representatives, with its three hundred and twenty-five members, representing 55,000,000 people, will refuse at this time to give us a chance to discuss this question, to discuss the question whether we shall have a building worthy of a great people, worthy of the subject, worthy of and satisfactory to an intelligent country? It can not be!

Under the provisions of the law of copyright you must provide room for the volumes obtained from authors and publishers. You are trustees of these volumes. You will be unfaithful to your trust if you do not provide a proper and worthy place for them. These books are treasures, and they are now mere heaps of rubbish. Give them a place. Give the people a chance to read them. Let the people know you are interested in this worthy project.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. I rise to a question of order.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. I wish to know whether the gentleman is speaking in the time allowed for the opposition to this resolution.

The SPEAKER. That is not a question of order. The gentleman, as the Chair understands, is advocating the adoption of the resolution.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. I understand that the time is being consumed in opposition.

The SPEAKER. The Chair announced to the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. SINGLETON] that twelve minutes of the time remained in favor of the resolution. Thereupon the gentleman from New York took the floor in advocacy of the resolution. Of course that comes out of the twelve minutes.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. It does not come out of the time in opposition?

The SPEAKER. Of course not.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. I raised the question because there seemed to be some misapprehension about the time.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York will proceed.

Mr. NUTTING. Mr. Speaker, I hope that this House will stop for a few moments and consider the importance of this resolution. The committee has examined the bill passed by the Senate in all its details and has reported it to this House without amendment. It is now the duty of the House to allow it to be considered. You owe it as a duty to the great mass of books now decaying. You owe it to yourselves, and, above all, you owe it to the people.

You may reject the plan and the place and perhaps you will reject the bill, but do not reject this resolution and refuse to meet the question fairly. Give us such a building in such a place as your wisdom dictates, but give us a building. We should have a great national library. We must have such a library; and yet we can not have it unless we have a place to put it. There is no such place now, and you know it. Many pamphlets, papers, maps, pictures, and even books, which are invaluable and could not be replaced are fast going into decay. What are you going to do about it? Will you sit still and let this disgrace fasten itself on Congress? I hope not.

I have said sufficient on this subject until this bill shall come up for discussion and I hope final passage. We now ask simply a fair opportunity to present to the House what we believe to be an important measure. It is a subject on which I feel earnestly and sincerely, and am willing here and now, and in fact for all time to come, to place myself on record in favor of the erection of a building which will be a protection to our Library, a pride to our people, and worthy of a place among the national library buildings of the world.

Mr. SINGLETON. How much time is left.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman has six minutes remaining.

Mr. SINGLETON. I will reserve that until I hear from the other side.

Mr. HOLMAN. Of course every gentleman understands the ingenious method by which this scheme has been worked up during the last two years, in which the very efficient and competent Librarian has played a very important part, and every gentleman understands very well how their library and their books have been employed to work a given result. Every gentleman understands what is known to the whole country touching the lands to be condemned for the purpose of a site for the proposed library building. You have five or six hundred acres of lands of reservations within the limits of this city. And every one understands that a measure which that side of the House was not willing to pass during the last Congress is pressed now on this side of the House.

Now, what are the facts? You are called upon to abandon your Congressional Library, which was intended to be right under the eye of Congress, within the reach of every member of the House and every member of the Senate; a library of Congress, intended for the use of Congress and to aid Congress in the discharge of the great duties which devolve upon the respective Houses.

Has anybody opposed the building of a library wherever the city of Washington may desire to have it built and the placing in that library of such works as you could properly spare from your great collection, reserving those only which are appropriate for your own use? I have heard of no one opposing that proposition. The question is whether instead of having your library in this building convenient of access you are to pay for a site for it away from this building half a million of dollars out of the Treasury when you have five or six hundred acres of ground from which a site could be selected if one were necessary. You are called upon to indorse a scheme involving the expenditure of half a million of dollars on real estate and eight millions more for the construction of the building.

And every gentleman understands further that the vote now to be taken is the test vote. If by a two-thirds vote a day can be fixed for the consideration of this measure when it can pass by a majority the scheme may be successful, and a measure which the other side of the House was not willing to assume the responsibility for in the last Congress will be passed through this Congress.

I indulge the hope that this measure will not pass. Notwithstanding the vast accumulation of money in your Treasury vaults, the people still demand the same rigid economy in the administration of your Government as they required when your Treasury was comparatively empty, instead of overflowing as now; and that means that integrity in managing the public Treasury will be demanded just as sternly of this House as it would have been if you were dealing with an empty instead of a full Treasury.

I trust, sir, that this motion will not prevail. I trust that a scheme will ultimately be devised by which, leaving the Library of Congress where it is, you will erect such a building for the city of Washington for such portion of the library as you do not require to keep here, and sustain and support that library liberally out of the public Treasury. I have no objection to your building up that library, at the same time leaving your Congressional Library as it has been for generations past, within the reach of every member of this House and every member of the Senate. Put it in a building on those grounds which are proposed to be condemned or anywhere else and it ceases to be a Congressional library within the reach of members of Congress.

Mr. OATES. Has the gentleman inquired what authority we have for establishing a public library for this city?

Mr. HOLMAN. I do not wish to discuss the constitutional question at this time. I am discussing only the question of expediency. And I trust, in view of what has already transpired, the House will refuse to suspend the rules and fix a day for the consideration of the measure.

I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. REAGAN].

Mr. REAGAN. I am as heartily in favor of a proper building in which to place the books now belonging to the Congressional Library and those which may hereafter accumulate as any member can be, but I wish to see that done with some reference to propriety and economy.

My difficulty about supporting this measure grows out of the fact that it seems no measure to accommodate the necessities of a Congressional library can be got up here that does not have a job in it. What is the need, sir, of selecting ground east of this Capitol away from the central part of the city and condemning important property of great value in order to build a Congressional library? It is true, sir, it may give some people two or three times the full value of their property, and to them the scheme commends itself as a valuable speculation. But we need not do that unless we wish to facilitate and set forward private speculation.

We have here, sir, several hundred acres of public grounds extending from this Capitol to the Potomac River. We have in the vicinity of the Smithsonian Institute, the National Museum, and the Agricultural Department building as appropriate grounds as could be selected in the city or its vicinity—beautiful ground, ample room, and at a more convenient distance to the great body of the population of the city than the place would be east of the Capitol—and nothing to pay for it.

Mr. BROWNE, of Indiana. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. REAGAN. Yes, sir.

Mr. BROWNE, of Indiana. If we consider the question at the time proposed to be assigned for the consideration of the bill may we not then amend the Senate bill and provide for the erection of a library building on one of the public reservations?

Mr. REAGAN. It may be that we can; but I want now, while it is on its boom, to strike the first blow at the scheme.

Mr. BROWNE, of Indiana. I will say to the gentleman from Texas, I shall vote against the location east of the Capitol as well as himself.

Mr. REAGAN. I am glad to hear the gentleman say so. As I have said, we have beautiful grounds with ample surroundings and better located in every way than those near the Capitol. The building which we are to construct away from the Capitol will simply be for a national library. The books for Congressional use will undoubtedly be retained in the Capitol. The building here proposed is for a national library, for that is what it is going to be.

Mr. CRISP. And that is what it is termed on the design here, "National Library."

Mr. REAGAN. I believe that is so. When we have reserved for the use of Congress such books as may be needed, the building to contain the balance of them ought to be located as conveniently as may be for the use of the citizens of the capital and those who may visit the capital with a view of examining the books in the Library. We have ample grounds, handsome grounds, for that purpose, already paid for, and the object will be better served by erecting a building on such grounds than it will be by this proposed bill.

It seems to be difficult to do anything in connection with appropriations for this city that shall not have some private speculation in it. We should remember that we are here not merely representing the city of Washington and the interests of private property-owners here, but we are representing our constituents at home, who are at least interested in having our expenditures made with due reference to economy and common honesty.

I should not have said a word on this bill but for the fact that I agree with the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN], that the demonstration already made here is such that the adoption now of this resolution by an overwhelming majority will be deemed as substantially determining this question. I desired to avail myself of these few minutes to protest against the scheme which is presented to the House by this bill.

Mr. HOLMAN. I will yield the remainder of my time to my friend from Illinois [Mr. TOWNSHEND]. Before doing so I ask him to allow me to say that the National Association of Libraries of this country in three successive national conventions have condemned this entire scheme.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. I would inquire how much time there is left to me?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman has five minutes.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. I am in favor of erecting a national library building, one that will be an honor and a credit to the national capital as well as to the Republic. I will not pass any criticism upon the character of the building which it is proposed by this bill to erect, because I am not a sufficient judge of architecture to be able to form a correct opinion on that subject. And I have no doubt Mr. Smithmyer has designed a suitable building for that important purpose.

But I am opposed to this bill upon the same grounds that I have heretofore opposed such bills in past Congresses. It is because of the persistency on the part of the Senate in requiring the purchase, at extravagant price, of a site for the location of this building which in my judgment, in the first place, will not be a proper one; and, in the second place, because it is entirely unnecessary for the Government to purchase any ground for the building.

I can point out locations in this city where the Government owns acres of land much more suitable than the site selected by this bill, and where the Library building ought to be erected. I am willing to vote for erecting a building on some such ground which will be ample for the purpose and a credit to the country. But I am utterly opposed to, and shall ever oppose, the project of purchasing these blocks of buildings east of the Capitol at an unnecessary expense to the Government.

Mr. RICE. Will the gentleman permit me to ask him a question?

Mr. TOWNSHEND. Not now; I have but a minute or two; the gentleman will have his own time.

There is the location known as Armory Square, lying just east of the Smithsonian grounds. I do not know how many acres there are in the Armory Square; probably twenty acres. It is an eligible location, one well situated for this purpose, and it will not cost the Government one cent to have the building located there. Now, if you purchase the blocks of buildings east of the Capitol, or only one-half of what was originally comtemplated, it will cost the Government over a half million of dollars, and when you have bought it the Library will be in an inconvenient situation.

To what use do you propose to dedicate this building? To the use of members of Congress? Not at all. It is to be a library for the use of the public; therefore it should be located in the center as near as practicable—the center of population in this city. If you locate it on Capitol Hill it will be inconvenient for the mass of the people of this city.

If you simply want a Congressional library, every book that is needed for the use of Congress can be stored in that portion of the Capitol where the present Library is located. We need only a parliamentary and political library for the use of Congress. We have no use for Byron, or Pope, or Ovid, or for light literature and works of that character in this Capitol.

In the moment or two left me I desire to say that when gentlemen will bring in a bill here proposing to locate this Library building at some convenient point in the city, on ground already owned by the Government, I will join hands with them and endeavor to secure the passage of such a bill. And I am in favor of appropriating a sufficient amount to make such a building ample for the purpose and one which will reflect credit and honor both upon this city and upon the nation.

I want it distinctly understood that I base my opposition to the adoption of this motion upon the belief that when this bill is brought before us we shall not have as fair an opportunity to defeat the proposed location of this library as we have now. The first bill brought in here designated Judiciary Square as the site. There was then in that square some forty acres of vacant land, in the very center of the population of the city. That site had been examined by engineers of the Army and declared to be suitable for the purpose. By it seems that persons owning this property east of the Capitol were determined that the Library should not be located upon a Government reservation. It is said that their property is not profitable and that they want to unload it on the Government.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. WHITE, of Kentucky. Mr. Speaker, I desire to know what is the question before the House.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. SINGLETON] to suspend the rules and adopt the resolution.

Mr. WHITE, of Kentucky. I understood that the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. TOWNSHEND] was discussing the merits of the bill. Was that in order?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois has taken his seat, and if the point of order were well taken, it is too late. What the gentleman from Illinois has said can not now be corrected upon a point of order. [Laughter.]

Mr. SINGLETON. Mr. Speaker, the remarks of gentlemen who have opposed this resolution would seem to imply that if the rules be suspended and a day fixed for the consideration of the bill, that settles the question as to the location of the Library and the style and character of the building that is to be erected. Now, gentlemen know better than that; and the whole object of introducing that kind of argument at this time is to defeat entirely the consideration of the bill. This, in my judgment, is not a fair method of opposing the measure. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. TOWNSHEND] who has just spoken knows perfectly well that when this bill comes to be considered the House will have an opportunity to decide upon the location and adopt such other amendments to the bill as it may think proper, or if the House should so desire the bill may be rejected entirely.

There is no reason why this interesting public question should not be considered by this House. It has been an unsettled question for many years past. It is time we should let the country know whether we intend to take care of these books, establish a creditable national library, or allow these books to be destroyed and the country left without a grand repository for them.

Mr. NICHOLLS. As the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. TOWNSHEND] has a green badge on his breast, in honor of St. Patrick's day, this may be with him an Irish bull. [Laughter.]

Mr. SINGLETON. I think that very likely, as from some cause the gentleman has switched off the track entirely.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. I did not hear the remark of the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. NICHOLLS].

Mr. SINGLETON. I yield the residue of my time to the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. WOODWARD], my colleague on the committee.

Mr. WOODWARD. Mr. Speaker, I beg members of the House, and especially those on this side, to consider that a vote against this proposition is practically a vote against the maintenance and continuation of this Library. The remarks made by my colleagues on the committee, the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. SINGLETON] and the gentleman from New York [Mr. NUTTING], sufficiently indicate that the Library of Congress in its present condition is a shame and a scandal; and, sir, it concerns the dignity and convenience of this House and in no small degree the dignity and honor of the American people that we shall speedily do something to take away this reproach.

Mr. Speaker, one gentleman says that he is in favor of a national library. Another gentleman, the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN], says that he is opposed to a national library and will have none of it. I say to gentlemen that the opposition, which is specially based upon the character of this bill, is an opposition to all libraries. It appears to be the design of the gentleman from Indiana, distinguished as he is, to connect the Democratic party in some way with hostility to libraries.

Now, Mr. Speaker, it is true, as stated by my colleague on the committee, that the vote upon adopting this resolution does not in any manner determine the result of this bill. If the House should decide that this bill shall not be taken up for consideration, when shall we have proper provision for our Library? When will opportunity be given for members of this House to determine what shall be done with these books? If no provision is to be made for the Library, we might as well lock up the books or put them down in the coal-hole.

As to the pending bill, I have only to say that during the last eight or ten years every committee of this House and every committee of the Senate that has had the subject under consideration has practically approved of this measure. As to the location of the Library, that is a matter which will properly be considered when the bill comes up. At that time we will show the House, by descriptions and surveys of every Government reservation in this city, that there is no eligible location for the new Library building upon any Government reservation. But if this House should think differently, let the bill be amended. Let the House reject the bill if it will and send the subject back to the committee. Let the House indicate what kind of a bill it is disposed to pass. In the present condition of the Library it is not so much a question what we shall do as an imperative necessity that something be done to take away the present scandal and reproach.

The SPEAKER. The time for debate having expired, the question is now on the motion of the gentleman from Mississippi to suspend the rules and adopt the resolution.

Mr. HOLMAN and Mr. RANDALL called for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 181, nays 61, not voting 78; as follows:

Mr. DORSHEIMER with Mr. BROWNE, of Indiana, for to-day.

Mr. KEAN. I am paired with my colleague from New Jersey on political questions; but, not regarding this as a political question, I have voted.

The result of the vote was then announced as above recorded.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. BLOUNT. I move that the House do now adjourn.

The SPEAKER. Before that the Chair desires to lay before the House some executive communications and personal requests of members.

COMMISSIONED AND WARRANT OFFICERS OF THE NAVY.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a communication from the Secretary of the Navy, in response to a resolution of the House of Representatives of March 1, 1884, requesting certain information concerning the employment of the commissioned and warrant officers of the Navy at the date of the compilation of the last Naval Registers; which was ordered to be printed, and referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

FOOT-AND-MOUTH DISEASE.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Missouri [Mr. HATCH] asks leave to have printed as a document the following communication, the title of which the Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Letter from the Secretary of State, inclosing a letter from Mr. Lowell, American minister at London, concerning measures which have been introduced into the British Parliament for the prevention of the foot-and-mouth disease in the United Kingdom.

The SPEAKER. This communication will be printed and referred to the Committee on Agriculture.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. The gentleman from Missouri asked also that it be printed in the RECORD.

Mr. HATCH, of Missouri. Yes, printed in the RECORD for the information of the House. That was the request I made.

The SPEAKER. Without objection it will be so ordered.

There was no objection.

The communication is as follows:

DEPARTMENT OF STATE, Washington, March 12, 1884.

SIR: I have the honor to inclose herewith, for the information and consideration of your committee, a copy of a dispatch to this Department from Mr. Lowell, the American minister at London, concerning measures which have been introduced into the British Parliament for the prevention of foot-and-mouth disease in the United Kingdom.

I have the honor to be, sir, your obedient servant,

FRED'K T. FRELINGHUYSEN.

Hon. WILLIAM H. HATCH,
Chairman of the Committee on Agriculture,
House of Representatives.

No. 720.] LEGATION OF THE UNITED STATES,
London, February 26, 1884.

SIR: The recent prevalence of foot-and-mouth disease in the United Kingdom has not only caused great losses and greater apprehensions among the farming population, but has been adroitly used by the friends of protection and the enemies of the party in power for the purpose of bringing to the surface and rendering active a certain amount of political discontent. It is assumed that though this malady may be originated in other less favored quarters of the globe, yet that the soil and climate of England have been endowed by the Creator with some divine immunity in this respect; and it has not been difficult to persuade the agricultural classes that their losses have been due to the unwise and even culpable laxity of the government in the admission of foreign cattle. Looking round in their irritation for some object on which to vent it, the farmers have naturally selected the ministry as the most obvious and attainable. As many of the liberal members of Parliament are largely interested in the question as landholders and represent rural constituencies, the question has assumed so much political importance as to give some anxiety to the government.

The matter was not alluded to in the speech from the throne, but was thought so urgent that a bill was introduced in the house of lords by Lord Carlingford, president of the council, to define more precisely and in some respects to enlarge powers already possessed by the privy council with respect to the importation of cattle. The bill, amended on motion of the Duke of Richmond, with the intention of making it obligatory on the privy council to prohibit such importation from any country in which they were not satisfied that the disease did not exist, will now go to the house of commons.

What will be its fate there it is of course impossible to foretell; but from all I hear I should think it hardly likely that it will leave the commons with any abatement of its more rigorous provisions. The wish and hope of the farming interest is absolute exclusion, but this will be difficult of attainment, because the graziers both here and in Scotland are fully sensible of the advantage they would gain by the free admission of cattle on the hoof.

Hitherto the privy council have performed a very difficult and complicated duty with great fairness, and with a leaning, if there was any, toward the most liberal interpretation of the law.

But the clamor is so loud and so persistent that they may find themselves forced to measures which, in principle, they would disapprove. The question has grown to such dimensions that one of the persons most competent to give an opinion assured me that he thought it to be politically the most important which would confront the ministry in any election that might occur in an agricultural constituency.

Should the protectionists and farmers' friends succeed in bringing about anything like the exclusion of foreign cattle, there would soon be an even more powerful reaction brought about by the higher prices of meat that would inevitably follow, and which it is the thinly veiled object of the agricultural interest to produce.

Though it might be almost impossible in a territory so vast as ours to prevent the occurrence of sporadic cases of foot-and-mouth disease, it occurs to me that it might be feasible thoroughly to disinfect and keep disinfected certain routes and ports of shipment by a rigorous inspection and an unswerving resolution in stamping out every spark of existing contagion.

Were such a course persevered in it would produce conviction here as nothing else, especially no amount of argument, ever could or will.

I have the honor to be, with great respect, your obedient servant,

J. R. LOWELL.

Hon. F. T. FRELINGHUYSEN,
Secretary of State.

REPRINT OF A REPORT.

Mr. WILLIS. I ask unanimous consent that an order be made for the reprinting of report No. 495.

Mr. WHITE, of Kentucky. What is that?

Mr. WILLIS. It is upon the educational question. The report has been exhausted, and there is a great demand for it from all quarters.

The SPEAKER. If there be no objection the order to reprint the report specified will be made.

There was no objection, and it was ordered accordingly.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

By unanimous consent, leave of absence was granted as follows:

To Mr. O'HARA, for six days, on account of important business.

To Mr. ATKINSON, for three days from to-morrow, on account of important business.

To Mr. TAYLOR, of Tennessee, for two days, on account of ill-health.

The motion of Mr. BLOUNT was then agreed to; and accordingly (at 5 o'clock and 12 minutes p. m.) the House adjourned.

PETITIONS, ETC.

The following petitions and papers were laid on the Clerk's desk, under the rule, and referred as follows:

SENATE.

TUESDAY, March 18, 1884.

Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. E. D. HUNTLEY, D. D.

The Journal of yesterday's proceedings was read and approved.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. CLARK, its Clerk, announced that the House had passed a bill (H. R. 6073) to provide for certain of the most urgent deficiencies in the appropriations for the service of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1884, and for other purposes; in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. HILL. I present the memorial of the Denver Chamber of Commerce on the subject of the retirement of small Treasury notes, and as it is a brief document and an able argument, I ask that it may be read.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Colorado presents a memorial of the Denver Chamber of Commerce on the subject of the retirement of small Treasury notes, and asks that the memorial be read. Is there objection?

Mr. SHERMAN. I have no objection to the reading except the time that is consumed. I have no objection to an order to print it. I should like very much to hear it, but I do not think it is the custom or the proper thing in the Senate to have memorials read unless they come from the Legislature of a State, when by courtesy they are read. This paper is evidently several folios long.

Mr. HILL. I notice that within the past few days exceptions have been made and that such papers have been read in the Senate. If this document can be printed in the RECORD I have no objection to letting it take that course.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Colorado asks that this memorial be printed in the RECORD. Is there objection?

Mr. INGALLS. What advantage is gained, I will ask the Senator from Colorado, by having it printed in the RECORD, cumbering up our proceedings and making a vast bulk that is already so unwieldy as to be almost unmanageable? If the Senator thinks that any advantage will be gained, or that the evil will be remedied any sooner by putting this publication in the RECORD, I have no objection; but it seems to me the same object would be attained by having it printed as a document, if he desires it laid on our tables, where it will be accessible.

Mr. HILL. It will not occupy more than about one column of the RECORD. It will encumber it to a slight extent, and I think it is very important that such an able and clear presentation of a subject of paramount importance should be made a part of the permanent record of Congress. I ask to have it printed in the RECORD.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the printing of this memorial in the RECORD? The Chair hears no objection, and it is so ordered.

The memorial, which was referred to the Committee on Finance, is as follows:

MEMORIAL.

The Denver (Colo.) Chamber of Commerce to the Congress of the United States.

Whereas the Secretary of the Treasury has notified your honorable body of the immediate necessity of an appropriation of $150,000 to defray the expense of a new issue of one and two dollar Treasury notes; and

Whereas there is now in the Treasury of the United States $147,000,000 of silver coin: Therefore,

We, the people of Colorado, through the Denver Chamber of Commerce, would earnestly petition your honorable body to enact a law or laws authorizing the Treasurer of the United States to call in and redeem in silver all Treasury notes of the denominations of ones and twos now outstanding, and to authorize the Secretary of the Treasury to discontinue any further issue of Treasury notes of a like denomination, and that in the future no paper money of less denomination than $5 be allowed to be issued or paid out by the Government or any national bank.

And we would further call the attention of Congress to the following reasons (among others) for urging at this time the granting of this our petition:

First. Gold and silver is the constitutional currency of the country.

Second. The United States produces a large quantity of these metals, and for all purposes of business and change (under $5) gold and silver is as convenient for the people, more satisfactory to them, and much less expensive to maintain than the paper money known as "small bills."

Third. That it is the paramount duty of the Government to do everything in its power to make the money of the nation—gold, silver, and paper—equal, uniform, and invariable.

Fourth. That silver has not been fairly dealt with by the capitalists of the East nor the General Government, and that no sincere effort has been made by the Government to give silver coin (of which there is $240,000,000 in the United States) its proper place, value, and usefulness with the other money of the country.

Fifth. That in evidence of this fact in 1879 Congress passed an act preventing the national banks from issuing any more one and two dollar bills. At that date there was nearly eight millions outstanding of these small national-bank bills, besides forty millions of the same denomination in Treasury notes; but Congress did not stop the issue of ones and twos by the Government. And what has been the result? The national-bank notes were taken up until there now remain less than one million outstanding, while the Government has issued an additional seventeen millions since 1879, thus really increasing the outstanding ones and twos from about forty-eight millions to fifty-eight millions, the amount then outstanding. Had the Treasury notes, as well as the national-bank notes, been withdrawn at that time and not reissued and silver substituted therefor, it would not only have brought the fifty-eight millions of silver into circulation, but gone far toward placing silver in the same useful, convenient, and valuable position it had occupied during the first eighty years of our Government.

Sixth. That all paper money of a less denomination than $5 should be withdrawn as speedily as possible and forever and silver substituted therefor. England, the greatest enemy of silver, has no paper money of less amount than $25; Germany has no bills of less denomination than $7.50. The bank of France has only about $1,000,000 of paper of less denomination than $10 outstanding. All these countries use silver for change. France is the country most like our own in her government and in her position as to silver money and in the amount of reserve held. She now has in her treasury $395,000,000 coin and bullion, $203,000,000, or 51 per cent., being in silver, and this besides the large amount in circulation, and its prosperity is only second to our own in all the countries of the world.

Seventh. That there is now in the United States Treasury $375,000,000 of gold and silver (coin and bullion), 41 per cent. of which (or $147,000,000) is in silver, and that there is to-day a little less than $100,000,000 of silver in circulation in the United States, or about $2 to each inhabitant—a people that do five times the business on the same capital of any people in the world.

Eighth. That there is no sort of justification in the course pursued against silver by the Eastern States of the Union, and they have been and are strongly supported in their war upon it by the present administration.

Ninth. That however unwise (which we do not admit) the large coinage of silver may be it now exists, and the Government is the actual owner of three-fifths of the silver in the United States; that the product of gold is now, and has been, gradually decreasing for the past ten years; that the product of silver is not increasing. It behooves the Government and people to adopt such a course as will restore and maintain the value of silver throughout the world.

Tenth. That the reserves required by law at this time of the national banks of the United States is in round numbers $235,000,000, and in addition the Government requires the banks to deposit a redemption fund of $15,000,000, which makes $250,000,000 of reserve (and this amount will not vary much in the future), and must be held at all times and under all circumstances by the national banks and the Treasurer of the United States for them. Now, if Congress will so amend the national-bank act as to require these national banks to hold 10 per cent. of their legal reserve in silver coin for their redemption fund, this would permanently dispose of, say, $40,000,000 of the floating silver of the country, and the banks could, without much difficulty, manage their part of it. This amount, added to the silver coin necessary to take up the one and two dollar bills, would dispose of, say, $100,000,000 of silver in a manner that would give stability to this metal, and would relieve the Government, strengthen the banks, and give general satisfaction to the masses throughout the Union.

And your memorialists would ever pray.

The foregoing memorial was reported by the committee on finance, and unanimously adopted by the Denver Chamber of Commerce, Denver, Colo., at a meeting held February 28, 1884, and ordered to be sent to Hon. N. P. HILL, United States Senator from Colorado, for presentation to Congress.

JOHN L. DAILEY, Secretary.

Mr. CULLOM presented the memorial and joint resolution of the Eighth Legislative Assembly of the Territory of Wyoming, in favor of additional compensation for the members thereof; which was referred to the Committee on Territories.

Mr. CALL. I present the petition of John L. Wilson, president of the Library Association, A. Anderson, secretary, of Saint Augustine, Fla., and various other members of that association, praying for a grant of a lot of land belonging to the United States, known as Governor's Garden, situated within the limits of the city of Saint Augustine, Fla., for the erection of a free public library and reading-room. I move that the petition be referred to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. CALL. I also present the petition of M. R. Cooper, J. W. Henderson, and a large number of other citizens of Saint Augustine, Fla., visitors and others, praying Congress to grant the petition of the president and officers of the Library Association of the city of Saint Augustine for the donation of a lot of land known as Governor's Garden. I desire to state, Mr. President, that for two hundred years these lots have been open to the use of the city and people of Saint Augustine under the Government of Spain, and that they are not needed by the Government of the United States for any purpose. I move that the petition be referred to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. McPHERSON. I present a petition of citizens of New Jersey, praying for the passage of a bill providing for the construction of certain bridges across Staten Island Sound. As it appears to be a bridge for railroad purposes, I move that the petition be referred to the Committee on Railroads.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. MITCHELL. I present a memorial of the Vessel-Owners and Captains' Association of Philadelphia, Pa., in favor of the right to sue the Government for damages resulting from collisions at sea with United States ships, and move that it be referred to the Committee on Commerce.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair will suggest to the Senator from Pennsylvania that the Committee on the Judiciary reported yesterday a bill upon that subject.

Mr. MITCHELL. Perhaps the memorial had better lie on the table.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The memorial will be laid upon the table.

Mr. MITCHELL. I present a memorial of the Commercial Exchange of Philadelphia, Pa., remonstrating against the extension of the grain-shovel patents. As that question is before the Senate, I move that the memorial lie upon the table.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. MITCHELL presented a memorial of the Vessel-Owners and Captains' Association of Philadelphia, Pa., in favor of what is known as the Dingley pilotage bill; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

He also presented a petition of H. A. Ross Post, Grand Army of the Republic, of Lebanon, Pa., officially signed, and a petition of Daniel H. Bee and 49 other members of John Pollock Post, Grand Army of the Republic, of Pennsylvania, praying for the equalization of bounty and other relief to ex-Union soldiers; which were referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

He also presented a petition of citizens of Lawrence County, Pennsylvania, praying for the repeal of certain laws permitting the use of vapors of alcoholic spirits in manufacturing vinegar; which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. SLATER, from the Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (S. 280) granting a pension to Wesley Morford, reported it without amendment, and submitted a report thereon.

Mr. SABIN. I am instructed by the Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred the petition of Dr. P. W. Bradbury, praying for a pension, to report adversely thereon.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If there be no objection the report will be agreed to and the committee discharged from the further consideration of the subject.

Mr. COCKRELL. Has the Senator made a written report?

Mr. SABIN. Yes, sir; a report is filed.

Mr. COCKRELL. All right. There is no bill with that case.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. There is no bill reported. There is an adverse report on the petition.

Mr. COCKRELL. Then it can not go on the Calendar under the rule.

Mr. SABIN, from the Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (S. 605) granting a pension to Capt. Sanderson H. Rogers, submitted an adverse report thereon, which was agreed to; and the bill was postponed indefinitely.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (S. 531) granting a pension to Caroline M. McDougal, reported it without amendment, and submitted a report thereon.

Mr. CAMDEN from the Committee on Military Affairs, to whom was referred the bill (S. 512) for the relief of citizens of Oregon, Washington, Idaho, and Montana who served in connection with the United States troops in the war with the Nez Percé Indians and for the relief of the heirs of such as were killed in such service, and for other purposes, submitted an adverse report thereon, which was agreed to; and the bill was postponed indefinitely.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (S. 345) for the relief of certain officers in the Medical Department of the United States Army, submitted an adverse report thereon, which was agreed to; and the bill was postponed indefinitely.

Mr. ALDRICH, from the Committee on Finance, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 4779) to change the name of the West Waterville National Bank of Oakland, in the State of Maine, to that of the Messalonskee National Bank, reported it without amendment.

Mr. FRYE. That is a bill to which there can be possibly no opposition, and the bank directors are very anxious that it shall receive early consideration. I shall ask after the morning call is through that it be taken up.

Mr. HAMPTON, from the Committee on Military Affairs, to whom was referred the bill (S. 1058) explanatory of an act directing the Second Auditor to settle the pay and bounty account of John Ammahaie (or Ammahe), passed June 30, 1876, submitted an adverse report thereon, which was agreed to; and the bill was postponed indefinitely.

Mr. GEORGE. I am directed by the Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the bill (S. 536) for the relief of Nicholas J. Bigley, to submit an adverse report thereon. I call the attention of the Senator from Indiana to this report.

Mr. VOORHEES. I ask that the bill be placed on the Calendar with the adverse report.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be placed on the Calendar with the adverse report.

Mr. LOGAN. I am directed by the Committee on Military Affairs, to whom was referred the bill (S. 1420) to increase the efficiency of the Army of the United States, to report it with amendments. I ask that a letter from the Secretary of War in reference to the bill be accepted as the report of the committee, and that it be printed with the bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Illinois, from the Committee on Military Affairs, asks that a letter from the Secretary of War to the committee on the subject of this bill be printed for the use of the Senate. Is there objection? The Chair hears none.

Mr. LOGAN, from the Committee on Military Affairs, to whom was referred the bill (S. 1745) for the relief of former occupants of the present military reservation at Point San José, in the city and county of San Francisco, in the State of California, asked to be discharged from its further consideration, and that it be referred to the Committee on Claims; which was agreed to.

PENSION LEGISLATION.

Mr. MITCHELL. I am instructed by the Committee on Pensions to ask the Senate to adopt an order for the printing of the hearing of a committee of the Grand Army of the Republic who lately appeared before the Committee on Pensions and presented their views on the subject of pensions. It is not long and it is a matter of public interest. I therefore present the following order for printing the report of the remarks made on that occasion:

Ordered, That the remarks of the committee of the Grand Army of the Republic before the Committee on Pensions of the Senate on the 8th instant, in relation to proposed legislation on the subject of pensions, be printed for the use of the Senate.

The order was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Mr. PALMER introduced a bill (S. 1864) to allow John Winchell arrears of pension; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. SABIN introduced a bill (S. 1865) granting a pension to Mrs. Minna Haeberle; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

He also introduced a bill (S. 1866) granting a pension to John T. Rudy; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. VOORHEES introduced a bill (S. 1867) restoring to the pension-roll the name of Samantha Harriman; which was read twice by its title, and, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. GIBSON introduced a bill (S. 1868) for the relief of Francis Masich, of Louisiana; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. MILLER, of California, introduced a bill (S. 1869) granting a pension to Kate C. McDougal, widow of the late Commander Charles

J. McDougal; which was read twice by its title, and, with the papers on file relating to the case, referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. CALL introduced a bill (S. 1870) to amend article 103 of the Rules and Articles of War; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. HAWLEY. I introduce a bill and I beg that it may be read in full, as it is short.

The bill (S. 1871) authorizing the Secretary of the Navy to offer a reward of $25,000 for rescuing or ascertaining the fate of the Greely expedition was read the first time at length, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Navy be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to make proclamation immediately, and cause said proclamation to be published and distributed as thoroughly as may be in such foreign ports as are interested in navigation and traffic in the Arctic seas, that the Government of the United States will pay a reward of $25,000, to be equitably paid or distributed to such ship or ships, person or persons, not in the military or naval service of the United States, as shall discover and rescue or satisfactorily ascertain the fate of the Greely expedition.

The bill was read the second time by its title.

Mr. HAWLEY. This matter has been discussed a great deal among seafaring men and others, and it is known that from many European ports, English, Norwegian, Swedish, and others, there are vessels, strong vessels, manned by hardy and skillful officers and crews, that are prowling through the Arctic seas constantly. I am sure that even a reward of $25,000 would cause them many times to turn aside a little from their cruise and make a brief exploration of the shore where they might hear news or see signs. It is quite possible that this might result favorably. If it should, nobody would care for the $25,000. If it should not, there would be no $25,000 lost. I commend this urgently to the immediate consideration of the Committee on Naval Affairs, to which I move its reference.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. INGALLS (by request) introduced a bill (S. 1872) granting lands in aid of the erection of a monument commemorative of the homestead law; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

AMENDMENT TO A BILL.

Mr. VOORHEES submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to the bill (S. 467) to provide for a settlement with the Indians who were parties to the treaty concluded at Buffalo Creek, in the State of New York, on the 15th day of January, 1838, for the unexecuted stipulation of that treaty; which was referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

PAPERS WITHDRAWN AND REFERRED.

On motion of Mr. HARRIS, it was Ordered, That the petition and papers of Newton C. Perkins, administrator of the estate of J. J. Todd, deceased, be taken from the files of the Senate and referred to the Committee on Claims.

AMENDMENTS TO THE RULES.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair lays before the Senate the original resolution reported yesterday by the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. HARRIS] from the Committee on Rules, which was objected to and went over.

Mr. HARRIS. As the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. HOAR] at whose suggestion the resolution went over yesterday morning is absent from the Chamber this morning, I will allow all these resolutions, with the permission of the Senate, to lie over until to-morrow, when that Senator may be present.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The resolutions, if there be no objection, will be placed on the Calendar. They can be moved during the morning hour.

CHANGE OF NAME OF A BANK.

Mr. FRYE. I now ask unanimous consent to proceed to the consideration of the bill reported by the Finance Committee this morning changing the name of a bank, as it is a matter to which there can possibly be no objection.

By unanimous consent, the bill (H. R. 4779) to change the name of the West Waterville National Bank of Oakland, in the State of Maine, to that of the Messalonskee National Bank, was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

HOUSE BILL REFERRED.

On motion of Mr. ALLISON, the bill (H. R. 6073) to provide for certain of the most urgent deficiencies in the appropriations for the service of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1884, and for other purposes, was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

BUREAU OF LABOR STATISTICS.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The order of resolutions is now closed. The Chair lays before the Senate the Calendar, beginning at Order of Business No. 142, under Rule VIII, being Senate bill 140.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (S. 140) to establish a bureau of statistics of labor.

Mr. BLAIR. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment proposed by the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. GARLAND], which will be read.

The CHIEF CLERK. It is proposed to strike out all after the enacting clause of the bill and insert the following:

Add, after section 342, as follows:

"SEC. 343. The Chief of the Bureau of Statistics shall, under such regulations as the Secretary of the Treasury may prescribe, annually collect and report to Congress the statistics relating to marriage and divorce in the several States and Territories and the District of Columbia, and pertinent information relating to all departments of labor and production in the United States, especially touching the pecuniary, industrial, social, educational, and sanitary condition of the laboring classes, and to the permanent prosperity of the productive industry of the whole country; and the salary of the chief of such bureau shall be $3,500."

Mr. BLAIR. I was about to say that, this being the bill which was reported by direction of the Committee on Education and Labor, and there being in order at 2 o'clock, as the unfinished business, a bill to aid in the establishment and temporary support of common schools, which is also reported by direction of the same committee, if it would suit the convenience of the Senate I would deem it a personal favor if this order could be laid aside informally, not losing its place on the Calendar, and that I be permitted to proceed with the special order. I have considerable matter that I should like to lay before the Senate and desire to commence earlier in the afternoon than 2 o'clock.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from New Hampshire asks unanimous consent that the bill now under consideration be passed over, retaining its place at the head of the Calendar under Rule VIII. Is there objection?

Mr. MILLER, of New York. I shall be compelled to object to the order of procedure proposed, for I gave notice several days ago that as soon as the resolution passed yesterday was disposed of I should then move to take up the pleuro-pneumonia bill proper. I shall be compelled to make that motion when the proper time arrives. I do not desire to make it at this time, for I have no desire to antagonize the regular order of business of the Senate, and therefore prefer that the Calendar should go on. I suggest that we proceed with the regular order, the consideration of the bill which has been laid before the Senate, and which the Senator from New Hampshire reported, until 2 o'clock, and then the Senate can decide for itself whether it will take up the other bill which he mentions or the pleuro-pneumonia bill, which I shall move to take up.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Objection is made to the request of the Senator from New Hampshire.

Mr. BLAIR. I do not understand that the Senator objects, or if he does I will ask that he give me his attention and withdraw his objection so far as proceeding to consider the unfinished business is concerned at present until 2 o'clock, in order that I may proceed with my remarks upon the bill.

Mr. MILLER, of New York. I do not know that I quite understand the question of the Senator. Does he propose to proceed with the consideration of the present bill?

Mr. BLAIR. No; the school bill, until 2 o'clock.

Mr. MILLER, of New York. I do not desire to interpose any objection to prevent the Senator from having the floor to speak upon that bill.

Mr. BLAIR. I desire to proceed until 2 o'clock, if there is no objection, and then the motion which the Senator proposes to make can be interposed.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair understands that the Senator from New Hampshire desires to be heard upon the bill now under consideration.

Mr. BLAIR. No; on the school bill, until 2 o'clock.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from New Hampshire, pending the question on the amendment of the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. GARLAND], asks unanimous consent that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the unfinished business, being the bill (S. 398) to aid in the establishment and temporary support of common schools. Is there objection?

Mr. VEST. I should like to understand what is to be the result of this request of the Senator from New Hampshire. I have no disposition in the world to object to hearing the Senator from New Hampshire; but suppose he discusses the education bill until 2 o'clock and then the Senator from New York wants to take up the pleuro-pneumonia bill?

Mr. MILLER, of New York. The Senator from New Hampshire desires to occupy the time of the Senate on the educational bill, and at 2 o'clock the Senate will decide whether we shall go on with that bill or take up the pleuro-pneumonia bill, which I propose to move to take up at 2 o'clock.

Mr. VEST. The Senator from New Hampshire proposes to occupy the floor until 2 o'clock, and after that we are to take up the pleuro-pneumonia bill and proceed with that; and then does the educational bill come up again?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair is unable to hear the Senator from Missouri.

Mr. VEST. As a matter of course, if the Senator from New Hampshire shall not have concluded his remarks when the hour of 2 o'clock arrives, according to the usage of the Senate, to which I do not at all object and which I think very proper, he will be allowed to go on and complete his remarks. Then do we take up the pleuro-pneumonia bill, and, if so, when we finish the pleuro-pneumonia bill do we resume the consideration of the educational bill?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That depends upon the will of the Senate as expressed by its vote or by unanimous consent. It is in order for the Senator from New Hampshire to move at any time to proceed to the consideration of the educational bill, which is the unfinished business, and if unanimous consent be given him now to speak upon it without its being formally laid before the Senate, that can be done; but when 2 o'clock comes the educational bill will be before the Senate as the unfinished business and can only be displaced by unanimous consent or by a vote of the Senate.

Mr. COCKRELL. I move, then, that the Senator from New Hampshire have unanimous consent to proceed with his remarks upon that bill in the same manner as if it was regularly taken up by the Senate. That will obviate any trouble.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the Senator from New Hampshire proceeding with his remarks on the educational bill, it not being yet before the Senate? The Chair hears no objection.

AID TO COMMON SCHOOLS.

Mr. BLAIR. Mr. President, I suppose the reading of the bill will be first in order.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be read for information. The Chair did not lay the bill before the Senate on account of unanimous consent being given to the Senator to proceed. The bill will be read for information.

The Chief Clerk proceeded to read the bill (S. 398) to aid in the establishment and temporary support of common schools.

Mr. BLAIR. I see that the Chief Clerk is reading the original bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from New Hampshire asked that the bill be read.

Mr. BLAIR. It is the fault of the Senator from New Hampshire. I desire that the bill as reported by the committee be read.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment recommended by the committee?

Mr. BLAIR. There is a substitute reported by the committee for the entire bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment recommended by the committee will then be reported.

The Chief Clerk read the amendment, which was to strike out all after the enacting clause of the bill and to insert the following:

That for ten years after the passage of this act there shall be annually appropriated from the money in the Treasury the following sums, to wit: The first year the sum of $15,000,000, the second year the sum of $14,000,000, the third year the sum of $13,000,000, and thereafter a sum diminished $1,000,000 yearly from the sum last appropriated until ten annual appropriations shall have been made, when all appropriations under this act shall cease; which several sums shall be expended to secure the benefits of common-school education to all the children of the school age mentioned hereafter living in the United States.

SEC. 2. That such money shall annually be divided among and paid out in the several States and Territories in that proportion which the whole number of persons in each who, being of the age of ten years and over, can not read and write bears to the whole number of such persons in the United States; and until otherwise provided such computation shall be made according to the official returns of the census of 1880.

SEC. 3. That the Secretary of the Interior, at the close of each fiscal year, shall ascertain the total amount of the school fund to which the States and Territories and the District of Columbia are entitled under the provisions of this act, and shall certify the same to the Secretary of the Treasury. That upon the receipt of such certificate the Secretary of the Treasury shall, on or before the 31st day of July of each year, apportion the said total sum so certified among the several States and Territories and the District of Columbia upon the basis of population and illiteracy specified in the second section of this act.

SEC. 4. That the amount so apportioned to each State and Territory and to the District of Columbia shall be paid, upon the warrant of the Commissioner of Education, countersigned by the Secretary of the Interior, out of the Treasury of the United States, to the treasurer of the State, Territory, or District, or to such officer as shall be designated by the laws of such State, Territory, or District to receive, account for, and pay over the same to the several school districts entitled thereto under said apportionment. The term "school district" as used in this section shall include cities, towns, parishes, or such other corporations as by law are clothed with the power of maintaining common schools: Provided, That such distribution or payment, after the receipt of said fund by the State, Territory, or District, may be made to any officer designated by the laws of the State, Territory, or District for the disbursement of the school funds to the teachers employed in such schools.

SEC. 5. That the instruction in the common schools wherein these moneys shall be expended shall include the art of reading, writing, and speaking the English language, arithmetic, geography, history of the United States, and such other branches of useful knowledge as may be taught under local laws, and shall include, whenever practicable, instruction in the arts of industry, and the instruction of females in such branches of technical or industrial education as are suited to their sex, which instruction shall be free to all, without distinction of race, color, nativity, or condition in life: Provided, That nothing herein shall deprive children of different races, living in the same community but attending separate schools, from receiving the benefits of this act the same as though the attendance therein were without distinction of race.

SEC. 6. The money appropriated and apportioned under the provisions of this act to the use of any Territory shall be applied to the use of common and industrial schools therein by the Secretary of the Interior.

SEC. 7. That the District of Columbia shall be entitled to the privileges of a Territory under the provisions of this act, but its existing laws and school authorities shall not be affected by the operation of this act. The Commissioner of Education shall be charged with the duty of superintending the distribution of its allotment, and shall make full report of his doings to the Secretary of the Interior.

SEC. 8. That the design of this act not being to establish an independent system of schools, but rather to aid for the time being in the development and maintenance of the school system established by local government, and which must eventually be wholly maintained by the States and Territories wherein they exist, it is hereby provided that no part of the money appropriated under this act shall be paid out in any State or Territory which shall not, during the first five years of the operation of this act, annually expend for the maintenance of common schools at least one-third of the sum which shall be allotted to it under the provisions hereof, and during the second five years of its operation a sum at least equal to the whole amount it shall be entitled to receive under this act.

SEC. 9. That a part of the money apportioned to each State or Territory, not exceeding one-tenth thereof, may yearly be applied to the education of teachers for the common schools therein, which sum may be expended in maintaining institutes or temporary training schools, or in extending opportunities for normal or other instruction to competent and suitable persons, of any color, who are without necessary means to qualify themselves for teaching, and who shall agree in writing to devote themselves exclusively, for at least one year after leaving such training schools, to teach in the common schools, for such compensation as may be paid other teachers therein.

SEC. 10. That no part of the educational fund allotted to any State or Territory or the District of Columbia shall be used for the erection of school-houses or school buildings of any description, nor for rent of the same.

SEC. 11. That the moneys distributed under the provisions of this act shall be used in the school districts of the several States and Territories in such way as to provide, as near as may be, for the equalization of school privileges to all the children of the school age prescribed by the law of the State or Territory wherein the expenditure shall be made, thereby giving to each child an opportunity for common-school and, so far as may be, of industrial education; and to this end existing public schools, not sectarian in character, may be aided, and new ones may be established, as may be deemed best, in the several localities.

SEC. 12. That any State in which the number of persons 10 years of age and upward who can not read and write is not over 5 per cent. of the whole population thereof shall have the right to receive its allotment and to apply the same for the promotion of common-school and industrial education, or the education of teachers therein, in such way as the Legislature of such State shall provide.

SEC. 13. That the Secretary of the Interior shall receive from the governor of each State and Territory a report, to be made by or through such governor on or before the 30th day of June of each year, giving a detailed account of the payments or disbursements made of the school fund apportioned to his State or Territory and received by the State or Territorial treasurer or officer under section 4 of this act, and of the balance in the hands of such treasurer or officer withheld, unclaimed, or for any cause unpaid or unexpended, and also the amount expended in such State or Territory as required by section 8 of this act, and also of the number of public, common, and industrial schools, the number of teachers employed, the total number of children taught during the year and in what branches instructed, the average daily attendance, and the relative number of white and colored children, and the number of months in each year schools have been maintained in each school district, and such other information in relation to the use of the school fund and the condition of common-school education as the Secretary of the Interior may require. And if any State or Territory shall misapply or allow to be misapplied, or in any manner appropriated or used other than for the purposes herein required, the funds, or any part thereof, received under the provisions of this act, or shall fail to comply with the conditions herein prescribed, or to report as herein provided, through its proper officers, the disposition thereof, such State or Territory shall forfeit its right to any subsequent apportionment by virtue hereof until the full amount so misapplied, lost, or misappropriated shall have been replaced by such State or Territory and applied as herein required, and until such report shall have been made: Provided, That if the public schools in any State admit pupils not within the ages herein specified it shall not be deemed a failure to comply with the conditions herein.

SEC. 14. That on or before the 1st day of September of each year the Secretary of the Interior shall report to the President of the United States whether any State or Territory or the District of Columbia has forfeited its right to receive its apportionment under this act, and how forfeited, and whether he has withheld such allotment on account of such forfeiture; and each State and Territory and the District of Columbia from which such apportionment shall be withheld shall have the right to appeal from such decision of the Secretary of the Interior to Congress; and if the next Congress shall not direct such share to be paid, it shall be added to the general educational fund for distribution among the other States and the Territories and District of Columbia which shall be entitled to the benefit of the provisions of this act.

SEC. 15. That the Secretary of the Interior shall be charged with the practical administration of this act in the Territories and the District of Columbia, through the Commissioner of Education, who shall report annually to Congress its practical operation, and briefly the condition of common and industrial education as affected thereby throughout the country, which report shall be transmitted to Congress by the Secretary of the Interior, accompanying the report of his Department.

Mr. BLAIR. Mr. President, this is, in my judgment, among the most important public measures which have been considered by the Senate since the close of the war. It is, in fact, the logical consequence and true conclusion of the war. Had common schools been universal throughout the country there would have been no civil war; for intelligence among the masses of the people would have abolished the causes which led to it, and the chains of the bondmen would have dissolved like the mists of the morning in their warmth and light, instead of awaiting to be broken by the terrible hammer of Thor. Knowledge and virtue are the indispensable conditions of free government, and virtue without intelligence is of no avail, for while virtue is the natural if not universal fruit of knowledge, yet good intentions without knowledge are by a profound philosophy pronounced to be the very pavement of hell. So the restoration of the Union and the reconstruction of States with governments republican in form will be found to be but a bitter delusion unless the people throughout the whole country shall be made and kept sufficiently intelligent to know and to maintain their rights generation after generation.

As the National Government is republican in form, so its own existence depends upon the same conditions as the existence of the States; consequently in self-defense and in self-perpetuation it must secure directly by its own act or indirectly through other agencies the intelligence of its citizens, who are themselves the Government.

Beyond this, one of the most important constitutional functions of the General Government is its obligation to guarantee a republican form to the States.

If the General Government commits suicide by neglecting the education of the people, how can it fulfill its constitutional guarantee? And how can that guarantee of government republican in form be made and kept good to the people of a State who are too ignorant to be capable of self-government.

Self-existence and the discharge of its constitutional obligations compel the National Government to educate the people, who are the common citizens of both the nation and the State, whenever the local community fails to discharge this primary duty of a free people.

Mindful of the time of the Senate, and having in the last Congress discussed this subject at some length, and having embodied somewhat of that discussion in the report of the committee on this bill, I shall confine myself on this occasion, unless the course of the debate shall hereafter render it necessary to do otherwise, to a statement of the facts in the existing situation of the country, which, in my opinion, require the appropriation of large sums of money by the nation to the temporary aid of common schools throughout the country, and to the explanation of the provisions of this bill, which undertakes to provide a suitable remedy for the alarming and increasing ignorance existing among the people at the present time.

First, then, of the evil.

The bill proposes to give temporary aid to common schools in all the States and Territories.

Common schools are the means everywhere adopted to educate the masses of the people, and the instruction and discipline obtained in them constitute all the preparatory school training which twenty-four twenty-fifths of the American people receive for the practical duties of public and private life. I say public life with no reference to the incumbency of political office. By the public life of an American citizen I refer to his life as a sovereign; to his constant participation in the active government of his country; to the continual study and decision of political issues which devolve upon him whatever may be his occupation; and to his responsibility for the conduct of national and State affairs as the primary law-making, law-construing, and law-executing power, no matter whether or not he is personally engaged in the public service as policeman or President, as any State official whatever, member of Congress, Chief-Justice of the United States, or a humble justice of the peace. In republics official stations are servitudes. The citizen is king.

But, since knowledge is power, it is obvious that the degree of education which the citizen must acquire is commensurate with the character and dignity of the station which he occupies by the theory of the government of which he is a part. By so much and so far as he is deficient he will fail, and either become a nonentity or a source of danger and misrule. The indispensable standard of education for the people of a republic, then, is far above the mere capacity to read and to write the language in common use in a limited or perfunctory way. The education obtained in the common school and imparted, if necessary, with compulsion by the State should be such as to enable the citizen sovereign to obtain and interchange ideas and knowledge of affairs as well as to transact intelligently and safely all matters of business in the avocations of life. Measured by this not too exacting standard, the degree of disqualification for the duties and opportunities of citizenship actually existing is far greater than is indicated by the common standard, which is considered to be the nominal capacity to read and write. This test is the one resorted to in taking the census as a test to measure the intelligence of the people; and its use for this purpose by the Government and its adoption as the condition of the exercise of the suffrage by some States have served to fix in the public mind a very low standard of education compared with that which should be set up in the common school. I am heartily in favor of universal suffrage, for a partially ignorant people, with a free ballot actually secured to them, will govern themselves better than they will be governed by kings and aristocracies.

But I desire to remind the American people that the more they know the greater will be their personal power and the better will they govern themselves.

If the American people suffer from innumerable and bitter ills which they can never remove until they know how it may be done, their first great step is so far to educate themselves as to obtain the knowledge from which will result the power to remove the evils of their civil, social, and industrial condition. It is therefore at once apparent that tabulated statements, such as we obtain from the census and like statistical processes, fall far short of completeness as indications of the actual educational condition of the people. It is certain that the school facilities which have hitherto existed have been wofully insufficient, since more than one-ninth of the adult citizens of the country are unable even to read and write. What unknown margin of ignorance lies above this indication and yet below the true standard of competency and educational qualification for the duties of citizenship we are left without definite means of judging, but we know that it is very great. This dark belt of indefinite width which, like an unsurveyed desert, lies beyond the well-defined boundaries of ignorance and incompetency should be constantly borne in mind as we proceed with the consideration of the subject.

During the decade from 1870 to 1880 the population of the United States increased from thirty-eight to fifty millions. A like percentage of increase since 1880, a period of four years, would give a present population of about 56,000,000 of people.

By the census of 1880 there were in the United States 36,761,607 persons 10 years of age and upward.

In round numbers now there are 41,000,000. In 1880 there were, over 10 years of age, who could not read, 4,923,451 persons, or 13.4 persons in a hundred, and now there are 5,500,000. In 1880 there were 6,239,958 persons over 10 years of age who could not write, or 17 persons in a hundred. Now there are 7,000,000 who can not write.

In 1880 there were 32,160,400 white persons in the United States, of whom 3,019,080, or 9.4 per cent., could not write. Now there are 3,500,000 white persons in this country who can not write.

In 1880 there were, of colored persons in the United States, 4,601,207 10 years old and upward, of whom 3,220,878, or 70 persons of every hundred, could not write. Now there are 3,600,000 colored persons in the United States over 10 years of age who can not write.

In 1880 there were white persons, over 21 years of age, 21,984,202; persons of whom 2,056,463, or 9.4 of every hundred, could not write. Now there are 2,313,521 white persons in the United States who can not write.

In 1880 there were 11,343,005 white males over 21, of whom 886,659, or 7.8 per cent., could not write. Now there are 1,000,000 white adults who can not write.

In 1880 there were 2,937,235 colored persons in the United States over 21 years of age, of whom 2,147,900 could not write, or 73.1 per cent. of every one hundred. There are now probably 3,500,000, as the colored population increases by births 7 per cent. faster than does the white from births and immigration.

In 1880 there were colored males over 20 years of age, 1,487,344, of whom 1,022,151 could not write, or 68.7 per cent. Now there 1,150,000 or more, all voters.

In 1880 there were white and colored male persons over 21 years of age, 12,830,349; of whom could not write 1,908,810. Now there are males over 21, 14,500,000, of whom 2,150,000 can not write. These include the voting population. Unnaturalized persons over 21 should be deducted. The average of immigration is now, however, as intelligent as our own population. That is a thought not familiar to our national contemplation. One voter in seven can not write. The percentage of illiteracy is something less among males than among the other sex, or there would be one voter in five unable to write. Of those who can write a large number can only, with great painstaking, contrive even to write their names. It is greatly to be doubted whether more than three-fourths of the voting population is capable of reading or writing with such facility as to make those arts a source of intelligent suffrage.

Nearly three-fourths of the illiterate voters of the country are in the sixteen Southern States. The same States contain about one-third the entire population. Iowa has 18,886 voters who can not write in a population of 1,624,615. Georgia has 169,505 voters who can not write, and a total population of 1,542,180—nearly ninefold illiterate suffrage in about the same population. In proportion to population, notwithstanding the great cities within her borders, New York has only one voter who can not write to five in South Carolina.

I take the following from the very able report made in the last Congress by the House Committee on Education and Labor:

The last census shows that there are 6,239,958 people of this country above the age of 10 years who can not write—12.44 per cent., or about one-eighth of our entire population. The census further shows that 4,713,395, or 75.56 per cent. of them, are in the recent slave States, which contain but 36.8 per cent. of the population of the country. In six of those States one-third or more of the population above the age of 10 years are illiterate, while in the Territory of New Mexico nearly one-half can not write. Of the white population of the country only 6.96 per cent. can not write, while 47.7 per cent. of the colored population are in that condition. More than one-fourth of the entire population of those States is illiterate.*

The committee call attention to the illiteracy of the voters in the late slaveholding States. The following table has been furnished the committee by the Superintendent of the Census. It shows the total number of persons of 21 years of age and upward, and also the number of that age and upward who are illiterate:

States.	Total number of males of 21 years of age and upward.	Number of males of 21 years of age and upward who can not write.
		White.	Colored.	Total.
Alabama	259,884	24,450	96,408	120,858
Arkansas	182,977	21,349	34,300	55,649
Delaware	38,298	2,955	3,787	6,742
Florida	61,699	4,706	19,110	23,816
Georgia	321,438	28,571	116,516	145,087
Kentucky	376,221	54,956	43,177	98,133
Louisiana	216,787	16,377	86,555	102,932
Maryland	232,106	15,152	30,873	46,025
Mississippi	238,532	12,473	99,068	111,541
Missouri	541,207	40,655	19,028	59,683
North Carolina	294,740	44,420	80,282	124,702
South Carolina	205,789	13,924	93,010	106,934
Tennessee	330,305	46,948	58,601	105,549
Texas	380,476	33,085	59,669	92,754
Virginia	334,505	31,474	100,210	131,684
West Virginia	139,161	19,055	3,830	22,885
Total	4,154,125	410,550	944,424	1,354,974

*The ability to write is considered by statisticians the true test of illiteracy, as many persons through shame will not admit they can not read, but are not so likely to claim that they can write. Besides, a person who can read and not write is essentially an illiterate.

The following statement, showing the ratio of illiterate males of 21 years of age and upward to the whole number of males of the same ages in the States named, is derived by the committee from the preceding table. There being but few foreigners in those States, nearly all of those persons are citizens of the United States and voters:

Ratio of illiterate males 21 years of age and upward.

Alabama	46.7
Arkansas	30.4
Delaware	17.6
Florida	38.6
Georgia	45.1
Kentucky	26.0
Louisiana	47.4
Maryland	19.4
Mississippi	46.7
North Carolina	42.3
South Carolina	51.9
Tennessee	31.9
Virginia	39.3
West Virginia	16.4
Missouri	11.0
Texas	24.3

The average ratio of illiterate males of the ages named in the above States is 32.3.

Of the above illiterates 69.7 per cent. are colored, and 30.3 per cent. are whites.

In ten of the above-named States more than 30 per cent. of the voters are illiterate.

In six of them the illiterates are about 50 per cent.

In South Carolina 52 per cent. are illiterate.

The State of Alabama has 120,858 illiterate voters. Its popular vote in 1880 was 151,507.

The State of Georgia has 145,087 illiterate voters. Its popular vote in 1880 was 155,651.

The State of Mississippi has 111,541 illiterate voters. Its popular vote in 1880 was 117,078.

The State of Louisiana has 102,932 illiterate voters. Its popular vote in 1880 was 97,201.

While it is true that in many of the States not one-half of those entitled to vote actually did so, yet the wonderful nearness of the number of illiterates to the number of those who exercised the right of suffrage is startling.

The truism that no government which rests upon universal suffrage can long continue unless the suffragists are intelligent, in the light of the above facts presses itself upon our attention with renewed force. The words of James Madison, uttered in 1826, are a present warning: "A popular government without popular information or the means of acquiring it is but a prologue to a farce or tragedy, or both." Nearly half a million of the white and almost a million of the colored voters in the South can not read the ballots which they cast. But thirteen years have elapsed since the latter class was given the ballot. At that time all of them were grossly ignorant not only of letters, but also absolutely devoid of all knowledge of the rights and obligations of citizenship. During the last ten years the number of illiterates in the country has increased about 400,000, though the percentage of illiteracy to the whole population has decreased nearly 2 per cent. It would, however, take forty years to dispel this illiteracy at this rate of diminution.

There are 145,000 illiterate voters in North Carolina, and 117,000 in South Carolina. I clip the following from the National Republican of last winter:

The percentage of illiteracy to the voting population of the Garfield States in 1880 was less than 6; in the Hancock States it was 29.

About five times greater.

It is true that about 69 per cent. of the illiterate voters in the old slave States are Republicans, but it is also true that nearly that per centum of the illiterate vote was suppressed.

Suppressed, it is true; but it could not have been if intelligent.

Alabama has 120,858 illiterate voters; the popular vote of that State in 1880 was 151,507. Georgia has 145,087 illiterate voters; the popular vote there that year was 155,651. Mississippi has 111,541 illiterate voters; her popular vote in 1880 was 117,078. Louisiana has 102,938 illiterate voters, and cast 97,201 votes.

Mr. MORGAN. I suppose the Senator from New Hampshire knows that the great body of the illiterate men in Alabama voted for Garfield, and not for Hancock.

Mr. BLAIR. I stated that. The Senator will find as I go on that my remarks are not prepared with any idea or feeling of self-glorification for the section of country that I belong to. I have endeavored to simply state the facts.

By the Census (table 40) Compendium, page 560, it appears that the total number of white males over 21 years of age in the country in 1880 was 11,343,005; native-born, 8,270,518; foreign-born, 3,072,487; colored, including Japanese, Chinese, and Indians, 1,487,344; making a total of 12,830,349.

The question of the suppression of the Republican vote in the South is one that I did not propose to introduce into the debate, and it is one on which there is something perhaps to be said on both sides, if it were before us.

In 1880 there were 105,465 Chinese, 148 Japanese, and 66,407 civilized Indians. I am aware of no means by which the actual number of voters in the United States can be ascertained, but if we add to the total of male population over 21 years of age one-eighth of the total of 1880 we have 1,603,793, and in all at this time 14,434,142. Assuming one-half the foreign-born males of voting age to be naturalized, we have a voting element as follows, making allowance for increase of one-eighth in each element since the census was taken: Native-born white voters, 9,203,332; foreign-born white voters, 1,728,274; colored (excluding Chinese, Japanese, and Indians), 1,479,739; total voting population of the United States in 1884, 12,411,345; or in round numbers there will be 12,500,000 men whose ballots will or may decide the next Presidential election.

The percentage of illiterate white males over 21 years of age by the census of 1880 is 7.8, and of colored the rate is 68.7. There is no perceptible change in this percentage for the better, judging from the fact that the illiterate population increased, according to a statement of the Commissioner of Education, between the years 1870 and 1880, 581,814 persons. There is some confusion in the data, but I think there was an increase during that period substantially as estimated by the Commissioner. We have then at the present time an illiterate white voting population of 852,665; illiterate colored voters, 1,016,580; total illiterate voters, 1,869,245.

Generally the number is placed at more than 2,000,000. Such estimates can never be more than approximately correct, but they are in my belief practically greatly understated, because the technical qualification of being able to write one's name, however crudely, is very slight evidence of capacity to comprehend political issues or to discriminate intelligently between candidates for public positions.

This observation derives special significance when it is still further considered that the enumeration must of necessity rely generally as to the possession of even this qualification upon the verbal statement of the party concerned, who is not likely to make an unpleasant admission of incapacity against himself.

I do not believe that more than two-thirds, or at the most three-fourths, of the voting population of this country is to-day in possession of a degree of proficiency in the arts of reading and writing that qualifies them, through the use of those arts, to exercise the right of suffrage more intelligently than do total illiterates. The school education of great multitudes is nominal, not real.

I purposely omit further data as to the distribution of the illiterate vote. If it were uniformly dispersed it would be less dangerous. But concentrated as it is in masses at points along the line, while intelligence can never be too strong anywhere, and considering that a majority of one in Florida or in Oregon may decide the most important of national elections and determine the future history of the whole country, I for one find it impossible to sleep in peace over this volcano.

As will be seen by reference to tables in the report of the committee and to the census the school age varies greatly in different States. In some it is from 5 to 15, in others from 4 to 21, and with great diversity between those extremes. In a speech in support of a measure, substantially the same as this, made in the Senate June 15, 1882, after careful consideration, I stated the number of our population who should be in schools as, in my opinion, 18,000,000. I believe it to be now 20,000,000. By the census of 1880 the number within the school ages was 15,303,535. Of this number were then enrolled, that is, their names were on some list of pupils, 9,780,773, leaving 5,522,762 not attending school anywhere. But there were 567,160 enrolled in private schools, making a total of 10,347,933 enrolled in all schools of the country, both public and private, and leaving 4,955,602, or nearly one-third, of the legal school population not attending either public or private places of instruction.

If, now, the total enrolled in public and private schools be increased one-eighth, as in previous calculations, we have a present school population in process of mental training of 11,641,424. If I am substantially correct in assuming a present population of 20,000,000 who should be either in public or private schools, from our total of at least 56,000,000 now living in this country, there will remain 8,358,576 who do not attend schools of any kind whatever, unless it may be of liberal or professional training. Making all allowances which can be reasonably claimed, there must be 8,000,000 of less than 21 years of age who are not enjoying school privileges of any description whatever. But look still further, in order that we may judge of the efficiency of our system in dealing with those actually enrolled. By the census, out of the 9,780,773 on the public school registers, there was an average daily attendance of 5,804,993; so that the real fact is that the net educational result is the same as though the latter number had attended the whole school period yearly, which is perhaps five months of the twelve in the whole country, and 9,499,542 had not received a single hour of school instruction for the year.

If the present average daily attendance in public and private schools be ascertained by adding one-eighth to the aggregate of 1880, to wit, 5,804,993, plus two-thirds the enrollment in private schools (which we may fairly assume to be the average daily attendance, or, to be liberal, 400,000 pupils), we have 6,204,993 increased by 775,623, or a total of 6,980,616, or say 7,000,000 in round numbers. Deducting this number from 20,000,000, and we have the same general result upon the educational status of our school population as though 13,000,000 of the 20,000,000 did not attend school at all.

Of course this calculation is of little value save as it affords a means of comparing our real condition with what it would be if the whole school population should attend constantly five months yearly between the ages of 4 and 21 years. Making every possible allowance for professional and other forms of special training, I do not believe that there is an average daily attendance of 10,000,000, or one-half our population, between the above-named ages twenty weeks of the year. I do not think there are sittings or accommodations of any kind, no matter how primitive and inexpensive, for one-half our school population. We have now less than 300,000 teachers and an average of more than 66 pupils for each. We require at least 200,000 more, and both the professional standard and the pecuniary compensation of the body as a whole should be very much raised.

In table 136, page 1640, part 2 of Compendium, the whole number of teachers employed at one time is set down at 236,019; the total number who attended school during the year 1880 at 9,946,160, and the average daily attendance 6,276,398. The whole number of public schools, elementary and high, is placed at 225,880; the number of school buildings 164,832, and the whole number of sittings provided 8,968,731. The data I have relied upon in making these calculations have been derived in part from the census and in part from the returns of the Bureau of Education, which are collected with great care.

I propose now to state a few well-authenticated facts in regard to the actual condition of common-school education in different portions of the country.

The Louisiana Educational Society has just memorialized Congress upon the subject of national aid to common schools, praying for an appropriation. Their petition, presented by Senator GIBSON, is printed at length in the RECORD of March 11, 1884. It is such an admirable though distressing statement of the situation that I will ask the Secretary to read it to the Senate.

The Secretary read as follows:

OFFICE OF THE LOUISIANA EDUCATIONAL SOCIETY,
New Orleans, March 4, 1884.

To the honorable the Senate and House of Representatives in Congress assembled:

We beg leave to lay before you, on behalf of the State of Louisiana, the following statement of facts, and to submit this memorial:

The report of the superintendent of public education of the city of New Orleans for 1881 showed a total school population (6 to 18 years of age) of 61,456; a total enrollment in the public schools of the city of 24,401; and an average daily attendance in December and January (which were the months of largest attendance) of 17,135.

Although the number of educable children has largely increased since then, the superintendent reports for January, 1884, the enrollment to be only 14,482, with an average attendance of 11,070.

With an allowance of 10,000 in private and parochial schools (which is a large estimate), we still have 36,974 children in New Orleans receiving no educational instruction whatever.

The census of 1880 shows an average attendance of 15,190 (which included the months of most meager and the largest attendance). Thus you will see at a glance the large decrease in the number being educated, although the population is steadily increasing.

A corresponding retrogression exists throughout the State, and it may be safely affirmed that of the 273,845 school population of Louisiana (census of 1880) not more than 30 per cent. of them attend either public, private, or parochial schools.

In the fifteen Southern States, including the District of Columbia, the census of 1880 shows that there are 2,702,835 (white and black) of the 5,703,216 school population not enrolled in schools, and notwithstanding the efforts made by the people of these States and the generous contributions from private sources in the North for educational purposes the number of children unenrolled in the schools and the illiterates continue to increase.

The State and city have done much toward public education, but the illiterates are such a large proportion of the population, and poverty is so widespread, that the taxable property can not bear such a burden as must necessarily be imposed to provide for and sustain public schools.

We are aware that, in so far as ignorance is the source of pauperism, crime, and a want of thrift, the State is chiefly interested and the Federal Government indirectly only, but there is a common ground on which Federal and State interests meet and blend. Good government is necessary for both, and it is equally the duty of both to see that the citizen is made capable of performing the duties of citizenship intelligently, fearlessly, honestly. Said one: "Honest enough, brave enough, and keen enough to resist corruption, defy violence, and defeat fraud."

Both are alike interested in making the masses of the people sufficiently intelligent to understand what constitutes the greatest good for the greatest number; and to comprehend also the converse of the proposition, that the good of the greatest number is the highest and best interest of the individual citizen.

We believe that the very life of the Republic and the preservation of the liberty it vouchsafes depend upon the intelligence of its people, the universal education of its citizens; that as their illiteracy increases so do the dangers to our country multiply.

In the words of Senator BLAIR: "Education, physical, intellectual, and moral, is the primal necessity." The fathers and founders of our Government so considered it. They thought that a republic could stand only on the intelligence and virtue of its citizens.

Our danger is imminent and increasing. France in 1870 realized that it was not the needle-gun but educated Germany which so quickly brought her to defeat and submission. She was taught a bitter lesson, by which she is now profiting, Since then she has largely increased her taxation for public schools, made elementary schooling free and attendance compulsory. Let her history teach us to educate our children, be they white or black.

But this can only be done with the liberal aid of the National Government, and unless it comes to our assistance the condition of our educational work must grow steadily worse.

We believe that a very large sum is necessary to meet the great need of the country. A bill before Congress proposes to give $15,000,000 for the first year and to decrease the appropriation $1,000,000 each year during a period of ten years, dividing it according to the number of illiterates in each State.

We trust that some such measures may meet your approval. Some such measures are necessary to stay and roll back the tide of illiteracy in this and other States of the South, which now finds no barriers strong enough to resist it. We believe it to be the duty of Congress to make some such appropriation, and on behalf of our State we ask it to do so.

Washington, Adams, Jefferson, Madison, Monroe, declared the necessity for and the importance of public education. Said the latter in his inaugural address of 1817: "Let us by all wise and constitutional measures promote intelligence among the people, as the best means of preserving our liberties."

Presidents Grant, Hayes, Garfield, and Arthur have severally recommended it, and President Garfield said: "All the constitutional power of the nation and of the States should be summoned to meet the danger by the saving influence of universal education."

With our poverty upon us and dangers before us we appeal to Congress to do all that can constitutionally be done to aid in the education of youth, so that we may reap the fruits of industry, integrity, and intelligence.

Mr. BLAIR. On Friday, March 24, 1882, a committee of the National Educational Association appeared before the Committe on Education and Labor of the Senate and House of Representatives, to urge national aid to public school education. This association comprises the superintendents of public instruction of the States and Territories and a large number of the principal educators of the country.

The committee of the association consisted of Hon. G. J. Orr, of Georgia; Hon. M. A. Newell, of Maryland; Hon. J. H. Smart, of Indiana; Hon. Hugh Thompson, of South Carolina; Dr. J. W. Dickinson, and Hon. B. G. Northrop, of Connecticut.

This committee presented at the hearing another memorial already prepared by representatives of the great religious denominations of the land, of the trustees of the Peabody fund, and of missionary and educational institutions, which memorial they indorsed and urged upon the consideration of Congress and the country.

I ask the Secretary to read the memorial.

The Secretary read as follows:

A MEMORIAL TO CONGRESS.

The undersigned earnestly call the attention of Senators and Representatives to the following facts and suggestions with reference to governmental aid to common schools on the basis of illiteracy.

The following table is based upon the estimates of the Bureau of Education. In the sums raised by the States interest on the invested funds is not included, except in a few States. The table is not exhaustive, but only illustrative:

States.	Total population, 1880.	Total illiterates 10 years and over who can not write, 1879.	Colored illiterates 10 years and over who can not write, 1879.	Total of State and local taxes for common schools, 1879.	What this gives for an average school of 30 pupils per annum.	Total sum that a fund of $3 per capita for illiterates would give the State.	How much of this because of colored illiteracy.	How much of it to white illiteracy.

We respectfully suggest:

1. The help should be so given that it will stimulate rather than supersede the necessity of State effort.

2. It should be help for the common schools; temporary aid in the training of teachers perhaps, but chiefly in giving them opportunity to teach. "The safety of the Republic is the supreme law of the land." This is the maxim which not only justifies but demands action on the part of the General Government, and it should also suggest the limitations under which the action should be taken.

3. The help should be immediate and not remote. The fortunes of war and the necessities of legislative action have made citizens of a large mass of ignorant men, whose votes are to shape, for weal or woe, the character of our laws. Education alone can convert this mass of ignorance and element of danger into one of enlightened strength and safety.

Largely more than one-half of a fund for the education of the illiterate would go to the South for negro illiteracy; less than one-fourth because of white illiteracy. If Congress should create a fund which would give $3 per annum per capita for the education of this class alone, it will require an aggregate annual sum of $18,719,958. Of this, Mississippi, e. g., would receive $1,119,603; but of this $959,529 would be for colored illiterates and $160,344 for white illiterates.

Representing an educational work in the South chiefly for the negro race, in which have been expended about $10,000,000, and speaking with a wide knowledge of facts, we emphatically assert the impossibility of accomplishing this great work unless the General Government shall come to the assistance of those States in which this illiteracy is chiefly found.

Every dollar we have expended expresses the conscientious and earnest desire of the donor that this work shall be done, and is an emphatic vote for the action for which we ask.

In the name of the millions of Christian citizens whom we represent we earnestly urge Congress to help qualify the ignorant voters who are intrusted largely by Congressional action with the ballot for the duties with which they are charged, believing the power to do this is co-ordinate with the power that enfranchised them.

WASHINGTON, D. C., March, 1882.

Mr. BLAIR. I call attention to these signatures, not only on account of the great personal worth of the men themselves, of the superior position which they occupy as individuals in the country, but on account of the representative capacity in which they have signed the memorial. These denominations are also organized into a national educational assembly, which has had two annual meetings, of which Bishop Simpson is the president. It is proper that I should observe here that there is a substantial combination of all the great religious bodies of the country, at least in the Northern States, who have one specific purpose, and that is to urge upon Congress the appropriation of national money in the direction of general education.

The hearing which followed is to be found reported in full in Miscellaneous Document 55 of this session, to which I refer the Senate, but from which I wish now to quote a few of the more important statements made on that occasion. Superintendent Orr, of Georgia, addressed the committees as follows:

Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, the duty assigned me on this occasion is a very simple one. I have been laboring in this work in my State for the last ten years.

I desire to say that Superintendent Orr can speak with larger and more reliable authority probably from the standpoint of an educated, energetic, and patriotic Southern man upon this subject than any other man whatever in the whole country. I consider his statements as of very special significance, and entitled not alone to the attention of the Senate but of the entire country; in fact all that I shall read, much to the weariness, I trust not to the disgust, of any members of the Senate, will be from representative men, who are much better authority on this subject than anything I might state. Mr. Orr said:

I have been the representative of the Department of Education since 1872. I do not propose to detain the committee by any lengthened remarks. I propose to give you, gentlemen, some plain facts showing our condition, showing our necessities, showing the temper and spirit of our people, and I feel that when I do this, when I put before you the condition of the State of Georgia, I shall have given you a type of what prevails throughout the entire South.

In the year 1860, when one of the honored Senators from my State now present was our chief executive, the tax returns, according to the documents in the office of the comptroller-general, summed up 672,000,000. After I entered the office which I now have the honor of filling I went to the files of that office for the purpose of trying to ascertain the aggregate value of property at the first return made after the war. I found it to be $170,000,000. The property of the State was thus reduced $500,000,000 in value. This made a great change in the condition of the State, as you may well know; but this does not represent fully the change. It lacks a great deal of it.

I will put before you, gentlemen, a few other considerations which will show more fully the great change which was wrought. Everything that we had accumulated during the four years of the unhappy struggle in which we engaged was invested in confederate securities, and was held in the shape either of bonds or of confederate currency. Thus what remained of the labor of four years, after the devastation of your army and the support rendered ours, was blotted out in one hour. Hundreds, thousands, and tens of thousands of the best men in the State of Georgia were thus left in a condition in which, under the old postal laws of the United States, when postage was paid at the place of delivery, they could not have taken a letter from the post-office. You will very readily understand, then, how we were situated as to our capacity to commence life again.

Not only this, but the whole labor system of the country was thrown into disorganization. The agriculturists had no means of going to work again, and we are an agricultural people, as you well know. They had no capital to begin with. They had to borrow. They had to give a lien upon the products of the soil in order to enable them to pay the debts, and those who held the capital exacted exorbitant interest. Our farmers and agriculturists have been paying from 50 to 100 per cent. for advances. Having their noses thus put to the grindstone, they have been kept there up to the present time, for every intelligent man knows very well that farming can not be conducted successfully when the capital used in it costs such a percentage. The lack of resources and the utterly disorganized condition of the labor of the country put us in a very helpless condition.

Let me glance for a few moments at certain other facts. We had in the State of Georgia two kinds of citizens—those who had always been citizens, and a number of persons, very nearly equal, who had been made citizens as a result of the war. The last school enumeration, which was taken four years ago, showed that we had 198,000 colored school children in the State. The entire school population is 433,444. The difference will show you how many are colored; nearly half, you will see.

Let me say a few words about the colored people. They were made free without resources. They had no capital; they had no habits that would lead men when thrown upon their own resources to accumulate capital. They have been gathering capital gradually, until I am very glad to report that the last return of the property of the State showed that there were in the hands of the colored people of that State some $6,000,000 worth of property. I think the colored people of my State have done nobly; I say it here to their credit. But the point I am now making is the immense burden which was put upon us. I do not give you an idea of that burden by telling you the number of persons who were suddenly made free without resources. That does not give you an idea at all.

There is no means of getting at the number exactly, but I think at least one-half of the white population was in the same condition, utterly wrecked, ruined financially by the results of the unfortunate struggle in which we had engaged. For one, I want to see the last remains of that struggle forever buried so deep that the hand of resurrection will never bring them up again. I think it becomes us of this generation to begin to think about living for the future, to forget the past. We have a great country, and here we must dwell; our people want to dwell with you in unity and harmony. I know what I say; I have visited in the course of the administration of my office almost every county in the State of Georgia. I have made two hundred addresses to the people. I have stated to you the difficulties now. I know the condition; I know the spirit of the people, their present sentiment. I know it from mingling with them in their cottages and in their cabins, for I have visited the colored man as well as the white man. I have mingled with all; I know their feelings.

I want to say to you, gentlemen, that in the State of Georgia, under my administration of ten years, the entire loss of school fund will not foot up more than about $6,000. In an administration covering ten years there has not been a single dollar misapplied with that exception that I know of. We try to make it do the greatest possible amount of good. We try to manage it with the greatest economy. We admit to our schools all who want to enter them. We commenced in 1871 with a school attendance of 48,000. We have gone gradually upward. My brethren here will excuse me for using the same illustration which I did before the association when in session. One of the fathers, a man contributed to us by New England, one of our most honored men in the early history of that State—I allude to Abraham Baldwin—in speaking once of central power, illustrated it by that wonderful power known as the screw. He stated that at every revolution it gained a little and it held all it gained. I quote his illustration, not making the same application of it; I make a very different one.

We have gained at every revolution a little in Georgia, and we retain all that we gain. We are moving steadily forward. We commenced with an attendance of 48,000 the first year. The second year we had 83,000, the next year 136,000, the next 156,000. I shall not follow the statistics along. Year before last (my year's work has not been footed up, as the returns are not all in) we went up to a school attendance of 236,000. We have never failed to gain as much as 9,000 in any year. We have gone over that in attendance every year, and the colored people have proceeded pari passu with the whites in their attendance. They commenced with 6,000 and went up, according to the last return, to 86,000 colored children in our schools. There is no discrimination made; no man can afford to do it in an office in my State. So strong is the school sentiment in favor of the administration of exact and equal justice that no man can afford to do it. We are struggling to do the very best we can with our limited means.

I have read a good deal on the subject of the school history of this country and of the different States. In addition to that, I have been giving my attention to this great subject of the education of the races for eleven or twelve years. I have been reading whatever fell into my hands, and you will excuse me when I say that considering the circumstances in which we were placed, the great disadvantages under which we labored, the immense difficulties which we had to contend with—considering all these things and considering the work achieved, I do not believe the equal of it has been done in any State of this Union in any time during the past. If it has, it is not within my knowledge. We have wrought a marvelous work, but we are unable to do what ought to be done. We come to you and ask the interposition of the strong arm of the Government, the Government of your fathers and of our fathers, for we are one of the old thirteen. We stood shoulder to shoulder with you in that contest, and I want to say here today that if another contest shall arise our people will stand by the people of New England and the people of the Middle States in supporting the power and the authority of the Government of the United States.

Gentlemen, I do not know that I could state anything further that would be of service to you. I wish to add that I was greatly gratified when my brethren here from New England, and from the great Northwest, and from the Middle States, and from the Southern States, met in council, and when we sat down as brethren, and when we agreed almost unanimously upon every point to be submitted to this committee for consideration. We are practically a unit, and on all of these recommendations the men from all portions of the country agree.

Now, gentlemen, begging pardon for taking up so much of your valuable time, and thinking that it is proper for me to yield to others who may have something to say on this occasion, I shall conclude by asking, as I know I shall have, the candid consideration of this great question of the education of the masses, greater than questions of commerce, than questions of currency, than questions of tariff, than questions of constitutional law—greater than any questions that statesmanship will have to contend with and settle, because we make the people, and without the people we can have nothing else. We make the men and women of the country. I shall say nothing further.

Representative Updegraff, now dead, asked this question, to which Mr. Orr responded:

I should like to ask the honorable gentleman whether the average time of continuance at school has increased?

Mr. ORR. Our last Legislature succeeded in adding about $100,000 to the fund. We shall have this year very nearly $600,000 to operate with. We shall be able to run our schools in many of the counties absolutely free for four months of the present year—that is my estimate—and in all of them paying the entire expense for three months. We are adding just as rapidly as we can.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. HARRIS in the chair). The hour of 2 o'clock having arrived, the Chair will lay before the Senate the unfinished business, which the Chair believes is the bill to which, by the unanimous consent of the Senate, the Senator from New Hampshire is now addressing himself. It is now before the Senate in its own right for consideration. The Senator from New Hampshire is entitled to the floor.

Mr. BLAIR. Hon. Hugh Thompson, of South Carolina, was before the committee and made the following statement from his standpoint as a prominent citizen of that State, and as superintendent of public instruction, I think, at that time:

Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, in presenting the view of South Carolina I shall ask to call the attention of the committee to three points:

First. That the State of South Carolina is now doing all in her power for public education.

Secondly. That it is impossible in her impoverished condition for her to furnish the means of education to the masses of the children; and Thirdly. That the aid we ask for, if granted at all, should be granted immediately.

I have brought here some figures from the school returns of South Carolina which I wish to read, and as I have no set speech to make to the committee, I shall be glad to answer any question that any member of the committee may wish to ask. An interruption will not interfere at all with the line that I shall take.

I call the attention of the committee, first, to the fact that in 1877, when I took charge of the department of education in South Carolina, the first thing I did was to call for a statement from the different counties of the amount of past indebtedness, known as the school indebtedness. I was aware that it was large, but I was surprised to find when the returns came in that we had upon us a debt of $210,000 due against the school fund. This debt at that time of $210,000 was supposed to be the full limit, but upon subsequent investigation it turned out to be much larger. During the period from 1877 until the present time we have been attempting to pay off this debt. In some of the counties the debt has been entirely liquidated, and there are not more than one or two counties now remaining in which there is any considerable debt to be paid. But that debt has hampered us in every move we have made to strengthen and develop our public-school system. In addition to that we have a debt of $191,800, known as agricultural land scrip. There was not one cent of that money to be found in the treasury; the last dollar of it had been misappropriated. That fund, too, has been restored.

The committee will observe, therefore, that we have paid a debt of over $400,000, money that ought to have been used for elementary and higher education, and that we have thus been hampered in our attempts to make the school system as strong as it might otherwise have been.

The assessed value of the property of South Carolina to-day is nearly $138,000,000. We have three sources of revenue from which our school-tax is derived. First, it comes from a constitutional tax of 2 mills on the dollar upon all the taxable property of the State. The amendment to the constitution making this a part of the organic law of the State was adopted in January, 1877. Observe, gentlemen, that this is part of the organic law; it is not subject to changes by different Legislatures. We are glad to state that each year the income from this source grows larger and larger as the assessed value of property is raised.

The second source from which we derive an income is from the poll-tax. There are in the State of South Carolina, on the books, 140,000 polls, and the poll-tax there is $1 a head. We have never succeeded in collecting more than $114,000 from this source, owing to the fact that a large number of the voters of the State are entirely without property, and we can not enforce the collection of even the $1 per head.

The third source from which we derive our revenue is local taxation. This mode of raising taxes is becoming more and more in vogue each year. At each session of the Legislature we find different towns coming forward and asking permission to levy additional taxation.

The misuse of the public money during the first years of the school system, from 1868 to 1877, and especially the abuse of power under the local-tax laws, is one of the great obstacles that the school men of South Carolina have had to contend with, because we are constantly met with the charge that the thousands of dollars that were wrung from the people within the period named were misapplied, were stolen and misappropriated, and that this public-school system is only an engine of taxation, the money for which will not be carried into the channels for which it was intended. I believe, though, that this spirit is rapidly passing away. As I said the other night before the association of superintendents, I am convinced that if to-day the question of maintaining the public-school system of South Carolina were submitted to a vote of white citizens alone, by a very large majority they would be in favor of maintaining it and strengthening it and of developing it so far as may be in their power.

I should like to call the attention of the committee, in order to show what the State is doing in this respect, to a brief comparison of the taxes collected for the different purposes in South Carolina. The whole of the State tax, in round numbers, is $629,000. The proceeds of the county taxes are about $800,000, making a total of nearly $1,500,000. The proceeds of the school and poll taxes, according to the last return of the comptroller-general, were $465,000. In other words, the school tax of South Carolina is about one-third of all the other taxes that are collected in the State. The assessed school tax was $465,000. Of course the actual amount collected was a little less than that, being about $425,000, because there were a good many delinquent taxes.

In addition to this the State now makes an appropriation of $24,000 for the University of South Carolina. That university has two branches, the old South Carolina College at Columbia, for the whites, and the Claflin College at Orangeburg, for the colored. The Claflin College is partly supported from benefactions by benevolent persons at the North; but these two institutions for the higher education of white and colored are maintained by the State at an annual cost of about $24,000. In both these institutions instruction is free; no charge whatever is made for tuition. In the Claflin school at Orangeburg we have a normal department for teachers, which is each year turning out successive bodies of skilled and trained teachers, who are doing estimable work for the colored. In addition to this the State has recently made provision for the re-establishment of its military academy, appropriating $15,000 this year for that purpose. In this military academy there will be supported now, as before the war, two cadets from each county, who pay nothing whatever. They are supported in full by the State, and they are required to teach two years in the public schools of the State after their graduation. There will be another class of young men in the institution known as pay cadets, who will pay moderate tuition for themselves, and will not be required to render any service. They will pay their way through the institution. Besides that we have the normal institute, supported by the State, this year an appropriation of $1,500 having been made for that purpose.

You will observe, therefore, gentlemen, that we are appropriating now about $465,000 for elementary education in South Carolina and a little over $40,000 for higher education, making a total of more than half a million dollars which South Carolina is devoting to this purpose, with an assessed valuation of property of but $138,000,000.

I should like to call the attention of the committee to another comparison. The whole expense of the State government of South Carolina for the last year, inclusive of interest on the public debt, was $238,575. The expenses for the maintenance of the charitable institutions, there being but two, an asylum for the insane and one for the deaf and dumb, were $116,164. Therefore the expense of public schools and of charitable institutions was $581,164. For these purposes South Carolina appropriates two and a half times as much as she does for the whole expenses of her State government. For public schools alone she appropriates twice as much as she does for all the expenses of the State government. I mention these facts in support of the position which I take that the State is doing all that she can do for the maintenance of her public schools.

I now desire to call the attention of the committee to the second point I make, which is that the State of South Carolina is unable because of her impoverished condition to give proper instruction to all classes of her people. The scholastic population of the State—children between 10 and 16 years of age—as made by the returns of the county school commissioners in 1875 (I have been unable to get the returns of the census, which are more accurate, and I doubt not will show even larger figures than these) was, whites 85,678, colored 152,293, making a total of 237,971 children. The school attendance in South Carolina for the year 1880-'81 was, whites 61,339, colored 12,119, making a total of 73,458 at the public schools. The expenditure per capita of school population is $1.95, the expenditure per capita of school attendance $3.50. I call the attention of the committee to the fact that while these schools are free and open to all and no distinction is made on account of race or color, according to these returns (which are inaccurate, because I believe they are below the truth), we have 100,000 children in the State of South Carolina whom we are unable to educate for the want of larger means. The number of public schools in the State last year was 3,057, the number of white teachers 2,026, the number of colored teachers 1,223, making the total number of teachers 3,249.

Taking the illiteracy of South Carolina shown by the return of the last census, which I had an opportunity of observing last night, the ratio of white illiterates to the whole population is 7.77 per cent.; the ratio of colored illiteracy to the whole population is 33.09. I maintain that as far as controlling the white illiteracy in the State is concerned, South Carolina is able, ready, and willing to control it; and that she is equally ready and willing to control the colored illiteracy, but that it is beyond her power to do so. It is from this class of our citizens, a class to whom I claim that the State government of South Carolina in all its departments has done full and ample justice, that the trouble comes. I believe I speak the sentiment of the majority of the people of the State when I say that we in South Carolina feel that the safety and prosperity of the State depend upon the education of that class of our citizens. I need not speak to you, gentlemen of the committee, of the limited opportunities that the colored people have had heretofore for education, but you know that the absolute need for it now is such, that if the United States Government does not hold out a helping hand to us at this time we shall continue to send forth each year illiterate voters by thousands.

Bear in mind, gentlemen, that one generation of these people has grown up without the opportunities of education. This generation has got now the fathers and mothers of another generation coming along. It is a well-established fact, a principle recognized by all, that to appreciate education is a consequence of education itself. It is necessary, therefore, for the State and for the General Government to come to the front at this time, and to make South Carolina and other Southern States what I believe the people of those States desire that they shall be, thoroughly educated.

I will call the attention of the committee to the fact that there are now in the Southern States about 5,000,000 children ready and needing the opportunities of education. The expenditures of the Southern States under this head are about $7,000,000; but little more than a dollar a head. It would take at the lowest calculation $30,000,000 to furnish the opportunities of education to our children in the South. Gentlemen, I say, as one knowing the spirit of the people and knowing their limited resources, that we have not the means to furnish this education.

I do not propose to detain the committee with any argument as to the right of the General Government to furnish the means for which we ask. I desire to say for my State, and I am sure that I speak the sentiment of other States, that we do not come here as mendicants in this matter. We do not come here asking for charity. We have put our own shoulders to the wheel; we are using all the efforts in our power, and we simply ask of this great Government that it will come to our aid now in the time of our great necessity, because if this aid is withheld now, if it is not granted now, as I have shown, there are thousands of children whom we are unable to educate, and who need this assistance at this very moment, who will not be educated.

I was told this morning, since I entered this room, by a gentleman to whom I was introduced, that South Carolina always liked to be in the front. As of old, South Carolina wants to be in the front in the matter of public education. It is for that reason we have come here, because we have not the means, as I have stated, to furnish this education ourselves. I believe it is but a few moments ago when some gentlemen from this side were called before a committee of the House of Representatives of Congress with regard to the deepening of the harbor at Charleston and the improvement of that harbor. That great work is now going on under the charge of a distinguished engineer, a distinguished soldier, whose duty it was during the war to leave more imperishable marks upon the city of Charleston. He is there now in the quiet pursuits of peace, deepening that harbor, and giving to South Carolina an outlet for her trade and her commerce which she has so long needed; but, gentlemen, there is a need that South Carolina has not second even to the deepening of the harbor of her great metropolis. Great as are her resources, wonderful as her power is when fully developed, the true source of her strength and of her power is in the brains of her people. It is for that purpose we are here to ask the Government to give her the means of developing the brains of her people, and we do ask that we may have an opportunity of coming to the front and staying there, as one of the States of the Union, contributing our share to the civilization and the progress of this great country, and making South Carolina as one of the States of the Union, contribute her quota to make the people of this whole country once more free, prosperous, happy, and united.

I call the attention of the Senate to these particulars because they demonstrate that on the part of the State of South Carolina there is really being a very earnest and energetic effort made to educate the children of the State so far as can be done with the available revenues. I call special attention to the following statement made by Hon. J. H. Smart, then and for many years superintendent of public instruction of the State of Indiana, as that of one of the most distinguished educators of the country, and a Northern man whose associations have been such as to make him a conservative and reliable observer. I am proud to claim him as a son of New Hampshire.

ADDRESS OF J. H. SMART.

Dr. DICKINSON. I now present a gentleman eminent as an educator, a friend of education, who is here to represent the North. I refer to Hon J. H. Smart, of Indiana, and I will say before he commences that Mr. Smart presided two years ago at the meeting of the National Teachers' Association which met at Atlanta, and he knows well the spirit of the people of that country.

Mr. SMART. Mr. Chairman and gentleman of the committee, I shall detain you just long enough to state a fact and to express an opinion, a fact in reference to the need of the South, and an opinion in reference to their willingnees to do what they can.

It has been my fortune to be able to make several visits to a number of the Southern States, and on one of these, taken last summer, I was driven from one of the popular summer resorts in the State of Georgia to the railway station, a distance of about 18 miles—a road frequently traveled, because this summer resort was largely visited by Southern people—by a negro who owned his own team, letting it to the hotel proprietors and his own services during the summer months. He informed me that he owned a little house and a small amount of land; that he rented fifty acres, and I found that he knew a good deal about the condition of things in his locality. I have talked with several hundred negroes in the South as occasion offered, and I want to tell you some of the answers this driver gave to some of my questions on this ride.

This man was thirty-two years of age, and he told me that he had tried to learn; that there was a school within a reasonable distance, and that he had attended that school; but he confessed that he had not been able to learn very much. He was a man of more than ordinary intelligence for one in his condition. I asked him if he knew the name of the President of the United States, and he said that he did not. I asked him if he knew the name of the governor of his State; he said that he did not. I asked him if he had voted for the President of the United States at the recent election; he said that he did vote. "Can you tell me for whom you voted?" "No, sir; I cannot; I don't recollect." "Do you know anything about England?" "Yes, sir; I have heard something about England." "Is it in the United States?" "I do not know." "Is France in the United States?" "I can't tell you; I think it is." "Did you ever hear of Governor Colquitt?" "Oh, yes; I think I voted for him. Is he the man you spoke of a moment ago?" "No, he is not the President of the United States." "Did you ever hear of Garfield?" "Oh, yes; he was hurt, wasn't he; he was shot, wasn't he?" "Is not that the man you voted for?" "Yes," he thought it was.

Now, this man, unable to read his ballot, is not a subject whose duty it is to obey, the sum of whose political duties is found in the word obedience, but he is a sovereign, and the ballot is put into his hands. It has been put there by the national Congress That man makes the law that governs me. Forty per cent., as I am informed by Dr. Orr, of the voting population of this State are illiterates; there being 80,000 of them.

I related this incident to a number of Southern superintendents a while ago, and I was told that it was a typical case, much to my astonishment, and that what I found here with this negro was to be found in thousands of cases in the other States. I believe that the State of Georgia is in danger, and not only the State of Georgia, but the State of Indiana, from this state of affairs—in more danger than if one hundred thousand men were to land on the coast of Georgia to day fully armed and equipped for war, and that the State of Indiana will suffer from this condition of affairs.

Now, I want to express the opinion that the Southern people are willing to do all they can to cure this great evil and remove this great wrong, and, so far as I have observed, the work that has been done, under existing circumstances, has been a marvelous work. The Southern people have made a heroic effort, certainly in three or four States that I have visited, to do the best that could be done for these colored people. I want to say that throughout the length and breadth of the Southern States, without one exception, the colored people are given the same advantages that the white people are given. No distinction whatever is made; and, so far as I was able to find out, there is an almost unanimous, certainly an overwhelming, sentiment in favor of educating the colored children equally with the white children. And I believe, from what I saw, that we are able to trust the existing State organizations represented by these gentlemen; we are able to trust them with whatever means we can appropriate, and I speak after some investigation and after deliberation.

There is a pressing need, and these gentlemen have told you about it; there is no necessity for me to talk about it, but I want to express the feeling that I think exists in my own section of the country; that this appropriation ought to be made—not only for the protection of the people of the South, but for the protection of the people of the North; that while we do not need it for our own illiterates, for we ought to be able to take care of them ourselves, we need it because we suffer from an ignorant ballot, and we see danger in it, so that we join our brethren from the South in asking Congress to make an adequate and speedy appropriation in order that this great evil may be rooted out.

Mr. M. A. Newell, then superintendent of public instruction for the State of Maryland, a very able gentleman, spoke as follows:

Mr. Chairman and gentlemen, I am not here to-day to make any special plea in behalf of Maryland. We think that in a small way and in the course of time we shall be able to take care of our own people in the way of education. I am here to show that, so far as Maryland is concerned, we are in absolute accord with the gentlemen who have already addressed you. We look upon ignorance not as a local but as a national question, and we consider it as much or nearly as much of an evil to have ignorance in Florida or Georgia as it would be to have it in Maryland or in Pennsylvania. Yet I think, Mr. Chairman, though you and the gentlemen of the committee have studied this question long and deeply, you are hardly aware even now of the immense mass of ignorance that is pressing upon us not only in the South but in the Middle States and in the North. I can hardly bring this more pointedly to your notice than by stating a few simple facts with regard to my own State.

I have been at the head of the educational department of Maryland for fourteen years successively, and therefore I know all that I am going to say of my personal knowledge. We spend every year a million and a half dollars for common school education. We keep our schools open in most of our counties ten months in the year, in none of them less than seven months and a half, and an average of nine months of every year. Our teachers are reasonably well paid; they are properly selected, and are doing their work as well as can be expected under the circumstances. All our surroundings are in favor of education. The people believe in it for themselves, and they believe in it for their neighbors. And yet, Mr. Chairman, after sixteen years of a uniform State system, well supported, tolerably well endowed, the last census reports 134,000 illiterates in the little State of Maryland.

Now, sir, the argument is, a fortiori, if, after sixteen years of hard and honest work, we have not been able to wash out this black stain of ignorance, what chance have our friends in South Carolina and in Georgia and in Florida to deal with theirs?

Mr. Chairman, I am old-fashioned enough to think still that the State ought to do nothing that the private individual can do as well, and I am willing to carry it further, and to say that the National Government should do nothing that the State Government can do as well; but all history and all experience prove to us that the individual is not able to educate his children; he has never done it in the history of the world; the State must come in and aid him in the work; and I think we have proved abundantly that in our Southern States, at all events, the State is not able to do the work of education. Therefore, I say it is the duty and the privilege of the National Government to come in and help the States to do that which they are willing but are not able to do.

The above statement from the efficient superintendent of Maryland demonstrates not only the necessities of his own and other States, but the further fact that even with the prolonged school year an immense outlay is required to increase the accommodations that the surplus school population now not reached at all may be brought in.

Hon. D. F. De Wolf, superintendent for Ohio, spoke thus for Ohio and the central Western States:

Mr. DE WOLF. Gentlemen, there is one point that I should like to speak of for the State of Ohio, and I think for the central and Western States. I have mingled with these people for forty years; was with them during the great struggle that resulted in the reconstruction, so called, of the Southern States. Those States were a party to the doctrines that were embodied in that reconstruction when they united in imposing on the Southern States a large body of voters. They took the responsibility of imposing upon that section of the country and upon the United States a large body of voters. I do not know but that they did wisely and I do not know but that they think they did wisely, but they think they assumed very great responsibilities, and I think they are ready now to consider those responsibilities, and to take what action may be necessary to meet those responsibilities.

Rev. Dr. A. D. Mayo, of Massachusetts, who is as well informed upon this subject as any man living, next addressed the committee. Dr. Mayo is well known throughout the country. His views have been expressed on many occasions, and they are those probably of the largest and perhaps the most accurate observer in the Northern States upon this matter of the school condition of the people of the South.

Rev. Dr. MAYO. Gentlemen of the committee: I suppose my brethren have asked me to say a word to you because for the last two years I have spent my whole time during the school year in visiting the schools of twelve of the Southern States, from Virginia to Texas, inclusive. During this time I have had the most ample opportunities afforded me by the State authorities, by teachers, by citizens, by pupils, by people of every class, to ascertain the condition of educational affairs in that portion of the country, and I feel that I am in a condition to form intelligent opinions in regard to the several matters that will come before you in this consultation. Of course time will not permit me to give the data or the reasons for conclusions which I may express to you, but ever since I began this work—and I would say that previous to that I had no personal knowledge of affairs in the South, and never went through the South until two years ago—several conclusions have forced themselves constantly upon my attention.

In the first place, I am fully prepared to indorse that emphatic declaration of Dr. Curry, who perhaps better than any Southern man understands the educational condition of the South, when he says that the illiteracy of the Southern States is absolutely appalling. By this I do not wish to say that the leading classes of the Southern States are an ignorant people. I find them there a very cultivated people; I find a people equal to any people in the world; I find as a class the white people of the South are fully up to the people of any State in the Union in natural capacity and force; but the condition of illiteracy which exists seems to me absolutely appalling. And one little point I wish to call your attention to here: Not only is this illiteracy confined to the colored people and the poor white people, but there is great danger, unless something can be done soon, that great numbers of the children of the better classes of white people in the South will be plunged into illiteracy.

No class in the South suffered so much from the effects of the war as the respectable leading class of white people in the South, and to-day there are hundreds of thousands of boys and girls growing up through all the Southern States, the sons and daughters of the leading people of those States, who, unless something can be done very soon, will be doomed to grow up in ignorance. Perhaps the most pitiful thing that can happen to any State is that it should lose what it has gained. While the blacks and the poorer whites are really better off in educational affairs than ever before, the children of the better classes of people are absolutely worse off than they ever were before.

Now, to meet this condition of illiteracy, it seems to me utterly idle to speak of anything but a system of thorough elementary education afforded by the State. No church system of schools, no private system of schools can meet the exigency. There must be a system of elementary education, which includes the training of teachers, proper school-houses, and everything of this kind, in order to meet this great want.

Another matter has forced itself very constantly on my attention, which has been alluded to before, which is this: I am pretty well acquainted with the condition of education in our country and in other countries, and I have no hesitation in announcing to you, gentlemen, my conviction that never within ten years in the history of the world has an effort so great, so persistent, and so absolutely heroic been made by any people for the education of the children as by the leading class of the people in our Southern States.

Practically, within ten years every one of these Southern States has put on its statute-book a system of public schools; practically, within this time every district of country in the South has received something that can be called a school. This school public, as we may call it, consisting of State officials, of school officers, of superior teachers, of thoughtful people all over the South, is to my mind the most forcible, the most persistent, the most devoted school public now in any part of the world. There is no body of superior teachers doing so much work for so little pay and under such great disadvantages as in the South to-day. There is no minority of people working so hard to overcome this terrible calamity of illiteracy anywhere in the world to-day as in the South. I give this as the deliberate result of two years of observation in twelve States.

Once more, gentlemen, it seems to me that in building up this system of elementary education our Southern people have come almost to a halt. For the last ten years the school public has been working in every conceivable way to bring the attention of the people to this matter, and I believe to-day that the practicable limit of taxation is about reached. We may say ideally and abstractly that the Southern people can give more than they do for education; but practically, looking at them as we look at every people in the world, I believe that the limit is reached. And what is the condition in which we find things there to-day? Perhaps $10,000,000 is expended through these States of the South for elementary education, and there seems to be just about money enough to put on the ground a system of schools which, while it is an improvement to the negro and to the poor white man, is profoundly unsatisfactory and insufficient for the leading class of the white population of the South; in other words, the introduction of the public-school system has broken down the old-fashioned system of education by which the white people obtained their help, and has introduced an inefficient system, so that a multitude of these people really have no good place to educate their children.

Let me illustrate the state of things: Here is a town or a district that has a thousand dollars, all told, for school purposes; with that thousand dollars that district can establish an insufficient school for three or four months in the year, with an inexperienced teacher, in an insufficient school-house; a school which is not satisfactory to the best people, which cannot do the work that should be done. That is the course of things all over the Southern States, in cities, in country towns, and in the country districts, and the crying want through all that country is that what these people now have shall be supplemented by enough to put a good school system at once on the ground.

We must remember, gentlemen, that nine men out of ten in the South never saw what we call a good public elementary school. The thing that is necessary is to put for one year, for two years, for three years, in every district through that country a school that will be a fair representative of a public school, that the people can see it; and once having seen it and enjoyed its benefits they never will give it up again. Now, it is utterly impossible for the average school authority to get the money to put such a school on the ground. Give to that man another $500, another $1,000, and at once, without wearing himself out with importunity, he can put on the ground the school that the people need; a school that, instead of being a school that satisfies nobody, is a school that satisfies everybody; and once having seen that school for one year, for two years, for five years, for ten years, that people will be stimulated to great exertions and will never give it up.

Let me illustrate this by one spectacle which I saw which will put you in full possession of this point. The little city of Goldsborough, N. C., has about four thousand people. Up to a year ago that city had no school in it which was satisfactory to any portion of the white inhabitants of the city; it had a poor public colored school under the county authorities. Six months ago a few of the enterprising citizens of that city were able to put into operation a thorough white graded school. By the aid of the Peabody fund they were able to secure an expert for a teacher, so that school took all the children in the town. Four hundred children were put into a good school-house, graded and organized; over them was put an expert teacher, and at once it was shown to everybody in that town what could be done with a good graded school. I visited that town one day, and it was like going to a town that was under the effect of a religious revival; everybody was in a state of delightful excitement; everybody was asking me to see the school; people were coming from all parts of the country to see it, and just because the agent of the Peabody fund could come in with his thousand dollars and give to that school the expert which made it what it was. The battle was won, the thing was done, everybody was satisfied, and the whole region around about was being instructed and brought up to that work.

Such schools in county towns mean good schools in the country districts. What we ask you, gentlemen, is to give to these school authorities everywhere through the South money enough to supplement what they are now doing; so instead of an insufficient school, as they have now, they can put on the ground at once a good school, which will satisfy the people, which will confirm them in their desire to sustain education, and which will give them a fair understanding of the benefits of the institution.

Now, gentlemen, just one word more and I am done. I fully concur from my observation in all that has been said on several points. First, the South needs this money at once. It is an urgent case. Are you aware, gentlemen, that the average school life, reckoned by months, of the average boy east of the Alleghanies is four years; the average school life of the Western boy, reckoned by months, is three years; the average school life of the white and colored school boy in the South is less than two years; the average school life of the average Southern boy is not one year?

This is a turnpike gate through which these children are streaming, and while you are debating and consulting on the feasibility of different methods, generation after generation, you may say, are streaming through.

What is to be done should be done at once to meet the great demand of the present.

In the next place, money enough ought to be given to do the work at once. If the roof of your house is on fire and you are obliged to put it out by carrying water in buckets it does no sort of good to have a ladder that reaches to the second-story window. You are just as badly off as if you had no ladder. What you want is a ladder that reaches to the roof, that will take you up where the danger is. The school system of the South to-day does not reach the full magnitude of the difficulty. Give enough at once to enable the school authorities to put a good school on the ground everywhere, and the difficulty is met.

One thing more, gentlemen. I am acquainted with the State superintendent of instruction, I believe, in every Southern State. I am acquainted with the State school board, I think, of every Southern State but two or three. I have studied with great care in the records of all those offices their methods of distribution of money. I believe there is no set of men in this country who are handling a moderate amount of money with greater economy, with greater fidelity than these gentlemen. It seems to me it would be a great mistake in distributing such funds as you give to put into each of these States a dual administration. If that should be done, I believe that at once $100,000 or $200,000 of money would be thrown away, virtually, for supervision. I believe if there is any set of men in this country that can be trusted to administer a fund of $10,000,000 or $15,000,000 in thirteen or fourteen States with fidelity it is the school authorities of those States, and therefore it seems to me that this money should go directly to the children through the accustomed channels, of course being guarded by all proper safeguards in the central power.

Among the cities of the South, no city has done so much as the city of Charleston. I know all those cities. No city has done so much with so little help as the city of Charleston. We have to-day two representative men with us. We have the mayor of Charleston, who represents what has been done in that city. We have, in another citizen of Charleston, a young gentleman who is a fine representative of the kind of young school men that we must rely on to do this work through the country. If your time and patience will permit, it will give me great pleasure to introduce to you the mayor of Charleston, Mr. William A. Courtenay.

Mayor Courtenay spoke as follows:

Mr. COURTENAY. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen, having in view the great pressure upon your time, I can best show my appreciation of the honor you have done my city by limiting what I have to say to a very brief statement of facts.

I will say that about twenty-five years ago we commenced in Charleston the system of public schools which was then being spread over the country. There were in 1860 four large, substantial brick school buildings of modern construction, calculated to seat comfortably eight hundred pupils each, which in the then condition of our affairs was ample for the children that were then being educated. One of these buildings was destroyed by the fire of 1861, so that when we resumed our school work in 1865 or 1866 we had three school buildings with an average capacity of eight hundred seats, and we took the Shaw Memorial School into our public school system, which had been erected in 1865, making the same number of school houses and about the same number of comfortable sittings. We have made an equal division of those school-houses—two are for white children and two are for colored children—and there are in the Morris street school (which is the largest colored school we have) eighteen hundred children packed into accommodations intended for eight hundred.

That is our school situation to-day. We have been for five years levying a small tax, and a new school building will be completed this year which will somewhat relieve the pressure, but we need really two or three more commodious buildings for school purposes, which we shall build in time when we can raise the money.

Now, gentlemen, in addition to the tax which is common all over the State of South Carolina, a constitutional tax of two mills, Charleston has paid during these last fifteen years an additional tax of from one to one and a half mills for the purpose of giving accommodations such as we have to give in these very crowded school-houses to a portion of the children of the city. I need not tell you that what was intended to accommodate 3,000 children will not accommodate 6,000, and that although there are over 4,000 children crowded into the schools, there are children who can not get a place inside the school-house to stand or sit, and are, therefore, not being educated. We have a very large city debt, and we have a large amount of charities to distribute every year, orphan houses and hospitals; the expenses of the city government are very nearly as much as those of the State; we have reached the limit of taxation; and we look naturally to the United States Government to come to the assistance of the city, the State, the South, and the country generally in illiteracy, and make some provision by which this great trouble can be cured.

I made a rough calculation hastily this morning without the data to make it accurate; but I assert here that the city of Charleston has paid for education over and above the State taxation since the close of the war somewhere between four and five hundred thousand dollars, and we will continue to do the best we can under any circumstances. But in view of the great burdens which are pressing upon us in many ways, because of the want of improvements in our city, and our great charities, which take from fifty to seventy thousand dollars a year—nearly 10 per cent. of the whole income—we feel that we can with some confidence come here and express our opinion in common with all other sections of the country for material and important aid.

If the gentlemen of the committee will be kind enough, I should like my friend Mr. Bryan to occupy the remainder of my time.

Mr. Bryan is a young, cultivated, and highly intellectual man, and seemed to be the embodiment of the better time which is to be. His remarks profoundly impressed the committee. He was an eloquent, vigorous young man, I suppose a truly representative man of the rising life of the Southern portion of our country. No man ever made a stronger, more vigorous, and more pathetic appeal for aid or for assistance of any description than did this young gentleman of great ability from Charleston, S. C. Any Senator who will read that and vote against this bill is less of a Senator than I think.

Mr. ORR. Mr. J. P. Kennedy Bryan is the young gentleman who has been referred to, the son of the United States district judge for South Carolina.

The CHAIRMAN. We shall be happy to hear Mr. Bryan.

Mr. BRYAN. Mr. Chairman, I would hardly deem it in this presence, with so much gathered wisdom and experience, proper for me to be heard here, were it not that the subject-matter which the committee is now considering is one that appeals and has appealed to me for years, young as I am, and one that is, I think, the first in the mind and the heart of the youth of the South. The burden of this question, the shoulders upon whom it is to fall, are those of the youth of that Southern country, who now wish to control its destinies, and who now, for weal or for woe, await the decision here at this Capitol.

After what has been said by my friend Dr. Mayo, after what has been said by gentlemen from Massachusetts and from Indiana, after what has been said with regard to the State at large by my friend Colonel Thompson, I need hardly speak; and I would not speak but that I think by giving you a pictorial image of the city of Charleston in facts and figures, that concrete thing, I can show you that even municipal aid added to State aid, with all the agencies of private education, in an old community and aid coming from the city that doubles the State aid, still we stand appalled before a tide that we cannot meet nor control. It is only because the city of Charleston is a representative community of the South and expresses the conditions of all those States, and in a more favorable way than the country districts, that I will give you the facts and the figures relating to that community, because those facts and figures will bring home the question in its reality and show really what is our necessity and our danger.

That city is more favored because it has in it the seeds of a cultured society; it has in it men of mighty powers from the past, and those men are there, and they think, and they feel, and they see what is upon us. It has in it not only that, but men who have a sense of duty and men who have conscientiously risen to all the burdens of this occasion.

Why, gentlemen, in 1860 the city of Charleston had an educational plan greater than any Southern city. It had a system of public schools in which there were four thousand white children, besides large private schools, which fully met all the demands of that city. To-day it has that same educational plan, and in those schools are four thousand children, two thousand white and two thousand colored. There is an equal division of the school facilities. To do that, the city of Charleston has to add to what the State revenue is for schools just as much again. It pays this year $72,000 in a city of fifty thousand, in which there are twenty-three thousand whites and twenty-seven thousand colored, the colored paying 3 per cent. of the tax. After we have raised the local tax, double what the State gives, we find that we only have four thousand children in the schools; that is, we only have in schools what we had in 1860 of whites. More cannot enter the schools; they are packed.

Gentlemen, the tax of a citizen of the city of Charleston to-day is 3.5 per cent. on every dollar of real and personal property. The city debt of the city of Charleston requires the levy of ten mills. Repudiation we cannot go to. There is 1 per cent. levied in that city for the debt of the municipality. Then there is the State debt. With these heavy burdens, by the census and by the report of the superintendent of schools of the city of Boston, we pay on a ratio one-third more than the city of Boston pays for its whole system of education, primary and classical. We pay to-day one-third more than the city of Boston does in the face of a debt of five millions upon the city of Charleston.

Gentlemen, when his honor the mayor came to the control of that city, in the same spirit of zeal and in the same interest that he overlooked all the departments, we got at the facts and the figures, and he said it is the duty of the city, simply as a representative city of the South, and on behalf of all, to reveal to the country this terrible and appalling condition to say to them, here is a national calamity; it is common in its origin to the people of this country; it is equally common in its evils and in its effects. We thought, and the city of Charleston and all the men there think to-day, that the National Government alone can help us—not to do for us, but simply help us in that which we cannot do. If the tax goes above 3.5 per cent. it is a dismemberment of society. We simply ask you to hold up our hands; we simply ask you to roll back that tide. Where it will sweep we know not, and I, in all deference, do not think that all the wisdom here can tell us where it will sweep. We ask you do not let it overwhelm us and you. We thought and were led to believe that that Government, which, under the power of the Constitution, has the right to provide for the public defense referring to the time of war, and for the general welfare referring to the time of peace (for surely that was in the mind of the framers of the instrument), would come to our assistance in this time of calamity.

We were led to believe that that Government which, when the cries came from the Mississippi Valley under the most awful deluge of the last five decades, sent immediately and within a day aid to those people asking for bread. We were led to believe that that same Government, acting on the same principle, would send to a more hungry people, who if unfed the worse will be the disaster, that bread of national life which they ask. We were led to believe that that Government which, when pestilence struck this country, in one day raised the means and sent broadcast over the land succor where small-pox or yellow fever struck, would send some relief to a more awful pestilence that is working in the body-politic. We were led to believe that that Government which, in its beneficence, looking to the general welfare of the agricultural interests of this land, sends from this national center good seeds in order that the labor of the husbandman may prosper and that he may gather fruit and an abundant harvest—that that same Government, on that same principle of general welfare, would give us not only good seed but some good seed to plant in this waste.

Gentlemen, it is only because the city of Charleston furnishes you such an example, it is only because I think we feel it as an old community, and we know what this thing means and what is threatened all the time; it is only because it is a representative city in that regard of all our Southern communities that I have spoken.

I think, I feel, in fact I know, that it is in the mind and the heart of the assembled representatives here from this land to help. I am sure we have not come and told our simple story in vain. We look for aid, and we expect it, and we trust that from that seed of national aid shall come great and abundant harvests that will overflow here in good government, in peace and prosperty years and years to come.

Hon. B. G. Northrop, secretary of the Board of Education for Connecticut, so well known for his life-long and very important services in the cause of education in placing certain valuable statements before the committee, urged an immediate appropriation. I read his remarks because he is a New England man, and a representative man, as truly a representative of the opinions and feelings of educators in that portion of the country as any man can be.

Dr. DICKINSON. Mr. Chairman, I now present Hon. B. G. Northrop, secretary of the Board of Education of the State of Connecticut.

Mr. NORTHROP. I desire to lay on your table, Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, a paper containing extracts from the speech made at Atlanta by ex-Governor Brown on the eve of his election to the Senate, an extract from the speech of Robert C. Winthrop at the Yorktown celebration, and in full a speech of Rev. Dr. Curry, bearing all entirely on this subject. And while I am up may I say that this is not a new measure, but when friends of the measure have pressed it before members of Congress in former years, the objection has been "you cannot force schools on any community; schools must answer to local public sentiment, and that public sentiment does not exist." That was the former argument. Now I say in addition to the proofs presented by gentlemen from the South as to the interest you have in that paper, I think a most remarkable demonstration of the interest taken, by the fact that ex-Governor Brown should make such a speech on the eve of his election, and it is a more remarkable fact that on the basis of that speech advocating this measure, advocating free public schools for all classes, he should be elected to the Senate of the United States by so large a majority. It demonstrates the new era in the South. I think that if the plan of giving $15,000,000 for this object is carried out now it will be worth more than $20,000,000 will be twenty years hence. The case is urgent; the need is immediate.

* * * * * * *

I must say that this measure, I am confident, will suit the North as well as the South. I have in this paper I have handed you printed the sentiment expressed by the Connecticut State Board of Education most heartily, and also other expressions of Northern sentiment; and may I mention in the briefest form one other fact showing the great change that has occurred within the past year? This subject was advocated ably before our association at its meeting in New York, one year ago, by ex-Senator Patterson, now the superintendent of education in New Hampshire. He advocated then that the money should be distributed by a large number of Federal officers in all the States That met but one dissent at that meeting a year ago; that is to say, a majority of this association seemed to favor his plan, but one objecting. At this meeting every member of the association has expressed his views in favor of the plan of distributing the money through existing local officers. We are a unit on that point.

The resolution of the Connecticut State Board of Education referred to is as follows:

Resolved, That in view of the necessity of education to the perpetuity of free institutions, and of the great and disproportionate burden which adequate provision for universal education would impose on some of the Southern States, this association expresses its conviction that it is the imperative duty of the National Government to extend to those States in which the burden and the danger of illiteracy are greatest such pecuniary aid as shall enable them to provide that all the children and youth within their borders shall receive at least an elementary education.

The State Board of Education has formally expressed "its hearty approval of the sentiments of the above resolution, and its earnest hope that the influence of Connecticut in the national Congress and elsewhere may be exerted in favor of the adoption of some equitable and efficient means for the accomplishment of the end proposed."

The following letter is in reply to one addressed to Colonel Rogers, superintendent of public schools of New Orleans, by myself, in which, mentioning the fact that Dr. Bicknell, one of the most able, active, and earnest advocates of national aid to public schools, had understood him to say that he should not know what to do with a large sum if he had it, and that it might be lost or stolen, I requested him to present his views in full for publication. I ask the Secretary to read his answer. He has given his life to this work in Louisiana.

The Secretary read as follows:

NEW ORLEANS, March 6, 1884.

DEAR SIR: Your favor of 3d instant is just to hand, and I hasten to reply.

My friend Colonel Bicknell has evidently mistaken my views in regard to national aid for education. Our conversation upon the subject was fragmentary and of a personal character. So far as I can recall the words used by me they had no reference to the main issue, but were incidental to a feature of the subject, designed to show the necessity of a cautious, well-regulated, systematic, expenditure of a large sum of money in a large city where school attendance was voluntary, and where the object was to bring in the large class of children who are now beyond school influences. I certainly never intended to intimate, directly or indirectly, that if any part of this national aid was to be expended in Louisiana by our State and city authorities it would, by reason of such form of disbursement or indeed for any cause, "be wasted or stolen."

Officially I can only speak for New Orleans. In twenty-five years past connected with educational work in this city I cannot be entirely ignorant of the condition of affairs in other parts of the State.

For several years I have had a growing conviction that if we are to give public education to all classes of our educable population we must have outside aid from some source. I believe that this is the opinion of the great majority of persons who are familiar with the situation. With those who are engaged in educational work I know of no difference of conclusion as to the necessity of aid. You are furnished with the statistics of illiteracy. It is not necessary to repeat them here. They are not mythical. Those who are engaged in the work of education know that illiteracy is a present factor, and that statistics simply reveal how much is done or not done, and how insufficient are the means at our command.

Our school population in New Orleans between six and eighteen years of age was 61,456 by census of 1880. For the year closing December 31, 1881, the whole number of pupils enrolled in our public schools was 24,401; average daily attendance, 14,566; average roll, 17,027. Our school population has increased, while school attendance has diminished. For the current year our total enrollment will not exceed 17,000, and our average attendance will fall short of 13,000 pupils. Estimating the number of children in private and parochial schools in this city at 10,000, and the number over twelve years of age who are engaged in some industrial pursuit at 10,000—a large estimate—and there are about 36,000 children and young persons of educable years who are not in any school, of whom about 26,000 cannot be accounted for as either attending school or industriously employed. We are confronted with the fact that instead of overtaking ignorance, as it exists among the young persons in our midst, we are losing ground, and that to an alarming extent, since not only do we not keep pace with the increase in our population, but our school attendance has steadily declined.

The chief cause of this decreased attendance arises from the insufficiency of our school revenues. For the proper care and instruction of an average roll of 17,000 children, including cost of supervision, instruction, buildings, supplies, &c., we need an annual expenditure of $270,000. This implies a session of nine or ten months, necessary in a city system, yearly salaries of employés, &c. Our entire revenue, from all sources, falls short of $220,000. A constant pressure of financial restriction and curtailment naturally tends to contract the usefulness of the schools. Last year, 1883, our session was reduced from ten to seven months, all teachers having been discharged from service and the schools closed during three important school months. For several years past, the teachers have not been paid for two or three months of the year, and have held our school system together by their unrequited labors during that period.

Mr. BLAIR. Mr. President, I challenge the history of the world to produce a fact more honorable to humanity than the noble self-devotion of this body of instructors of youth or more disgraceful to a great people than the neglect of both State and nation which rendered their self-sacrifice necessary.

The Secretary read as follows:

Notwithstanding the fact that the city of New Orleans has entered upon a prosperous era, those who control its finances maintain that they are giving as much to education as can be spared from the general revenues. I do not propose to question the correctness of their statement or the wisdom of their policy. I only know that we do not get enough, and that those who make the appropriations say they cannot give us more. I know also that it follows from this want of money that our schools are not doing all the work which they might otherwise do, and that more and more children are growing up in ignorance and idleness, with stronger inducements to immorality and vice.

We have between three thousand and four thousand colored children in our public schools They share equally with the white children in the privileges of education. They are instructed by competent teachers, have good buildings, and their condition is as favorable to their progress as any other class of pupils. The city government has not been able, since the war, to increase the amount appropriated in former years to one race only, and as the colored people pay but a small part of the cost of education, it follows that the colored pupils in the schools are mainly instructed at the expense of the whites, and that the children of the whites have been put on short allowance to make provision for the other class.

I know of no feeling antagonistic to the education of the negro. On the contrary, there is a growing opinion, so far as I can judge, in favor of extending to that class of our people the fullest and fairest opportunities. The kindly spirit which characterizes the relation of the two races in this city and State extends to their respective schools. There are no contentions or animosities. Teachers of equal grade are sent sometimes to the schools for colored pupils, or, again, to the whites, and I know of no hardship to which the colored pupils are exposed, by means of insufficient funds, in which the whites do not equally share.

We certainly do need aid for public education in the city of New Orleans, and if we had the money we could make good use of it. I believe if its distribution was intrusted to our State and city authorities it would be wisely expended for the equal benefit of all classes and conditions of our school population

The present system could be strengthened and enlarged. Additional schools could be opened in portions of the city where they are much needed. The city school board has had before it for some time past applications from remote sections of the city asking for school privileges where none exist for either white or black children. Nothing but the want of funds has prevented the board from complying with these requests. Even under our purely voluntary school attendance, I believe that several thousand pupils could be at once, within three months, added to our school attendance if means could be provided for their efficient support, and I think it would follow therefrom that the usefulness and influence of the schools would steadily increase, so that we would be able to reduce the bulk of illiteracy by permanent progress in the intelligence and virtue of all classes of society.

So far as the condition of public education in Louisiana, outside of New Orleans, is concerned, it seems to me of even greater importance that we should have outside assistance if we propose to make any advance in overtaking illiteracy. The total school population of the State is 273,845. From the last published report of State Superintendent E. H. Fay, the attendance in all the public schools of the State, including the parish and city of Orleans, in 1880, was: whites, 31,642; colored, 22,670; total, 54,312, or less than 20 per cent. of the school population. Outside of New Orleans, in 57 parishes, there were 819 schools, with 16,326 white children and 17,075 colored children. The average salary of teachers was $25.62 per month. Six parishes reported, "No schools for want of funds." Nineteen parish boards report a session of 3 months or less. The aggregate of all months reported from all the parishes was 144!

For 1881 there was an increase in the whites and a decrease in the number of colored pupils. The last Legislature, 1882 (we have biennial sessions), appropriated one mill on the dollar for public education. Upon an assessed valuation of the property of the State of $200,000,000, this would give, if all collected, $200,000. Under the State constitution and legislative enactments this school fund is charged with certain specific appropriations, aggregating about $90,000, all of which must be paid before any sum can be given to free public schools. After these deductions, and allowing for the non-collection of taxes, we estimate the amount allowed for free public education at about 31 cents per capita on school population. The amount is too small, and we are looking to the next session of the legislature, May next, for a more liberal policy.

Nevertheless, we are not confident of any very great increase in our school appropriations. A constitutional amendment, to be voted by the people, may be necessary before there can be an efficient school system for the State. The power to impose a local tax for education must be conferred upon parish authorities. At best the relief must be partial. The relations of the capital and population of the two races are such that a system of public instruction which is intended to meet the wants of the entire educable population, and which shall be sustained by a revenue derived from the property of the State, is beyond all present possibilities. Such a tax could never be imposed with the consent of the people. It could not be collected, if authorized, without breaking down every industry, and virtually confiscating the property of every planter and merchant in the State. To give six months' instruction to 200,000 young persons in the primary branches of a common-school education would require 5,000 teachers and an expenditure of a million dollars.

The friends of education do not contemplate a scheme so impracticable. We know that time and patient effort are needed to build up any great enterprise. We think that it is possible to strengthen and enlarge our present system of public instruction, so that it may be put in the way of ultimately accomplishing the great objects which it contemplates.

What would national aid do for Louisiana?

It would enable parish school boards to open schools where there are none now for want of funds. It would prolong the sessions of schools which are now kept open for one, two, or three months only. It would draw large numbers of children from idleness and ignorance to the school buildings, and it would enable school boards and other authorities to employ trained, competent teachers, who should be paid reasonable salaries with a regularity and promptness which secures cheerful and skillful service.

In rural parishes the services of young persons over 12 years of age are useful to the planter during several months of the year. From four to six months may be devoted to systematic school work, and if this should be continued only four or five years the seeds of a better life would be planted, and important results would follow to the individual, to society, and to the country. In a well-conducted school there may be acquired, by the average child, white or colored, during the period named, ability to read and write; to understand and perform the ordinary examples of arithmetic as needed in common business transactions; to know something of the geography and history of the country; to acquire habits of order and industry; to distinguish between right and wrong in the duties of life, with such moral lessons as grow out of every well-regulated school-room.

When opportunities for securing these results are within the reach of all classes—the poorest and lowest, as well as of the children of the more favored classes—we may reasonably expect a useful, honorable, and an intelligent citizenship.

Without education, we have unskilled labor, a discontented class of society, thriftless, heedless, with brutal passions and degrading vices, ready, when roused by fanaticism or demagogism, to hurl against the peace of society or the best institutions of the country a compact and powerful voting minority which already holds the balance of power between the two great political parties of the country.

At no period in the history of Louisiana has there been manifested a greater interest in the subject of education than at the present time. This, I believe, is generally conceded by the leading public men of the State. The subject enters largely into the present political canvass. An educational society has been formed in New Orleans, which already has a large membership of leading merchants and representatives of all trades and professions. Branch organizations have been established throughout the State. The fundamental principle of the society is free public education to all classes of children without distinction of race. We hope, by means of aroused public sentiment, to secure for public schools their full share of the resources of the State, but I imagine that the most sanguine friend of public education cannot hope to materially change the figures of illiteracy, now resting upon the good name and well-being of the State, without the use of more abundant means than can be now drawn from the Government, or the people of Louisiana in the present condition of public and private affairs.

Asking to be excused for the length of this commnication, I remain, dear sir,

Yours, respectfully,

WILLIAM O. ROGERS,
Superintendent Public Schools New Orleans.

Hon. H. W. BLAIR, United States Senate.

Mr. BLAIR. On Saturday, February, 16, 1884, a joint session of the Senate and House committees having in charge the subject of national aid to schools was held in the room of the Senate Committee on Education and Labor.

Dr. Orr and a committee of the superintendents of public instruction of the States, Dr. Thomas W. Bicknell, president of the National Educational Association, Professor Painter, and others, composing a committee of the department of superintendence of the National Educational Association, were present and addressed the committee for four hours.

The proceedings are published in Senate Miscellaneous Document No. 55, Forty-eighth Congress.

I respectfully refer the Senate to these addresses voicing the universal sentiment of all parts of the country, and coming from some of our ablest, best-informed, unselfish, and patriotic men, whose express business it is to know whereof they speak, deploring this all-pervading national evil of popular ignorance, demonstrating the necessity of national aid, and beseeching, not to say demanding, as our first duty, its bestowal as the only adequate source of relief. It is impossible to attempt even a synopsis here of what they said.

Permit me here to add the memorial of the American Social Science Association, than which the opinion of no body of men whatever is more entitled to respect by the American Congress or the American people.

AMERICAN SOCIAL SCIENCE ASSOCIATION,
Boston, December 28, 1882.

To the Senate and House of Representatives in Congress assembled:

The American Social Science Association, impressed with the danger involved in the existence of a large number of illiterate voters in the population of this country, as revealed in the last census, for the proper enlightenment of which class of voters many of the States are unable to make adequate provision, and believing that a Government resting on the suffrage of the majority of the people cannot preserve itself from corrupt influence nor secure a high degree of civil freedom unless education is generally diffused among all classes of voters; and further believing it to be within the constitutional power of Congress to provide in this manner for the safety of the Republic, and that the enfranchisement of the freedmen imposes an especial obligation upon the Government to qualify them for a safe discharge of the new duties devolved upon them, would earnestly pray that your honorable body will take prompt and efficient measures to avert these dangers; that money raised from such sources as your honorable body may in its wisdom deem best shall be distributed, for a limited period, to the common schools of the States and Territories, on the basis of illiteracy, and in such manner as shall not supersede nor interfere with local efforts, but rather stimulate the same and render them more efficient; said moneys to be distributed under such guarantees as shall secure their application to the object herein named, with equal justice to all classes of citizens.

Prepared by order of the American Social Science Association by the council of the association.

FRANCIS WAYLAND, President.

Attest:

F. B. SANBORN, Secretary.

These petitions are not gotten up in the way that petitions are gotten up for a new highway. They are signed by men whose signatures are meant to indicate responsibility.

Rev. Dr. Curry, the general agent of the trustees of the Peabody fund, whose services to the country in the discharge of a great trust have already fixed his rank high among its benefactors, has addressed a memorial to the Congress, which I take this means of placing more conspicuously before the Senate and the public. I am at a loss to comprehend the motives which can refuse the necessary assistance to educate the classes for whom Dr. Curry, in his representative and personal capacity, makes this argument and appeal. I ask the Secretary to read it.

The Secretary read as follows:

To the honorable the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States in Congress assembled:

Your petitioner, the general agent of the Peabody education fund, would respectfully represent:

That in March, 1880, the trustees of the Peabody education fund submitted a memorial to Congress on "the vital necessity of national aid for the education of the colored population of the Southern States, and especially of the great masses of colored children, who are growing up to be voters under the Constitution of the United States." They accompanied their memorial by a report which had been prepared by a committee of their body, consisting of Hon. Alexander H. H. Stuart, of Virginia, Chief-Justice Morrison R. Waite, of Ohio, and Hon. William M. Evarts, of New York. The attention of Congress is invited anew to that very able and conclusive paper. Since the presentation of that memorial the subject of national aid has assumed larger proportions in the public mind and in the public conscience.

The census of 1880 exposes a fearful amount of illiteracy in the United States. As might have been expected, for an obvious reason, that illiteracy exists largely, disproportionately, in the lately slaveholding States. In ante bellum days the negroes were not educated. Since the abolition of slavery—a fact which no sane man would undo—the South, although making patriotic and self-sacrificing efforts in that direction, has failed, as all familiar with her pecuniary condition could have foreseen, to provide universal education for her people. The history of our country, prolific in instances of exalted patriotism and ready adaptation to local and national exigencies, furnishes no exhibition of these virtues superior to the attempt of the Southern States to meet the unfamiliar and difficult, but cheerfully assumed, obligation of giving rudimentary instruction to all classes, irrespective "of race, color, or previous condition of servitude." The history of public schools in those States is a chapter of peculiar interest in the general history of our institutions and civilization. The credit due to an impoverished people, bravely struggling to do their part in the new and strange environments, is shared by religious bodies and individual citizens of the North, who, comprehending the needs of the young, have generously and munificently contributed money to supply them with the means of education. Hard experience has demonstrated the inability of the Southern States, unaided, to sustain the heavy burden of universal education. If illiteracy is to be removed, or prevented in the future, the States must receive liberal and prompt aid from the General Government.

This aid should be rendered in co-operation with the school systems of the States. Those systems, varying in details, but generally copied from the systems which exist in the Northern States, are the outgrowth of the convictions of the people. Year by year they are being adapted to the wants and peculiarities of communities and States. Constitutions command free schools; statutes establish and provide for them; State and local officers administer; State revenues are increasingly supplemented by local taxation. No organized opposition to public schools can be found; political parties are zealous to declare their purpose to sustain and perfect; press associations approve and newspapers give their valuable support; legislatures invite educators and advocates of free schools to address them; the people are willing and eager to be informed and to adopt improved methods of instruction and school management. With probably the most extensive acquaintance with school officers in the South possessed by any man in the Union, acquired by personal intercourse with them, I make bold to affirm that no departments of government have better qualified, more patriotic, more trustworthy, more enlightened administrators. What is needed for success in making education universal is not severe Federal supervision, subordination of State schools to central authority, but a well-guarded and adequate appropriation of public money.

Of the extent of the illiteracy your honorable bodies, having ready access to the latest census returns and to careful compilations of school statistics, need not to be informed. On the dangers of this illiteracy it would be superfluous to enlarge. The basis of our free governments is intelligence and integrity. Free government presupposes intelligent self-government. The mere possession of power by the people is no assurance or guarantee of good government. Civil government can dispense with arbitrary restraints and with physical power; can allow the possession and enjoyment of personal liberty just in so far as the citizens impose, voluntarily and intelligently, restraints upon themselves. Free governments, governments of the people and by the people, allowing and securing the largest measure of individual freedom, are compatible only with popular education. It is idle to hope for free government or republican institutions apart from free schools.

From the act of the Continental Congress on the 20th of May, 1785, for the disposition of the lands ceded by Virginia and the other States to the present time, the United States is committed to the principle that "popular education is the only safe and stable basis for popular liberty" and to the policy of using Government property in aid of public schools. What was a privilege and duty in the past has now become an imperative obligation. The general argument for Congressional intervention to remove or prevent illiteracy becomes stronger when applied to the negroes. As is stated in the report to which attention has been called, the production of the pen of an honored and venerable statesman of Virginia, they are an "exceptional class of our population," and as such have peculiar claims on the justice and bounty of the Federal Government.

Their ancestors did not come voluntarily to this country seeking to better their condition, as come the immigrants who by thousands are now flocking to our shores. They were brought forcibly as slaves and were held as such prior to the Revolution by the connivance and direct action of the mother country and under the authority of the laws of all the States. When the war for independence closed slavery existed in all the Colonies. The Federal Constitution sanctioned the institution. In the exercise of its discretion the Federal Government emancipated the slaves, elevated them to the dignity of American citizens, and invested them with the right of suffrage. "Slavery is but half abolished, emancipation is but half completed, while millions of freemen with votes in their hands are left without education." The new citizens need to be made to comprehend the duties of citizenship, to be taught the nature and benefits of the political rights they enjoy. From manumission and enfranchisement there is on the part of the Government a resulting obligation to secure to those suddenly exalted to citizenship and suffrage that amount of education which is necessary to enable them to discharge intelligently the new duties devolved.

Inter arma leges silent is recognized in times of extreme peril as a legal maxim. When the national life is endangered the Constitution yields to a liberal interpretation. The latitude is not because of war, but because of the crisis which war sometimes creates. If the necessity be as great, the peril as imminent in time of peace as in time of war, then with equal reason may be invoked the principle, salus reipublicæ est suprema lex. That masses of ignorant voters constitute a national peril, justifying a resort to the "extreme medicine of the Constitution," it would be an insult to your honorable bodies to argue.

The evils of ignorant voting cannot be exaggerated. Four Presidents in succession, with increasing emphasis, have invited the attention of Congress to legislation on the subject. State Legislatures, educational conventions, religious assemblages, public press, and private citizens swell the demand for immediate and effective measures of relief.

It seems that each generation must pass through its own trials, as each person must be disciplined for his own improvement and growth. We reap the fruits of the sacrifices and achievements of our ancestors, but for ourselves we must endure trials and meet responsibilities. Our Republic is a holy trust. Much as our fathers did, none the less are we required to do. Free institutions are still an experiment. They are on trial before the world. No peril is greater, more insidious, more pervasive, arouses more the apprehension of the patriot, than the illiteracy of citizens. Fortunately the evil is remediable, and the remedy is in your hands.

Your petitioner earnestly invokes your intelligent and continuous attention to the dangers which come from so much illiteracy, and trusts that action, prompt and adequate to meet the emergency, will be had before your adjournment.

J. L. M. CURRY.

RICHMOND, VA., May 17, 1882.

Mr. BLAIR. I may add as a recent expression from Dr. Curry, the agent of the Peabody fund, what he says in a letter:

A letter before me from one of the best scholars and most active school men in the South says: "The argument is unanswerable. Here we stand face to face with the necessity. All over this State the taxes of the white people cannot be made to suffice for the education of both white and colored; with the utmost goodwill, the resources are deficient. Nothing but national aid can solve the problem, and without it there is great danger that the effort may be abandoned in despair."

That last sentence is unspeakably important. If this Congress adjourns without the aid, I shall almost surrender hope in reference to the future of our country. May God save our land.

The Union League Club of New York City comprises over sixteen hundred of the leading citizens of the United States, residing in all parts of the country. Probably no body of men, unless it were the several loyal, sovereign States, did so much as the Union League Club of New York to preserve the Union in time of war, or since the war has done so much to make it worth again preserving by their wise and patriotic endeavors to reconstruct the Government upon principles which are indispensable to its prosperity. I therefore introduce the following from their memorial to Congress, presented to us by Senator MILLER:

THE UNION LEAGUE CLUB,
New York, February 10, 1882.

DEAR SIR: The following report was accepted and the appended resolution unanimously adopted at a regular meeting of the Union League Club, held on the 9th of February, 1882.

We request you to present them to Congress, as being the respectful petition of this club.

Very few subjects equal in importance that of elevating the illiterate voters in the United States to the condition required for the proper enjoyment and protection of universal suffrage.

It appears from the census of 1880 that of the total colored population, over 47 per cent. are unable to write. Of the total white population, nearly 7 per cent. are unable to write. These percentages are much higher in the South. Those unable to write in Alabama are, whites, nearly 17 per cent.; colored, over 53. In Georgia, whites, nearly 16 per cent.; colored, over 54. In North Carolina, whites, over 22 per cent.; colored, over 51. In New Mexico, whites, 49.5 per cent.; colored, 69.5. In many of the States the means for instruction are confessedly insufficient to cope with this great evil.

The want of education and of consequent ability to use the suffrage so as to protect the voter from fraud, violence, and misdirection, and our free institutions from peril, have caused the introduction into the Senate of the United States of a bill entitled "A bill to aid in the establishment and temporary support of common schools.

The Secretary of the Interior, through the Bureau of Education, is charged with the administration of the act, aided by a commissioner in each State, to be appointed by the President by and with the advice and consent of the Senate. The commissioner thus appointed is to act in co-operation with the State authorities in which he is located. In Territories this commissioner is charged with the general supervision and control of public education.

All payments under the act are to be made by Treasury warrants directly to the person in each State or Territory who renders service, on vouchers to be approved by the local authorities, the commissioner, and the Secretary of the Interior.

It will be seen, therefore, that the amount payable in any State or Territory can neither be diverted nor squandered, but that careful provision is made for the application of it directly to the purposes of education. The bill is comprehensive as well as guarded, and is to continue only for the length of time supposed to be required for stimulating the most sluggish of the States into the requisite activity.

The condition of the Treasury, with a large annual surplus, tempting to useless schemes of extravagance, would seem to be a favorable time for the adoption of a measure to secure the enlightenment of the uneducated and the safety of our republican form of government.

The Constitution, in express terms, provides, section 4, article 4, that "The United States shall guarantee to each State in this Union a republican form of government." The powers necessary to carry out this guarantee are implied and are therefore complete. By the act of the National Government a large body of illiterate men have been suddenly raised from the condition of chattels into that of freemen and voters, without any preparation for the high duty which admission to the suffrage involves. The extraordinary measures resorted to in States where the danger from this source is most conspicuous, often leading to bloodshed and anarchy, would seem to impose on the General Government the immediate duty of seeing that the republican form thus threatened by the two evils of illiteracy and violence shall be preserved. The necessary and proper means for this consists in such a wide diffusion of the benefits and blessings of education as will secure the requisite intelligence and patriotism.

The committee of political reform recommend the adoption of the following resolution.

GEO. B. BUTLER, Chairman.
S. M. BLATCHFORD, Secretary.

Resolved, That the Union League Club heartily approves of the scope and object of the bill introduced into the Senate of the United States by the Hon. HENRY W. BLAIR, of the State of New Hampshire, entitled "A bill to aid in the establishment and temporary support of common schools," and that the president and secretary of the club be directed to affix their names to this report and resolution as being the respectful petition of the club to the Congress of the United States in favor of the passage of the bill.

We have the honor to be, very respectfully,
WM. M. EVARTS, President.
DAVID MILLIKEN, JR., Secretary.

To the Hon. WARNER MILLER.

I wish to say, as bearing upon the expression of popular feeling and opinion on this subject, that I have here a large number of data of memorials which themselves are so large that, if all printed, I suppose the world would not contain the books they would make, as was said on another occasion. It seems almost trifling with the time of the Senate to accumulate this mass of evidence of popular feeling to be inserted in the RECORD. It is here, and it is ready to be produced if anybody should ever conceive the thought that there is no expression of the general popular, and that the best popular, sentiment on this subject.

The following is an imperfect list of the petitions and memorials praying for aid for the common schools on the basis of illiteracy:

Citizens of Romney, West Virginia.
One hundred citizens of Circleville, West Virginia.
Citizens of Jackson County, West Virginia.
Citizens of Nicholas County, West Virginia.
Citizens of Webster County, West Virginia.

I have collected citations from high authorities, and historical illustrations, bearing upon the necessity of education, especially in a republic. They are from authors of other nations as well as our own. Many of them are of high literary merit. They are good reading. I will read a few of them. Before proceeding to do so, I wish to make one statement as bearing on the interest of education in our Southern States by reason of the liberation of the colored people. The historical example nearest our shores, that of the liberation of the blacks in the British West India colonies, might well be adduced, and should be instructive to us. There the British Government, more considerate, perhaps, than our own, gave pecuniary compensation to the extent of about $100,000,000, if I remember correctly, to the owners of the emancipated slaves. No provision, however, was made for the education and the elevation of the colored people. They have had freedom so far as it could exist under the British constitution, and they have had degeneracy and demoralization accompanying it. Without wasting time to depict the causes of the social condition and industrial condition of those people, I will state one fact which is significant of almost everything else that could be said, that such is the social degradation of that people that most social ties are disregarded, poverty is universal, and over 60 per cent. of the annual increase of the population is illegitimate. Let me quote from the American Cyclopædia, volume 15, page 17:

> The government measure was brought forward April 23, 1833. It proposed an apprenticeship of twelve years for the slaves, and to pay out of their earnings to the masters the sum of £15,000,000. The friends of emancipation remonstrated against these features of the plan, and it was finally modified by a reduction of the term of apprenticeship to six years, and a provision to pay the masters £20,000,000 out of the national treasury. The bill passed the house of commons August 7, the house of lords August 20, and received the royal assent August 28, 1833. The day fixed for emancipation was August 1, 1834, and it was left optional with the local legislatures respectively to adopt or reject the system of apprenticeship. Antigua and Bermuda rejected, while the other islands adopted, the system. The apprenticeship system did not work well.

It ought to be known and is known that like causes produce like effects. It is well known to those who have taken pains to be informed by evidence coming to them, though they may never have been in the Southern States themselves, and I have some personal observation that has instructed me, so that I am convinced of the fact that the general condition of the colored population in very much the larger geographic proportion of the South is growing worse rather than better. The colored population when disciplined by their former legal status were much more industriously inclined than the youthful colored population that is now growing up. The colored youths now are not so quiet and good-natured and easily managed and tractable a race of men as the Northern people are inclined to think. I believe that they are rapidly becoming demoralized, an idle, thriftless population, with a tendency to violence, and likely to become a source of as much danger to the United States as a population like this described in Jamaica can be. They increase much more rapidly from natural causes than does the white population. By the last census it is shown that they increase 7 per cent. more rapidly than does the white population of the whole country from immigration and births combined. While increasing in numbers, in my belief they are not improving in condition. In twenty-five years from now this Southern colored population, unless something is done to restrain, improve, and elevate them, are quite likely to be a source of violence and of turmoil in this country. Those who think otherwise, I imagine, will find themselves profoundly mistaken, and it is well enough to be instructed by historical examples when they exist.

I cannot take the time of the Senate a great length in reading the citations from eminent men which I have made; but I will read a few in regard to national education. Macaulay in his speech on education uses this language:

NATIONAL EDUCATION.

This, then, is my argument. It is the duty of government to protect our persons and property from danger. The gross ignorance of the common people is a principal cause of danger to our persons and property. Therefore it is the duty of the government to take care that the common people shall not be grossly ignorant.—Macaulay's Speech on Education.

The education of the people is not only a means, but the best means, of obtaining that which all allow to be a chief end of government.—Ibid.

Another great authority says:

When we see government measures, which are excellent in themselves, fail from the opposition of an ignorant people, we at first feel irritated against the senseless multitude; but when we come to reflect, when we observe that this opposition might have been easily foreseen, and that the government, in proud exercise of authority, has taken no steps to prepare the minds of the people, to dissipate their prejudices, to conciliate their confidence—our indignation is transferred from the ignorant and deceived people to its disdainful leaders.—Jeremy Bentham's Works, volume I, page 568.

Let me give further citations:

Ignorance causes poverty.

By diminishing productive capacity, and therefore wealth.

Intelligence is a most powerful factor in industrial efficiency. The intelligent is more useful than the unintelligent laborer: (a) Because he requires a far shorter apprenticeship * * *. (b) Because he can do his work with little or no superintendence * * *. (c) Because he is less wasteful of materials * * *. (d) Because he readily learns to use machinery, however delicate or intricate.—Walker's Political Economy, pages 52, 53.

By hindering improvement.

In some parts of the country the ignorance of the people of almost everything beyond their huts and potatoes and pigs, their entire lack of practical sense and judgment, and of that energetic and progressive spirit which advancement in education is apt to bring, has hitherto been one of the greatest hinderances to the progress of the country. With this ignorance there has often been coupled superstition, and a tendency to indolence, increasing poverty, distress and discontent.—The Irish Question, by King, pages 283, 284.

II. Ignorance causes poverty.

Illustration from Scotland and Ireland in 1800-'10:

I am persuaded that the extreme profligacy, improvidence, and misery which are so prevalent among the laboring classes in many countries are chiefly to be ascribed to the want of education. In proof of this we need only cast our eyes on the condition of the Irish, compared with that of the peasantry in Scotland. Among the former you behold nothing but beggary, wretchedness, and sloth; in Scotland, on the contrary, under the disadvantages of a worse climate and more unproductive soil, a degree of decency and comfort, the fruit of sobriety and industry, are conspicuous among the lower classes. And to what is this disparity in their situation to be ascribed, except to the influence of education? In Ireland the education of the poor is miserably neglected; very few of them can read, and they grow up in a total ignorance of what it most befits a rational creature to understand; while in Scotland the establishment of free schools in every parish, an essential branch of the ecclesiastical constitution of the country, brings the means of instruction within the reach of the poorest, who are there inured to decency, industry, and order.—Robert Hall's Works, I, 201, 202. (1810.)

II. Ignorance causes demoralization.

Illustration from Rome:

But we must look beyond the political institutions of Rome, and seek in her social condition the primary causes of the fall of the republic. * * * There was no union of the different classes of society in common interests and sympathies, nor any adequate gradation of classes to balance their relative forces. Without a middle class, industrious, orderly, progressive, and contented, society was broadly into the rich and the poor. And in the later days of the republic both were corrupted. The rich became more covetous and grasping. * * *

The poorer classes were no less demoralized as citizens and depositaries of political power. Pauperized by bounties of grain; corrupted by bribery; debased by barbarous and brutal entertainments; tainted with the vices of slavery; without regulated industry; disunited by the confusion of many nationalities; and unsettled by incessant wars and revolutions, they were wanting in all the elements of a sound democracy.—May's Democracy in Europe, I, pages 225, 226, 227.

Illustration from France:

The peasants, suffering from want and resenting the oppression of the feudal lords, rose in great numbers in different parts of France (in 1353); they burned many castles, murdered the owners, and committed the most frightful outrages upon women and children, * * * and in later times the like passions were to be revealed in excess no less monstrous and unnatural.—May's Democracy in Europe, II, pages 91, 92. See, also, Taine's Ancient Régime, pages 374-380.

II. 4. Poverty causes demoralization.

Illustration from Rome.

The mind itself can scarcely comprehend the wide range of the mischief—how constant poverty and insult long endured, as the natural portion of a degraded caste, bear with them to the sufferers something yet worse than pain, whether of the body or the feelings; how they dull the understanding and poison the morals; how ignorance and ill-treatment combined are the parents of universal suspicion; how from oppression is produced habitual cowardice, breaking out when occasion offers into merciless cruelty; how slaves become naturally liars; how they, whose condition denies them all noble enjoyments, and to whom looking forward is only despair, plunge themselves, with a brute's recklessness, into the lowest sensual pleasures; how the domestic circle itself, the last sanctuary of human virtue, becomes at length corrupted, and in the place of natural affection and parental care, there is to be seen only selfishness and unkindness, and no other anxiety on the part of parents for their children than that they may, by fraud or by violence, prey in their turn upon that society which they have found their bitterest enemy. Evils like these long working in the heart of a nation render their own cure impossible; a revolution may execute judgment on one generation, and that perhaps the very one which was beginning to see and to repent of its inherited sins; but it cannot restore life to the morally dead; and its ill success, as if in this line of evils no curse should be wanting, is pleaded by other oppressors as a defense of their own iniquity and a reason for perpetuating it forever.—Arnold's Rome, volume II, page 19.

Illustration from the No-Popery Riots of 1780:

I do not know that I could find in all history a stronger proof [than the No-Popery Riots of 1780] of the proposition that the ignorance of the common people makes the property, the limbs, the lives of all classes insecure. Without the shadow of a grievance, at the summons of a madman, a hundred thousand people rise in insurrection. During a whole week there is anarchy in the greatest and wealthiest of European cities, &c.

The cause was the ignorance of a population which had been suffered, in the neighborhood of palaces, theatres, temples, to grow up as rude and stupid as any tribe of tattooed cannibals in New Zealand—I might say as any drove of beasts in Smithfield market.—Macaulay's Speech on Education.

II c. A discouraged person is useless and may become desperate.

His industrial power is small.

A fifth reason for the higher efficiency of the laborers of one class or nation than of another is found in greater cheerfulness and hopefulness, growing out of higher self-respect and social ambition and a more direct and certain interest in the product of industry —Walker's Political Economy, page 54.

Fear is far less potent than hope in evoking the energies of mind or body, while efforts made under the influence of the former passion are far more exhausting than those made under the influence of the latter.—Ibid.

Discouragement may result in desperation [French revolution].

The feeling of hatred [in the French peasant at the time of the revolution, 1791] was become too strong to be appeased, because here too it was mixed with intense suspicion, the result inevitably of suffering and ignorance, and nothing but the overthrow of those against whom it was directed could have satisfied it.—Arnold's Lectures on Modern History, page 390.

III. Ignorance causes immorality.

Because its opposite, knowledge, elevates.

But to return to the moral good which results from the acquisition of knowledge; it is chiefly this, that by multiplying the mental resources it has a tendency to exalt the character, and in some measure to correct and subdue the taste for gross sensuality.—Hall's Works, I, 200.

Results of ignorance.

Where education has been entirely neglected, or improperly managed, we see the worst passions ruling with uncontrolled and incessant sway. Good sense degenerates into craft, and anger rankles into malignity. Restraint, which is thought most salutary, comes too late, and the most judicious admonitions are urged in vain.—Dr. S. Parr.

III. Ignorance causes immorality.

Ignorance vs. Education in Switzerland.

Neither in Switzerland nor in other countries do we find ignorance and poverty united with high moral qualities. In some of the cantons, however, where education is diffused, and industry and commerce have become sources of wealth, the people are contented and happy.—Dean's History of Civilization, VI, 108, 109.

Injuries from ignorance.

The laboring class, for instance, will have no mobility [if uneducated], will be in the power of the employer, will have no hope of bettering its condition of life by change of place, will be given to low pleasures. Crime and ignorance go together, and the prospect for the children of such a class is dark indeed. For the industry, morals, loyalty, and quiet of this class, for the safety of all classes, some kind of education is necessary.—Woolsey's Political Science, I, page 227.

III. 2. Immorality causes degeneration. National degeneration comes from loss of character.

But this political ruin [of the Roman Empire] was an effect of a moral ruin, not a first cause; and a nation that has lost its character must decay politically until some new condition of the world quickens it again into life.—Woolsey's Political Science, II, page 601.

Fruits of long-continued moral advance.

There are certain moral fruits so conspicuous in the history of civilization that no pessimist can dispute them. That the long, slow movements in society which have been tending with steady purpose and sure result to establish order and the reign of equal laws; to extinguish slavery; to break oppression of every form; to mitigate the barbarities of war, and to put restraints upon it; to diminish human suffering; to help the unfortunate, and to lift the debased; to cultivate the cosmopolitan sentiment and the spirit of co-operation among men—that the movements which bear this ripening fruitage are moral movements, it is impossible to deny.—J. N. Larned in Popular Science Monthly, XI, 549.)

I.V Ignorance causes error in judgment and conduct.

By opening the people to evil influences.

Nothing in reality renders legitimate governments so insecure as extreme ignorance in the people. It is this which yields them an easy prey to seduction, makes them the victims of prejudices and false alarms, and so ferocious withal that their interference in a time of public commotion is more to be dreaded than the eruption of a volcano.—Robert Hall's Works, volume I, page 203.

By deceiving him as to his interest in his neighbor.

The less instructed a man is the more he is led to separate his interests from those of his fellows. The more enlightened he is the more distinctly will he perceive the union of his personal with the general interest.—Jeremy Bentham's Works of, volume I, page 537.

ILLUSTRATIONS OF BENEFITS FROM EDUCATION.

Athenian intelligence.

Mitford was right enough when he assumed that an English county meeting reached the very height of political ignorance, only he should not have thence leaped to a similar conclusion as to the assembled people of Athens. * * * * We suspect that the average Athenian citizen was, in political intelligence, above the average English member of Parliament. It was this concentration of all power in an aggregate of which every citizen formed a part which is the distinguishing characteristic of true Greek democracy.—Freeman's Athenian Democracy, pages 146, 147.

The education of a lower class in Turkey.

In the vigorous age of the Ottoman Government the Turks were themselves excluded from all civil and military honors, and a servile class, an artificial people, was raised by the discipline of education to obey, to conquer, and to command.—Gibbon's Rome, chapter LXV.

Scotland vs. Ireland.

We have two nations closely connected, inhabiting the same island, sprung from the same blood, speaking the same language, governed by the same sovereign and the same legislature, holding essentially the same religious faith, having the same allies, and the same enemies. Of these two nations one was, a hundred and fifty years ago, as respects opulence and civilization, in the highest rank among European communities; the other in the lowest rank. The opulent and highly civilized nation leaves the education of the people to free competition. In the poor and half barbarous nation the education of the people is undertaken by the State. The result is that the first are last and the last first. The common people of Scotland—it is vain to disguise the truth—have passed the common people of England. Free competition, tried with every advantage, has produced effects of which, as the Congregational Union tells us, we ought to be ashamed, and which must lower us in the opinion of every intelligent foreigner. State education, tried under every disadvantage, has produced an improvement to which it would be difficult to find a parallel in any age or country.—Macaulay's Speech on Education.

WASHINGTON'S VIEWS.

Some views of education entertained by Washington are indicated by provisions inserted in his last will; e. g., he provided that the slaves who had not attained their majority at the time when they were to receive their freedom in accordance with his direction should be taught to read and write and be brought up to some useful occupation. He bequeathed $4,000 for the education of orphans and the children of the poor in the academy at Alexandria. He gave property for the endowment of a university which should draw to it the youth of all sections, thus preventing their being sent abroad to their injury, and reconciling local prejudices and antagonisms through friendly association.

What I have read from Robert Hall was written at the beginning of the present century in reference to a status then existing in Ireland; but it is proper to say that of late years the educational privliges of Ireland have been very greatly improved, as in fact they have been in every European country, until to-day the truth is that many of them are passing our own country in the vigilance and intensity of the effort which they are making to educate their own people. Indeed there is great danger that they will pass us, and pass us before a great while, in the matter of industrial skill, because of the greater attention they are giving to the matter, perhaps growing out of the fact that they have recently discovered the great need of the education which they want, and are making correspondingly vigorous efforts to overcome the prevailing ignorance. They also find that American production paying higher wages is nevertheless competing with them in their own markets, and likely to do so more extensively hereafter in all the markets of the world, and unless their people become educated they will soon be without employment or that form of employment giving productions for exportation to the other and increasing markets of the world. In other words, the skilled labor of Enrope, based upon general education, is coming more and more in competition with the skilled labor of America, and our superior intelligence will not much longer tell to our advantage in this direction.

I close my citations from the writings of eminent men and illustrations drawn from the history of the race by quotations from two remarkable addresses delivered before the National Education Assembly, held at Ocean Grove last August, from the 9th to the 12th, four days, inclusive.

Over sixty addresses were delivered on that occasion by American educators and some others interested in the subject. Thousands of people were in attendance, and all religious denominations nearly were represented.

Rev. J. C. Hartzell, D. D., who was the active organizer of the great work, has published the proceedings in a volume, which I hesitate not to say is of greater practical value than any other work upon the subject of education, and its cognate problems as they exist and require to be dealt with to-day than any, and I had almost said all, other sources of information accessible of which I have knowledge. The book is an encyclopedia in one volume, carefully indexed, and treats exhaustively of the following topics: Education and man's improvement; Illiteracy in the United States; National aid to common schools; The negro in America; Illiteracy, wealth, pauperism, and crimes; the American Indian problem; the American Mormon problem; Education in the South since the war; Christ in American education; Tables: Illiterate and educational status United States 1880.

On that occasion, among the sixty, the Hon. John Eaton, Commissioner of Education, delivered an address, which was full of meat, and of good meat, too. I wish to read a little from it, not his comments and philosophy, but statements of fact. I read from page 49:

But we must not pause here; we must look at the reverse side. New England to-day has but one college student, male and female, to every one hundred and sixty-seven families; whereas at the end of the first twenty-three years of New England history, or when there were 20,000 souls in the settlements, there was one university graduate to every forty families. May we not say that hence came such wisdom in laying the foundation of those States? When will the educated classes anywhere attain the same relation to the whole body of the people?

But against this attendance upon the public schools there is the non-attendance of 5,754,759. Allowing that these odd hundred thousands are in private schools that are not reported, there remain 5,000,000 of children of school age untaught. To furnish these sittings in buildings, at the usual average of $20 per sitting, would cost a hundred millions in money; to furnish them teachers would require an increase of 30,000 to the teaching corps, and a single year's preparation of these teachers at the average rate in New York would cost $10,000,000.

The pay of these 30,000 additional teachers for one year of ten months, at the rate of $32 a month, which is about the average throughout the country, would amount to $9,600,000. Add to this the items for preparation and school-house sittings necessary for these non-attending school children, and you have the grand total required for the first year of $12,000,000.

There has been an attempt to raise a laugh at the proposition of the Hon. Senator Logan to appropriate $60,000,000 in aid of education, but I give you here figures which cannot be invalidated, showing that his proposition falls $60,000,000 short of the sum which would be required to furnish for a single year all our school children now without school sittings and teachers.

Referring to myself he says:

Mr. Senator BLAIR, in his examination of this point in his recent speech, considering that Texas has a school period of only six years, states that, if the school life were properly lengthened in that and other States, the number reported without school accommodations and without teachers would be increased by three millions.

In our cities we are accustomed to expect the best teachers, best school-houses, best methods, and best supervision; but laws making attendance obligatory are wanting in more than half of the States, and, on an average, two-fifths of the children are not enrolled in the schools. Here are forced upon us the terrible problems encountered in older civilizations and more dense populations.

* * * * * * *

The fifteen States and the District of Columbia, where slavery prevailed, having a legal white school population of 3,899,961, had 2,215,674 enrolled in schools, and with a colored school population of 1,803,257, had 784,709 enrolled, and expended $12,475,044. This money, it should be remembered, is divided pro rata, without distinction of color, in all States excepting Kentucky and Delaware. In the former State the colored people have had for educational purposes the benefit only of the income of the tax upon their own property and polls and specified fines and forfeitures. By an act of the last legislature, however, provision was made for submitting to the people the question of adding a two-mills tax upon property for educational purposes, uniting this and the amount from the previous provisions for education, and distributing the whole pro rata per capita. In Delaware, $2,500 are now appropriated for the colored schools. What has thus been accomplished in these States for education may be taken as a pledge of what they will do.

* * * * * * *

To which great agency can you assign the additional burden of educating these illiterates? To the family? How many families of the most cultured and best conditioned are unable to educate their children as in former times or as they desire; and among those colored people the least supplied with schools, how widely is the family a minus quantity as a factor in promoting the improvement of the young? Shall we then look to the Church for the light to overcome this darkness? How inadequate are the resources of the Church in the South to supply sittings and preachers for the special function of declaring the gospel? How generally are they in debt? What appeals are they compelled to make to their friends in other quarters? Shall we turn, then, thirdly, to the States, already impoverished and loaded with taxes and embarrassed by questions of repudiation? In reply, let me invite attention to the fact that the taxable real and personal property reported for assessment in those States is given in round numbers as $3,379,000,000, while the real and personal property in New York and New Jersey alone is worth nearly an equal amount, or $3,292,000,000.

What would the people of these two States say to an additional assessment on their property sufficient to erect all the additional school-houses and supply all the teachers for the instruction of the millions of illiterates in the South? All are familiar with the sensitiveness in the several Northern States to the assessment of any additional tax for education or any other purpose, and there the total wealth as assessed is reported as $13,095,000,000, or nearly ten billions more than in the South.

It should be remembered, in addition to the short period in which schools are already taught in the South, that there are 2,702,835 children of age not enrolled for instruction. Take another comparison: Charleston, S. C, now levies a tax of three mills on a dollar; but to furnish the children of that State a fair approach to the instruction given those in Massachusetts would require a tax on the property of the State of nearly three cents on the dollar. This the friends of education in Massachusetts or any other State would hesitate to propose in their own case.

* * * * * * *

I must not pause to elaborate these points, but supposing (1) that the labor of an illiterate is increased in value 25 per cent. by teaching him to read and write, 50 per cent. by fairly educating him, and 75 per cent. by giving him a thorough training; and (2) that the average value of the labor of literates is the same as the average wages paid employés in manufactories, then the following computations give sound conclusions.

By the census of 1880, the number of persons of 21 years and upward in the Southern States who were unable to write was 2,984,387. If 75 per cent. of them should be taught to read and write, it would increase the value of the labor of 2,238,290 persons 25 per cent. The present value of their labor is, approximately, $248 a year each. The increase of value would be $62 a year per capita, a total of $138,773,980. If 15 per cent. of the illiterates should be fairly educated, it would increase the value of the labor of 447,658 persons 50 per cent. or from $248 to $372 a year each. The total of this annual increase would be $55,509,592. If the remaining 10 per cent. of illiterates should have the value of their labor increased 75 per cent. by being thoroughly trained, the industrial value of 298,439 persons would be raised from $248 to $434 a year each, a total of $55,509,654. By adding the three totals just given, it is seen that the increase which would come to the industrial value of illiterates in the Southern States would be, were they educated as indicated, $241,727,220 a year.

A regular computation may be made for the entire country. The average annual wages paid by manufacturers is $345. The number of persons 21 and over unable to write is 4,204,263. By teaching 75 per cent. of these to read and write, the labor of 3,153,272 individuals is increased in value from $345 to $431 a year, a total gain of $271,181,392 each year. The gain which would come from educating 15 per cent. (830,654) of the illiterates so that their labor would be increased 50 per cent. in value, would be $108,787,815. The same amount would be gained by so training the remaining 10 per cent. of illiterates that their labor would be of 75 per cent. more value; and the total annual profit to the country by the conversion of illiterate into educated labor would be, according to the premises assumed as a basis of computation, $488,757,022 a year.

Need I go further to indicate that education is a most profitable investment for both labor and capital? * * *

Omitting any reference to the influence of illiteracy during minority, or any bearing of the illiteracy of the female adults, the late census shows us that there is a great army of 1,870,216 adult males or voters who cannot write, an army nearly double that ever in the field during the late deplorable civil war. You will certainly excuse me from any delineation of the horrors of the devastation that might follow their united and concentrated efforts against the peace and order of society.

I simply call your attention to what may be the injurious effect of their silent action at the polls. The members of our respective political parties believe in the rightness of their principles and seek to make their appeal to the reason and consciences of the people; but the figures disclose the alarming fact that in eleven States these illiterate voters outnumbered the votes cast in the last Presidential election by either of the political parties. Thus, should they unite under any strong, impassioned, successful leader, they would have absolute control of legislation and offices in those States and of the election of twenty-two members of the United States Senate.

I turn now to the address of Col. Dexter A. Hawkins, of New York city, who is a prominent lawyer and publicist, as undoubtedly members of the Senate are aware. His address was upon the relations of education to wealth and morality, pauperism and crime. I read only the most pertinent extracts, and would refer any one interested to the entire address.

In 1870 the Commissioner of Education at Washington sent out a series of carefully drawn, comprehensive, and searching questions to the great centers of labor in all parts of the United States. These centers were so selected as to represent every kind of labor, from the rudest and simplest up to the most skilled. The object of the questions was to determine the relative productiveness of literate and illiterate labor. I have tabulated, reduced, and generalized the answers so as to get at what seems to me to be the average result over the whole country. This investigation—one of the most interesting ever made—brought clearly to light the following facts:

1. That an average free common-school education, such as is provided in all the States where the free common school has become a permanent institution, adds 50 per cent. to the productive power of the laborer considered as a mere productive machine.

2. That the average academical education adds 100 per cent.

3. That the average collegiate or university education adds from 200 to 300 per cent. to his average annual productive capacity, to say nothing of the vast increase to his manliness—to his godlikeness.

By the census of 1880 we had in the United States 4,204,362 illiterate adults—white and colored.

I read his computation in order to show that independent and most intelligent observers and thinkers arrive at substantially the same conclusion:

Now, putting their labor at the minimum annual value of $100 each (which is far below the average even for farm labor, while the wages of manufacturing operatives, including 15 per cent. of women and children, as shown by the census of 1880, average in the whole country $345 each per year), and the annual loss to these persons from the lack of at least a common-school education would be $50 each. This, for the whole number of 4,240,362, is $210,000,000 per year—a sum twice as large as the entire annual expenditure for public education in the whole country. This sum—$210,000,000—is a clear annual loss, not only to these illiterates, but to the community, by reason of their illiteracy.

* * * * * * *

The late slave States complain of their inability to pay the expenses of free common schools, and they raised for public education in 1880 only $10,883,104. The amount of the annual loss in these same States, from their labor being illiterate, is at least $150,000,000. The extra productiveness of their laborers over what it is now would—had they been educated, as in Maine and New Hampshire—establish and support free common schools nine months in the year for every child of the school age within their borders, and leave a surplus sufficient to support a free academy in every county and a free college in every State.

A supposition of that kind is very well, but it must be remembered that an existing state of things, where it is the status of human beings, cannot be changed but by long and expensive processes, and that to change the actual condition in these Southern States to the degree of literacy which exists in the ones referred to must necessarily be the work of ten or fifteen or twenty years.

A careful examination of the census of England, Scotland, Ireland, and of the several countries on the continent of Europe indicates that, other things being equal, pauperism is in the inverse ratio of the education of the mass of the people; that is, as education increases pauperism decreases, and as education decreases pauperism increases.

In the Grand Duchy of Baden they put into operation in 1854 a rigorous system of universal compulsory education in the elementary branches. The effect in seven years upon pauperism was to reduce it 25 per cent. It has been calculated by statisticians and students of social science that 96 per cent. of pauperism could be exterminated by universal compulsory education in the elementary branches of knowledge and industry.

* * * * * * *

In Pennsylvania, Ohio, and Illinois, three great central States, where self-support is not difficult, one in ten of the illiterates is a pauper, while of the rest of the population only one in three hundred is a pauper. In other words, in those three great central States a given number of children suffered to grow up in ignorance produce thirty times as many paupers as when given an average common-school education.

In 1870 a special investigation was made, in fifteen States, of the inmates, to the number of 7,398, of almshouses and infirmaries. Of these, 4,327, or nearly 59 per cent. could not read and write; while in those fifteen States the average percentage of illiterates was only 6 per cent. of the whole population. From this 6 per cent. came that 59 per cent. of the paupers; or, to express it in another form, a given number of children in those fifteen States, suffered to grow up in ignorance, produced twenty-two times as many paupers as the same number of children would if given a fair common-school education.

Similar results may be obtained from the census of almost every country in Europe or America.

We may safely say, then, that it is a general law of modern civilization that an illiterate person is from twenty to thirty times as liable to become a pauper and a charge upon the public as is one with an average common-school education; and that the annual loss to the community, in the United States, in the productive power of the illiterates, and in the support of paupers made such by illiteracy, is nearly, if not quite, equal to the amount that would be required to establish and maintain a free common school the year round in every State in the Union, amply sufficient for the whole fifteen millions of the children of the school age in the United States.

The annual expense of maintaining paupers—96 per cent. of whom have become such through lack of proper training while young—is at least ten times as great as would have been the expense to the public of securing an education while young to each of these paupers sufficient to have enabled 96 per cent. of them to support themselves instead of being a charge upon the public.

Education leads naturally to industry, sobriety, and economy; hence it makes one conscious of the benefits resulting from these habits.

Statistics proclaim in no uncertain voice that education is the surest preventive of pauperism; and that the expense of providing and applying in season this preventive would not be one-tenth that now brought upon society by pauperism.

The first incentive to action is self-support—gaining a livelihood. This is the very basis of personal independence of individual character, respectability, and influence. The key to self-support is education. Money and labor, invested in education, are capital invested in such a manner that the principal is absolutely safe, and the income large, sure, and promptly paid. The States should see to it that a reasonable investment of this kind is made in and for every child as it grows up.

* * * * * * *

In France, in 1868, one-half of the inhabitants could not read nor write. From this half came 95 per cent. of the persons arrested for crime. From the other, the educated half, came only 5 per cent. In other words, a given number of children, suffered to grow up illiterate, produced nineteen times as many persons arrested for crime as the same number would if educated, at least to the extent of the elementary branches.

In the Grand Duchy of Baden, from 1854 to 1861—seven years—the government, by a rigorous system of universal compulsory elementary education, reduced the number of prisoners actually arrested 51 per cent., and the number of crimes committed 54 per cent.

In the six New England States, in 1870, 7 per cent. only of the inhabitants above ten years of age were unable to read and write; and yet this 7 per cent. produced 80 per cent. of the criminals. Or, in other words, a given number of children in New England at that time suffered to grow up illiterate produced fifty-three times as many criminals as the same number would if educated to the extent of the curriculum of the public schools. This fact is a complete vindication of the moral effect of the New England system of public education, Cardinal Antonelli to the contrary notwithstanding.

In the State of New York, in 1880, the illiterates produced eight times their pro rata proportion of the criminals in that State; that is, a given number of children brought up illiterate, on the average produced eight times as many criminals as the same children would have produced if educated to the extent of the curriculum of the public schools.

In the city of New York, in 1870, among the illiterates, one crime was committed for every three persons; while among the literates there was only one crime to twenty-seven persons. Or, in other words, the ignorant class in that city furnishes nine times the criminals they would if educated in the public schools.

In the Commonwealth of Pennsylvania, in 1870, the illiterates, according to their numbers, committed seven times as many crimes as the literate class.

In Pennsylvania, Ohio, and Illinois, taken together, the illiterates committed ten times as many crimes, according to their numbers, as the literate class.

Take the whole of the United States together, according to the census of 1870, the illiterates committed ten times their pro rata proportion of crimes.

In Pennsylvania, in the years 1879 and 1880, one-thirtieth of the population above ten years of age could neither read nor write, and this one-thirtieth committed one-sixth part of the crimes, or nearly six times its proper proportion. But if we class with the illiterates the criminals who could barely read and write, but who had no education beyond bare reading and writing, it will then appear that the one-thirtieth of the population of Pennsylvania that is illiterate commits one-third of the crime, or more than fourteen times its legitimate proportion.

A careful examination of the statistics of twenty States shows the following average results:

First. That one-sixth of all the crime in the country is committed by persons wholly illiterate.

Second. That one-third of the crime in the country is committed by persons wholly or substantially illiterate.

Third. That the proportion of criminals among the illiterate class is, on the average, ten times as great as it is among those who have been instructed in the elements of a common-school education or beyond.

Fourth. That the expense imposed upon society to protect itself against a few thousand criminals, most of whom were made such through the neglect of society to take care of their education when young, is one of the heaviest of the public burdens. In the city of New York it is 50 per cent. more than the whole cost of the public schools.

In that city the annual appropriation for police, criminal courts, reformatories, jails, and penitentiaries is over five millions of dollars; while that for the training of the 385,000 school children in the city is only $3,500,000.

The average attendance at the schools in 1888 was 138,329. The "compulsory school age"—that is, the age within which all children are required by law in the State of New York to attend school—is eight to fourteen years. The number of children of this age in the city of New York in June, 1880, was 144,474; while the average attendance on the public schools of children of all ages from five to twenty-one in that year in the city was only 133,096. As a logical consequence of this neglect of education the city jails and almshouses are crammed and taxes are high.

The city, in its meager provision for education and its enormous taxation for criminals (to use an old but expressive adage), "saves at the spigot but loses at the bung."

What is true of the metropolis of the country is equally true of every city, town, village, and neighborhood.

These facts could be multiplied almost without limit.

The examination of the statistics of criminality and illiteracy in the census of any civilized state or country will give results substantially in harmony with the above.

Carlyle says that—

"If the devil were passing through my country, and he applied to me for instruction on any truth or fact of this universe, I should wish to give it to him. He is less a devil knowing that three and three are six than if he didn't know it; a light spark, though of the faintest, is in this fact; if he knew facts enough, continuous light would dawn on him; he would (to his amazement) understand what this universe is, on what principles it conducts itself, and would cease to be a devil."

I desire here to introduce a series of tables compiled from various sources, but chiefly from the census of 1880 and from returns gathered by the Bureau of Education. There are sometimes slight variations in the results obtained by different agencies, but their general accord is an indication of their reliability.

Several of the most important are taken from the report of the committee of the House of Representatives on the bill for aid of the Government for educational purposes. I refer to Mr. WILLIS'S report, very lately published; a report without which no examination of the subject will have been exhaustive, and with which no one can consider his sources of information incomplete.

These tables contain the substance of all the statistical matter in possession of the Government necessary for the study of the subject. Upon several of them I have expended considerable labor personally, but to the wise, philosophical, and indefatigable efforts of the Bureaus of Education and of the Census the credit of this mathematical and statistical grouping chiefly belongs.

There is necessarily some repetition of matter in showing different combinations of elements as they relate to different topics and propositions, but it is believed that there are important features peculiar to each table, and that the present and future will find this statistical statement one of convenient reference and perhaps of profound study.

These tables are twenty-four in number, and in order to facilitate reference to them I give a résumé of the contents of each.

Table 1. Historical and statistical data of the United States.

Table 2. Showing the area of the several States and Territories containing public lands, and the quantity devoted for educational purposes up to June 30, 1867.

Table 3. Public-school statistics of the United States in 1880, with number of teachers and pupils in private schools, prepared by Commissioner of Education. Items too numerous to mention.

Table 4. Showing the total population, school population, enrollment, average attendance, total number of teachers, length of school year in days, number of pupils or children not attending school, per cent. of school population enrolled in schools, per cent. of school population not enrolled in school in eighty-six cities, census of 1880.

Table 20. Drawn from the returns of school statistics for the year 1881 to the Bureau of Education, showing the number of youth not enrolled in school, and the expense of supplying them with the necessary school-houses, teachers, and text-books, including wages of teachers, for a school three months the first year.

Table 21. Drawn from the returns of school statistics from the Southern States and District of Columbia for the year 1881, showing the number of youth not enrolled in school, and the expense of supplying them with the necessary school houses and teachers, and the books and wages of teachers for a school of three months' length for the first year.

Table 22. Based on returns to the Bureau of Education for 1881, showing legal school population, total school expenditure, per capita of school expenditure, proportion of $15,000,000 to each State based on number of persons by census of 1880 ten years old and upward who cannot read, proportion of $15,000,000 to per capita of school population of 1881, total of school expenditure including $15,000,000, and total per capita expenditure including $15,000,000.

Table 23. Showing the sum of money which each State and Territory would receive in the division of $15,000,000 among them all in proportion to their relative population ten years of age and upward who cannot write (census of 1880, 6,239,958).

Table 24. Showing the sum of money which each State and Territory would receive in the division of $15,000,000 among them all in proportion to their relative population ten years of age and upward who cannot read. (Census 1880.)
